The right of sanctuary was common almost down to modern times when it had to be abolished on account of the abuses to which it led (see J. B. Sāgmüller in CE art. Privileges, in fin.).

j 9-15 The Appointment of Six Cities of Refuge—If a man kills anyone he becomes liable to be slain by the nearest kinsman of the murdered person. Hebrew legislation modified this custom by establishing the principle that accidental killing cannot be punished by death. But the acquittal of an unintentional homicide is subject to certain conditions. He must appear before the assembly or popular council who will decide whether the killing was wilful or not, and, in case of an unintentional killing, the homicide will take refuge in an asylum where he will be safe from the blood-avenger. For the purpose of this law six cities were to be selected, the names of which are given in Jos 20:7 f.

k 16-23 Distinction between Wilful and Unintentional Killing—The killing was to be presumed wilful: (i) when the death was caused by an instrument the use of which was likely to be fatal, such as an instrument of iron, a heavy stone, a wooden instrument or staff; (ii) when, failing this evidence, the relations between the homicide and the dead person were unfriendly, or when the death was premeditated. On the contrary the death was to be presumed to have been unintentional when, though it was caused by a murderous instrument, the relations between the two persons were friendly, and still more when the instrument was not in itself lethal. Therefore four cases may be distinguished: 1. Wilful murder: (i) death premeditated and caused by a murderous instrument; (ii) death premeditated and caused by a non-murderous instrument. 2. Unintentional homicide: (i) unpremeditated death caused by a murderous instrument; (ii) unpremeditated death caused by a non-murderous instrument.

24-32 Legal Procedure—All cases of killing must be decided according to these principles. If it is legally proved that the death was wilful, the murderer is delivered into the hands of the murdered person's relatives. But if the death was accidental, the innocent man-slayer is taken to his city of refuge where he must remain till the death of the high-priest. If during his period of detention the man-slayer leaves his asylum, he is no longer protected by the law. Only at the death of the high-priest is he allowed to return to his home.

Further laws are added. In capital sentences at least two witnesses are required (cf. Deut 17:6; 19:15). It is forbidden to accept money as a ransom for the life of a wilful murderer and to allow the innocent man-slayer to return home before the death of the high-priest. Detention in a city of refuge was not only a deliverance from the hands of the blood-avenger, but also a sort of punishment for the shedding of human blood.

33-34 Hortatory Conclusion—The land of the Israelites is the habitation of Yahweh and therefore must be kept free from defilement. Bloodshed defiles the land, and this defilement cannot be expiated except by the blood of him that shed the blood.

XXXVI The Marriage of Daughters possessing Landed Property—It had already been decided that daughters had the right to inherit their fathers' property when there was no male issue (27:1-11). This concession now raised an important case. If an heiress married outside her tribe, her property would go to another tribe which would consequently have its territory increased, while that of the wife's tribe would be diminished. Such a transference of property not being made by sale, was unaffected by the Jubilee concessions (Lev 25:13 ff.), and was therefore likely to produce a certain fluctuation and instability of the tribal possessions, and perhaps even an extensive absorption of one tribe by another. In order to prevent this inconvenience the principle was laid down that the tribe and its possessions were inseparable and therefore no property of one tribe could be transferred to another. According to this principle it was decided that the daughters of Salphaad should marry whom they pleased but within their own tribe.

b Name—Deut is the last of the five books of which the Jewish Tôrâh, the Law, is composed. The name, meaning strictly 'a second law', is taken from the LXX's faulty translation of a phrase in 17:18, properly 'a copy of this law'; but it is apt enough, since the book contains a later form, with some additional material, of much of the legislation of Ex and Num, presented as a second covenant, distinct from that of Sinai.

c Form and Contents—Unlike the other books of the Pentateuch, Deut is to be classified formally not as history or legislation but as oratory. It is a homiletic exposition of law in an historical setting, and in it both law and history are so treated as to produce the maximum of conviction and persuasion in the hearers. Hence the constant urging of motives, the impassioned tone of personal appeal, which make this 'book of the Law' so very different from ordinary legal codes, whether ancient or modern. The greater part of the book is composed of three discourses, presented as spoken by Moses to the people of Israel in the land of Moab, shortly before his death. The second and longest speech contains the large body of legislation which is known as the Code of Deuteronomy. The last four chh of the book, distinct in composition from the speeches, form a conclusion to the Pentateuch as a whole. Neglecting some minor and transitional sections (1:1-5; 4:41-49; 32:44-52), the following scheme gives the outline of the book:

Style—Corresponding to the oratorical character of Deut is its style of composition, unique among the books of the OT. Solemn, emphatic, repetitious, even tautologous, this style is a remarkable effort to expand the simple, limited syntax of classical Hebrew into sonorous and rhythmical oratorical periods. A number of phrases, such as 'Yahweh, your God' or 'our God', 'attach oneself to God', 'with one's whole heart and one's whole soul', etc., are so frequent here and so rare elsewhere as to form a distinct phraseology. And the fervent and reiterated exhortations to act in accordance with the doctrine taught are matched only by the equally passionate eloquence of some of the prophets.

Origin—Christian tradition has constantly held that Deut, as part of the Law, is to be attributed to Moses. Most non-Catholic scholars, however, in the last 100 years, have held that it is a 7th cent. composition, with nothing Mosaic about it. This 'liberal' view, generally associated with the name of Wellhausen, was based chiefly on singularities of phraseology and diction (alluded to § 210c); on inconsistencies and contradictions between the Code of Deut and the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:23-23:19) and the Priestly Code (Lev) respectively; on the remarkable correspondence between King Josias' religious reform (4 Kg 22 f., 2 Par 34) and the prescriptions of Deut; on a conception of Israelite history as developing in vacuo, little touched by preceding or neighbouring cultures; and, not least, on a philosophical concept of history as a unilinear evolution from less perfect to more perfect and from the simple to the complex. But greatly increased knowledge of the Ancient East and its literatures has occasioned, in the last 30 years, a growing tendency to reject W.'s conclusions as over-simplified, and to admit a more or less large proportion of 'Mosaic material' in Deut. The philosophical bases of the theory are rejected, and more moderate and 'traditional' explanations given of the other phenomena. Catholic writers, on the other hand, have steadily maintained the 'substantial Mosaic authenticity' of Deut (as of the rest of the Pentateuch), laid down by the 4th response of the Biblical Commission in 1906 (cf. § 48d); they have, however, varied considerably in their interpretations of this phrase, and there is as yet no general agreement on a satisfactory solution. The responses of the Commission itself make clear that it is not necessary to hold that Moses wrote or dictated every line of the book, nor even that its literary form is due to him—since it might be attributable to his 'secretaries'. He may also have used—with or without adaptations—earlier sources. Finally, an unspecified amount of additions may have accrued to the book after Moses' time. Some authors, inclining to a strict interpretation of these responses, have therefore held that Moses wrote a work substantially identical with our present Deut, to which was gradually added in succeeding centuries a small 211b quantity of notes, supplements, or glosses. Others, finding it difficult on these grounds to account for various characteristics which seemed to indicate a post-Mosaic date, have ventured on a broader interpretation, suggesting that the book contains the teaching and legislation of Moses—the latter in the form that it assumed after several centuries of evolution; but that this material was composed into a book by a later writer, who was also inspired and to whom would be due its distinctive style and phraseology. It must be noted that in such a view there is no question of a belated adoption by Catholics of a position long taken for granted by those outside the Church. (The only such position so far has been that of Wellhausen, and its inadequacy has been abundantly demonstrated.) It is simply an effort at finding 'an explanation which will be faithfully consonant with the teaching of the Church, particularly with the traditional doctrine of the inerrancy of Scripture, while being at the same time in due conformity with the certain conclusions of profane sciences' (DAS §48).

The question has been put on a new footing by the recent (1948) letter of the Biblical Commission to Cardinal Suhard (cf. § 53k), which is a significant expression of the present mind of the Holy See on the subject. This letter lays down (not as an adventurous proposition that may be tolerated, but as a starting point, universally agreed to) that the Mosaic legislation, as well as the narrative sections of the Pentateuch, underwent a steady growth (un accroissement progressif) after Moses' time; it further indicates that the responses of 1906 are not to be taken as settling the question once and for all, but are to be properly understood and interpreted in the light of certain paragraphs in the recent Encyclical. It is in the light of this letter, naturally, that the Commission's early decrees must henceforth be understood. In any view, then, a development of the Mosaic legislation, over a period of nearly a thousand years, must be allowed for. The Law was not from the first, what it had become by NT times, a sacrosanct formulary whose least phrase was sacred and untouchable. Rather it was something vital and growing, moulding the ethos of the people but also being itself moulded and developed in response to changing conditions and new situations. Its 'fossilization' probably did not occur before the time of Esdras. But it developed always from the principles and along the lines laid down by its first and principal author. Naturally those who committed to writing new laws or modified old ones, in so far as they contributed to the sacred text, enjoyed the charism of inspiration. In general, the form of the legislation in Deut seems to have been fixed at a stage midway between that of Ex and that of Lev.

The Law of the One Sanctuary—The principle set forth in the last paragraph is of some importance in considering the central law of the Deut Code in ch 12, which allows only one sanctuary in Palestine, where sacrifice may be offered to Yahweh. What relation has this prescription to the quite different laws regarding the place of sacrifice in Ex 20:22–26 and Lev 17:1–7? and further to the actual practice—also very different—followed by the Israelites in Palestine down to the time of Josias? The following historical reconstruction may be proposed, but without any claim to be a definitive solution. At Sinai a cult law was promulgated, laying down that the worship of Yahweh must differ both in manner and in place from the cult of idols: in manner, by the abstention from images; in place, by not sacrificing to him anywhere, but only at the spots that he should choose and indicate by a theophany or other sign. Sinai of course was the first of such sacred places; cf. Ex 24:5. After the departure thence the Tabernacle, wherever it was, became the centre of the cult, and during the Wandering no other public sacrifices, at least, were allowed than those performed before the Tabernacle (Lev 17), though this law too may have allowed exceptions from time to time. Thus a certain centralization of the cult was practised, which Moses directed to be continued after the conquest of Palestine, as soon as settled conditions should allow the tribes to be periodically united in one place. But the conquest took so long, and the tribes were so scattered, that this command remained for centuries no more than a vague and vaguely-remembered ideal. The idea of a central sanctuary was kept alive—at first by the Ark at Shiloh and later by the temple in Jerusalem. We have striking evidence for a centralized worship at the latter (c. 930 B.C.) in Jeroboam's action (3 Kg 12:26 ff.) in erecting sanctuaries at Dan and Bethel, expressly to prevent the Northerners from going to sacrifice at Jerusalem. This makes it clear that the law of one sanctuary, the temple, was well established and usually recognized by the orthodox, in spite of abuses. But the strict corollary, that only in this place should Yahweh be (sacrificially) worshipped, was in practice forgotten, or at least disregarded. Smaller Yahweh sanctuaries were in existence all over the country, often on the sites of Canaanite high places, and sacrifices were offered to him there, in all good faith, even by the prophets (see e.g. 1 Kg 9:12 f.; 3 Kg 3:2–4; 1 Par 21:26 ff.). Nevertheless, in proportion as Israel learnt to adopt the Canaanite civilization (under the monarchy), the frequent contamination of these rites with pagan practices, and perhaps the identification, or at least association, of Yahweh with the local Ba'als in a syncretistic cult, became a scandal to all who had preserved a tradition of the Mosaic teaching on the transcendence and exclusiveness of the cult due to Yahweh. Partial measures of reform were undertaken by Ezechias (728–700 B.C.); and a thorough enforcement of the law in its strictest sense was made by Josias (641–609 B.C.). See also § 112a–d.

For the question of the 'book of the law of Moses' found in the temple in 621 B.C. see on 4 Kg 22 and § 135d. The book was no doubt some edition of Deut; but be it noted (against many critics) that the reform was at least started prior to, hence without dependence on, the discovery of the book. The chronological order of events is given in 2 Par 34, not in 4 Kg 22; and Josias feared the wrath of Yahweh for his fathers' infidelity, but had a clear conscience as to his own practice. Hence, even on the supposition of the late composition of Deut, it was not composed as the 'programme' for Josias' reform, but rather both it and the reform were products of the same movement. Doctrine—Deut is a treasure-house of practical theology, expounded with a warmth and eloquence that touch the heart. The purpose of the discourses, never lost from sight, is to produce an unshakable fidelity to God, based on a realization of his transcendence and majesty, of his overflowing love for his Chosen People, of the kindness he has shown them and will yet show them in the future. For the Israelite this fidelity means observing the obligations of the Covenant: negatively, by having nothing to do with strange gods and their cult; positively, by devotion to the cult of Yahweh and by keeping his commandments.

God is One, supreme; sole Lord of man and of all that is. 'I, I am the One; and there is no other god but me' (32:39). In contrast to the 'gods' of the other nations, his relation to his people is not a natural one based on locality, function, or blood-relationship; it is arbitrary and historical. He could have chosen any people: he did choose Israel—but out of sheer compassion, not for their importance or moral excellence. Israel has made a poor return for this astonishing kindness—Deut deals unsparingly with their obstinacy, infidelity, and ingratitude—but though he may punish for a time, they are still his people. Of all the divine attributes, Deut most stresses Love—the original free choice of an insignificant group, the granting of the Covenant, the fostering and protection against oppressors, the frequent—all too frequent!—forgiveness, the training in the Desert, the richness of the land 211f set aside for them, the desire to see them prospering and 'rejoicing before Yahweh'. The emphasis on joy, too (cf. 12:18; 16:14 f.; etc.), is peculiar to Deut, as are also the kindness and thoughtful charity enjoined, towards one's neighbour, towards the helpless, and even towards dumb animals.

Israel's obligations arising from the above are clear. No temptation or weakness will excuse failure in this loyalty, based on every possible reason of obligation, of gratitude, of honour. And—not to omit any motive that may stimulate human weakness—the terrible results of God's displeasure, if they should still turn their backs on him, are eloquently set forth.

g A word must be said here about the anathema (2:34; 3:6; 7:2, etc.), a practice which is repugnant to the humane feelings inculcated by two thousand years of Christianity and seems to be inconsistent with the loving-kindness of God. But the difficulty will vanish once we replace this custom in its setting, and view it in the light of the religious and cultural conditions of the 13th cent. Israelites. Here, as in so many other points of primitive Israelite legislation—status of women, treatment of strangers, sexual morality, etc.—an intermediate stage of ethics, which seems so crude when we look back on it, represented in fact a considerable advance over what went before. The anathema, or ban (herem), meant originally that which is or must be separated and set aside, particularly that which, on account of some inherent evil, would be dangerous to the people; in practice it meant killing living creatures and dedicating material things to use in the sanctuary or to destruction. The institution was not peculiar to Israel. Mesha, king of Moab in the 9th cent. B.C., records of his successful expedition against the Israelite city Nebo: 'I captured it and killed (them) all, 7,000 men and women, boys and girls, for I had made them anathema to Astarte-Chemosh'. For the ancient Semites war was a religious exercise, fought under their god's direction for the extension of his dominion, and captives and spoils were in the first place at the god's disposal; if odious to him, they must be destroyed. This practice Moses regulated for the people of Yahweh; it was to be strictly applied only to those who otherwise would be morally certain to corrupt Israel's faith. Cf. the distinction in 20:15 ff. between peoples in Palestine and elsewhere. In practice, the prescription was applied with varying degrees of severity or not at all, and Israelites and Canaanites intermingled to a large extent, with the inevitable results for the religion of the former. Cf. Jos 6:17 ff.; 7:1 ff.; 8:2; 11:8 ff.; 1 Kg 15; Ps 105:34 f.; etc. With regard to the cruelty of the practice, according to Christian ideas, this may be said: (1) God, as Creator and sovereign Lord, may end the life he has given, as well by the agency of other men as by 'natural' causes; cf. the command to Abraham to sacrifice Isaac. (2) The Israelites—Moses included—were children of their time, and could rise only slowly to loftier conceptions of morality; cf. the permission of divorce, expressly attributed by our Lord to 'the hardness of your heart' (Mt 19:8 and par.). (3) By limiting the herem to those occasions when the people's fidelity to Yahweh was at stake, Moses did at least exclude the idea that God took any pleasure in the killing as such; it was not on his account but on theirs. Contrast Mesha's remark on another Israelite city, 'I killed all its inhabitants, a (pleasing) sight for Chemosh', and the large-scale tortures and massacres by which the Assyrian kings rejoiced the heart of Aššur. The early Hebrew ethics, certainly, are inferior to those taught in the NT; they are nonetheless in advance of those of contemporary and neighbouring peoples. See also §§ 110f, 208f.

h Christian Applications—The lessons of fidelity and gratitude so eloquently set forth in Deut sound with redoubled force in the ears of the Catholic. To every exhortation he can add, 'A fortiori, so should I'. To the choice of Israel, and the Covenant, he can add the Incarnation, his incorporation into Christ, and the history of the working of God's grace in his soul. And the fidelity which the inspired text preaches is for him not to the old Law and the worship of the temple, but to the teaching of the Gospel and the life of the Church.

I 1-5 Preliminary Verses—As 1 gives the conclusion of what precedes, it should really be attached to the book of Numbers. Deut is concerned only with the final lawgiving in Moab, not with the other places named, which are not only 'beyond the Jordan' (from the Palestinian viewpoint) but far to the south. 2 as it stands seems to be a fragment out of place. 3 is a first introductory note; 'fortieth year'—scil. after leaving Egypt; forty is a round number, indicating the passing of one generation. 4 f. is a second introduction; in 5, read a comma after 'Moab' and omit 'And'. Note the word 'expound'; in Deut the Law is not simply announced but preached.

I 6-IV 40 The First Discourse: the Lesson of History. b
I 6-III 29 Historical Section.

I 6-46 The First Approach to Palestine—The orator recalls to the people their experiences since the revelation at Horeb (Deut's word for Sinai); Yahweh ordered them then, a generation earlier, to begin the conquest of Palestine from the south; but it miscarried, through their want of trust in him. 7. 'Go up towards the hill country of the Amorites and all their neighbours, in the Jordan valley, in the highlands and in the Shephelah and in the Negeb and on the sea-coast.' For the Shephelah cf. § 55a, for the Negeb § 54h. 'Euphrates' is probably an erroneous gloss—the river referred to would be the Leontes. 9-17. Appointment of Subordinate Judges—Cf. Ex 18:13-26. Jethro's part is here passed over, as not bearing on the orator's purpose. Moses chose suitable men, and (15) 'appointed them rulers over thousands, and rulers over hundreds, and rulers over fifties, and rulers over tens'—a civil organization based on military cadres. 19-46 summarizes the first, frustrated, attempt at the conquest of Palestine (see Num 13 f.). 19. 'By the way of . . .': this idiom must not be understood like the Latin viā; it means 'by the way that leads (eventually) to'. So in 40 below, 2:1, 8, etc. The verse ends 'And we arrived at Kadesh-barnea'; the sending of the explorers preceded this arrival. 22 ff. The brief account here stresses points that aggravated the people's guilt: they themselves had proposed the exploration (a detail omitted in Num 13:2 f. where it is given as a command of Yahweh), and they passed over the favourable account of the land to dwell on the discouraging news of its inhabitants. 28. Enacims (Anakim): see on 9:2. 41b. 'And everyone of you girded on his battle-array, and you thought it an easy thing to go up into the hill-country.' The people passed abruptly from despair to presumption—both sins contrary to their due trust in Yahweh. 42. Moses kept the ark, the sign of Yahweh's presence, in the camp, instead of letting it go in the van of the attack. 46. 'A long time'; traditionally, one generation. Apparently in this period the Israelites led a semi-nomadic pastoral life, with the water-supply in the neighbourhood of Kadesh-barnea as their rallying-point.

II 1-15 The Second Approach to Palestine—not directly from the south, but through Transjordan, from the east. (Cf. Num 20 f.) 2-8. The Transit through Edom—According to Num 20:14 ff. Moses applied to the Edomites (in terms very similar to Yahweh's instructions here) for permission to cross their territory and was decisively refused. This necessitated a long detour to the south with eventually a march northward to Moab along the east side of Edom. This refusal is not mentioned in Deut; and it becomes a question whether it should be understood here between 7 and 8 (so that Yahweh's instructions could not be put into practice), or in 1, before the 'compassing of Mt Seir' (which was Edomite territory). If the latter, then there were two applications to cross Edom, some 38 years apart, of which the later one was granted, and would be referred to here in 8 (reading with LXX 'passed through') and in 29. 10-12 is an archaeological 212c note, awkwardly inserted in Yahweh's speech, giving popular traditions of the pre-Canaanite population of Palestine and Transjordan, who developed a flourishing chalcolithic culture 4000-3000 B.C. 13. The first phrase is the conclusion of the speech in 9: "Now rise and cross the Wady Zared." And we crossed the Wady Zared'. This watercourse (modern W. el-Hesa) was evidently felt to mark the edge of the 'wilderness'; once it was crossed, the Wandering was over. 14 refers, not to the 'departure' from Kadesh-barnea of 1, but to the 'going up' (to attack Canaan) of 1:43, which occasioned the punishment of the long delay in the desert.

d 16-37 The Victory over Sehon—18. 'Pass the border', i.e. skirt the territory, not passing through. 20-23. Cf. 10-12 above. 24. If Yahweh's instructions really preceded Moses' message to Sehon (26 ff.), the latter has a strange air of insincerity; yet there was really none, according to the Israelite conception of God's providence. Moses was making sure that his people would be blameless—and the fault fell only on Sehon, thanks to his 'hardened spirit'. On the other hand, since 31 repeats 24, the divine order may have come after Sehon's answer. In the concrete, this answer, in these circumstances, was the divine order—24 is how the Israelites would formulate it. 34. For 'killing' read 'making anathema'; see § 211g.

e III 1-7 The Victory over Og—Here again the anathema (6) was applied.

8-17 Division of Transjordan—A rather composite section: 8, 10, 12a give a summary of the successful outcome of these two campaigns, which was an impressive vindication of Moses' promise of God's assistance. 9, 11, 13b-14 are historical notes; 12b-13a and 16-17 are duplicate accounts of the distribution of the land. 10. The 'plain' means the plateau of Moab, a high tableland which sinks abruptly to the Jordan valley. 11. 'Bed of iron' is thought to mean a basalt sarcophagus. 12. 'And this land we took possession of at that time. From Arer, which is beside the Wady Arnon, half of the hill-country of Galaad with its towns I gave to Ruben and to Gad.' 16 f. repeat 12 more in detail: 'I gave from Galaad to the Arnon, the torrent valley being the boundary.' 17. 'And the Jordan valley, with the Jordan as the (western) boundary, from (the city) Cenereth to the Dead Sea.' 18-20. A brief account of the dispute in Num 32 (cf. Jos 1:12-18). 21 f. anticipate the command of 28. 23-29 Moses' Petition Rejected—Cf. Num 27:12 ff. and 32:48 ff. below. This prayer of Moses is not mentioned elsewhere. 25. A petition: 'Please let me pass over and see. . .'. 'Mountain' means hill-country or uplands. 27. The fulfilment of the command is described in 34:1-4.

f IV 1-40 Homiletic Section—A reminder of the obligation they are under to be faithful to Yahweh and an exhortation to keep his Law. 1. 'Commandments and judgements': these are the two main kinds of law represented in Deut, corresponding broadly to statute-law and case-law. A commandment ('statute', 'testimony' or 'ceremony': DV is unfortunately not consistent in its translations) is a precept, usually in the form 'Thou shalt (not) . . .'. It is based on a categorical and ultimate authority—the Will of God, who is Justice and Holiness—and binds the individual's conscience before the act. A judgement is a legal principle, usually in the form 'If so-and-so has been done, such and such shall be the penalty or the result'. It is based on the authoritative or customary solution of previous cases, accepted as a precedent, and guides the judge's decision after the act. The Mosaic 'judgements' are the Israelite form of Semitic 'common law', and it is in them that are found the numerous parallels with the Babylonian, Assyrian and Hittite codes (which are all phrased in this conditional form). But it is in the 'commandments' that the transcendence of the Israelite code and religion is seen, and these not only have Yahweh's authority but contain his revelation. The 'Ten Commandments', however, are not so called in HT, but usually 'The Ten Words'; also 'the Covenant', par excellence, or 'the Testimony'. 2. 'Adding and taking away' means altering without authority; exact observance is enjoined, and three motives are added. 3. The first, threat of annihilation. For Beelphegor see Num 25. 6. Second motive: reputation with neighbours, who will say 'Surely a wise and prudent people is this great nation'. Other peoples will see 'greatness' in the Israelites' military success; but on examining their culture they will find also divine wisdom and prudence. 7 and 8 start each with the same phrase: 'What great nation is there . . .?' Israel, though politically insignificant, is already superior to the 'great powers', since they have not the protection and Law of Yahweh. 8 continues ' . . . that has (such) righteous statutes and judgements as all this Law, which I am going to set before you this day?' This is the third motive—the excellence of the Law in itself. 9. 'Only take care and keep strict watch over thyself, that thou forget not the things . . .'. scil. the favours received from Yahweh during the Wandering. 10. Omit 'From'; that great day is one of the things to be remembered. 12. Lit., 'A sound of words you heard, but form you saw none; only a sound'. The doctrine that Yahweh has no visible or imitable form or shape is repeatedly emphasized in the Mosaic tradition, and is one of the points in which Israel's religion is unique among the religions of the Ancient East. In speech and writing the Israelites did not hesitate to use the most graphic anthropomorphisms; they spoke of Yahweh's eyes, ears, nostrils, fingers, etc. But the attempt to represent him visibly, in clay, stone or metal, is in the canonical literature always unsparsingly condemned. 13 f. is a parenthesis; 15 follows on 12. In 13, omit 'and' after 'do'; the Ten Words were the Covenant. The word 'covenant', b'rit, may be used of any pact, alliance or agreement, between men or nations; the Covenant between Yahweh and his people is so called only by analogy, since ordinarily a certain equality of the parties is presupposed. Here there was an act of unprecedented love and mercy on God's part, to which the acceptance and adherence of man were naturally due. Nevertheless, obligations arose on both sides: God chose Israel as his people, and thereby bound himself, as long as the Covenant stood, to protect them and advance their national prosperity; on their side, Israel was bound to remain faithful to God by observing its terms—fidelity was the condition of its existence. 15-18. The prohibition is not directly against worship of other gods (idolatry in the NT sense) but against making representations of Yahweh, whether as man or woman, bird or beast or reptile—all forms under which the Egyptians represented their innumerable divinities. By multiplying images, this practice would have led to the worship of numerous 'Yahwehs', and degraded him to the level of the multiple Ba'als of the Canaanites. See on 5:8. 19. Prohibition of star-worship, which flourished especially in the Assyrian and Neo-Babylonian empires, and infiltrated into Palestine in the time of the monarchy. The heavenly bodies are only God's creatures, which he 'has distributed to all the peoples under every (part of the) heavens', scil. to be worshipped by them. Some have suggested that this means that for other nations, not granted Israel's revelation, star-worship was approved by God as a means of leading them to a knowledge of himself. But no divine approval is implied here—Hebrew thought and expression ignore the distinction familiar to Christian theology, between willing (good) and permitting (moral evil). The idea is rather to answer the question (a difficult one according to the conceptions of the time), 'Why, if Yahweh is such a great God, the only God, is he known and worshipped only by one small people?' The answer is simply, that it pleased him to leave other nations to their own devices, while for himself he chose Israel as his people. 20. HT emphasizes: 'But you Yahweh took and brought . . .'. 21. Cf. the end of ch 3. 25. One of the great material 212g benefits that Yahweh bound himself by the Covenant to provide was the possession of their own land ; and their breaking of the Covenant would naturally be punished by its forfeiture. The books of Kings, and the Prophets, testify that Judah and Israel gave only too much cause for the Exile, threatened in 26-28. 28. 'Serve gods': this does not here refer to formal idolatry, and hence apostasy from Yahweh ; that will have taken place already and been the cause of the Exile. A more material and unwilling servitude is meant : the mere working as captives, or state slaves, in a foreign land was itself a 'service' to the divinities of that land—even apart from the specialized case, no doubt verified of many, of being slaves of some temple. 32-34. This is the 'Deuteronomic style' at its highest—a fervent and eloquent exclamation at the thought of a loving providence unique in history. 33. 'Has a people ever heard the voice of God . . . (34) or did God ever go and take . . . ?' Here the First Discourse rises to its climax and summary in 39 f.

h 41-43 The Cities of Refuge—A note inserted between the Discourses. See on 19: ff. The cities cannot now be identified with certainty ; they are listed in order from south to north.

44-49 Introduction to the Second Discourse, either an editorial addition or an indication that at one time the book began here, and chh 1-4 were prefixed later.

45. Omitt 'And' : 'These are the edicts and the statutes and the judgements which Moses proclaimed. . . ' 45 ff. is an expansion, or duplicate, of 44. 48. 'Sion' is not Jerusalem, but probably an error for 'Sirion'.

213a V 1-XXIX 1 The Second Discourse.

V 1-XI 32 Exhortation on Fidelity to Yahweh.

V 2-33 The Covenant of Sinai ; the Decalogue—The original form of the 'Ten Words' would be somewhat as follows :

I, Yahweh, am thy God

Thou shalt have no other gods than me

Thou shalt not make thyself a graven image

Thou shalt not swear by Yahweh falsely

Take care to sanctify the Sabbath day

Honour thy father and thy mother

Thou shalt not murder

Thou shalt not commit adultery

Thou shalt not steal

Thou shalt not testify falsely against thy neighbour

Thou shalt not covet what belongs to thy neighbour

To these has been added, both here and in Ex 20:2-17, a certain amount of expansion and commentary, in oral tradition or by the inspired authors. 8. Since the first commandment excludes other gods, the second prohibited originally images of Yahweh (see on 4:12, 15) ; but the explanation in 9 applies it to images of false gods, which were a prevalent temptation once the Israelites were settled in Palestine. 11. This commandment might be rendered 'Thou shalt not abuse the Name of Yahweh', excluding, besides perjury, its use for magic and superstitious purposes. One's name, in the mind of the ancient Semites, was one's very personality, one's essence ; to abuse Yahweh's Name was to abuse him. So penetrated were the Israelites by this idea that, to be on the safe side, they ceased using the Name at all. 12-15. The Sabbath was evidently something already familiar, and so, like circumcision, a pre-Mosaic institution. Whatever its origin, it was consecrated at Sinai and given divine sanction. 15 gives for Sabbath observance a reason different from that in Ex 20:11. 16. This is St Paul's 'commandment with a promise' (Eph 6:2). 17. 'Kill' in English is too general a word ; Hebrew rāṣaḥ means the taking of human life, by a private person, unjustifiably. The commandment therefore did not abolish the obligation to avenge a kinsman's death by slaying his murderer (see on 19:ff.), nor have any reference to warfare. 21. Ex 20:17 has 'Thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's house' (= property), and analyses the latter into wife, slaves, cattle and 'anything he owns'. Deut, however, 213a puts 'wife' in a separate sentence, with a different verb : 'Thou shalt not desire thy neighbour's wife ; and thou shalt not covet thy neighbour's property'. The evident intention to safeguard the woman's dignity and avoid looking on her as merely one of the man's possessions marks an advance in civilization, and indicates that the editing of the Deut text is later than that of Ex. 22. The Ten Words were spoken by Yahweh himself, 'in a loud voice, adding nothing more' ; hence they are more immediately from him than the rest of the 'commandments and judgements'. (The phrase 'And the Lord spoke to Moses, saying', so frequent in the Pentateuch, is a conventional introduction to Israelite law ; it does not indicate innumerable divine revelations but merely that the prescription in question has God's authority behind it.) It is in the Decalogue that the Covenant consists ; hence the insistence of the prophets that the Covenant did not require sacrifices and ritual but justice and righteousness. See e.g. Jer 7:21 ff. ; Am 5:21 ff. 24-27. Cf. Ex 20:18-21 ; it is an idea frequently expressed in the OT, that sinful man, if admitted to the presence of Yahweh, would shrivel up and die, in the blaze of his grandeur and purity—e.g. Jg 13:22 ; Is 6:5. The people had come before him once, and, contrary to expectation, had not died, but they would not risk it again.

VI 1-25 The Obligation of Faithfulness—1. 'And this is the Command, (consisting of) the statutes and judgements.'

4. The first word, S'ma, 'Hear !', has given its name to the prayer, or profession of faith, of the devout Jew, recited morning and evening, from pre-Christian times to the present. It is made up of Deut 6:4-9, 11:13-21, and Num 15:37-41, introduced and concluded by various blessings. 'One Lord' : the exact meaning of the phrase is doubtful ; either 'Yahweh is our God, Yahweh alone', or, 'Yahweh is our God, Yahweh is One'.

5. This is the commandment that our Lord declared to be the first and greatest (Mt 22:37 f. and par.).

6. 'These words' refers to 4 f. 7. 'And thou shalt talk about them, sitting at home and walking abroad, lying down and rising up.' 8 f., probably meant only figuratively, were taken very literally indeed in later Judaism. The passages of the Torah thus distinguished (Deut 6:4-9 ; 11:13-21 ; Ex 13:1-10, 11-16) were written on parchment and enclosed in little leather pouches, worn on the left arm and the forehead. These were called (in Greek) phylacteries ; cf. Mt 23:5.

13. 'Fear' in Hebrew is a wider term than in English ; 'the fear of Yahweh' practically = religion (cf. 'god-fearing'), as comprised in internal dispositions : 'service' refers to one's outward acts. 'Swear' : the oath by a god played an important part in Semitic civil life, especially in connexion with law cases. To swear by a god was to acknowledge oneself subject to him ; hence the Israelites must swear only by Yahweh.

16. To 'tempt God' is to show a lack of due faith in him—to put him to the test, as it were, to see whether he is really able and willing to fulfil his promises. For the reference see Ex 17:1-7. 20-25. Note the importance of family tradition. The knowledge of the Covenant, the marvellous fact of Yahweh's free choice of Israel, is a sacred trust that every Israelite must hand on to his sons. He must explain why this Law is the foundation and the condition of their liberty and prosperity. 24. 'This day' means the time of the successful occupation of Palestine. 25. 'And it will be (reckoned) justice to us, if we take care to carry out all this Command in the sight of Yahweh, our God, according as he has commanded us.'

VII 1-26 Duty of Exterminating the Canaanites—1. d

On the nations here listed see § 151f with references and § 57d. 2. 'and Yahweh thy God shall have delivered them up to thee, and thou shalt have defeated them, thou shalt make them strictly anathema' (cf. § 211g).

3 f. are evidently a later addition to the text. If original, they would be not only an anticlimax but quite pointless after 2. They imply not only the survival

213d of the Canaanites but some social intercourse between them and the Hebrews. But this law too was much disregarded, and in the post-exilic community both Esdras and Nehemias had to struggle for its enforcement. 5 continues from 2. 'Statues': massebhôṭ were large blocks of stone set upright in the ground and associated with the ritual of the high places. A massebhâh was not necessarily idolatrous; Jacob erected one (Gen 28:18), and Moses set up twelve on Mt Sinai (Ex 24:4). But those used by the Canaanites were to be destroyed. 'Groves': ʿāšerîm, wooden posts called after the goddess Astarte, and presumably carved in her image. 'Graven things': the idols, of Ba'al or Astarte. It is plain that the law was most imperfectly carried out; many of the Canaanite sanctuaries were used for the (illegitimate) cult of Yahweh down to the 7th cent. 10. 'Forthwith', 'immediately': read, in person. This is a qualification of the doctrine that sons suffer for their fathers' misdeeds. That is not denied, but it is stressed that the sinner himself will not escape punishment. 13-15. A description, in rhetorical style, of the rewards they may expect for fidelity. 20. If there is an historical allusion here it escapes us; whether 'hornets' be literal or figurative, the meaning is clear. 22. Apparently a later writer, missing the conditional character of all these glowing promises—if Israel should be faithful to the Covenant—and finding that the Conquest turned out a much slower and more painful business than is here implied, inserted this 'explanation'. It is in marked opposition to the whole context—see e.g. 9:3. 23 follows on 21; for 'But' read 'And'. 24. To destroy a man's name included killing him, and much more besides—annihilating everything to which his personality, his 'soul', extended—his sons, his property, any memorials he might leave: to leave no trace that he had ever existed. 25. 'The images of their gods thou shalt burn with fire; thou shalt not covet the silver and gold (which are) upon them.' The idols, of wood or stone, had clothing or ornaments of precious metal; the latter would of course be melted to shapeless lumps in the fire, but even these the Israelites must not take into their own possession.

214a VIII 1-20 Gratitude for God's Care in the Desert—Here a new reason is given for the Wandering: it was not only a punishment for despair and presumption, it was also a time of testing, an education of the people to make them realize their utter dependence on Yahweh. Having been so looked after in the desert, where life was hard and provisions scarce, they should not forget, in easier circumstances, that it is still Yahweh who is caring and providing for them. Cf. 11:10 ff. 3. 'Not in bread alone. . .'. Cf. Ps 126: 'Unless the Lord build the house. . .'. God can provide for man, irrespective of the latter's co-operation. Manna was not produced by human means; ordinary bread is. Yet the one and the other are equally dependent on God's working, and the Israelites, when providing themselves with bread, must not forget that it is God's gift just as much as the manna 'which came down from heaven'. 4. It is an example of God's providence that they have been able to clothe and otherwise provide for themselves during the long Wandering. We need not take this as literally as did some rabbinic commentators, who held that their clothes were miraculously renewed for forty years, and the children's clothing grew to keep pace with their growth! 7. 'For Yahweh thy God is bringing thee into a good land, a land of running brooks, of springs and deep waters, welling up in its plains and hills.' No single feature of the Land would sound more grateful to the ears of desert-dwellers than this. By European standards, Palestine is not particularly well-watered; but it is much better provided than the desert, and, under proper irrigation and cultivation, is really a fertile country, as has been often proved in its long history. In pre-Christian times, too, it was probably better afforested than it is today. 9. Iron and copper are not found within the limits generally assigned to Palestine, but they are found, and were mined, in Edom, which was under Israelite control during the early monarchy. 15 recalls the perils of the desert: 'burning serpents and scorpions, and arid places without water'. What 'burning' means is uncertain (cf. Num 21:6); the 'dipsas' is not a serpent but 'thirsty ground'. 16 ends with a purpose clause: 'in order to afflict thee and in order to test thee, to do thee good in the end'.

IX 1-X 11 Past History as a Warning against Presumption—2. 'A people great and tall, sons of Anak, as thou knowest; and thou thyself hast heard (the saying): Who can stand up to the sons of Anak?' 'Sons of Anak' or Anakim is not the name of any people then in Palestine; they were fabulous giants, and the phrase would be applied to any fierce warriors or very tall men. 3 gives an idealized description; see on 7:22. 7-24 recapitulate various infidelities of the Israelites in the desert, presenting them as so many motives for humility and gratitude. The chief, of course, is the breaking of the Covenant, almost as soon as made, at Horeb. The incident is recalled, in a summary of Ex 24, 32, 34-9. 'Forty days' is a conventional expression denoting a time of solemn preparation (cf. Gen 7:4; 3 Kg 19:8; Jon 3:4; Mt 4:2; Ac 1:3). 12. 'For thy people, whom thou hast brought out of Egypt, have acted corruptly; they have quickly turned aside from the way which I commanded them.' Very striking is the change to the second person, 'thy people'; having broken Yahweh's Covenant, they are no longer his people. 13. HT is more forceful: 'I have seen this people, and behold! it is a stiff-necked people.' 14. 'Let me alone. . .'. The implication is, that the 'prayer of a just man availeth much' (Jas 5:16). Yahweh wishes to destroy the people, but if Moses intercedes he will not be able to refuse him; and so of course it turned out (cf. 19 and Ex 32:11-14). 'Their name': see on 7:24. 16. The 'golden calf' was intended as an image of Yahweh (cf. Ex 32:4); but it was a grave and express violation of the second commandment and hence a breaking of the Covenant. 17. 'I took hold of the two tablets and cast them down out of my hands and broke them to pieces before your eyes.' This was not merely a display of holy anger on the part of Moses; it was a symbol of the broken covenant, to impress on the people what they had done. 21 for proper sequence should follow 17. 22 f. mention other examples of the people's infidelity in the desert, at 'the Burning' (Num 11:1-3), 'the Place of Temptation' (Ex 17:7) and 'the Graves of Lust' (Num 11:4-34). These are proper names, artificially formed in memory of these incidents. 25-29. As there is a decided break between 24 and 25, this section may have been displaced from between 18 and 19 (or between 19a and 19b). The motives urged by Moses why Yahweh should relent and forgive his people are drawn from his greatness and love, and his 'credit' in the eyes of the Egyptians; the merits of the patriarchs are also mentioned; but any merit or just claim on the part of contemporary Israelites is implicitly excluded. God merely owes it to himself, not to reject his unfaithful but chosen people.

X 1-9 contains various notes, presumably editorial additions. The narrative of ch 9 is continued in 10:10 f. 1-5. This section corresponds to the account of Ex 34:1-4, 28, 29, with the addition of the making of the ark, which, however, in Ex follows the inscribing of the tablets (Ex 25:10-21; 37:1). The two sets of instructions, given at different times, and their respective fulfilments, are here combined. 5 ends 'and there they remained, as Yahweh commanded me'. 6-7 is a fragment from the itinerary of the Wandering, long after the events at Horeb; see Num 33:31-33. Its insertion here is unexplained. 8-9 is inserted as a note to the mention of the ark (1-5) of which the tribe of Levi had charge. Three functions are mentioned as proper to the tribe of Levi as a whole; elsewhere (e.g. Num 3) the tribe is distinguished into priests and Levites, the latter caring for the ark, the former exercising the ministry and blessings.

214d X 12-XI 32 Exhortation for the Future—12. 'And now'—after the vivid review of their infidelity and God's love—'what is Yahweh thy God asking of thee . . . ?' 14. Yahweh is Lord of the whole universe; nevertheless (15) 'it was thy ancestors whom Yahweh took delight in, to make them an object of his love'. 16. Circumcision of the heart means the purifying of the will and affections, to make them receptive to Yahweh's will. 18. 'Stranger' or 'resident alien' means a foreigner settled, for whatever reason, in an Israelite community. As having no blood-relationship with any Israelite family, and—according to the ideas of the Semites in general—no claim to the protection of the Israelite God, he would be quite defenceless against injustice; but Yahweh is the God of justice, and has a special concern for the protection of the unprotected. XI:2-7 is a long, complicated sentence, from which some words are missing in HT. Read prob.: 'And bear in mind this day—for it is not with your children, who know not and who have not witnessed the teaching of Yahweh (that I speak)—his great doings.' 'Chastisements': the Heb. means rather 'instruction', 'education', in the ethical sense. 4. A rapid summary of Ex 14. 5. 'To you': better, 'for you'. 6. Cf. Num 16, where it seems that the stories of two rebellions are combined—that of Core, and that of Dathan and Abiron; only the latter is mentioned here. 7 is better taken as the emphatic conclusion: 'for it is your own eyes that have seen. . .' 10-17 give an explanation why (according to Hebrew conceptions) their prosperity in Canaan will depend more immediately on God than does the success of Egyptian agriculture. In Egypt, where the overflow of the Nile is just as certain and regular as the seasons, man needs only to sow his seed in the soil thus unfailingly prepared; but in Palestine he is dependent rather on the rains which come (within limits) irregularly, and vary greatly from year to year, and which he is quite helpless to control. Hence Yahweh, sending or withholding the rain, will seem to take a more active and significant part in their yearly well-being or otherwise. 10. 'For the land into which thou art entering, in order to take possession of it, is not like the land of Egypt whence you [sic] have come, where thou wert wont to sow thy seed and water it with thy foot, like a vegetable garden.' 'Water with the foot' is uncertain; the most plausible explanation is that in 'vegetable gardens' the water was distributed by shallow channels, whose entries could be opened or blocked by a little earth moved by the foot. 12. The anthropomorphism is rather striking: the fertility of Palestine depends on Yahweh's constant supervision. 14. 'He will send rain on your land at the right time, the early rains and the later rains . . . (15) and he will give grass in thy field for thy cattle; and thou shalt eat and be filled'. 18-21. Cf. 6:6-9. 24. Read prob.: 'From the desert to Lebanon', giving the extent from S. to N. 26-28. This choice is developed at length in ch 28, which forms the conclusion of this speech. 29. The Blessing and the Curse were thought of as material objects, to be set in prominent positions in the Land, ready to produce their effect as called for. Cf. ch 27 and Jos 8:33 f. 30 is a gloss, in the form of a question: 'Are they not across the Jordan, beyond the western road, in the land of the Canaanites that live in the 'Arabah, in front of the galgala near the oak of Moreh?' The 'Arabah is the Jordan valley. Galgala means 'a circle' (of standing stones?) and was the name of a well-known sanctuary near Jericho. But the latter is so far from the locality here described that possibly some other stone-circle, near Shechem, is meant. The oak of Moreh was an ancient landmark (cf. Gen 12:6; DV 'the noble vale').

215a XII 1-XXVI 15 The Deuteronomic Law-Code—This section sets forth about eighty laws, with the amplification and emotional appeal proper to oratorical presentation. Many of the laws, as will be indicated in the notes, have parallels elsewhere, especially in the Book of the Covenant (Ex 20-23), along with some significant differences.

XII 1 Title to the Code.

XII 2-XVI 17 Laws on Religion.

XII 2-7 The Law of One Sanctuary: First Enunciation

—This is the first and most characteristic law of Deut (see §§ 112a-d, 211c). In this one chapter it is enunciated four times, in slightly varying terms. 2f. Read with LXX '*You shall utterly destroy all the places . . . ; break in pieces their massebot and cut down their asherim and burn their idols in the fire*'. See on 7:5. 4. 'You shall not do so'; this is vague, but explained in 5 and 30. The cult of Yahweh must differ both in place and in manner from the cults of the Ba'alim. Not in any 'natural' place, like Ba'al and Astarte, but only in a place of his own choice would he accept man's worship. Thus is emphasized Yahweh's transcendence, as a God of revelation. The place—never named in Deut—is of course the temple in Jerusalem, which was 'chosen' through David's capture of the city and Solomon's building there, of which God expressed his approval. 'To put his name there' means that he would be present there, to receive his people's sacrifices and hear their prayers.

8-12 Second Enunciation—8 f. The law is clearly presented as an aspiration, a pious hope for the future, that could not be enforced in Moses' day nor for some time thereafter. Internal peace and security were not enjoyed by the Israelites in Palestine before David's reign, c 1000 B.C. 10 is a temporal clause: 'When you shall have crossed the Jordan and settled in the land . . . , when you enjoy rest from your enemies round about and have settled down in security, then, to the place that Yahweh chooses . . . you shall bring. . .'

13-19 Third Enunciation—13. 'Place' has a technical sense—the sacred places of the Canaanites. 15. For the Semites generally, any slaughtering of cattle for food had originally a sacrificial character: the beast was first made sacred to the god, and then enjoyed by his worshippers. But meat, eaten by nomads only on rare occasions, would be available more frequently (though still not habitually) to sedentary farmers; hence this important corollary is added to the law, that non-sacrificial meals are allowed, away from the temple. (Contrast Lev 17:1-7.) Beasts may be slaughtered at the homestead, without infringing the law reserving sacrifice to Jerusalem, and 'whether (you are) clean or unclean you may eat it as you would gazelle or hart'—i.e. game, which was not material for sacrifice. Ritual purity of course was necessary for those taking part in a sacrificial meal. 19. The Levites, who theoretically were to live on the income of the central sanctuary, naturally suffered if the latter was neglected. See on 18:6 f.; Jg 17:7 ff.

20-28 Fourth Enunciation—20. 'If Yahweh thy God extends thy territory as he has promised thee, and thou sayest "I would eat meat", because thou cravest to eat meat: thou mayest eat meat as often as thou desirest.' 23. Although such a feast has no sacred character, God's rights to life (represented by the blood) must not be infringed: 'for the blood is life; and thou must not eat the life along with the meat'. (Cf. Lev 17:10-14.)

29-31 Canaanite Practices forbidden—As the Canaanite places of cult are illicit, so is their manner of worship. It might lead even to child-sacrifice in honour of Yahweh. The section 16:21-17:7 may have originally followed these verses; see below.

XII 32-XIII 18 Three Laws for the Punishment of Apostates—32. Introduction—'All the instruction that I am commanding thee thou shalt take care to observe; thou shalt neither add to nor take away from it.'

XIII 1-5 A Prophet—In 18:22 unfulfilled prophecies are given as the indication of a false prophet. Here we see that the converse is not necessarily true: prophecies that come true are not an infallible sign of a true prophet. He must also be tested by his doctrine. (Cf. Gal 1:8.) 5. HT is more forceful: 'because he preached revolt against Yahweh your God'.

6-11 Private Person—6. 'If thy brother, the son of thy father or the son of thy mother, i.e. half-brother or full brother. 9 f. 'But thou shalt forthwith denounce him:

215e thy hand shall be on him first, then that of all the people, and (so) thou shalt stone him to death. (Cf. note on 17:6 f.) 12-18 Israelite City—12 f. 'If thou shalt hear that in one of thy cities . . . worthless men have gone forth from the midst of thee, seducing their fellow-citizen and saying . . . 'Going forth' means abandoning the cult of Yahweh; 'Belial' is not a proper name, but 'worthlessness', 'iniquity'. 16. Not 'in the midst of the streets' but 'in the city-square', the open space inside the gate. The site shall be left as a 'heap', i.e. a tell, the technical word for the mound covering the ruins of a city. The intensity of feeling expressed in the details of these three laws is remarkable. So grave a crime was it to reject the Covenant of God's love.

XIV 1-2 Pagan Mourning Rites—Incisions in the flesh and cutting off of hair were signs of mourning common to Israel and its pagan neighbours. They are referred to casually, and without rebuke, by the prophets (Is 22:12, Jer 16:6, Ez 7:18, etc.). Either this law remained a dead letter, or (more probably) it is a late (post-exilic) addition.

f 3-21 Unclean Foods—Cf. Lev 11. That some beasts were 'clean' for food, others not, was a rooted Semitic belief long before Moses. Given that distinction, the legislator imposes the natural conclusion that a holy people must eat only what is clean. Some of the creatures named cannot be identified with certainty.

4-8 Land Animals—Two criteria are given—a clean animal must have divided hooves and be a ruminant (the latter not in the sense of modern zoology but according to appearances). The 'pygarg' is a species of antelope, the 'camelopardalus' probably a mountain-sheep, the 'cherogril' a badger (?). 9 f. Aquatic Animals 'without fins and scales' are unclean, probably because of their resemblance to reptiles. 11-20. Winged Creatures—No general criterion is given, but those forbidden all appear to be either birds of prey or scavengers. 15. The 'larus' is a gull, (16) the 'heron', the 'swan' and the 'stork', three species of owl, (17) the 'porphyrion' an eagle, (18) the 'charadriion' a heron. 19 f. Winged insects are unclean; all clean flying things may be eaten. 21a. A beast dying 'naturally' is unclean; this is not a hygienic precaution, but to avoid consuming the blood, which would remain in a carcass not ritually slaughtered. Hence the insistence of orthodox Jews, down to modern times, on slaughtering their own meat. 21b forbids a Canaanite religious rite, to which reference is made in a mythological text from Râs-Shamra; cf. A. Casey, S.J., in VD 16 (1936) 142-8; 174-83.

g 22-29 The Law of Tithes—Different stages of this law are preserved in Lev 27:30-33 and Num 18:20-32. Deut supposes it as already in practice, and is concerned only with the modifications necessitated by the strict observance of the law of one sanctuary; it insists that only there may the ritual tithe-banquet be enjoyed. 24. Distance is no excuse—better to sell one's produce locally and then buy supplies in Jerusalem, than to have the tithe-banquet at any other place than the central sanctuary. (It was the abuses connected with the practice of this law that called for Our Lord's purifying of the temple, Mt 21:12 and par.) 28 f. However, to compensate the former beneficiaries, the poor of one's own neighbourhood, every third year 'thou shalt bring forth all the tithe of thy harvest of that year and shalt leave it within thy gates', instead of bringing it to the temple.

216a XV 1-11 The Remission of Debts—1-3. This appears to be not a law in the strict sense, for the regulation of commercial practice, but a pressing exhortation to fraternal charity. (Cf. in the NT the Sermon on the Mount, Mt 5:38-42, etc.) No sanction is suggested for its non-observance; in fact there is no record of its ever being put in practice—unless it be Neh 5:7 ff., where however Nehemias does not invoke the authority of the Law. Attempts have been made to interpret it of remission of interest (but cf. 23:19 f.) or temporary suspension of claim to the principal; but the text almost certainly prescribes a simple extinction of the debt. 4-6 seem to be a later insertion, protesting that if only they keep the Law, the question of borrowing will never arise: 'Only there will be no poor among thee, for Yahweh will abundantly bless thee . . . provided only that thou strictly obey the voice. . . ' 10. 'Thou shalt give to him generously, and not be grudging in thy giving; because for this very thing Yahweh will bless thee.'

12-18 The Freeing of Slaves—A man of little property, if he fell hopelessly into debt, had often no option but to sell himself (or his children) to whoever would buy him, the price being the payment of his debts. Once a slave, he could be freed only if a kinsman bought him out or if he himself accumulated sufficient money; but this law provides for automatic manumission after six years, and, with characteristic benevolence, insists that the slave is not to be turned out destitute. Jer 34:8-16 gives a repellent instance of how this law, generally disregarded, was temporarily put in force to avoid embarrassment, and later rescinded, by the slave-owners of Jerusalem. 17. The ear was the 'organ' of obedience; hence the symbolism. 18. 'It shall not seem a burdensome thing to send him away free, for he has brought thee double the profit of a hired servant for six years.' The owner, after all, has had more than his money's worth out of the slave, since he paid for his keep, but no salary.

19-23 Firstlings—Cf. Ex 22:29 f.; Num 18:15-18; §132 f-g. Another modification of law required by the insistence on the one sanctuary. Ex loc. cit. prescribes the offering within eight days, but Deut here allows firstlings to be kept until a yearly visit to the temple, when they shall (if unblemished) be duly sacrificed. In the meantime they must be set apart as belonging to Yahweh and no use be made of them. 20. In Num loc. cit. the flesh of firstlings is the perquisite of the priests, and the offerer has no claim to share in it. Apparently we have in Ex, Deut, Num, three stages in the historic development of a Mosaic law.

XVI 1-17 The Three Yearly Feasts—Older customs are here modified only in so far as concerns the obligation of celebrating these feasts in the place of Yahweh's choice, not 'in thy gates'. (Cf. Ex 23:15 f.; 34:18, 22 f.; Lev 23.)

1-8. The Pasch and Feast of Unleavened Bread—(Cf. §113 f-g.) Originally distinct, in the Mosaic legislation they are always associated, since the latter (the Azymes) began the day after the Paschal meal. (Cf. Lk 22:1.) 'Take care in the month of Abib to celebrate a pasch to Yahweh thy God.' Abib (later, Nisan) is the month of the 'new ears of corn', March/April. 2. 'Oxen': Ex 12:5 mentions only lambs and kids, but perhaps the larger beast is allowed for a more numerous party now that the feast is transferred to the temple. 3. 'Leavened bread' was considered unsuitable for cult purposes since the rising of the dough was regarded as a sort of corruption; cf. St Paul's application (1 Cor 5:6-8). 7. 'And thou shalt boil it', which is forbidden in Ex 12:9; but this passage of Deut probably represents the original custom. 8. Strictly, it is the Pasch and not the Azymes which must be celebrated at the sanctuary, since only that has the sacrificial meal; hence Deut permits the return home for the celebration of the Azymes. 'And on the seventh day (shall be held) an assembly in honour of Yahweh thy God, when thou shalt do no work.' 9-12 The Feast of Weeks—See §113 h-i. 13-15 The Feast of Tabernacles—See §113 j. 16 f. Conclusion—16 is a quotation from Ex 23:17, 15b, with the Deuteronomic addition 'in the place which he shall choose'.

XVI 18-XVIII 22 Laws concerning Authorities.

XVI 18-20 Judges—Not only sacrificial worship was to be restricted to the temple, but also the other important function of a sanctuary, that of giving judicial decisions in God's name. 18 adds nothing to the practice observed by the tribes since leaving Sinai, but 17:8 states that the court of reference for difficult cases is to be 'the place which Yahweh thy God shall choose', and, by implication, not any of the other

b XVI 21-XVII 7 Crimes against Religion—These three laws seem out of place, since they occur in the middle of the law on judges. They may have been transferred, accidentally or otherwise, from after 12:31. 21 f. 'Thou shalt not plant for thyself any tree-trunk as an ʾĕlārah beside the altar of Yahweh . . . nor set up for thyself a maššēbāh'; cf. on 7:5. XVII:1. From the context it would seem that Canaanite ritual permitted 'blemished' victims. 2-5. The case of individual apostasy—which probably introduced the other cases (13:1-17). 6 f. Cf. 19:15-21. The witnesses are obliged to be the first to stone the culprit. This was intended as a check against malicious false witness; the shedding of innocent blood was a crime crying to God for vengeance; and the consciousness that he would be obliged to commit the crime might well deter a man from making the false accusation.

c 8-13 Continuation of the Law on Judges—8. 'If some matter of judgement be too intricate for thee, a question of homicide, a question of litigation, a question of wounding, matters of controversy in thy towns: thou shalt arise and go up. . . ' 9. The court of reference consists of the priests of the temple and a lay judge; cf. 2 Par 19:8, 11, where in the reign of Josaphat (870-847 B.C.) the same appointments are mentioned. Deut does not institute this tribunal but supposes it already existing.

d 14-20 The Law of the King—It was almost inevitable that the Israelites, establishing themselves as a nation in the land of Canaan, should adopt the institution of monarchy, the universal form of government of the time. Hence there would be nothing surprising in Moses' having foreseen and provided for it. But the details of the present passage seem to contain obvious references to the career of Solomon, as recorded in 3 Kg 9-11. 16. Solomon conducted a profitable trade in chariots and horses between Egypt and the Hittites; whereas the king should not 'cause the people to return to Egypt, in order to get many horses'. The command (or prophecy?) that there should be no return to Egypt is referred to again in 28:68, but is not found elsewhere. 17. The reference must be to foreign wives who would be an occasion of apostasy from Yahweh. A frequent token of alliance between kings of the Amarna age (14th cent. B.C.) was the exchange of princesses for their harems. 18. The king is to 'have a copy of this Law written for himself, according to the book in the keeping of the Levite priests'. The Law referred to would be Deut, at least the legislative part. 20. He is not to 'turn aside from the Command to right or to left'.

e XVIII 1-8 Law of the Priesthood—This is not a code for the observance of the priests but instruction to the laity on what is due to the priests and Levites. Concerning the latter cf. § 112g-i. The distinction between the two classes is practically ignored in Deut; yet this may be precisely because Deut is addressed to the laity. 1 f. The tribe of Levi has a right to support from the offerings brought to the sanctuary. In 1 Kg 2:12-17, 29, the sons of Heli are severely blamed for demanding their share, contrary to custom, before the meat is cooked, and for 'getting fat' on the choicest offerings. Deut here regulates the practice by determining the priests' portion and assigning to them all the firstfruits. 3. 'Whether it be an ox or a smaller animal, he [the worshipper] shall give the priest the shoulder, the jaws and the stomach.' Still better and larger portions are assigned to the priests in Lev 7:31 ff. and Num 18:18. See on 15:20. 6 f. 'And if any Levite should wish to come from one of thy towns, from any part of Israel where he dwells as a stranger, and comes in the fullness of his desire to the place which Yahweh shall choose, he shall serve in the name of Yahweh his God, like all his brethren (who are) ministering there before Yahweh.' This passage seems to ignore the 'Levitical cities' (Num 35:1-8; Jos 21); but perhaps these never got beyond the 'planning' stage. The meaning of 8b is uncertain; a suggested emendation would give 'except priests of idols and necromancers'. 6-8 has been interpreted by many of priests formerly officiating at the various local sanctuaries, which Deut desires to see abolished. By this law they would be permitted to migrate to Jerusalem and be on an equal footing there with the staff of the temple. But in view of Deut's attitude towards these illegitimate cult centres it is most improbable that their personnel should be welcomed to the One Sanctuary—even if the emendation of 8b (see above) be correct. And, in fact, in Josias' reform we see that the 'priests of the high places' were excluded from the priestly ministry (4 Kg 23:8 f.). Rather, the law, like the many references to Levites in chh 12 f., aims at safeguarding the rights of a member of the tribe of Levi; they do not lapse merely because he has lived long away from the temple.

9-22 Law of Prophets—When the Israelites desire to know the divine will or purpose, they are not to have recourse to the magic and superstitious practices of the Gentiles. Nine different pagan modes of divination are specifically banned. 10. None shall 'make his son or daughter pass through the fire', i.e. immolate his children—a terrible rite thought to be of great magical efficacy by many of the ancient Semites. 12-14. All these practices are abominable to Yahweh, and the destruction of the Canaanites is partly in punishment for this impiety. Yet the desire for superhuman guidance is itself not wrong; and God has specially provided for the instruction of his people. 15. 'A prophet from among thy brethren, like myself, will Yahweh raise up for thee; him you shall obey.' The singular is collective, since 20-22 supposes a number of prophets, and the institution is to be a permanent one. Nevertheless it is also a prophecy of our Lord, the Prophet par excellence, foreshadowed in the OT by kings, priests and prophets alike (cf. Jn 6:14; 7:40; Ac 3:22 ff.; and probably Jn 1:45). 16. Cf. 5:25-28. 18-22. The function of the prophet is not primarily to foretell the future, but to instruct and reprove the people in God's name. Predictions, and miracles in general, are intended as 'signs' to establish his credentials (cf. § 415c-f).

XIX 1-XXV 19 Civil, Penal and Miscellaneous Laws. 218a

XIX 1-13 Cities of Refuge—Cf. 4:41 ff.; Num 35:9-34; Ex 21:12-14; Jos 20. In the patriarchal society of Semitic nomads, an important institution for the protection of life was blood-vengeance: the obligation on members of a clan not to let the murder of a kinsman go unavenged. The execution of the murderer was a family responsibility, falling in the first place on the next-of-kin, like the lesser responsibilities of protecting kinsfolk against want, oppression, or the extinction of their name. (Hence the precarious and pitiable situation of the unprotected widow, orphan, and stranger.) But the lack of discrimination between voluntary and involuntary killing might lead to the 'execution' in its turn being looked on as a murder; then the resulting blood-feud might rage for generations. Hence any nascent civil authority among Semites had to come to grips with this practice and attempt to control its abuses. From their very first settlement in Transjordan, the Israelites had their 'cities' of refuge, to which this law refers. 3-5. 'Thou shalt determine the distance [i.e. to know where to set the division] and divide in three the whole area of thy land. . . . And this shall be the test of the slayer taking refuge there, whether he shall be allowed to live: whether he struck his neighbour unintentionally, not being previously his enemy. [For instance] if he goes with another man to the woodland to cut timber, and as his hand is swinging the axe to cut down a tree the head flies off the handle and strikes the other man so that he dies . . . ' 6. 'Grief': better, 'in the heat of his anger'. 10. The purpose of this principle of asylum is only to allow a delay, in which the case may be examined coolly and responsibility determined. 12. If the homicide was wilful, the 'elders' from the slayer's city are to see that he is handed over to justice, i.e. execution by the next-of-kin. Unlike the Code of Hammurabi (and later Jewish practice) Deut makes b 14 Boundary Stones—Since a man's inheritance from his fathers was his dearest possession, it was a shocking crime to encroach on a neighbour's land by secretly moving back 'thy neighbour's border-stone, which the men of old set up'. Thus far the verse quotes a law, drafted some time after the occupation of the Land; 'in thy possession', etc., is added to fit it into the framework of the discourse.

c 15-21 Law of Witnesses—Cf. 17:6; Num 35:30. 15. Not only for an accusation of apostasy, but 'whatsoever the sin or wickedness be', at least two witnesses are required, and by their evidence 'the matter shall be decided' (of course, the evidence must be concordant; cf. Mk 14:56, 59). 16-21, however, allow an exception to the foregoing, when a single 'malicious witness', or rather accuser, persists in his accusation. The case must then be referred to God's decision, i.e. to the temple tribunal described in 17:9. But the law contains the presumption that the single witness, so persisting, is moved by malice and will be found to be a liar.

d XX 1-20 Laws on War—1-4. It is presumed that the war is religious in character and approved by Yahweh; hence a priest is to exhort the army to remember that Yahweh fights on their side. 'Horsemen': rather, 'horses and chariots'. Cavalry as distinct from chariotry was introduced to the Near East only by the Persians in the 6th cent. B.C. 5-8. These exemptions being ancient customs known to all, their proclamation on the eve of battle would be a formality, aimed rather at stimulating the whole-hearted courage of the warriors. In 1 Mac 3:56 the proclamation is recorded, but there is no suggestion that any took advantage of it. 10-20 Conduct of Sieges—The bearing of this law is probably to mitigate earlier practice. The inhabitants of an enemy city must be given the chance of surrendering; and if they do so, their lives are to be spared. 15-18 make clear that the rigour of the anathema was to be applied only to the cities in Palestine itself, at the time of the Conquest (see § 211g); hence this law belongs to an 'expansionist' period in Israelite history, later than the period of the Judges. 19. 'If thou art besieging a city for a long time, assaulting it in order to capture it, thou shalt not destroy its trees by felling them with axes; but thou mayest eat their fruit, without cutting them down. For, is a tree a man, that it should be besieged by thee?' A sense of responsibility is enjoined and the duty of avoiding—what all armies are inclined to—purely wanton destruction. 20. 'Only trees which thou knowest are not fruit-trees—those thou mayest destroy and cut down, and (use to) build siege-works.' This section supposes a technique of warfare far in advance of any that the Israelites possessed at the time of the Conquest. Cf. the need of a miracle for the capture of Jericho (Jos 6:2-5) and the strategem by which they penetrated the defences of Hai (Jos ch 8).

e XXI 1-9 Unsolved Cases of Murder—Innocent blood involves a stain that must be expiated—if not by the guilty, then by his kin; if not by them, then by the community in whose territory it has been shed. This law is not 'civil', else it would specify, as does the Code of Hammurabi, compensation for the family of the slain. It is purely religious, to remove the blood-guilt that would otherwise rest upon the land. Hence it is curious that (2) 'thy elders and thy judges' are to handle the matter, and the elders of the city concerned are to perform the ceremony. 4. They are to bring an unbroken heifer to 'an uncultivated valley with an ever-flowing stream, and there cut the heifer's throat into the stream', so that the blood is carried off by the water. Thus the act is not a sacrifice, but a symbolical removal of blood from the land. 5 has every appearance of being an addition to the text. 6. 'And all the elders of that city, (namely) the one nearest to where the corpse was found, shall wash their hands over the heifer slain into the stream.'

10-14 Marriage with a Captive—This law is concerned with humane treatment of the woman. Basically, she has the status of a slave, but, by becoming her master's concubine, she acquires a dignity and title to respect that can never be taken from her. As a slave she would be bound to the religion of Yahweh, so this custom is not to be confused with the marrying of free foreign women—which involved the peril of apostasy for the husband.

15-17 Right of Primogeniture—In patriarchal times the father might convey the rights of head of the family to a younger son (cf. Gen 48:13 ff.; 49:3 f., 8), but Deut excludes this, at least for the motive that the eldest son's mother is 'not loved' ('hated' is too strong). The eldest son had a right to twice as much of the father's goods as each of the other sons.

18-21 The Rebellious Son—While emphasizing the gravity of the offence, nevertheless this law, like the foregoing, restricts the old patria potestas, for the protection of the son. The father cannot inflict death at his discretion but must refer the case to the elders.

22-23 The Exposed Corpse—'If a man has committed a capital offence and been put to death, and thou hast hanged his body on a tree: thou shalt not leave his corpse on the tree (overnight) but bury it without fail that same day' (cf. Jos 10:26 f.). The exposure of the corpse was an additional infamy, for the criminal and for his family; but it was also a sight which drew down God's curse, and it must not be allowed to infect the land (cf. Gal 3:13).

XXII 1-4 Helping One's Neighbour—'Brother' means any fellow-Israelite. Ex 23:4 f. stresses the obligation even towards a personal enemy. 4. If a loaded animal fell down, one man unaided could not put it on its feet again without unpacking the load.

5-12 6. As in 20:19, a warning against wanton destruction. 5, 9-12. These laws probably had some religious significance which now escapes us.

13-30 Offences concerned with Marriage—Hebrew 'espousals', at which the man paid the bride-price for the virgin, were a binding contract that constituted a legal marriage, even though months or years might pass before cohabitation began. Hence an 'espoused maiden' is a wife, and her unchastity constitutes adultery. 13-21 Wife accused of Infidelity—This law aims especially at protecting the innocent woman's reputation and the honour of her family. 15. 'Tokens of her virginity', i.e. a garment she wore at the time of the consummation of the marriage, which the husband had to hand over afterwards to her parents. It would bear traces of blood from the ruptured hymen, which were accepted as evidence of previous virginity. 20 f. If guilty, however, the wife shall be brought 'to the door of her father's house, and (there) the men of her city shall stone her to death'. The penalty shows that the offence is presumed to have been committed since the espousals. This was more or less the case that presented itself to St Joseph in connection with the Blessed Virgin's pregnancy, and explains why he was unwilling 'publicly to expose her' (Mt 1:19). 22-27 Adultery—The general law (22) is qualified by 25-27, which establishes a presumption in favour of the betrothed damsel, not yet under her husband's care, when the adultery took place out of reach of help. 28 f. In a case of rape the girl's guilt or innocence is not considered, but the man's responsibilities are determined. 30. 'His father's wife' does not mean his own mother; the law suppresses the practice of a son's inheriting his father's wives, along with the rest of his property. The custom is illustrated in 2 Kg 16:22 and 3 Kg 2:22. In both cases it is regarded as a claim to the father's position.

XXIII 1-8 Exclusions from the Israelite Community k
—1. 'A man whose testicles are crushed or penis amputated shall not enter the assembly of Yahweh.' 2. 'Mamzer' is uncertain ('one born of a prostitute' is the explanation St Jerome was given by the Rabbis of his time); it may mean the offspring of an incestuous union—or even be a general term for the Samaritans, the mixed

218k post-exilic population of the North. 7 f. Such kindly feeling for Edom and Egypt would be surprising; but the law refers not to the nations as such but to immigrants who settled down to live with the Israelites.

1 9-14 Purity in Time of War—Every war being a holy war, the soldiers must guard themselves against ritual impurity, of which nocturnal pollution is taken as an instance. More than that, respect for Yahweh's presence in the camp—at the Tabernacle of the Ark—requires that the necessities of nature be attended to outside it. The signs of parenthesis in 14 are unnecessary.

m 15-16 Fugitive Slaves, from neighbouring countries, are not to be arrested and sent back—nor are they to be enslaved by the Israelites. They are to have the status of 'resident aliens', for whose considerate treatment the Law is frequently solicitous (10:18 f., etc.)

n 17-18 Sacred Prostitution—'There shall be no sacred female prostitute . . . and no sacred male prostitute'; another point in which Israel's religion is unique among ancient Semitic cults. 18. 'Dog' is an opprobrious term for the male hierodule.

o 19-20 Interest on Loans to Israelites forbidden—Cf. Ex 22:25; Lev 25:35 ff. It follows from the concept of blood-relationship that loans between Israelites, as between members of one family, should be charitable assistance, not commercial investments; but the latter may be placed with the 'foreigner' (nokri, distinguished from ger the 'resident alien'). 24-25 show a careful combination of charity to the wayfarer (or the poor) with justice to the owner of the land.

219a XXIV 1-4 No Remarriage with a Divorced Wife after her New Marriage—This law, which supposes divorce as already customary (but excluded in certain cases, 22:19, 29), aims at discouraging it by making it more formal, and irrevocable once the divorced wife has married again. The case is stated in 1-3, the judgement only in 4. 'If a man takes a wife and marries her, and she does not please him because he has found in her something unseemly; and he writes her a bill of divorce and gives it to her and sends her away; and she leaves his house and goes and becomes another man's wife; and the second man does not like her and writes her a bill of divorce and gives it to her and sends her away; or else the second man who took her as his wife dies—her first husband, who sent her away, cannot again take her to be his wife, after she has been made unclean; for that would be an abomination before Yahweh.' The law is quoted in Jer 3:1. The nature of the woman's uncleanness is not clear. It is evidently relative only to her first husband, since it is not forbidden for a third man to marry her.

b XXIV 5-XXV 4 Miscellaneous Laws—5. Cf. 20:7. 7. 'If a man is found who has kidnapped one of his fellow-Israelites and has made him his slave or sold him, that kidnapper shall be put to death.' 8. On leprosy, cf. Lev 13 f.; on Mary (Miriam), Num 12. 6, 10-13. Pledges, as security for the loans of 23:19 f. The hand-mill, a necessity of life for the Israelite family, is excluded; and if the borrower offers his only mantle, 'thou shalt not sleep upon his pledge, but thou shalt return him his pledge without fail (each) evening, that he may sleep in his mantle and bless thee; and it shall be (reckoned) justice to thee before Yahweh'. 14 f. 'Thou shalt not oppress a poor and needy day-labourer'; such were often paid not in money but in foodstuffs. 16. Cf. §110g. 17-22. Justice and Charity towards the Unprotected should be inspired by the hope of God's blessing, a sympathetic remembrance of their own unhappy condition in Egypt, and gratitude for their deliverance therefrom. XXV 1-3 Corporal Punishment—No passage in the Law determines for what offences the bastinado was to be inflicted. The present law aims at preventing its abuse. It may be inflicted only after trial, by due sentence, in presence of the judge, and to a limited number of strokes. 4. Cf. 1 Cor 9:9; 1 Tim 5:18.

c XXV 5-10 Levirate Marriage—An old custom in Israel, but not mentioned elsewhere in the Law. Gen 38 and Ru 4:5 show that in default of a husband's brother the obligation rested on the next-of-kin. Deut limits it to brothers living on the same estate, one of whom dies 'without leaving a son' (the law of Num 27:8 is ignored), and stresses the purpose of the law. A humiliating punishment is prescribed for the man who will not fulfil it; the similar ceremony in Ru 4:7 is presented as merely a legal formality.

11-12 Indecent Assault—The barbarity of the punishment (the only instance of mutilation prescribed by Deut) marks this law as very old, probably pre-Mosaic. (The Middle Assyrian law-code, 1500-1250 B.C., had a similar clause.) It reflects not only the gravity of the injury likely to be suffered by the man, but also primitive reverence for the sexual organs as the source of life.

13-16 Commercial Honesty—13-14 require only that a man use the same standard for both buying and selling (cf. Am 8:5; Mt 7:2). 15, however, evidently of later date, prescribes that the weight and measure be 'true', conformed to some standard, presumably promulgated by the king.

17-19 The Amalekites were nomads who repeatedly harassed Israel during the Wandering and after (Ex 17:8 ff.; Num 14:43; Jg 6:3, etc.). The barbarity here mentioned (not elsewhere recorded)—when they 'cut off all thy stragglers disorganized in thy rear, while thou wert weary and worn out'—was particularly odious by the standards of desert warfare, and explains the severity of the condemnation. (Cf. 1 Kg 15:2 ff.; 30:1 ff.; 1 Par 4:41 ff.)

XXVI 1-15 Two Liturgical Ordinances—1-11 Thanksgiving—At the offering of the firstfruits Israel shall publicly recall Yahweh's loving kindness, contrasting their original nomad condition with the present possession of their own fertile land. 3-4 seem to be an extract from a different version of the same ceremony.

5. 'Thou shalt speak before Yahweh thy God: "My ancestors were nomad Aramaeans, who went down into Egypt and dwelt there as aliens, few in numbers; and there they became a people, great and strong and numerous".' 10. 'And now, behold, I bring the firstfruits.' The essence of Deut's doctrine is in this fine prayer, stressing the gratitude due in return for so much love. Further, there is the intention to exclude any reference of the harvest blessings to the Canaanite fertility gods; to Yahweh alone is due the increase.

12-15 The Triennial Tithe-Banquet, held at home for the benefit of the local poor (cf. 14:28 f.). 12 f. 'When thou hast finished tithing . . . and hast given it to the Levite . . . (then) thou shalt speak in the sight of Yahweh . . .' Not less than the offerings in the temple, these foods belong to Yahweh and must not be profaned; hence not partaken of by one in mourning, nor touched by one ritually unclean, nor used for an offering to the dead—i.e. food and drink set on a grave. 17-19. Statement of the obligations mutually assumed by Yahweh and his people, in the making of the Covenant. 'This day', in the context, is the day on which Moses is presented as making this speech, in Moab; but also any day that a solemn renewal of the Covenant took place, when this formula might be used. This section continues in 28:1.

XXVII 1-26 Ceremonies to be performed on entering the Promised Land—On crossing the Jordan the Israelites are to perform certain rites to signify that they take possession of the land on the terms laid down by Yahweh. The instruction is inserted here as a speech of Moses, independent of the main discourse (chh 5-28). For its fulfilment cf. Jos 8:30-35. 2. An inscription painted on whitewashed stones would not survive long in the climate of Palestine; but—evidence of the antiquity of this tradition—this was the technique used in Egypt. 5f. For this occasion Mt Ebal would be a place chosen by Yahweh for sacrifice. 9-10 are out of place; read as the introduction to ch 28. 14. 'Levites' are here distinguished, as functionaries, from the tribe of Levi, 12. 15-25. The twelve curses listed are surprising; one half of the crimes are not mentioned in the Deut Code, and some of Deut's gravest precepts are passed over. Hence this is

- 219f probably a selection, to fit the number of the tribes, from some much more elaborate ritual of anathemas.
- g XXXVIII 1-68 Blessings and Curses—The ratification of any covenant was accompanied by blessings for its fulfilment and curses for its infringement; cf. the conclusion of the Book of the Covenant in Ex 23:20-33, of the Law of Holiness in Lev 26:3-45. This of Deut, in oratorical form, is the most tremendous of all.
- 2-14 Blessings—6. An all-inclusive blessing, which 'signifies totality by the combination of opposites'. 10. 'That the name . . .': freely, 'that thou art the property and under the protection of Yahweh'. 15-46 Curses—Four short sections, rising each to its own climax in 19, 26, 34, 46. 15-19 correspond to 1-6. 25b. 'and thou shalt be an object of horror to all the kingdoms of the earth.' 34. 'And thou shalt go mad by reason of the things thine eyes shall see.' 36 f. and 41 are out of context; they probably go with the following section. 47-68 Additional Curses—This section is of later composition than the rest. 58, 61 show that it is an addition, not to a speech but to a written book. 64. Cf. note on 4:28. This stirring chapter, overwhelming in its vehement eloquence, shows us by implication how difficult in practice, and how imperfectly fulfilled, was the obligation of the Covenant. Cf. St Paul's comments (Rom 7:7 ff., etc.). We should not exaggerate the material character of the rewards and punishments so vividly pictured; they are adduced only as the outward manifestations of the satisfaction or displeasure of Yahweh, whose sanctity and love are the norms to which his people must conform.
- XXIX 1 Conclusion to the foregoing legislation (chh 12-26) constituting the Covenant of Moab, 'as distinguished from the covenant which he made with them at Horeb'.
- 220a XXIX 2-XXX 20 Third Discourse—2-9 Motives for Gratitude are briefly recalled, in historical summary. 4. According to Heb. idiom this is not an excuse but an accusation; it is equivalent to saying that they would not understand and obey. 6. When the ordinary sustenance of bread and wine was lacking, Yahweh provided them with manna and with water from the rock.
- b 10-29 The Covenant is for Future Generations; hence the responsibility of the whole community here present, when they (12) 'agree to the covenant of Yahweh thy God, and his oath' or 'malediction'—the punishment for non-fulfilment of their contract. 16 f. They know, from their own contact with idolatry, the need for such an agreement, to prevent there being among them now or later, anyone (18) 'who secretly apostatizes from Yahweh our God, to go and worship the gods of these peoples', yet, (19) 'when he hears the words of this oath, congratulates himself, saying, "I shall have peace, doing as I please"; and so wet and dry shall be swept away together'. The last phrase signifies the destruction of all the people, 'the green wood and the dry', for the guilt of some. But in 23-28 the guilt is represented as having been universal. 28. 'As it is seen this day', even if it is part of the 'answer', suggests that this chapter took its final form during the Exile. 29 is a gloss, of uncertain meaning; presumably the 'secret things' are future events, known only to God; the 'manifest' are those which have come to pass, which are a warning 'to us and to our children'.
- c XXX 1-10 Restoration promised even after Destruction—Cf. 4:29-31. 1. 'The blessing or the curse' is probably a gloss; 'all these things' refers only to the chastisement, here presented as an historical fact. This section (1-10) is addressed directly to the exiles in Babylonia, 6th cent. B.C. 3. 'Yahweh thy God will restore thee', i.e. put an end to thy affliction. 5. 'Thy fathers', the generations from the time of Josue to the Exile. 6. 'Circumcise': cf. 10:16.
- d 11-14 No Excuse for Ignorance of the Law—Yahweh has revealed his will clearly and unmistakably, so that they need not fear arbitrary and unpredictable punishments; they know exactly what they have to do to please him.

- 15-20 Summary—15. Cf. 11:26 ff. 16. LXX supplies a missing phrase: 'If thou wilt obey the commands of Yahweh thy God, which I am commanding thee this day, to love Yahweh . . . thou shalt live and multiply and Yahweh thy God will bless thee.' 20b. 'For that means life for thee, and length of days.'
- XXXI 1-XXXIV 12 Historical Appendix—These four chapters form a conclusion not so much to Deut as to the Pentateuch as a whole. They combine extracts from different sources, and the text is in some confusion.
- XXXI 1-8 Appointment of Josue—This is an extract from a larger context. 1 seems to refer to some instruction just received from Yahweh. 2. 120 is a round number, perhaps indicating a life-span of three generations. 'I can no longer go out', i.e. 'I am not active as I used to be'—a different emphasis, at least, from that given in 34:7. 3b. 'And this Josue . . .' is out of place—should perhaps follow 6.
- 9-13 Septennial Reading of the Law—This direction b represents an ideal, probably rarely put in practice before the era of Judaism. 9. 'This law': there is no way of telling what is included in this expression—the Decalogue? the Code of Deut? or some other part of the Pentateuch? Cf. 27:2 f. 12. 'And assemble all the people.'
- 14-15, 23 Commission of Yahweh to Josue—Cf. the parallel account in Num 27:18-23. This in Deut is fragmentary; the 'charge' of 14 comes only—and very briefly—in 23; the latter repeats the phrases of 7.
- 16-21 Instruction to Moses—A description of the conduct of the people, once settled in Palestine. Also fragmentary—cf. the sudden reference (19) to 'this canticle', not mentioned before. 20. 'When I shall have brought them into the land': there is a striking note of pathos in this reference to Yahweh's love.
- 22, 24-30 Introduction to the Canticle—As HT stands, d 24-27, repeating 9, tell of the writing of a law and its delivery for safe-keeping to the Levites; while 28-30 is a fragment, parallel to 22, of an introduction to Moses' recitation of the canticle referred to in 19, 21 f. But a quite plausible correction of two letters—hallsrah for hallsrah—gives in 24 the reading 'words of this canticle', adopted by most critics; then the whole section is an introduction to the canticle.
- XXXII 1-43 The Canticle of Moses—This majestic 222a poem is a didactic psalm, recounting the familiar story of Yahweh's particular bounty to Israel and Israel's unfaithfulness to Yahweh. For this they have been severely punished, through foreign oppressors; but in the end, since his own honour is at stake, Yahweh will rescue his people and turn his anger against their persecutors (cf. Ps 105). Not only the Wandering (10-12) but events in Palestine (13-18) are referred to as history, and ancient history at that (7), which is contrasted with Israel's triumphant vindication (35-43), still in the future. Hence this is a composition not of Moses' time but from some later period of unsuccessful war, following on a time of prosperity and corruption. Its ascription to Moses is an ordinary literary device, to indicate that this is the doctrine that he taught and the history that he foretold.
- 1-7 Announcement of the Theme: Yahweh's Goodness and Israel's Ingratitude—1 f. Invocation. 3 f. Character of Yahweh. 4. 'The Rock, whose work is perfect': a favourite term for God, here and in the earlier Psalms. 5 f. Unreasonable ingratitude of Israel. 7. Introduction to the main theme.
- 8-25 The History of God's Love and Israel's Ungratefulness—c 8-14 What Yahweh did for Israel—8 f. In distributing territories (Gen 10:32) he set aside ample space for his people, 'For Yahweh's own portion is Jacob—Israel is his allotted possession.' 11 should be joined with the foregoing: 'As an eagle, rousing his nestlings, Hovering over his fledglings, Spreads his wings and takes them, Bearing them on his pinions.' 13. 'He let him ride on the heights of the land, And eat the produce of the hills': the installation in Palestine. 14c. 'And the blood of the grape thou didst drink in foam; Thou didst become fat and 222a plump and sleek. The latter phrase has been displaced into 15. 15-18 How Israel abused his Kindness—15. 'But Jacob ate and was filled—And Jeshurun grew fat and kicked—And he abandoned God his Maker—And scorned the Rock his Saviour.' 'Jeshurun', a rare and poetical synonym for 'Israel', is used here ironically; it means 'the Righteous'. 18. 'Thou hast abandoned the Rock who begot thee—And hast forgotten the God who bore thee.' 19-25 Just Anger of Yahweh—20. Yahweh's speech, beginning here, goes to the end of 28. 24 f. Famine, pestilence, and war are his instruments of chastisement.

d 26-42 Yahweh's Anger is diverted to Israel's Enemies—26-28. He will not let his people be utterly destroyed, lest their enemies take occasion to mock at him. 26 f. 'I would have said, "I will wipe them out, I will abolish their memory among men", But I dreaded the taunts of the foe, Lest their enemies should misunderstand.' 28. 'For they are a nation', scil. the enemies. 29-31. Foolishness of the Enemies—Here the poet speaks, interrupting Yahweh's soliloquy. The only reason for Israel's defeats—and by inferior numbers!—is that Yahweh so willed; otherwise his people would naturally conquer, for, 'not like our Rock is their rock—Our enemies can witness to that!' 32-35a. Wickedness of the Enemies, which is an offence to Yahweh. His speech continues. 35a. 'Mine shall be the vengeance and the requital, At the moment when their foot stumbles.'

35b-42 Yahweh will destroy them—The poet speaks again. 35b-38. 'For the day of their destruction is at hand, And their fate is overtaking them, For Yahweh will do justice to his people, And will take pity on his servants.' But he will take care that they learn their lesson; ironically, he will say (37 f.) 'Where are their gods, The rock where they sought refuge? (The gods) who ate the fat of their sacrifices—And drank the wine of their libations?—Let them rise up.' The speech continues to the end of 42. 39. 'See now that I, I am the One, And there is no other god but me. It is I who slay and who bring to life—I wound, and I give healing.'

40 f. Yahweh's solemn oath: 'For I raise my hand to heaven, And I say, "As I live for ever; If I whet my sword . . ."'

e 43 Conclusion of the Canticle—Exult loudly, ye nations, for his people, For he will avenge the blood of his servants, He will execute vengeance on his enemies, And purify his people's land.'

44-52 Conclusion; Yahweh's Instructions to Moses—44 refers to the Canticle, 45 f. to the Law: 'And when Moses finished speaking to all Israel, he said to them, "Set your hearts. . ."' 47. 'For this is not a trifling matter for you, but it means your life; (only) in this way will you live long.' 48-51 is a doublet of Num 27:12-14, with some editorial additions. 52 joins on to 34:1.

f XXXIII 1-29 The Blessing of Moses—This chapter contains (6-24) a series of oracular blessings, in poetic form, on eleven of the tribes (omitting Simeon); cf. the earlier Blessing of Jacob (Gen 49:2-27). The situation implied, the disappearance of Simeon, etc., suggest as a date of composition the late Judges period or the early monarchy. As introduction and conclusion to the blessings there are two parts (2-5, 26-29) of a 'national psalm', glorifying the God of Israel in his leadership of the people. The text of the chapter is corrupt and uncertain in many places.

g 2-5 Psalm; First Part—A theophany: Yahweh brings his people to Palestine. Cf. the same theme in Jg 5:4 f.; Ps 17:7 f.; 77:13 f.; Hab 3:3 f. Here the Wandering is outlined by the mention of four stages. 2b. 'He shone from Mt Pharan; He came to Meribath-Kadesh. From his right hand, a burning fire.' 3b-5. 'They received of his teaching, The Law which he has commanded us. The assembly of Jacob is his possession, And he became king in Jeshurun, When the heads of the people were assembled, The tribes of Israel all together.'

6-25 The Blessings—6 Ruben: 'Let Ruben live, though his men are few in number.' 7 Judah: 'And bring him back to his people. Let thy hands defend his cause; Be thou his helper against his enemies.' 8-11 Levi: 'To Levi belong thy Thummim, And thy Urim, to the man of thy love.' Cf. §179d. The tribe is praised for putting devotion to the cult and the Law above natural ties. 12 Benjamin: 'Benjamin is the beloved of Yahweh; He abides in the security of the Most High, Who guards him all the day, And he reposes on his back', i.e. is carried like a child. 13-17 Ephraim and Manasses: the two tribes are joined as one, Joseph. The blessing of fertility is a variant of Jacob's (Gen 49:25 f.). 13. 'Blessed of Yahweh be his land, By the excellence of the heavens above, And by the deep ocean lying below.'

16. 'By the excellence of the earth and its fulness, May the favour of the Dweller in the bush Come upon the head of Joseph, Upon his head, who is the prince of his brethren.' For the 'Dweller in the bush' see Ex 3:2-4. 17. 'His glory is that of a first-born bull—And the horns of a wild ox are his horns.'

18-19 Zabulon and Issachar: 19. 'They summon peoples to the mountain; There they offer due sacrifice, For they suck the riches of the sea, And gather treasures from the sand.'

20-21 Gad: 'Blessed be he that hath enlarged Gad; Like a lion he crouches, Tearing the shoulder-blade and the head too. And he saw that he got the best, For there is the allotment of the ruler'; not a reference to Moses (who was buried in Ruben's territory) but to the tribe's prosperity in Transjordan. 22 Dan: 'Dan is a lion's cub; He springs out from Bashan.' 23 Naphtali.

24-25 Aser: 'Let Aser be the most blessed of the sons, Favoured above his brothers', especially in possessing the luxuriant olive-groves of Galilee. 'Iron and bronze be thy bars', i.e. gate-fastenings, as a symbol of security.

26-29 Psalm: Second Part—Yahweh continually protects his people. 26 f. 'There is none like the God of Jeshurun; The Rider of the heavens is thy helper, (The Rider) of the clouds, in his majesty. On high is the God of ages, And underneath are the everlasting arms'; a beautiful figure for the protection he gives to Israel. 28. 'Israel shall dwell in security; The fountain of Jacob be secluded, In a land of corn and wine; Yea, his sky shall drop dew.'

29c. 'Thy enemies shall submit to thee, And thou shalt march on the heights of their land.'

XXXIV 1-12 The Death of Moses—The Pentateuch closes solemnly with the death of the great Prophet and Legislator, who was God's instrument in forging a group of nomad tribes into a people, holy to the Lord, and so preparing the way for the far greater Prophet and Legislator whom he prefigured. 1-4 The View of the Promised Land—The headland of Pisgah (Phasga) runs out NNW. from Mt Nebo proper, and rises to a small promontory (modern Râs es-Siaghah) whence on a clear day there is a magnificent panorama of Palestine. Still, it does not include all the further limits here named, which define the land itself rather than Moses' view of it. 1b-3. 'And Yahweh showed him all the land: Gilead as far as Dan; all Naphtali; the land of Ephraim and Manasses; all the land of Judah, to the Western Sea; the Negeb; and the Dead Sea basin (that is, the Valley of Jericho, the city of palms) as far [south] as Segor.'

5-12 Death of Moses and Succession of Josue—5 f. 'And Moses . . . died there . . . according to the word of Yahweh; and he was buried in the valley . . .'. 7. Cf. on 31:2; here, 'his sight was not dimmed nor his vigour spent'. 11-12, awkwardly joined to 10, are a later addition to the text.

THE HISTORICAL BOOKS

By E. POWER, S.J.

- 223a Names and Order of the Historical Books—The historical books are placed in the following order in our Bibles: Josue, Judges, Ruth, 1-4 Kings, 1-2 Paralipomenon, 1-2 Esdras (or Esdras and Nehemias), Tobias, Judith, Esther, and lastly, after a long interval, 1-2 Maccabees. It is generally admitted that Judith and 1 Maccabees were originally written in Hebrew. The primitive language of 2 Maccabees is Greek, that of Tobias is uncertain. In the Hebrew Bible 1-2 Kg is called Samuel, 3-4 Kg Kings, 1-2 Par Chronicles, and 1-2 Esd Ezra-Nehemiah. The word Paralipomenon means 'of things left out' and its substitution for 'Chronicles' by the Greek translators shows that they regarded that book, not quite correctly, as a supplement to Kings. While we distinguish the books of the OT which follow the Pentateuch as historic, prophetic and didactic, according to their subject matter, the Hebrews had only two categories: Prophets, Former and Latter, and Writings or Sacred Writings. The Former Prophets comprised the four historical books: Josue, Judges, Samuel and Kings. Some scholars explain the honorific title given to these books as a consequence of their greater antiquity or earlier inclusion in the Canon. But the Rabbis are more correct in regarding it as an indication of the personal dignity of the authors. According to them Moses, author of the five books of the Torah, ranked highest (cf. Num 12:6-8), then the prophets, who wrote the eight prophetic books, and lastly the Wise Men, who composed the Sacred Writings. Grades of personal dignity do not imply grades of inspiration which are excluded by Catholic teaching. But the name of Prophets clearly indicates that the authors of the principal historical books were the exponents of a divine message, since a prophet was, according to the Hebrews, the mouth of God (cf. Ex 4:10-16; 7:1-2).
- c Survey of the Contents of the Historical Books—The books called 'Former Prophets' by the Hebrews give an outline of the history of the Chosen People from the invasion of Palestine to the Babylonian captivity. Josue describes the conquest and occupation of the Promised Land. Judges contains an episodic narrative of the disorderly period between the settlement in Palestine and the institution of the monarchy. Samuel (1-2 Kg) gives an account of the last of the judges and founder of the monarchy, Samuel, and of the reigns of the first two kings, Saul and David. Kings (3-4 Kg) continues the history of the monarchy through the reigns of Solomon and Roboam, the schism of the northern tribes and the separate kingdoms of Judah and Israel until their disappearance in the Assyrian and Babylonian captivities. There is no history of the captivity. But Esdras carries on the narrative with an account of the principal events of the first century of the restoration. In the Chronicles (1-2 Par) we have a kind of compendium of biblical history from Adam to the edict of Cyrus and additional information about the period of the monarchy, especially as regards the religious institutions of the Kingdom of Judah. There is a second lacuna of two centuries and a half between Esdras and Maccabees. 1 Mac relates the victorious wars of the family of the Maccabees against the Seleucid monarchs of Syria (177-136 B.C.). 2 Mac has the same theme, but only covers the first part of the period (177-161 B.C.). The four smaller books are concerned, not with periods, but with single episodes. Ruth narrates the reception of a Moabitess among the Chosen People in the period of the Judges. Judith describes the deliverance of Israel from a foreign invasion, either of Assyrians in the 7th, or, more probably, of Persians in the 4th cent. B.C. In Esther we have a similar deliverance of Hebrews in exile from the extermination with which they are menaced by a decree of King Xerxes. The trials and rewards of a pious Hebrew family during the Assyrian captivity are the subject of the book of Tobias.

Purpose of the Historical Books—Though these books narrate historical facts, it is evident from an examination of their contents that they have not been written from a merely historical standpoint. In such a hypothesis the historian of the period of the monarchy, for instance, would undoubtedly have informed us at some length of the exploits and fortunes of the various kings of Judah and Israel. The sacred writer, however, usually refers us to historical works, now no longer extant, for information on these matters. On the other hand he regularly points out the religious or irreligious character of the different monarchs and devotes considerable space to the activity of the two great prophets, Elias and Eliseus. The events of the life of King David are recounted at such length that they fill more than a fourth of the pages devoted to the whole history of Israel from the conquest of Canaan to the Babylonian captivity. The historical episodes related in the book of Judges depict, for the most part, recurring cycles of events: sin of Israel, punishment by foreign invasion, repentance of Israel, deliverance by Yahweh. This repeated sin of the Israelites is described in the prologue (Jg 2:20) as a violation of the covenant which God had made with their fathers. Thus we have here a clear indication that the main purpose of the sacred writer was to narrate the working out of the covenant made by God with his chosen people.

And the same idea of a history of the covenant offers a satisfactory explanation of the choice of materials made by the authors of the other historical books. The parts played by Josue and David as God's instruments in the fulfilment of the two great promises made to Abraham (cf. Gen 12:7 and Jos 1:6 and the Messianic prophecies Gen 22:18 and 2 Kg 7:16) explain their predominant importance. Samuel among the judges, Elias and Eliseus among the prophets, Ezechias and Josias among the kings, receive particular attention as the great supporters and restorers of the national religion. The reigns of the most powerful and prosperous rulers of the kingdom of Israel are only briefly recorded. The impiety of Ahab is depicted at length but it is only from Assyrian and Moabite inscriptions that we learn of such important historical facts as the first encounter between Israel and Assyria and the character of the revolt of Mesha, king of Moab. The final narrative of the restoration in Esdras completes the history of the covenant as a cycle of sin, punishment, repentance and deliverance, like the episodes of the book of Judges. In thus relating the fulfilment of the promises and threats attached to the observance and neglect of the covenant, the sacred writers had undoubtedly in mind the instruction of later generations in the religious teachings of their past history.

223g We may thus define their purpose as religious and didactic rather than scientific and informative. The books are historical in the sense that the religious lessons are definitely based not on fictitious narratives but on the facts of history. But the history as such is incomplete, since only those facts are narrated which the authors found suitable to their purpose. The same conclusion may also be deduced from the general character of the Sacred Scriptures, which were given, not for the satisfaction of our intellectual curiosity, but in view of our eternal salvation. As St Paul tells us: 'All Scripture divinely inspired is profitable to teach, to reprove; to correct, to instruct in justice' (2 Tim 3:16).

224a Authorship and Date of Composition—1-2 Par and Esdras exhibit such striking similarities of language, style and method of composition that they are considered by all to have been written by the same hand. The unity of plan which appears in the other historical books suggests an individual author in each case, provided, of course, that we consider these books in their original extent and ignore the later division into two parts or books of Samuel, Kings, Chronicles and Esdras. But various diversities, not only of style and construction, but also of language and date, show that these authors are distinct from one another. Who they were cannot be definitely determined. Names like Josue, Samuel and Esdras do not refer to authorship, but to subject matter like Judges and Kings.

b Nor have we any reliable indications of the various dates of composition except such as can be deduced from the texts themselves. From these we conclude that Josue, Judges and Samuel are pre-exilic, since they make no allusion to the Babylonian exile. The mention of the captivity of the land in Jg 18:30, if authentic, must be referred evidently to the Assyrian captivity of the kingdom of Israel in 733 or 721 B.C. But even this date is uncertain, since a textual error, by which land has taken the place of an original ark, is suggested by the context. The citation from the Book of the Just, or of Yashar (Jos 10:13), which also contained David's elegy on Saul and Jonathan (2 Kg 1:18), shows that Josue was written after the death of Saul. But it would be unsafe to conclude from the reference to the Canaanite occupation of Gezer 'to the present day' (Jos 16:10) that it was written at latest during the early part of Solomon's reign, since there may be question here, as in similar cases, of the citation of an ancient document. The author of Judges implies the existence of kings in Israel and must therefore have been written after the institution of the monarchy. The allusion in Samuel to the kings of Judah (1 Kg 27:6) shows that it was composed some time after the partition of the kingdom. The author of Kings undoubtedly writes in view of the exile, of which he sets forth the causes. He even mentions some events of the exilic period, but makes no mention of the restoration. The book may thus be assigned to the latter part of the exile. The language and contents of Esdras and Chronicles seem to exclude a date prior to the end of the 4th cent. B.C. Of the smaller books Ruth may be pre-exilic and Esther may belong to the Persian period, but both dates are disputed. The dates of Tobias and Judith cannot be even approximately determined. 1 Mac was probably written about 100 B.C., 2 Mac somewhat earlier, but not earlier than 124 B.C. if the first letter cited belonged to the original work.

c Literary Sources—The authority of a historian who had no direct contact with the events which he narrates depends mainly on the character of his sources. There are many indications that the Hebrew historians did not rely on oral tradition for their materials but had excellent contemporary documents at their disposal. References to writing in the earliest sacred books, which were regarded as anachronisms in some quarters not so very long ago, have been amply confirmed by archaeological proofs of its widespread diffusion in Palestine at a still earlier period, cf. § 80i.

224c That Josue left a written record of some events of his life and that this record was used by the sacred writer is an obvious conclusion from Jos 24:26. The lists of the cities of Palestine show their antiquity and documentary character by the use of ancient names, such as Baala, Cariath-Sepher, Hesron and Cariath-Arbe, which have to be supplemented by the author with their later equivalents. The statement at the end of the list of the cities of Judah that the Jebusites dwell in Jerusalem 'to this day' (Jos 15:63) must be part of an ancient document, since David's capture of the fortress was a matter of general knowledge when the book was written. The author, however, does not explicitly mention his sources except in one case, the Book of the Just (Jos 10:13), which seems to have been a poetical collection of the exploits of the righteous men of Israel. In Jg 1 there are some statements, which figured already in Josue in identical terms, but in a different context. The language of the Canticle of Debbora proves that it is an ancient document and the intensity of feeling which it displays implies a very close contact with the events which it describes. The letter of Jephthe to the king of the Ammonites (Jg 11:14-28) seems to have been known to the sacred writer, though this is not expressly stated.

d We have much more direct and indirect evidence of sources employed by the authors of Samuel, Kings and Chronicles. Only one source is explicitly mentioned in Samuel, the Book of the Just, from which David's elegy on Saul and Jonathan is taken (2 Kg 1:18). But we find a mazkir or recorder included among the court officials of David and such abundant and detailed information on his life as to postulate the use of written documents. Here the Chronicler comes to our aid with a mention of the Chronicles of King David (1 Par 27:24) and of the Acts of King David written by the prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad (1 Par 29:29). Moreover, there are many passages, sometimes of considerable length, in Samuel and Kings on the one hand and Chronicles on the other, which are either literally or substantially identical and therefore suppose a literary borrowing either of the latest author from the two earlier ones or of all three from a common source. The latter alternative is the more probable. The Chronicler regularly indicates his sources and gives us at the same time much additional information, for which no sources would be indicated except Samuel and Kings, if he borrowed directly from them. It would seem, therefore, that the sources he indicates are different, since he could not cite from the earlier canonical books what they did not contain. It follows that the sources used by the author of Samuel are the same as those of the Chronicler, namely the Chronicles of King David and the written records of the contemporary prophets, Samuel, Nathan and Gad. The words 'to this day' (3 Kg 8:8; 9:21; 12:19; 4 Kg 8:22) attest the use of documents in Kings, since they do not suit the time in which the book was composed. The author refers us, moreover, once to the Annals of Solomon, fifteen times to the Annals of the Kings of Judah and eighteen times to the Annals of the Kings of Israel. Though these works are directly indicated as sources of further information, there can be no doubt that the facts narrated were mainly derived from them.

e A recorder is mentioned among the court officials of the three kings, Solomon, Ezechias and Josias, whose reigns, owing to their religious importance, receive particular attention. We may, therefore, conclude that the other kings, about whom we are less fully informed, had also their recorders. It is most probable that this word designates an official historian, but it may possibly indicate also, or instead, one who had to remind the king of his duties and functions. If the recorders were historians, the annals of the kings of Judah and Israel would have been mainly derived from their records. Indeed the very mention of the annals seems to imply the existence of such officials. The singular omission of all reference to these annals in Kings and Chronicles for further information on f The Chronicler, who ignores the kingdom of Israel in his account of the monarchy, usually indicates his sources at the end of each reign. These are of two kinds: official chronicles and prophetic writings. Both are represented in the sources of the life of David already mentioned. The prophetic writings of Nathan, Ahias, Addo, Semeias, Jehu son of Hanani, Isaia son of Amos, and the official Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel are cited for the subsequent history of the monarchy, the prophets more usually in the earlier and the Book of the Kings in the later period. The special information on the religious institutions of the kingdom of Judah, in which the Chronicler was particularly interested, would naturally be mainly derived from the prophetic writings. Esdras consists almost entirely of the personal narratives of Esdras and Nehemias, concerning events in which they took a leading part, official documents cited as such, and various lists of persons, derived apparently from public and private records. Only one of these records, a book of Chronicles which had a list of the children of Levi, is explicitly mentioned. The genealogies are mainly derived from the book of Genesis. The author of 1 Mac refers us to public records for the history of the last of the heroes whose exploits he chronicles (1 Mac 16:24), from which we may conclude that similar sources were at his disposal throughout his whole narrative. In 2 Mac we have a synopsis of a longer work of the Greek historian, Jason of Cyrene. There is no definite indication of the sources of Ruth, Tobias, Judith and Esther.

225a Credibility of the Historical Books—The ordinary reader cannot fail to be deeply impressed by the obvious sincerity of the Hebrew historians. This impression is mainly produced by two remarkable characteristics. The first is their special view of the function of history, which is quite different from that of the modern scientific historian. They see and trace in the facts of history the manifestations of an all-ruling Providence, rewarding good and punishing evil and directing all things according to a divine plan. The moderns, on the other hand, leave Providence aside and only seek to discover the natural causes of events. There is, of course, no conflict between these two different points of view, since each refers to a different order of causality and the Primary Cause concurs harmoniously with the secondary causes in producing the resultant effects. But the Hebrew view of history excludes all deliberate distortion of the facts, since such a mode of procedure would deprive it of its essential foundation and undermine its religious teaching. One might disagree with their interpretation of the facts in some cases, if one had not in the doctrine of inerrancy another and a higher motive for assenting to it, but one could scarcely believe that they knowingly substituted fiction for fact.

b The second important characteristic is their truly remarkable impartiality. They know that their people is the chosen people of God, charged with a special mission in the execution of the divine plan, and yet they narrate at length without dissimulation the various instances of their idolatry and moral obliquity, of their backsliding and ingratitude. The sins and scandals of national heroes like David and Solomon are frankly described. Jehu's ferocity and bloodthirstiness and Jephthe's moral and religious deficiencies show us these two deliverers not as idealized figures, but, as they really were, very imperfect human instruments of Yahweh. The error of the prophet Nathan in approving David's plan of building the temple is openly avowed, nor is there any concealment of the very human discouragement of Elias. This characteristic is a natural consequence of the elevated Hebrew concept of history. Alleged instances of partiality can be shown to be only apparent when the special purpose of the sacred writer is considered. Thus the Chronicler's silence about the sins of David and Solomon is explained by the fact that his main interest was in the religious institutions of the kingdom of Judah on which they had no bearing. 225b

Method of Composition: Oriental History—In his e Encyclical on Biblical Studies Pope Pius XII declares that the literal sense of a passage in Scripture, that is, the sense intended and expressed by the inspired writer, 'is not to be determined by the rules of grammar and philology alone, nor solely by the context; the interpreter must, as it were, go back wholly in spirit to those remote centuries of the East, and with the aid of history, archaeology, ethnology and other sciences, accurately determine what modes of writing, so to speak, the authors of that ancient period would be likely to use, and in fact did use'. After remarking that this study of the past has more clearly shown the forms of expression used in recording the facts of history and 'the special pre-eminence of the people of Israel among all the other ancient nations of the East in their mode of compiling history, both by reason of its antiquity and by reason of the faithful record of the events' he adds: 'Nevertheless no one, who has a correct idea of biblical inspiration, will be surprised to find, even in the sacred writers, as in other ancient authors, certain fixed ways of expounding and narrating, certain definite idioms, especially of a kind peculiar to the Semitic tongues, so-called approximations, and certain hyperbolic modes of expression, nay at times even paradoxical, which help to impress the ideas more clearly on the mind'. He then urges the Catholic exegete to make a prudent use of this means also in interpreting the sacred text, attributes to the neglect of it not a few accusations of historical error or inaccuracy made against the sacred writers in the past, and concludes with the words: 'By this knowledge and exact appreciation of the modes of speaking and writing in use among the ancients can be solved many difficulties, which are raised against the veracity and historical accuracy of the Divine Scripture; and no less efficaciously does this study contribute to a fuller and more luminous understanding of the mind of the sacred writer'.

The ancient peoples of the East, Assyro-Babylonians, d Hittites, Egyptians, etc., have left us in their records historical materials, but no historical works. The Hebrews were the first to narrate the events of a period in a continuous narrative with a definite purpose and plan. Their materials were derived from the sources at their disposal, but the choice of the materials used, the ordering of the narrative and the interpretation of the facts were the task of the inspired writers. While, therefore, we derive much enlightenment on their language and customs, modes of expression and historical milieu from their eastern contemporaries, we obtain no direct information on their method of composition.

An effort, however, has been made to assimilate their e mode of procedure to the better-known methods of their earliest eastern counterparts, the much later Arab historians of the Mohammedan period. These were compilers rather than authors, who transcribed their sources or interwove them in their narrative, with or without explicit indication of their provenance, but with little or no attempt at a critical evaluation of their contents. When a modern historian incorporates in his narrative a passage from a literary source without explicitly indicating its author he makes it his own and assumes responsibility for it. Such a passage is an implicit citation. When on the contrary he indicates the author, he leaves the responsibility to him and it is only from the context that we can determine whether he accepts or rejects it in whole or in part. Here we have an explicit citation. The later Arab historians made no distinction between an explicit and an implicit citation. The assumption that the Hebrew historians like the Arab did not assume responsibility for implicit citations seemed to some Catholic exegetes 225e to provide an easy means of solving historical difficulties against biblical inerrancy. But a decree of the Biblical Commission proscribed an indiscriminate use of the theory of implicit citations, authorizing it only in cases where it has been solidly proved that there is a citation and that the sacred writer does not approve it or make it his own; cf. § 521. The reason of this decree is obvious. If the sacred writers did not guarantee the materials they have chosen from sources so extensively used, they would deprive their writings of historical value and would also undermine the religious lessons they intend to teach of an over-ruling Providence in the history of Israel, since these lessons are manifestly and necessarily based, not on dubious or fictitious narratives, but on definite historical facts. The exceptional cases referred to in the decree are not easily established owing to the difficulty of complying with the second condition laid down. One might suggest with all due reserve that the census lists of David provide an instance. It was just as manifest to contemporary readers of Samuel and Chronicles as it is to modern exegetes that these lists were derived from written sources. No prudent historian who knew how the census was made would regard the resultant figures as giving more than a good general idea of the population. The fact that different numbers, derived apparently from different sources, are given in 2 Kg 24:29 and 1 Par 21:5 seems to prove this point, since these numbers differ too much to be approximately exact in both cases.

f The evolutionary theory of Wellhausen, to which many modern critics still adhere, supposes a number of unhistorical post-exilic additions in Judges, Samuel and Kings and finds little historical value in the narratives of Josue and Chronicles. The arbitrary character of this theory has led to the modern reaction against it, even in critical circles, based on the results of recent archaeological discoveries; § 135b-g. As regards its special bearing on the value of the earlier historical books, two points may be noted here. Post-exilic additions made by inspired writers to these books are not excluded a priori, since they are found elsewhere in the Sacred Text, but cannot be determined as such by the mere requirements of the evolutionary theory. The special purpose of the authors of the different books provides the natural explanation of their choice of materials from their sources. The author of Kings, wishing to indicate the causes of the exile, brought about by the sins of the people, naturally concentrates on the history of the Northern Kingdom and has little to say about cult. The Chronicler, on the other hand, who is mainly interested in cult, confines himself to the Southern Kingdom, home of the ark and temple, and describes its religious institutions.

226a Texts and Versions—We are concerned here only with the special character of texts and versions in the historical books of our Hebrew, Greek and Latin Bibles and its bearing on their historical accuracy and inerrancy. As inspiration is a personal attribute of the sacred writers, the inerrancy which it implies belongs primarily to the original autographs, which we do not possess, and can be attributed to our later texts and versions only in so far as they are in exact conformity with them. The inerrancy ascribed to the Latin Vulgate version by the Council of Trent is restricted to matters of faith and morals. We have therefore no guarantee that our present Hebrew, Greek and Latin texts, though substantially authentic, are free from historical errors, but know, on the contrary, from a study of their divergencies, that they all contain a number of them. This is not surprising since alterations invariably occur in literary texts during a long period of transmission and there was not the same reason for a special intervention of Divine Providence in safeguarding historical texts of minor importance as there was for the preservation of passages relating to faith and morals which Scripture is primarily intended to teach.

b The earlier Hebrew text used by the Septuagint

226b differed from the later text, translated by St Jerome, in the historical books by omitting 1 Kg 17:12-31; 17:55-18:5, showing a different order in 3 Kg 4-7, omitting 1 Par 1:10-23 and 23 verses of Neh 11-12 and adding 107 verses, more than a third of the whole book, to Esther. It also had a considerable number of similar but smaller variations. But it is not always easy to determine these accurately, since account must be taken of incorrect translations and of errors in the transmission of the Greek text. The Greek additions to Esther are inspired and canonical according to the decree of the Council of Trent. There is no rule of universal application with regard to the other variants which must be judged on their own merits. It is clear from a comparison of MT and LXX that the Hebrew text was neither so uniform nor so carefully preserved in earlier as in later times. The Greek version of the historical books is faithful on the whole, but not free from minor errors. We do not possess the original texts of Tobias and Judith and the Greek MSS in both cases present several types of texts, which differ considerably. The outstanding merit of St Jerome's version is universally recognized, but it must be remembered that Hebrew was less well known in his time than at present.

Numbers and Chronology—Some of the numbers given in the historical books are incredible. The reason of this is twofold. Alterations in the text, both deliberate and accidental, are more frequent in the case of numbers and the Hebrew use and evaluation of numbers is often different from ours. Some examples of both sources of error may be given. The statement that Saul was one year old when he began to reign and that he reigned two years (1 Kg 13:1) is a clear case of textual corruption. Here, as in similar cases, the sacred writer intended to give and undoubtedly gave the length of the two periods of the monarch's life, and the numbers are from this point of view false and absurd, and therefore corrupt. Again Solomon had 40,000 chariot-horses according to 3 Kg 4:26 (= MT 5:6) but only 4,000, according to 2 Par 9:25. The first number is shown to be a textual corruption by the fact that the king had only 1,400 chariots (3 Kg 10:26; 2 Par 1:14) and only two or three horses, according to the Assyrian and Egyptian records, were yoked to a single chariot.

The interpretation of Hebrew numbers is not always obvious. In 2 Kg 24:9 the results of the census of David are given as '800,000 fighting-men who drew the sword' for Israel and '500,000 men' for Judah. As the ratio of fighters to non-fighters is usually calculated as one to five, we should have in Palestine, according to the obvious interpretation, a population of 6½ millions, which is incredible as the land could not support them. Now the object of the census is twice expressly stated to be the numbering of the people, not of the fighting men only. This was probably done by counting the fighting men and calculating the whole population from the result. The numbers in the text give the whole population, practically the same as at the present day. The fighting men are mentioned to indicate the method of calculation. Some such expression as l'fi = 'according to', must be understood before the fighting men. Often in the historical books the word 'elep is used, not in its numerical sense as 1,000, but to designate a military division under an officer like a Roman centurion. The numerical interpretation of the word has resulted in quite absurd and incredible figures, such as a garrison of over 1,000,000 men in Jerusalem in the reign of Josaphat (2 Par 17:13-17) and armies of 400,000 men in Judah and 800,000 in Israel under Abia and Jero-boam (2 Par 13:3). The million men of Zara the Cushite in 2 Par 14:7 are simply a large indeterminate multitude, as in Gen 24:60, not of soldiers but of nomads seeking new homes. The rendering 'five thousand talents and ten thousand solids' (1 Par 29:7) imputes a gross anachronism to the Chronicler through a mis-interpretation of the Hebrew conjunction w which 226d here means not and but or, equivalently. The solids, literally darics, are contemporary gold coins of Persia and are mentioned to evaluate the weight kikkār, literally 'round', as equivalent to two of them and therefore containing about 17 grammes of gold. And thus the contributions of the people in gold seem no longer exaggerated when the text is exactly interpreted.

e Methods of computing numbers as well as textual errors make it impossible to build even a relative chronology on scriptural data. The practice of reckoning long periods by generations lessens considerably the value of the 480 years of 3 Kg 6:1 in determining the date of the Exodus. The Hebrew judges cannot be definitely assigned to successive periods. Even in the fuller indication of the length and succession of reigns in Kings cases of coreigns and regencies occur in which some years seem to have been reckoned twice. Sometimes the chronological order of events is not followed as in 1 Kg 16:14-23, since it was only after his victory over Goliath that David became a member of Saul's household.

f Miracles—The miracles in these books support rather than impair their historical character. The Hebrews were the chosen people of God, charged with a divine mission in view of the salvation of mankind. It is not surprising, therefore, especially to a believer in the miracles of the NT, to find recorded in their history instances of a special intervention of God for the preservation of their faith and their existence as a nation. These instances are fairly common because the people was stiff-necked and prone to idolatry, and miracles, like speaking with tongues, are for unbelievers rather than believers (1 Cor 14:22). The Hebrews who believed in an all-directing Providence and saw the hand of God in all the events of history had no special term for miracle in the strict sense of the word. Their 'signs', 'shining works', 'mighty works', 'wondrous works' can be and are all used to express natural as well as preternatural effects. But there is no doubt from the description of certain events that the sacred writers clearly recognized their preternatural character.

g These events are of two kinds: those which are preternatural in themselves and can only have God for their author and those which may in themselves be produced by natural causes, but actually occur in such a manner or in such circumstances as to postulate divine intervention. Examples of the first kind are the two resurrections from the dead narrated in the history of Elias and Eliseus (3 Kg 17:17-24; 4 Kg 4:18-37). It would be absurd to argue from the manner in which the miracles were performed that death was only apparent, since the sacred writer affirms that the child was dead in one case and that the soul returned to the body in the other. The 226g means used by the prophets are merely the counterpart of the clay and spittle used by our Lord in restoring sight to the blind. Examples of the second kind are more common. The consumption of sacrificial offerings by fire from heaven is narrated several times. The drought, prophesied by Elias and recorded by Menander of Ephesus in his history of Tyre, may have been the result of entirely natural causes.

The teleological aspect of the miracles is particularly important. Their object is to confirm the faith of the people in God's Omnipotence and Beneficence and to establish and uphold the authority of his envoys and interpreters, the prophets. The great miracles of the opening stages of the conquest of Canaan belong to a period when the assurance of divine assistance was particularly necessary. The miracle on the occasion of the sacrifice of Elias on Mount Carmel occurred at one of the greatest crises of religious history in Israel and secured the victory of the party of Yahweh. On the other hand the absurd and stereotyped prodigies, recorded by Greek and Roman historians as presages of remarkable events, are conspicuous by their absence from the historical books.

Historical Character of Ruth, Tobias, Judith and Esther—These four historical books differ from the others in not indicating their literary sources and in not covering a period of history. They confine themselves to single episodes of an edifying character narrated at length with a didactic purpose. Such narratives lend themselves more easily to dramatization and the admission of fictitious elements. Hence the question has been raised whether they are strictly historical, like the other books, or rather, like our historical novels, based indeed on historical facts, but only historical in appearance, so far at least as some of their contents are concerned. There is no difficulty in the latter view from the side of inspiration, since inspired religious teaching, where the actual course of Divine Providence is not concerned, can be derived from fiction as well as from fact, as parables and allegories attest. There is, however, a decree of the Biblical Commission according to which the historical books must be considered strictly historical except in cases, not easily or lightly to be admitted, when the contrary is established by solid arguments, see § 52j. The final decision on the value of these arguments is, of course, reserved to the Church. Among Catholic scholars the historicity of the books of Ruth and Esther is generally admitted. There is less agreement about the deuterocanonical books, Tobias and Judith. Uncertainty regarding the exact contents of the original inspired text makes a definite solution of the problem in their case practically impossible.

Contents—The book of Josue narrates the fulfilment of the promise made by God to Abraham that his descendants should possess the land of Canaan (Gen 12:7; 13:15; 15:7, 18; 17:8). Josue's campaigns of conquest are first related (chh 1-12), then his distribution of the land (chh 13-21), and finally, after the episode of the transjordanic altar of testimony, his last discourses and death (chh 22-24). The early events are described in detail: the crossing of the Jordan, the capture of Jericho, the capture of Hai, the treaty with the four Hevite cities, the relief of their capital, Gabaon, and the defeat and death of the five Amorite kings who besieged it. Only one subsequent campaign is recorded, the defeat of a great Canaanite coalition in Galilee. A list of the kings slain by Josue concludes the narrative. Its incompleteness is explained by the fact that the narrator restricts himself to those events in the conquest which attest most clearly the intervention of Yahweh. The second part is more complete but not without omissions. The land to be divided and the land already divided are first described and the boundaries and chief cities of the transjordanic tribes are indicated. The allotment of Hebron to Caleb is then narrated. The first distribution at Gilgal follows, in which the most powerful tribes, Judah and the sons of Joseph, receive their lots. The remaining territory is next surveyed and divided into seven portions which are assigned by lot to the seven remaining tribes in a second distribution made at Shiloh, the new headquarters. Six cities are then appointed as places of refuge for involuntary homicides, and cities and pastures are assigned to priests and Levites in the lots of the various tribes. The boundaries and cities of the tribes are not given in the same order and detail in all cases, sometimes for practical reasons, as in the case of the northern boundary of Manasses, since much of the land was still unconquered or unsettled, sometimes owing to a lacuna in text or source as in the case of the western boundary of Zabulon. In the appendix, g Authorship and Composition—The author of Josue, a prophet according to Jewish tradition, is unknown. From internal evidence we may conclude that the book was composed in the period of the monarchy and that ancient written sources were extensively used by its author. It contains only one explicit citation (10:12b-13a) taken from the Book of the Just which contained also the elegy of David on Saul and Jonathan (2 Kg 1:18). We are informed however that the survey of the land according to cities before the second distribution of territory was written in a book (18:9) and that the proceedings of the assembly at Shechem were written by Josue in the Book of the Law (24:26). It is remarkable that the boundaries of the tribes are more strictly according to cities and generally less orderly and less detailed in the second distribution than in the first, such in fact as we should naturally expect from a survey of territory still largely in Canaanite possession. There is thus justification for the assumption that this survey and other similar ancient records were utilized by the author, who finds himself obliged also to make some ancient city names intelligible by indicating their later equivalents. City lists are particularly exposed to interpolations (cf. 19:15 note) and some later elements in them do not affect their original date. The different sources more usually form constituent parts of the narrative (cf. chh 6, 9, 13, 16-17), but are sometimes added to it as in 15:63; 16:10, where we are incidentally informed that the Jebusites hold Jerusalem and the Canaanites Gezer to the present day. Two passages 15:13-19 and 24; 18-21, also found in Judges 1:10-15 and 2:6-9, are most probably derived from a common source. The designation of Josue as the sixth book of the Hexateuch and the distribution of its contents to JEDP are beginning to be abandoned in critical circles. Noth emphatically affirms in his recent commentary that Josue has a literary history of its own, entirely different from that of the Pentateuch. There are occasional glosses and textual corruptions in the MT which are indicated, when important, in the commentary. The LXX is sometimes helpful in determining the original text (cf. especially chh 6-8).

228a Date of the Conquest—The date of the Hebrew conquest and occupation of Canaan can only be determined by a comparative study of scriptural and archaeological data. The use of bronze, not iron, in the construction of the tabernacle and its furniture and the reference to iron, a generation later, in Canaanite chariots (17:16, 18) and spoils of victory (6:24; 22:8) assign the conquest to the period of transition from bronze to iron, c 1200 B.C. Iron was probably introduced into Palestine by the northern invaders, beaten back from Egypt by Ramesses III c 1193 and 1190 B.C., of whom the Sakkala and the Philistines (who had iron chariots Jg 1:19) settled in the plains of Sharon and Philistia. The Philistines are attested earlier c 1230 B.C.

b Several cities, captured by the Israelites, have been recently excavated and the results of these excavations, however much disputed, generally favour the above date and never positively exclude it. Surface explorations recently made independently by Glueck and de Vaux in the region occupied by Ruben and Gad show that it was unsettled throughout the whole Late Bronze Age (1600-1200 B.C.), but settled in the Early Iron Age. Although a surface exploration is less reliable than a complete excavation, nevertheless the homogeneity of the results obtained from the investigation of many individual sites in a large area authorizes the conclusion that Ruben and Gad settled in Transjordan c 1200 B.C. The methodical excavations at Shiloh establish the same approximate date for the Hebrew occupation of Canaan. The first permanent civil and religious capital of the Israelites cannot have 228b long remained unwallled and sparsely populated. Yet such was the condition of Shiloh in the Late Bronze Age, while it was wallled and thickly populated in the Early Iron Age. The Canaanite city and temple at Tell ed-Duweir (Lachish) were destroyed by fire at the close of the Late Bronze Age. The date is clearly indicated by the associated pottery which includes a bowl assigned by a hieratic inscription to the fourth year (of Merneptah), c 1222 B.C. The demolition of a Canaanite sanctuary at Tell Beit Mirsim (Debir) and the destruction by fire of Beitin (Bethel) are both associated with the latest phase of Late Bronze Age pottery and may have occurred c 1200 B.C. but certainly not two centuries earlier. Hai, a ruin, as its name indicates, was uninhabited at both dates. In Jericho and Tell el-Qèda (most probably Hasor) pottery of the latest phase of the Late Bronze Age was discovered and both sites were uninhabited during the Early Iron Age. It is natural to associate this abandonment with the ban of Josue. Jericho and Hasor are the only cities which he completely banned and destroyed by fire. The fire at Hai was primarily a signal (8:21) not a ban which is excluded by other indications. The later date of the destruction of Jericho and Hasor seems therefore more probable and is alone in harmony with other archaeological evidence.

Extent of the Conquest—Josue's conquest of Canaan appears at first sight inconsistent with Jg 1, where the task of subjugating the Canaanites seems to commence after his death. A closer study of the text reveals the incompleteness of his conquest and shows that both narratives are in perfect agreement. Josue overran the whole country, repeatedly defeated Canaanite coalitions against the invaders and thus established the Israelites in the land. He captured a number of cities by assault, put their inhabitants to the sword but did not burn them and render them uninhabitable (11:13), except Jericho and Hasor. He could not garrison them with an army of only 40,000 men, needed for his campaigns and for the protection of his headquarters, and they were consequently reoccupied by the enemy and had to be recaptured. The recapture of Hebron by Caleb and of Debir by Othoniel is related by anticipation (15:13-19) but reappears subsequently in its proper place as part of the narrative of Jg 1. Josue himself before his death speaks of many peoples still remaining to be conquered (23:4-5). The Hebrews were not numerous enough to occupy all Canaan (Ex 23:29; Deut 7:22) and much of the territory remained in the hands of the Canaanites long after the period of Jg 1, especially wallled cities like Yebloom, Tanaach, Megiddo, Dor, Jerusalem and Gezer. The region occupied in Josue's time is only indicated by the mention of Shiloh and Shechem in Mt Ephraim and probably included also much of Benjamin and northern Judah. It was protected from the Canaanites, who were particularly strong in the north, by the barrier of northern Samaria then thickly wooded and practically uninhabited. As regards Galilee we are only informed that the mountainous region in the north was still unconquered (13:6). And so there was peace in the land, a breathing-space after the big campaigns, before the individual tribes undertook the task of completing the conquest of their lots. Subsequent consolidation of an initial conquest is a feature of all successful invasions. Remarkable confirmations of the biblical narrative from recent excavations are: agreement of the dates of the Exodus and the conquest determined independently, Midianite nomads in Transjordan unsettled in the Late Bronze Age, abandonment of Hai in the same period, prosperous condition of Shiloh, the first Hebrew capital, and abandonment of Jericho and Hasor, the only completely banned cities, in the Early Iron Age. Thus the historicity of Josue, denied by the critics, is vindicated by modern research.

Religious Teaching—The principal religious teaching of Josue is the fidelity of God to his promises. He delivered the Israelites from the reproach of Egypt (5:9) and gave them possession of Canaan which he had 228e promised to the seed of Abraham. It is repeatedly stated that Yahweh fought with and for Israel and only those events of the conquest are narrated which manifest most clearly divine intervention under the form of miraculous assistance or at least of supernatural guidance. In only one recorded instance, the first expedition against Hai, Yahweh withdraws his aid in consequence of the sin of Achan and disaster follows. This is a practical illustration of another lesson, frequently inculcated, that fidelity to the law of God is an essential condition of divine aid and success. The absolute supremacy of religious values over all human considerations is taught clearly by the imposition of the ban on the Canaanites to avert religious contamination from a people prone to idolatry (24:14). The ban was not a moral instruction authorizing cruelty or savagery, but an inscrutable decree of God adapted to the execution of his mysterious designs.

f In Josue we have an example of a leader, chosen by God, in whom great natural qualities and fidelity to divine guidance are harmoniously united. His career is sketched and his exploits celebrated in Eccles 46:1-10. No instance is recorded in which he showed unwillingness or hesitation in executing Yahweh's commands. His last words (chh 23-24) express eloquently his solicitude for his people and his earnest endeavours to keep them united in fidelity to their God. His name, originally Hōšea 'salvation' changed by Moses (Num 13:17) to Tehōšua 'Yahweh is salvation' appears later (Neh 8:17) as Yēšua, whence comes the Greek Ἰησοῦς, our 'Jesus'. He is a type of the Saviour. Canaan is a type of the Messianic Kingdom (Rom 4:13). As Josue was the leader of the Israelites in the conquest of the promised land, so Jesus is our leader in the conquest of the kingdom of heaven.

The limits of this commentary exclude a discussion of the sites of the cities mentioned in the lists, for which we must refer the reader to standard works on Palestinian geography like those of Abel and Szczepanski.

229a. A. I-XII Conquest of the Promised Land—

I 1-9 Order to invade Canaan—Josue, appointed by God successor to Moses (Num 27:17-23) and charged with the conquest of Canaan (Deut 3:28; 31:3), is now, after the death of Moses, commanded to lead the people across the Jordan into the promised land. God promises him success in his mission, exhorts him to be courageous and diligent in securing possession of the land for the people, and above all to be faithful in all points to the law of Moses since that is the condition on which God's help is given and success depends.

4. The boundaries of the promised land are briefly indicated: the desert region of Negeb in the south, the mountain of Lebanon in the north, the river Euphrates in the north-east and the Mediterranean Sea in the west. The land of the Hittites, not in LXX and probably a gloss, is an Assyrian designation of Syria and Palestine. These boundaries include subject nations, the Aramaeans, and thus differ in part from the boundaries of the land actually inhabited by the Israelites in which the sources of the Jordan and Mount Hermon take the place of the Euphrates. 7d. 'that thou mayest prosper whithersoever thou goest.' 8a. 'Let not the book of the law depart from thy mouth' means speak frequently about the law. 8c. 'for then thou shalt make thy way prosperous and then thou shalt succeed.'

b 10-18 Preparations for the invasion—Josue orders the people to collect supplies and be ready to cross the Jordan within three days. He reminds particularly those already in possession of their lots east of the Jordan (Ruben, Gad and half-Manasses) of the obligation imposed by Moses on their warriors to accompany their brethren in the invasion. All the people (not merely the transjordanic tribes) declare their willingness to obey Josue as they obeyed Moses in all things.

10. The order is communicated to the people by šōf'rim, lit. scribes but actually headmen (DV princes) as in Ex 5. 11. The expression beyond the Jordan can indicate either side of the river and is therefore sometimes qualified as in 15 towards sunrise. 14. The strong of hand or mighty in valour are the fighting men.

II 1-24 The Spies and Rahab—Josue sends two spies e to inspect Jericho, who are received by Rahab the harlot and safely concealed under flax-stalks on the roof of her house. She manifests her belief in the God of Israel (cf. Heb 11:31) and begs mercy for herself and her father's house in return for the mercy she has shown to the spies. They promise on oath to grant her request and admonish her to tie on her window a scarlet cord that her house may be known and her household spared; she lets them down by a rope from the window of her house on the town-wall and warns them to flee to the hills for three days before recrossing the Jordan to avoid a meeting with their pursuers. The spies return safely and make their report to Josue.

1. Shittim, called Abel Shittim 'Acacia-meadow' in Num 38:48, is the modern Tell Kefrēn, six m. E. of the Jordan. The conjunction after land is explanatory namely or particularly. Rahab seems also to have been an inn-keeper. 4-5a. Correct 'I confess' to certainly and 'at the time' to about the time, since the gate was shut later. 5c. Read surely for 'and'. 6. 'had made . . . had covered . . . had laid in order on the roof.'

12. A true token is a reliable token. 14a. 'Our lives for yours to death if ye declare not this business of ours' means unless you betray us our lives are forfeit to God if any harm comes to you. 14b. For 'truth' read fidelity. 15b. 'For her house was against the inner surface of the wall, and she dwelt against the wall.' The wall is the town-wall. The word qir also means wall, regarded as a flat surface, here the inner surface of the town-wall to which the house of Rahab adhered (cf. 2 Cor 11:33). 16. 'lest the pursuers meet you and afterwards go your way.' 18a. 'Behold when we come into the land thou shalt bind this twisting of scarlet thread.' It is immaterial whether the conversation, mentioned first as most important, took place before or after the letting down of the spies. 21b. For 'hung' read tied. 23a. Omit 'when they were gone back into the city'.

III 1-IV 18 Crossing of the Jordan—1-6. Directions e for the day's march from Shittim to the Jordan are first given. The priests carrying the ark lead the march; the people follow at a thousand yards' distance; the people must be sanctified for the crossing. 7-13. Josue on reaching the Jordan is encouraged by Yahweh and receives instructions for the crossing on the morrow which he communicates to the people. The waters of the Jordan will be divided when the priests carrying the ark enter it, and they are to remain in the river bed until the people have crossed. 14-17. The actual crossing is described. IV 1-9. Twelve men, one from each tribe, are to take each a heavy stone from the channel of the river to be kept as a memorial of the crossing. Twelve other stones are lodged in the channel where the priests halted with the ark. 10-14. The halt of the priests in the river and the hasty crossing of the people are again narrated, then the ascent of the ark from the river and the march through the plains of Jericho. The confirmation of the authority of Josue by the miraculous crossing appropriately ends the narrative. 15-18. It is followed however by an account of the ascent of the priests from the river and the return of the waters to their channel. The obvious interpolation (3:12) reappears in its proper place (4:2).

The narrative is clear and consistent but contains many repetitions which seem best explained by the use of different sources since there would naturally be several traditional accounts of so noteworthy an event. Vg misinterprets 3:1c-2a: 'And they spent the night there before they passed over. And it came to pass after three days.' The three days are those of 1:11. Preparations began 7 Nisan, march to the Jordan 9 Nisan, crossing 10 Nisan (4:19). The spies remained hid three days (2:22); all 8 Nisan and parts of 7 and 9 Nisan. 3. 'follow it [the ark] as they go before.' 4. The people are to remain at a distance from the ark not through reverence but to discern the way more clearly. 5. On the sanctifica-

g The crossing of the Jordan will confirm the authority of Josue as the crossing of the Red Sea confirmed that of Moses (Ex 14:31); it is moreover an infallible sign of divine aid and final success in the invasion of Canaan, 13b, 'The waters of the Jordan shall be cut off, the waters from above, and they shall stand in a heap'; cf. Ex 15:8b. Only the upper waters are mentioned in describing the prodigy since the lower waters flow naturally to the Dead Sea. 14-17. 'And it came to pass when the people left their tents to cross the Jordan that the priests bore the ark of the covenant before the people and as soon as the bearers of the ark reached the Jordan and the feet of the priests bearing the ark were dipped in the brim of the water—for the Jordan overflows all its banks during all the days of the harvest—the waters coming down from above stood and rose in a heap afar off by the city of Adam beside Sartan, but those coming down towards the Sea of the Arabah, the Salt Sea, were cut off altogether, and the people passed over right against Jericho. And the priests bearing the ark stood firm on dry ground in the middle of the Jordan while all Israel passed over on dry ground until all the people had completed the crossing of the Jordan.' Adam is identified with ed-Damiye on the east bank of the Jordan about 16 m. N. of Shittim. The mention of this place where landslides occur as the site of the miracle raises the question whether the drying up of the Jordan was a natural phenomenon like the division of the waters of the Red Sea and thus only miraculous quoad modum in the providential circumstances of time and place. The landslides are caused by the waters themselves which undermine the high marl cliffs on the bank of the river. That of 1267, chronicled by the Arab historian Nuwairi, left the lower river bed waterless for sixteen hours; that of 1927 (to which an earthquake contributed) for over twenty-one hours. The mention of Adam as the site of the stoppage and the analogy of the Red Sea crossing make this view more probable. IV:3. Read stood firm and omit 'very hard'. 10. Omit with LXX 'and Moses had said to him'. 13. The whole army, not merely the transjordanic forces, numbered 40,000 men; cf. 1:16. Both number and interpretation are confirmed by Jg 5:8, a contemporary record, and agree with the indications of Ex 23:29; Deut 7:22. 18. 'And it came to pass when the priests bearing the ark of the covenant of Yahweh came from the middle of the Jordan the soles of the priests' feet were drawn out to the dry ground and the waters of the Jordan returned to their place and flowed as before over all its banks.'

230a IV 19-V 1 Encampment at Gilgal and Result of the Crossing—The exact site of Gilgal between Jericho and the Jordan is disputed and uncertain. Garstang locates the camp on the north side of the Wady Kelt half-way between Jericho and the Jordan, Abel prefers Khirbet el-Ethele nearer Jericho. Gilgal remained the headquarters of Josue and site of the tabernacle until after the first distribution of the conquered territory five years later (14:10). The objection that this site was unsuitable as not sufficiently central ignores the fact that Josue had to keep in close contact with the transjordanic territory denuded of its warriors. It was only when these returned to their homes that headquarters and sanctuary were removed to a more central position at Shiloh (18:1) where ark and tabernacle are still found in the days of Samuel (1 Kg 1-3). The result of the miraculous crossing was to teach all peoples the omnipotence of Yahweh, inspire the Israelites with the fear of the Lord and the kings of Canaan with fear of the invaders.

b V 2-9 The Practice of Circumcision is resumed—Circumcision was obligatory on all male Israelites as a sign of the covenant made by God with Abraham and his descendants to whom the land of Canaan was promised (Gen 17:7-14). The practice was observed in Egypt but neglected in the desert. Since therefore those who came out of Egypt had died in the desert in punishment of their disobedience those who entered Canaan were uncircumcised. Josue is now ordered, literally, to return and circumcise them, that is by circumcising them to return to the ancient practice. This he does with knives of flint according to custom. Vg abbreviates but gives the sense correctly. 2. The second time is tautological, not in LXX and probably a marginal gloss. 9. 'This day have I rolled away from you the reproach of Egypt.' Commentators of all schools refer these words of Yahweh to the rite of circumcision and consequently interpret the reproach of Egypt as uncircumcision. This is impossible if circumcision was practised in Egypt (5). We cannot assume with von Hummelauer that the Egyptian circumcision was material, not spiritual, and therefore equivalently uncircumcision or with Fernandez that Egypt is a time indication including the desert period of uncircumcision. Less conservative critics considerably alter the text, deny all previous practice of circumcision in Egypt or even in Canaan and find its earliest mention in this passage. All admit that the unexpected gallofi 'I have rolled' is a play on the word Gilgal, but ignore the obvious conclusion that the explanation of the reproach of Egypt must be sought in Gilgal and more particularly in being encamped at Gilgal as indicated in the preceding and following verses. The reproach of Egypt was naturally the humiliating condition of the Hebrews there, slaves in a foreign land. This reproach was not removed while they were landless wanderers in the desert. It was only when Yahweh finally established them in their own land at Gilgal that he 'gilgalled' away from them the reproach of Egypt. See 'Jos 5:9 and the Institution of Circumcision', ITQ 18 (1951) 368-72.

10-16 Celebration of the Pasch and Apparition to Josue—The Israelites celebrated the Pasch in Gilgal at the appointed time; cf. Ex 12. 11. 'And they ate of the produce of the land ['on the morrow of the pasch', not in LXX, is probably a gloss], unleavened cakes and roasted corn-ears on the same day.' On the manna cf. Ex 16. It was not the only food of the Israelites, hence the preparation of supplies (1:11). 14. It is not clear whether the leader of the army of Yahweh who appeared to Josue by Jericho was an angel (Michael? cf. Dan 10:21) or Yahweh himself. His words rather suggest the latter alternative. The apparition was a guarantee of divine aid in the attack on Jericho. For 'no' (MT) read him (LXX, Syr., some Heb. MSS) after 'answered'. As the Israelites had scarcely time to recover from the effects of circumcision in three days it is probable that here as elsewhere the chronological order of events is not strictly observed.

VI 1-47 Capture of Jericho—The interpretation of ch 6 is complicated by the uncertainty of the text and the fusion into one narrative of two traditional accounts of the capture. MT seems to have received later additions, difficult to explain if authentic. LXX in 2-7 had a shorter and better text. According to one account the Israelites invest Jericho and when the trumpets are sounded raise a mighty shout on which the walls collapse and they enter the city. According to the other a processional march is made round the city once a day for six days and seven times on the seventh day after which at the order of Josue they raise a mighty shout with the same result. The traditions are not inconsistent since a march round a city does not exclude an investment and Josue's order would naturally be communicated by the trumpets. The miraculous character of the capture is emphasized in both. The marching and the blowing of trumpets were not perhaps intended to intimidate the besieged but may have been ancient ritual observances connected with the imposition of the ban. The trumpet announces the ban in Ex 19:13, 17 and even in the NT at the last judgement it introduces the final victory of the blessed and the eternal ban of the wicked.

1. For 'fenced' read remained shut up. 3a. 'Place the fighting men round in a circle.' Omit 3b-4 (LXX). The trumpets are made of rams' horns, not 'used in the jubilee'

230f (Vg). 5a. 'And it shall come to pass when the ram's horn is sounded, when you hear the sound of the trumpet.' 6-7. After the words of Yahweh (2-5) Josue tells the priests to order the people to invest the city (LXX), but instructs first the priests, then the people, on the processional march round the city (MT). 8-9. Instructions for the march are given (LXX), but the actual march is described (MT). 10. 'And shout': 'then shout'. 11. Omit 'a day'. 12-14. The march of the second day is narrated. LXX erroneously puts the priests and the ark in the van instead of between vanguard and rearguard. 15-25. The account of the seventh day's proceedings is interrupted between the order to shout (16) and its execution (20), by instructions concerning Rahab and the ban. Their execution is described. Rahab with her family, house and belongings was exempted from the ban. She dwelt among the chosen people and holds an honoured place in the ancestry of our Lord (Mt 1:5). She is praised for her faith (Heb 11:31) because she sided with Yahweh and his people.

g The herem or ban was the prohibition of contact with certain persons or objects to avoid contamination of them, if sacred, or from them, if accursed. In war what was banned belonged to Yahweh, since he it was who gave victory to his people, in virtue not of a vow or a sacrifice but a right, the extent of which he alone determined. It was not the property of man or pleasing to God, two essential notes of sacrifice, with which it is contrasted (1 Kg 15). There was a ban on cities and a ban on persons. The banned city with its contents was destroyed by fire; it was forbidden to rebuild it; its inhabitants and their cattle were slain; valuables not easily destroyed, gold, silver, vessels of bronze and iron, were reserved for religious uses. Only two cities, Jericho and Hasor, are said to have been thus banned, and both are now known to have been uninhabited, after their destruction, during the Early Iron Age. The ban on persons obliged the Israelites to slay all the Canaanites except those who voluntarily submitted like the Hevites (9:20; 11:20). Their slaughter is not fully accounted for by their iniquities, since the innocent children were included, nor by the barbarous customs of the age, since the Israelites had war laws of a more humane character, but by a special command of God to whom all lives belong (Deut 20:10-20). Its object was to preserve his chosen people from religious contamination that they might remain a fitting instrument for the execution of his merciful design to redeem mankind. 26. Josue finally menaced prophetically the rebuilder of Jericho with the death of his eldest and youngest sons. The fulfilment of the prophecy is recorded (3 Kg 16:34). Some interpret the deaths of Hiel's sons as foundation sacrifices, but it is more probable that they were acts of God by which he punished the violation of his command. That Jericho was not inhabited between c 1200 and 870 B.C. is established by excavations on the site. Mentions of it in the interval (Jg 1:16; 3:13; 2 Kg 10:5) refer to temporary installations in its immediate vicinity.

h Garstang's recent excavations have illustrated and confirmed many details of the biblical narrative. The city captured by Josue was about five acres in extent and had a double wall of brick about 650 yards in circumference so that seven rounds of the walls could be made in a few hours. Many houses were observed built up against the city wall like Rahab's. This wall, 12 ft. thick, collapsed outwardly into the space between the two walls. The outer wall, 6 ft. thick, fell down the slope of the hill. The uncovering of the stone foundations showed that neither wall had been undermined. The walls wherever disclosed 'are found to be deeply fissured and as it were dislocated. The indications point to earthquake' (Garstang). If God used this natural means, the providential determination of time and place would still be miraculous. The ruins show traces of deliberate incendiarism. Garstang dates the catastrophe 1400-1388, Vincent 1250-1200 B.C. The Late Bronze Age pottery discovered in both city and necropolis on which Vincent grounds his date is assigned by Garstang to subsequent partial occupation of the site. 230h

VII 1-VIII 29 Capture of Hai—1-15. After mentioning the violation of the herem the narrator relates the first unsuccessful attack on Hai, then Josue's prayer to Yahweh, who reveals to him the cause of the defeat and the necessity and manner of expiating the sin committed. 16-26. The culprit is discovered, avows his guilt and reveals where the spoils are concealed. They are restored to the sacred treasury, Achan is stoned to death and the anger of Yahweh is appeased. VIII:1-9. Yahweh orders a second attack on Hai now placed under a mild form of ban. Josue commands 3,000 men to ambush the city on the west side. They are to enter and set fire to the city when its defenders rush out to pursue the Israelites attacking on the east side and simulating flight. 10-29. The attack is made on the morrow. The Canaanites are caught between the two parties and 12,000 are slain. The ban is executed on the occupants of the city, but the spoils and cattle fall to the victors. Here as in ch 6 LXX supposes a shorter and better Hebrew text than MT. Hai 'the Ruin' is the modern et-Tell 'the heap of ruins' over a mile east of Bethel. This identification agrees so well with the textual indications as to exclude all reasonable doubt. The easiest and most direct way to Hai from Jericho is up Mt Karantal between Wady Teisun and Wady Kelt, then by Wady Abu-Retme and straight on to the top of the mountain range. The distance is c 15 m.

2. Omit with LXX 'which is beside Bethaven', a MT gloss since Bethaven 'house of idolatry' is most probably a later name for Bethel 'house of God'; cf. Am 5:5. 5. Sebarim, lit. 'precipices' or 'quarries', rendered as a verb by LXX, is not identified. 6. Omit with LXX 'the ark of', a MT gloss. 14-18. On the judgement by oracle cf. Ex 28:30 note. The casting of lots was a long process. Tribe, clan (DV kindred), house or family, individual was determined by elimination. 21. For 'scarlet garment' read Babylonian mantle, for 'golden rule' tongue (tongue-shaped wedge) of gold, and for 'I covered with the earth which I dug up' was under them (lit. it used collectively). 23-25. According to LXX the stolen objects were not brought to the valley of Achor having been duly consigned to the sacred treasury (cf. 6:19) and only Achan was stoned. The burning and then stoning of them after the stoning of him is clearly a textual corruption in MT. It is therefore probable that the family of Achan was not slain (cf. Deut 24:16) and that his sons and daughters is an early interpolation. The name of the valley of Achor ('trouble') is explained. Achan becomes Achor in LXX. The valley (émeq) is not definitely identified. It may be the depression between the mountain range and the Jordan north or south of Jericho.

VIII:2. In the second attack an ambush is laid behind (west of) the city. There is a suitable place behind a hill called Burgmus between Hai and Bethel which could be reached secretly by the Wady Zeitun and where a detachment though well concealed could observe the movements of friends and foes. 3. Read 3,000 for 30,000, too many for an ambush. Omit with LXX 6c = DV 7a. 8. 'according to this word [LXX; 'the word of Yahweh' MT] you shall do. Take care! I have commanded you.' MT makes Josue's command more efficacious than Yahweh's. 9b. Omit with LXX the pointless statement 'But Josue stayed that night in the midst of the people', an explanatory gloss on 10a. 11b-13. Omit with LXX except: 'And the ambush for the city was on the west'. According to MT Josue laid a second ambush of 5,000 men west of Hai, pitched his camp for a day and a night north of Hai, and during the night paid a purposeless visit to the valley between the camp and Hai. But a second ambush is out of the question, and the first would have been discovered during the day by the Bethelites if the attack was delayed. When the assailants appear (11a) the king of Hai advances to meet them (14a). Omit with 231d LXX 14b 'to the place appointed before the desert' which is unintelligible. 15-16. LXX continues: 'And Josue saw and retreated with Israel before them, and they pursued the Israelites and were drawn away from the city'—a better text than MT. 19. The javelin (DV shield) is raised as a signal to those in ambush in LXX, where 'and those in ambush will come forth quickly from their posts' appears between 18a and 18b of MT. LXX entirely omits 26 where Josue's extended javelin is strangely assimilated to the hands of Moses raised up in prayer (Ex 17:11 f.). 19-29. The prearranged programme is carried out successfully. The king of Hai made prisoner is slain like the five Amorite kings (10:26) before being hung on a gibbet till sunset; cf. Deut 21:22, where also death precedes suspension. He was buried in a pit (LXX) like Absalom (2 Kg 18:17) at the city gate (MT) probably in the unexcavated east wall.

e It is solidly established by the excavations at et-Tell (1933-5) that the site was uninhabited 2000-1200 B.C. It was partially occupied in the Early Iron Age (c 1200-1050) to which the alleged finds of Late Bronze pottery made earlier by Albright and Garstang really belong as Albright subsequently recognized. How can the inhabitants of an unoccupied city have repulsed the Israelites or been defeated by them? The supposition that Hai had a different site or that a different city, Bethel, was attacked postulates a very improbable readaptation or a very arbitrary rewriting of the biblical narrative. Nor can it be expected that further excavations in the uninvestigated parts of the site will modify the conclusions reached since the separate attestations of walls, enclosure and necropolis are in complete agreement. Vincent's solution of the problem still remains and is strongly supported by various indications in the text. The immediate need of the Israelites after the conquest of Jericho was a strong position on the central mountain range as a base of operations. Such bases in Josue's time were not Canaanite cities but unoccupied or sparsely occupied sites like Gilgal and Shiloh. Ha-'ai 'the Ruin' by its nearness and accessibility, its natural defences and its fortifications only partially dismantled, was the most suitable objective. Its seizure seemed easy, since a reconnoitring party found it unoccupied, and 3,000 men were judged sufficient for the enterprise. So prudent a leader as Josue would undoubtedly have sent a much larger force, as he did in the second attack, if the post duly reconnoitred had then as later a garrison of 12,000 combatants (8:25). The repulse was a grievous surprise to Josue and, if the consequence of an error of judgement, could scarcely be attributed entirely to the sin of Achan. The object of the first attack is always (six times) called 'the Ruin', but more frequently 'the City' when known to be occupied. The Canaanites had seen the reconnoitring party, anticipated the move of Josue and garrisoned the post with contingents from the neighbouring cities. The Bethel contingent is actually mentioned (8:17). At Jericho, men and women, young and old were slain (6:21), at Hai only men and women (8:25) or combatants since women fought like men in those ancient times. Hai had no permanent residents. The 'king' of Hai is the leader of the garrison in accordance with the stereotyped form of historical narrative. Similarly the pre-arranged fire-signal (8:8, 21) assumes the stereotyped form of the ban (8:28). Hai temporarily inhabited was really burned and made an uninhabited ruin by Josue, but it was not banned in the strict sense of the word like Jericho and Hasor for the spoils fell to the victors (8:2), and it was inhabited in the Early Iron Age. Similar occupations of ancient ruins occur in modern Arab warfare. The excavations, therefore, far from discrediting the biblical narrative of the conquest of Hai, have given us the key to its correct interpretation.

232a VIII 30-35 Altar and Religious Celebrations on Mt Hebal—Josue executes the commands of Moses (Deut 27) by erecting an altar on Mt Hebal, writing a copy of the law (not 'Deuteronomy' DV) on stones, arranging the people half at the foot of Mt Hebal and half at the foot of Mt Garizim with the priests and the ark between them and having the law read aloud, particularly, though not exclusively, the blessings and curses assigned to its observance and non-observance, all in fact that Moses had ordered to be read. This passage appears after 9:2 in LXX and evidently registers an event which occurred at an indeterminate period after the conquest of southern Palestine. What Josue wrote on the stones is discussed in § 130k. Hebal and Garizim are not near Jericho, but respectively north and south of the modern Nablus, since Garizim is associated with Shechem explicitly (Jg 9:7) and implicitly by the terebinth (Deut 11:30). The Samaritan Pentateuch reads Garizim instead of Hebal (80), a deliberate falsification to give the halo of antiquity to their sacred mountain as is generally believed. 34. 'Josue read all the words of the law', had them read by the Levites (Deut 27:14).

IX 1-27 Covenant with the Gabaonites—1-5. A b confederation of four important cities in the centre of southern Palestine, terrified by the victories of Josue, send an embassy to his headquarters at Gilgal seeking an alliance. 7-15. They obtain their request under the false pretence that they have come from a great distance and are not Canaanites. 16-27. On the discovery of the fraud their lives are spared, but they are condemned to serve the Israelites for ever as hewers of wood and drawers of water. Of the four cities the most southerly is Kiriath-Yearim, Deir el-Azar, c 8 m. W. of Jerusalem on the southern road to Jaffa; Caphira, Kefire, is 2 m. N. of it; the most northerly is Beeroth, el-Bireh, 10 m. N. of Jerusalem; Gabaon, el-Gib, head of the confederacy, is 7 m. NNW. of Jerusalem. Some writers regard the narrative as a fiction to explain the subsequent condition of the Gabaonites as inferior temple servants, but the covenant is explicitly and implicitly attested in 2 Kg 21:1, since the famine which punished Saul's slaughter of the Gabaonites implies the violation of a special obligation. 1. For 'plains' read foothills, broken ground at the foot of a mountain range, and for 'by Libanus' towards Libanus, the northern boundary. 4b. Read 'and old sacks (of fodder) for their asses'. 5b. The bread was dry and mouldy. 6b. Read after 'country' 'now therefore make a covenant with us'. 6c. For 'them' read the Hevite. Some commentators read Hurrite (hri) for Hevite (hwi) here (with LXX) and also 11:3 and Jg 3:3. It seems preferable to retain Hevite with Abel and interpret the word as the name of an Amorite clan. 7a. 'Perhaps you dwell in the midst of us' is explained in Vg. The fact that the negotiations are conducted usually by Josue (8-13; 15a; 22-27), sometimes by the Israelites (7) or the princes of the congregation (14; 15b; 18-21) has suggested not improbably that two traditional accounts are fused into one narrative. The fusion appears where the ambassadors address Josue and the people first together (6) and then separately. The only difference is in the mode of expression and the additional but not contradictory details supplied. 9a. 'because of the name'. 13. Omit 'and burst . . . and almost consumed' (Vg). 14a. For 'they' (Vg), 'the men' (MT) read the princes (LXX). 15. The oath of Josue is contained implicitly in the covenant. 17a. The third day is not in LXX. Render 'multitude' and '(common) people' by congregation (DV 18, 21, 27). 20. The wrath is correctly interpreted of the Lord (Vg). 21c. 'As the princes had promised them.' 23. The curse was: None of you shall be freed from bondage so that you will be hewers of wood, etc. 27. 'And Josue gave them that day as hewers of wood and drawers of water to the congregation . . . should choose.' The inferior temple servants, not all Gabaonites, are therefore usually called N'ṭinim 'given'. As 'unto this day' always ends an episode the last clause of 27 is probably a gloss.

X 1-15 Defeat of an Amorite Attack on Gabaon—1-5. Five Canaanite kings leagued under the leadership 232d of Adonisedec, king of Jerusalem, attack Gabaon, stronghold of the Hevites, who had allied themselves with the Hebrews. 6-10b. The Gabaonites appeal for aid to Josue, who marches by night from Gilgal to Gabaon, surprises the besiegers and defeats them with great slaughter. 10c-15. During the pursuit of the enemy God aids the Israelites by raining hailstones on their foes and prolonging the daylight. The territory of the five kings forms a rough quadrilateral. Jerusalem (Urusalim, 'city of peace' or 'of Shalim', in the Amarna Tablets) was at the NE. angle, Hebron, modern el-Khalil 'the friend (of God)', i.e. Abraham, 19 m. S. of Jerusalem, at the SE., Jerimoth, el-Yarmuk, 16 m. WSW. of Jerusalem, at the NW., Lachish, the recently excavated Tell ed-Duweir, 16 m. W. of Hebron at the SW. The name and site of the fifth city is uncertain, either Eglon (MT) probably Tell el-Hesi, 6 m. W. of Lachish, or, less probably, Adullam (LXX), 'Id-el-Ma, 4 m. SSE. of Jerimoth. The central and most important part of southern Palestine is clearly indicated. Adoni-sedec 'lord of justice' recalls Melchisedec 'king of justice' (Gen 14:18; Heb 7:2). The interpretation, 'Sedec is my lord' (or 'king'), supposes a divinity Sedec of which there is no proof. The king of Jerusalem in the Amarna tablets had a Hurrite name 'Servant of Khipa'.

1. 'And were in the midst of them' (MT), 'and were their confederates' (DV), not in LXX, is probably a gloss. 2. For 'he' read they (the king and his subjects) and insert as before one. 5. Omit with LXX 'being assembled together' but read 'Amorite' (MT, Vg) not 'Jebusite' (LXX). Amorite is derived from Amurru, 'Westland' in Babylonian, with special reference to the mountain regions. 7. The conjunction before most valiant men is not connective but explanatory. Josue probably took the road to Hai turning to the left at Mukhmas. The distance, c 16 m., could have been covered in a night. 10. 'He' (DV) is Israel. The enemy fled westward to the Vale of Aialon by the northern route from Gabaon ascending to Upper Bethhoron (House of the god Horon), Beit-Ur el-fôqa, 5½ m. NW. of Gabaon, and descending thence to Lower Bethhoron, Beit-Ur et-tahta, 2½ m. farther on. Azeca and Makkeda are probably but uncertainly located respectively at ez-Zakariyeh, 2 m. W. of Jerimoth, and Khirbet el-Kheisum farther to the west. Makkeda in the Shephelah (15:44) cannot be Moghâr 'caves' in the western plain, c 14 m. from Aialon.

11. The great stones were hailstones. 12-15. The day was rendered memorable and unique by a prayer of Josue (12a), granted by Yahweh (14b), that the day or light period should be prolonged to enable him to complete his victory. The prayer is contained in an explicit citation from the Book of the Just, a collection of poems in praise of the great men of Israel, under the poetical form of a command given by Josue to the Sun and the Moon which they obediently execute. 12b-13a. 'Stand still, Sun, in Gabaon and Moon in the vale of Aialon. And the Sun stood still and the Moon halted until the people avenged themselves on their enemies.' As the Sun rules the day and the Moon the night (Gen 1:16), if the former halts to prolong the light period the latter must also halt to arrest the darkness period. The object of the halt is to give the people more time for the pursuit which would have been checked by darkness. The sacred writer now gives us his authoritative interpretation of the event. 13c-14. 'And the Sun stood still in the midst of the heavens and hastened not to set for about a whole day. And there was no day like that before it or after it for Yahweh hearkened to the voice of a man because Yahweh fought for Israel.' The explanation of stood still as hastened not to set clearly indicates a stoppage in the sun's normal course across the heavens to his setting. He hastens or runs his course (Ps 18:6) as a good servant executing with alacrity his master's behest. The verb bô 'enter' always means 'set' when used of the sun. The sense of 13c is thus assured and with it the meaning of the sun's stoppage intended by the sacred writer and consequently by God himself. As the sun stopped for a whole day or light period one day became two (Ecclus 46:5, LXX, not fully extant in Heb.) and was thus unique, not because God answered man's prayers, but because, fighting for Israel, he answered the particular prayer of the man Josue for the prolongation of the light period. Yahweh thus worked a great and unique nature miracle for his people at Josue's request.

It must not be supposed that the sacred writer is here chronicling an astronomical observation or teaching us astronomy. He is really recording an ancient tradition at least two centuries after the event in language suggested by the poetical citation from the Book of Yashar and adapted to the comprehension of his contemporaries who believed that the sun moved daily across the heavens and that a prolongation of the day or light period implied a temporary cessation of that movement. He does not teach or affirm anything about astronomy or other natural sciences but accommodates himself to the ideas and language of his time in these matters. He does not err therefore by expressing his religious teaching in terms of an ancient astronomical belief now known to be false. Nor does his language authorize the conclusion of a disturbance in the movements of the heavenly bodies since it is not a description of an astronomical observation but an accommodation to the ideas of his contemporaries. He does not tell us how the miracle was worked. We only know that God said: Let there be light. And there was light, when naturally there would have been darkness. The miracle is not particularly commemorated in the OT because it did not mark a stage in the history of Israel like the miracles of the Exodus. The same is true of other extraordinary miracles like the resurrections of the dead narrated in the history of Elias and Eliseus.

A different interpretation of the event recorded in Jos 10:12-14 has been proposed by some Catholic and non-Catholic commentators. The stoppage of the sun is explained as a cessation from his function of giving light and/or heat by reason of the clouds accompanying the hailstorm insinuated in 11. The meaning given to the Hebrew verbs indicating the stoppage may be admitted and it is possible, though not very natural, to suppose that the narrator may be referring to the same event in 11 and 12-14. There seems however to be an insuperable objection to this interpretation in 13c. The mitigation of the sun's light and/or heat by storm clouds does not impede or in any way affect his hastening to his setting. The sacred writer moreover clearly interprets the standing still of the sun as a cessation of his normal course across the heavens and his interpretation is authoritative. It might be added that while the order given to the sun in the new interpretation is at least intelligible, the same order given to the moon seems absurd, and that relief from the sun's light and/or heat would be at least as advantageous to the pursued as to the pursuers and thus ill adapted to the avowed object of Josue's request. A hailstorm moreover would scarcely be said to render a day unique. In the case of Galileo the theologians consulted undoubtedly erred in their interpretation of this text and showed a regrettable disregard for the principles laid down by St Augustine and St Thomas (Dz 1947). The decrees of the congregation however were not doctrinal but disciplinary. They prohibited certain books and condemned Galileo as suspected of heresy, but proposed no teaching to the faithful.

16-43 Conquest of Southern Palestine—16-27. The five Amorite kings kept prisoners in a cave at Makkeda are brought forth and put to death. 28-39. Various cities are now invested, captured and depopulated one by one in the following order: Makkeda, Lebna, Lachish, Eglon, Hebron, Debir. 40-43. On the completion of the campaign of conquest Josue returns to Gilgal. The interval between this and the last campaign was brief since the five Amorite kings have still to be dealt with. They are brought forth and Josue orders his captains to put their feet on the necks of their c XI 1-23 Defeat of a Northern Canaanite League and Completion of the Conquest of Canaan—1-9. Josue at the command of Yahweh, by a surprise attack, defeats a northern coalition under the leadership of Jabin, king of Hasor (Vg Asor) at the Waters of Merom. 10-15. He then captures Hasor and the neighbouring cities, slays the inhabitants and destroys Hasor by fire. 16-23. Finally, after a long war, he completes the conquest of Palestine.

1. The first places mentioned, Madon and Semeron in MT, Maron and Simoon (= Sim'on) in LXX, were most probably in eastern Galilee. The name Madon survives in Madin just south of Qarn Hattin, a strong position west of the Lake of Galilee. Sim'on is the Shammuna of the Amarna Tablets, the modern Sem'unieh, west of Nazareth. 2. Kinneroth (el-'Oreime), on the shore of the Lake of Galilee, is in the same region. Before 'Dor' read nāpāṭ as in 12:23; 17:11; 3 Kg 4:7. The district of Dor was northern Sharon. The league extended from Dor, near Tantura, 15 m. S., and Achsaph (Tell Keisan), 8 m. NE. of Haifa on the western seaboard to Lake Galilee and the foot of Mt Hermon in the east. 10. The special importance of Hasor attested by Egyptian texts and the Amarna Tablets explains its position as head of the league and confirms its location by Garstang at Tell el-Qēda, about 5 m. SW. of Lake Huleh where there was a fortified camp, 1,200 yards long and 600 wide, on a level plateau, dominated by a city, sixteen acres in extent, at the SE. end. Hasor means 'enclosure'. The expression Waters of Merom implies a city, Merom, with an abundant water supply, hence Lake Huleh is not meant. Meiron, 11 m. WSW. of the lake, the ancient Merom, seems indicated. Josue was a day's journey to the south when he received the order for the attack and the promise of success. 2. Read over against (LXX; south of, MT) Kinneroth, in the valley of Gennesareth. 4. The horses were not ridden but yoked two or three to each chariot. 8. The fugitives scattered, some going north to Sidon, others NE. to Maspha, probably es-Subeibe above Baniyas, others west to Misrephoth-maim, el-Muṣeiref on the coast just within the present northern boundary of Palestine. The date of the destruction of Hasor, where Garstang made extensive soundings in 1928, raises a problem like that of Jericho. 'The complete absence of Mykenaeen specimens [in the camp], as at Jericho, suggests a date of destruction about 1400 B.C. . . . The occupation [of the city] seems to have continued, less intensively, until towards the end of Late Bronze Age III. Thereafter ensued a considerable gap in which specimens of Early Iron Age I were conspicuously absent' (Joshua Judges 383). As Jericho and Hasor were the only cities completely banned and destroyed by fire it is surely more natural to regard the 'considerable gap' in both cases as the immediate result of the capture and ban. 13a. 'But all the cities standing on the hills Israel did not burn.' 16. Here as in 10:41 the land of Goshen immediately follows the arid Negeb (implicitly indicated by Qadesh-barnea in 10:41). LXX reads Gosom, and it seems probable that Goshem, lit. fertile (land), should be read. The Egyptian Goshen (LXX Gesem) might be similarly explained as the Hebrew allotment was very fertile. 17. Baalgad is probably Baniyas at the foot of Hermon and the plain of Libanus is Merg 'Ayyun (cf. 13:5); Mt Halaq, Gebel Halaq, 25 m. SW. of the Dead Sea, is the southern limit; cf. 12:7. 20. The hardening of the hearts of the Canaanites, a result of their own free-will, was permitted by God and formed part of the divine plan since their submission would hinder the Israelites in executing the ban and thus expose them to religious contamination. 21-22. The Anakim, lit. long-necked, were a race of giants in the mountain range of southern Palestine and in the Philistine cities. Goliath was one of the Philistine Anakim who were not exterminated. XII 1-24 Summary of Conquests—The conquests of Moses in Transjordan are first indicated, then those of Josue in Cisjordan. 1. Read after 'Hermon' and all the Arabah [Jordan valley] on the east side'. 2-3. Sehon ruled over half Galaad having the Arnon on the south, the lower Jabbok on the north, the Dead Sea and Jordan on the west and the Ammonite region bounded by the upper Jabbok on the east. Aroer is in the middle of (the line drawn by) the torrent. He possessed also all the eastern Arabah between Lake Gennesareth and the Dead Sea. This territory is further defined as extending at the south from Beth-Yeshimoth (Suweime) north-east of the Dead Sea, to underneath the slopes of Pisgah, Mt Nebo, since the Arabah widens considerably at this point. The mīṣōr, plain between Madaba and Dibon, omitted here, appears in the similar description (13:9). 4-5. Og g reigned over northern Transjordan from the Lower Jabbok in the south to Hermon in the north and from Salecha (Salkhad) in southern Hauran in the east to the Arabah and the regions of Geṣūr and Ma'aka, the modern Djölän, in the west. His chief cities were Edrai, Dera'a, about 30 m. E. of the southern end of Lake Gennesareth and Astaroth (Tell el-Aṣ'ari), 11 m. NNW. of Dera'a. 7-8. The description of Josue's conquests is that of 10:16 f. 'Part of' (DV, 7) is a proper name Halaq; cf. 11:17. 9b. Hai alone is located by a neighbouring city, probably because it alone was not a city but a ruin. 9-23. The district to which a city belongs is sometimes attached to it by a preposition; cf. 22b. Hence we conclude that Sharon (18) is really the district containing Aphek, Nafat Dor that containing Dor (23a) and that Galil, Galilee (LXX) not Gilgal (MT) should be read in 23b. The impossible king of the nations of Galilee could be rendered king of the valley of the sea of Galilee, probably a gloss localizing and then replacing the original king of Kinneroth in Galilee. It is not stated that Josue captured the cities mentioned but that he slew their kings.

B. XIII-XXI Division of the Land. XIII 1-33 Land to be divided and Land already divided—1-7. The land to be divided among nine and a half tribes is specified. 8-14. The territory already divided by Moses is defined and some provision is made for Levi. 15-33. The boundaries and chief cities of the transjordanic tribes are indicated. The territories to be considered are three: Geshur, Philistia and Canaan. Geshur, the modern Djölän, was an unconquered region in the NW. of Transjordan. It was not distributed or inhabited by Israelites (13).

2-3. The districts (DV Galilee) of the Philistines, extending from Shihor (DV troubled river) in front of Egypt to Accaron are reckoned to the Canaanite as original Canaanite territory and thus belong to Israel. They include five city states in the north and an Avite (DV Hevite) region conquered by the Philistines (Deut 2:23) in the south. Shihor 'Waters of Horus' is the Egyptian name of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile; cf. Is 23:3; Jer 2:18. LXX understands Rhino-

- 234a colura, the more northerly Wady el-'Arish, and this watercourse seems to be meant by the Torrent of Egypt (15:4). Between Shihor and Rhinocoluta is a desert. Philistia fell to Judah but the city states retained their independence. 4-5. Finally Canaan is to be distributed and its northern boundary is indicated. The text is undoubtedly corrupt. Israelite territory, in the widest sense, including subject nations, extended ideally at least to the Euphrates in the NE., but it never included Lebanon, except implicitly in Ez 47:20, where the reference is however to the future Messianic Kingdom, not to the land distributed to Israel. Here Byblos, the land of the Gebailite (ungrammatically expressed), and all Lebanon is included in the land to be distributed. Lebanon moreover immediately reappears (6) again as the northern boundary. Buhl's correction, generally accepted, gives a consistent text. 'And all the land of the Canaanite from [MT, and] Me'ara of the Sidonians to Aphek, to the boundary of the Amorite, and the land adjoining Lebanon [MT, of the Gebailite and all Lebanon] to the east from Baal-Gad under Mt Hermon to the Entry of Hamath.' Me'ara, perhaps el-Moqeiriye, 6 m. NE. of Sidon, is in the west, Aphek, an unidentified city of Aser (19:30) in the centre, and the boundary of the Amorite, the spurs of Hermon, in the east of the northern limit. To this is added the region between Baal-Gad (Baniyas) and the Entry of Hamath, the northern extremity of Merg 'Ayyun, whence the plain of the Beka' leads directly to distant Hamath. 6. Yahweh promises to drive out the Sidonians from the mountainous region of northern Galilee. 8a. With whom refers grammatically not to the transjordanic but to the cisjordanic half-tribe of Manasses. Some omission after 7 must be supposed. The kingdom of Sihon, whose boundaries were indicated in 12:1-6, consisted originally of Heshbon and its immediate surroundings. Here alone in the whole region between the Jabbok and the Red Sea Late Bronze Age pottery has been discovered, at Galul, 6 m. SE. of Heshbon—a valuable confirmation of the biblical narrative establishing the existence of Sihon's kingdom. By driving the Moabites south of the Arnon shortly before the arrival of the Hebrews the whole Mishor (northern Moab) was added to the original settlement. 21. Thus Ruben received all the kingdom (DV kingdoms) of Sihon, the Mishor and the southern fringe of the Jordan valley, so that the Wady Hesban roughly represents the boundary between Ruben and Gad. 24-28. Since however the Medianite nomads in southern Galaad were under the suzerainty of Sihon (21), Gad also received part of Sihon's kingdom, Yazer (land of Yazer Num 32:1) most probably Gazzir about 9 m. W. of Rabbath Ammon (Rabba, later Philadelphia, modern 'Amman), all the cities of Galaad (name originally indicating only southern Galaad but later extended to northern Galaad in the lot of Manasses) and the eastern Jordan valley as far as Lake Gennesareth. Half the land of the Ammonites most probably indicates an extension of the frontier in David's time since Israel was forbidden to occupy the land of the Ammonites (Deut 12:19, 37; Jg 11:18) and remains of Ammonite fortifications still indicate the original eastern boundary of Gad. Northern Galaad was then mostly thickly wooded and unsettled.
- d XIV 1-15 Caleb asks for and receives Hebron—1-12. After an introduction in which the omission of Levi and the double representation of Joseph are indicated, Caleb interviews Josue, reminds him of the promises of Moses forty-five years earlier and asks for Hebron. 12-15. Josue grants his request and the ancient name of Hebron is explained.
- 2a. For 'dividing all by lot' (DV) read by lot for their possession. 6-10. Since Caleb was forty years old when sent to spy out the land in the second year of the desert period and was now eighty-five, the Israelites, still encamped at Gilgal, were seven years in Canaan when the distribution was made. 11. Go out and come in (DV march) refer to non-military duties. 15. MT interprets Cariath-Arbe, city of Arbe and adds: He (Arbe) was the greatest man of the Anakim. LXX reads: It (Cariath-Arbe) was the metropolis of the Anakim. Adam 'man' becomes a proper name in Vg.

XV 1-63 The Portion of Judah—The boundaries of Judah are first described, then the special portion of Caleb and his younger brother Othniel and lastly, the cities of Judah. 1. 'The boundary of Judah reaches the frontier of Edom, the desert of Sin in the south and is in the extreme south.' This general description is amplified. 2-4. The boundary goes from the southern end (lit. tongue, DV bay) of the Dead Sea to the Ascent of the Scorpions (Naqb es-Safa over 20 m. SW. of the Dead Sea), passes to Sin and ascends to the south of Qadesh-barnea ('Ain-Qedeis), reaches the Torrent of Egypt (Wady el-'Arish) and follows it to the Mediterranean. The other places mentioned are not definitely identified. 5. The eastern boundary is the Dead Sea which probably extended more to the north in Josue's time. 6-8. The northern boundary ascends to Beth Hogla (Qasr Hagle, SE. of Jericho) and through the Valley of Achor (7:24) to the Ascent of Adommim (Tal'at ed-Damm near Khan Khatrur, midway between Jericho and Jerusalem), then southward to the Fountain of the Sun ('Ain el-Hod, Fountain of the Apostles, near Bethany) and the Fountain of Rogel (Bir Ayyub, Job's Well, SE. of Jerusalem). 'And the boundary ascends the Valley of the Son of Hinnom [Wady er-Rababy] to the flank of the Jebusite on the south, that is Jerusalem, and ascends to the summit of the mountain [Niqefuriyeh, W. of Jerusalem] which is in front of the valley of Hinnom to the west and at the extremity of the Valley of Rephaim [el-Beqa'a, SW. of Jerusalem] to the north.' Vincent renders minnegb 'from the south' instead of 'on the south' and supposes the boundary after meeting Jerusalem to run north instead of west. He identifies the Valley of Hinnom with Tyropoeon (el-Wady) in the middle of later Jerusalem and the mountain with Ras Nadr = Baal-Perasim 'Baal of the Watershed' (2 Kg 5:20), near Nephtoh, the culminating point of the Palestinian watershed in the region. In both views ancient Jerusalem belonged to Benjamin. The statement that the Judeans could not overcome the Jebusites in Jerusalem (63) seems to reflect the mentality of the period immediately preceding David's capture of the city. 9-11. From the mountain the boundary inclines to the Waters of Nephtoh ('Ain Lifta, NW. of Jerusalem) and thence to Cariathiarim (cf. 9:17), then southward to Chesalon (Kesla) and Bethshemesh ('Ain-Shems), westward to Timnah (Tibneh), northward to Accaron and Jebneel (later Jamnia, modern Yebna) and thence westward to the sea.

12-14. Caleb takes Hebron, the city of Arbe father of Enac, and slays three of the Anakim. 15-17. He offers his daughter in marriage to the conqueror of Debir, formerly called Booktown. Othniel takes Debir and marries his niece. Both cities were previously captured by Josue (10:36-9), but not being garrisoned were reoccupied by Canaanites. 18a. The context requires not 'she incited him' (MT) but he incited her (LXX). 18b. Read alighted from for 'signed on'. 19. Read after 'blessing': 'For thou hast given me (in marriage) to a dry land so give me a well' (LXX; wells MT). Albright locates one well, 2 m. N., the other nearly 1 m. S. of Tell Beit Mirsim. The narrative (14-19) reappears in its proper place chronologically (Jg 1:10-15).

XVI 1-XVII 13 The Portion of the Sons of Joseph— 235a There were two distributions, one to Joseph as a single tribe (16:1-4), the second to Ephraim and Manasses as separate tribes (16:5-10; 17:1-13). The reason of the second is given in 17:14-8. The southern boundary of the house of Joseph is subsequently only summarily indicated as the southern boundary of Ephraim, but the northern one is restated in practically identical terms as the dividing line between Ephraim and Manasses. Thus Ephraim retained the original lot of Joseph while Manasses received for his portion the extension subsequently granted in northern Samaria. No northern boundary of Manasses is indicated because the region was thickly wooded and its chief cities long 235a remained in the hands of the Canaanites. The eastern and western boundaries of both tribes were the Jordan and the Mediterranean.

1-3. 'The lot of the sons of Joseph went from the Jordan in front of Jericho [LXX; from the Jordan of Jericho to the waters of Jericho, MT] on the east. The boundary went up from Jericho to the mountain towards the desert of Bethel-Luza [LXX; Luza is an old name of Bethel; MT is corrupt but in general agreement with LXX]. And it went from Bethel-Luza and passed to the frontier of the Arkian at Atarôth [Khirbet 'Atara, c 4 m. SSW. of Bethel] and it descended westward to the frontier of the Yaphletian to the limit of Lower Bethhoron [cf. 10:11] and to Gezer [Gazer; cf. 10:32] and ended at the sea.' The same southern boundary of Ephraim in 5b-6a only mentions a different Atarôth in the east, Upper Bethhoron in the centre and the sea in the west. Addar is an interpolation. Arki and Yaphleti are clan names.

b 16:9-17:7-10. The northern boundary of Ephraim begins in the middle at Machmethath (in front of Sichem 17:7, probably Khirbet Guleigil) 'inclines eastward to Thanathelo [Ta'na el-fôqa, 8 m. SE. of Nablus], passes it on the east side to Janoe [Yanûn, south of Ta'na], descends from Janoe to Ataroth [mentioned 16:5 but unidentified] and Naaratha ['Ain Dûq, north of Jericho], reaches Jericho and ends in the Jordan'. On the western side only Taphua, south (DV on the right hand) of Machmethath (17:7b), probably Sheikh Abu Zarad, south of Yasûf, and the Torrent of Qâna (DV valley of Reeds, modern Wady Qana) are mentioned. Ephraim had also cities set apart in the territory of Manasses (16:9), of which Taphua alone is mentioned (17:8), since the statement: 'These cities belong to Ephraim in the midst of the cities of Manasses (17:9b)' cannot refer to unmentioned cities in the Wady Qana and is probably a gloss. Gezer remained Canaanite until Solomon's time.

c In 17:1-8 we are informed that the descendants of six children of Manasses settled in Palestine while the rest remained in Transjordan. These children are not necessarily great-grandsons of Manasses through Machir and Galaad (Num 26:30 f.), since links in the chain of ancestry are frequently omitted. The portion of one, Hephher, whose son, Salphaad, had no male issue, fell to his five granddaughters. The warrior who received Galaad and Bashan, Machir, is not an individual but a clan, the Machirites, descended not from Galaad but from Machir's other sons (1 Par 7:15-17). 7a. From Aser, not in LXX B, is probably a textual corruption by dittography. 11. Naphath (DV Nopheth), of which Manasses possessed a third, was not a city but a large district attached to the city of Dor in the territory of Asher. Naphath Dor was one of the administrative districts of Solomon (3 Kg 4:11). From 14-18 we learn that the mountain land was first occupied by the Hebrews, then wooded regions were penetrated and lastly the plain land was secured. Iron-bound chariots are possible (c 1190) after the invasion of the Sea Peoples. 17b-18. The Manassites had to work out their own salvation by enlarging their territory in Palestine to which no northern boundary is assigned, not by migrating to Transjordan, as some commentators hold, contrary to the direct evidence of the text: 'You are a numerous people and you have great strength. You shall not have one portion only, for the mountain will be yours. If it be forest, cut it down and its outlets will be yours, for you must dispossess the Canaanite because he has iron chariots, because he is strong'. The outlets to the plain of Esdraelon in Canaanite hands are clearly indicated.

d XVIII 1-28 Second Distribution at Shiloh: The Portion of Benjamin—In an assembly at Shiloh Josue orders the seven tribes who have not received portions to send each three men to survey the land still undistributed and divide it into seven lots. The first lot consisting of the territory between Judah and Ephraim falls to Benjamin. Its boundaries are described and its chief cities enumerated. The settlement of the tabernacle at Shiloh implies the permanent transfer thither of headquarters from Gilgal. The transfer must have been recent, naturally coinciding with the return of the transjordanic warriors to their homes immediately after the distribution (22:1, 6). It is moreover unlikely that much time intervened between the first distribution at Gilgal and the second at Shiloh. The new and more central headquarters is identified with Khirbet Seilûn, 20 m. N. of Jerusalem. No structural and only sparse pottery remains of the Late Bronze Age (1600-1200) were there discovered, but in the Early Iron Age the city was walled and very prosperous owing no doubt to the civil and religious importance which it received from Josue. Its culture is markedly Palestinian. Here again as in Transjordan Israelite occupation long before 1200 B.C. is excluded.

1. Read meeting for 'testimony'. 4. Read according to their inheritance for 'number of each multitude'. 9. Insert by cities after 'divided it'. The different lots were determined according to the number of cities which they contained. The boundaries of Benjamin are already known from those of Judah and Ephraim. 12. The desert (16:1) is here the desert of Bethaven = Bethel. 13a. Luz = Bethel is excluded by the boundary but included among the cities (22). The texts refer to different periods. 14a. 'And the boundary bends and turns to the south on the western side [of the lot] from the mountain in front of Bethhoron southwards.' 15. For 'part' read the end (Cariathiarim is excluded) and omit 'towards the sea', a textual corruption since the direction is eastward. 16. 'And the boundary descends to the extremity of the mountain, which is in front of the valley of Ben-Hinnom and by [or, in] the valley of Rephaim on its north side, and descends the valley of Hinnom to the flank of the Jebusite to the south and descends to the Fountain of Rogel'; cf. 15:8. 17-18. For 'Geliloth' (DV hills) read Gilgal (15:7) unidentified but west of Khan Khattru, and for 'Arabah' (DV campaign countries) Beth-'Arabah (15:8), 'Ain Garba in the Wady Qelt.

XIX 1-9 Portion of Simeon—Simeon received seventeen cities in the southern part of the large territory of Judah. 2. Sabee seems to be a dittography of (Beer)-sheba. Its omission verifies the number thirteen. No boundaries are given and the southern delimitation by means of a single city Ramoth (in the Negeb, 1 Kg 30:27) implies that there were none in the document utilized and refutes the conjectural theory that Simeon received originally a distinct territory, but was subsequently absorbed by Judah. The identified cities are all in the south.

10-16 Portion of Zabulon—Zabulon occupied the centre of southern Galilee. The delimitation begins in the centre of the southern boundary (cf. 16:6; 17:7; 19:25), going first west and then east. Sarid (usually corrected to Sadid), Tell Shadûd, 6 m. SW. of Nazareth is the central point. Jeconam (Tell Qaimûn at the foot of Mt Carmel) marks the western, Mt Tabor the eastern end. Ceseleththabor is Iksâl at the foot of Tabor on the west and Dabereth is Deburiye or Dabura, NW. of Tabor; Japhic is Yafa, SW. of Nazareth. 11a. 'And the lot ascended to the west and to Merala'—probably Galta in the plain of the Qishon. Dabbesheth is Tell Shemmâm, opposite Tell Qaimûn. 13. 'And thence it passes on the east side.' The eastern boundary is meant. Gethhepher, birthplace of Jonas, is probably Khirbet ez-Zurra' near Meshed, 3 m. NE. of Nazareth, and Rammon is Rummâne farther north in the Battôf plain. Ne'a (DV Noa) is very probably Tell el-Wawiyat, and (14) Hannaton, the adjacent Tell el-Bedeiwiye. The valley of Yiphtah-el is most probably the Battôf plain called Asochis in NT times and drained by the Wady Melek at its western end. As the eastern boundary is not mentioned, we may perhaps assume a lacuna in text or source. The number of cities exceeds twelve, but such lists often receive additions (cf. Nephtali).

17-23 Portion of Issachar—Issachar received the rich but insecure plain of Esdraelon (cf. Gen 49:14 f.)

236c between Zabulon-Nephtali on the north and Manasses on the south. The boundaries are not given and can only be deduced from the cities mentioned. They reached the Jordan on the east and the foot of Mt Carmel but not the Mediterranean on the west. The most westerly of the cities is Hapharaim (el-Farriye), 3 m. S. of Jeconam. 22. Thabor does not indicate the mountain but a city upon it or at its foot as otherwise the total of cities would be incorrect. The southern boundary may have been omitted as still undefined since it was the same as the undetermined northern boundary of Manasses.

d 24-31 Portion of Aser—The coast land of northern Palestine from the confines of Sidon in the north to Shihor Libnat (Wady Zerqa just north of Caesarea) in the south fell to Aser. On the east were the portions of Manasses, Issachar, Zabulon and Nephtali. The boundary, indicated by cities, begins in the middle of the west side (25-26a), goes first south (26b), then east (27a), then north (27b-28) and finally returns south to its starting-point (28). Shihor is not the Nile, but nonetheless may mean Waters of Horus of Libnath. Crocodiles found in it may have suggested the Egyptian name. 27b. For 'left' read north, since Cabul (Qabul, 9 m. NE. of Acco = Ptolemais, Acre, 'Akka) is in Aser. 28. Cana is not the NT Cana but Qāna, 8 m. SE. of Tyre. 29. 'The strong city of Tyre' is the island fortress. Hosa is the continental part of the city. For 'from the portion of' read Mahaleb (Mahalliba in Sennacherib's list, modern Mahalib, NE. of Tyre). 30. Achzib, Ecdippa, modern ez-Zib, north of Acre, belongs to the last group of names where 'Umma is a misreading of 'Acco.

e 32-39 Portion of Nephtali—Nephtali inhabited the eastern side of Galilee. The southern and western boundaries are first indicated, then the cities. 33. 'And their boundary was from Heleph [Arbaṭa at the foot of Thabor], from the terebinth of Bas'annim [Khan et-Tuggar; cf. Jg 4:11] and Adami-hanneceb and Yebnael [probably ed-Damiye and Yemma, SW. of Lake Gennesareth] as far as Lecum [probably Aulam, south of Yemma] and ended at the Jordan.' The Jordan is of course the eastern boundary indicated here at its southern and later at its northern extremity. 34. The western boundary runs north from Thabor to Hucuca (Yauqu, 5 m. W. of Capharnaum), 'touches Zabulon in the south and Aser on the west and Judah of the Jordan in the east'. Judah, not in LXX, is probably interpolated. The cities exceed nineteen if those of 33-34 are included.

f 40-48 Portion of Dan—The territory of Dan seems to have belonged originally, at least in part, to his more powerful neighbours, Ephraim in the north and Judah in the south. Accaron and Bethshemesh are on the southern, Mejarcon (Nahr el-'Audja) on the northern and Ayalon (Yalo, SE. of 'Amwas-Nicopolis) on the eastern boundary. 47a. 'And the territory of Dan went out from them', or (reading yasṣer) 'was too narrow for them.' Unable to hold it against the Philistines they migrated to NE. Palestine where they captured Lešem (sic? Laš Jg 18:29) and called it Dan (modern Tell el-Qādi, Mound of the Judge—i.e. of Dan, site of the principal source of the Jordan). 48-51. Josue himself received the city of Thamnath-Saraa in Mt Ephraim (probably Tibneh, 12 m. NE. of Lydda).

g XX 1-9 Cities of Refuge—God orders Josue to appoint six cities of refuge where whoever had unintentionally slain another might be protected from the vengeance of the relatives of the slain. The procedure in such cases is indicated. The cities are appointed and their object is defined. LXX(B) omits 4-6 probably because it is practically equivalent to 9 and consequently superfluous. The matter is more fully treated in Num 35:9-28; Deut 19:1-13.

3b. 'And they shall be to you a refuge from the avenger of blood.' 4. Read 'his business' instead of 'such things as prove him innocent'. 5. Read 'was not' instead of 'is not proved to have been'. 6. The two periods during which the slayer remains in the city of refuge, till his trial and till the death of the high-priest, must be distinguished. The former was appointed for all fugitives, the latter only for those who were subsequently judged innocent. The detention of the innocent was a safeguard rather than a punishment since the relatives of the slain would be eager for vengeance while the memory of their loss was recent. As this danger period could not be definitely fixed its end was vaguely determined by the death of the high-priest. 7-8. The appointment of the six cities of refuge is the execution of the command given directly to Josue himself (1-2) and indirectly through Moses (Num 35:9 f.). The fact that Moses himself determined the three transjordanic cities of refuge (Deut 4:41-3) is no obstacle to their inclusion by Josue in the final execution of the mandate which he had received. In 7 Galil 'circle' specifically designates Galilee, the northern part of Palestine.

XXI 1-42 Cities and Pasture-land for Priests and Levites—The command given (Num 35:1-8) to provide cities of residence for priests and Levites and pastures for their flocks in the tribal territory of which they had received no separate portion is here executed. In the distribution of the land among the tribes the available territory was first divided into the requisite number of fairly equal parts and the part to be assigned to each tribe was then decided by lot. Similarly here the cities, forty-eight in all, including the six cities of refuge, seem to have been first determined, then divided into four parts and finally apportioned to the recipients as the lot decided. The Caath clan alone contained priests as well as Levites and thus received two portions: thirteen cities from Judah, Simeon and Benjamin for the Aaronite priests and ten cities from Ephraim, Dan and cisjordanic Manasses for the remaining Caathite Levites. The Gersonite Levites received thirteen cities from Issachar, Aser, Nephtali and transjordanic Manasses; the Merarite Levites twelve from Ruben, Gad and Zabulon. The appropriate settlement of the priests near Jerusalem is thus determined by lot and an act of Divine Providence. The Levites had not exclusive possession of these cities but shared them with their tribal occupants. They had also certain township rights in the form of pasture-land consisting apparently of tracts located north, south, east and west of the city wall and each 2,000 by 1,000 cubits in extent. Similarly in modern Arabia 'there are circuits of the common soil about the desert village where no nomads may drive their cattle under pain of being accused to the Emir. Such township rights are called Hima' (Doughty, Travels in Arabia Deserta, II, 245).

1. For 'families and kindreds' read clans, bēṣ 'āḥōṣ, here abbreviated to 'āḥōṣ. The three sons of Levi, Caath, Gerson and Merari represent three clans. 2. Read pastures for 'suburbs'. 4. Render after 'Caath' and it was for the sons of Aaron, the Levitical priest'. 5-6. Read after 'remained' and 'Gerson' according to their families' as in 7 where DV has 'kindreds' for families. 11-12. The first mention of the gift of Hebron is probably taken from a different source. 26. For 'of the inferior degree' read remaining. A few errors in the list of names can be corrected from the similar list in 1 Par 6:54-81: Yeblaam for Gethremmon (25), Ashtaroth for Bosra (27), Hammon or Hammat (19:35), for Hammot-Dor (32). 38. Mišor indicates not a city but the plateau south of Galaad between Wady Hesban and the Arnon where Bosor is located; Yahsa and Qedemot should be read for Jaser and Jethson. LXX repeats 19:49 f. after 42, and adds that the flint knives mentioned 5:2 were kept at Thamnath-Saraa.

C. XXII-XXIV Appendix.

XXII 1-34 The Transjordanians return and erect an Altar—1-8. Josue dismisses the transjordanic warriors after commending their obedience, exhorting them to remain faithful to Yahweh, blessing them and enjoining them to share their spoils with their brethren.

237a 9-10. They depart and on reaching the Jordan erect an altar. 11-12. The Cisjordanians hearing of this apparent violation of the law assemble in Shiloh for an expedition against them. 13-20. First however the high-priest Eleazar and ten representatives of the ten tribes are sent to remonstrate with them for exposing all Israel to the wrath of Yahweh by erecting an altar of their own and abandoning his worship. 21-29. The Transjordanians reply that the altar is not intended for the offering of sacrifices, but as a testimony to future generations that Yahweh is God of all the tribes of Israel. 30-34. The ambassadors and subsequently the people accept this explanation of the altar of testimony.

b The address of Josue seems to end at 6. Its resumption after the superfluous information in 7a-b is probably from a different source. 8. Note that iron is included in the spoils. 10-11. The site of the altar was 'on the Jordan, in the direction of the land of Canaan, at the tracts of the Jordan, over against [or, beyond] the Israelites'. A transjordanic site is more probable especially as the altar is presumed in 19 to have been built to remove the uncleanness of Transjordan, not Yahwist territory. 14. The ambassadors are called heads of clans, of whom one was selected from each of the ten tribes. 20b. 'And he alone [lit. one man] did not die for his sin.' The people may also suffer for the sins of individuals. 29. The law of unity of altar of sacrifice is here attested as obligatory, though not strictly observed. The altar on Mt Hebal (8:30) would be authorized, but an altar in Transjordan prohibited by the law of Ex 20:24. The half tribe of Manasses is mentioned with Ruben and Gad in 1, 9, 11, 15, 21, 30, but omitted in 25, 32, 33, 34. The text is uncertain. LXX differs from MT in omitting Ruben and Gad (25) and mentioning the half tribe of Manasses (32, 33, 34). It appears from Num 32 that Ruben and Gad received their lots before half Manasses received his from Moses, but no text suggests that Manassites did not settle in Transjordan before the distribution in Canaan.

c XXIII 1-16 Josue, near his End, exhorts Israel to be Faithful to Yahweh—1-11. Josue summons the representatives of the people and after a general reference to the benefits received from Yahweh reminds them that enemies still remain to be subdued in the territory allotted to them and assures them that Yahweh will continue to give them victory in the future as in the past if they remain faithful to him and to his law and refrain from making alliances with the Canaanites or worshipping their gods. 12-16. If they are unfaithful to Yahweh and accept Canaanite friendship and Canaanite worship he will destroy not their enemies but themselves.

d 2. Omit the first 'and' not connective but explanatory. 3. For 'round about' read before you. 4. MT is unintelligible owing to an interpolation 'and all the nations which I have destroyed', rightly omitted in Vg since 5 shows that only enemies still to be conquered are indicated. 7. 'And cohabit not with the Gentiles who remain among you, and invoke not the name of their gods and swear not by them and worship them not and bow not down before them.' 9. 'And the Lord God took away . . . nations that were . . . and no man resisted you to this day.' 10. Read used to chase and fought. 12a. 'But if you go back [abandon Yahweh] and adhere to the remnant of the Gentiles who remain among you.' 13. 'Not' should be no longer, 'pit' trap, 'stumbling-block' whip and 'stakes' thorns. 14b. Read know. 16a. For 'when'

read if. This speech of Josue shows clearly that his conquest of Palestine was incomplete. Much of the territory distributed among the tribes was still in the possession of the Canaanites. 237d

XXIV 1-33 Last Words and Death of Josue—1-13.

In an assembly at Shechem Josue reminds the Israelites of the many benefits received from Yahweh from Abraham's time to the present day. 14-18. He then asks them to choose whom they will serve, Yahweh or strange gods, and they affirm their allegiance to Yahweh alone. 19-24. He tests them by representing the difficulties of the service of Yahweh, but they repeatedly reaffirm that him only will they serve. 25-28. He then makes a covenant with them, instructs them in their duties, registers the proceedings in the Book of the Law, sets a great stone under the terebinth in the sanctuary as a testimony and dismisses them to their homes. 29-33. The death and burial of Josue and the last resting-places of Joseph and Phinees are briefly recorded.

1. LXX substitutes Shiloh, the capital, for Shechem confirmed by the mention of the terebinth (26; cf. Gen 12:6; 35:4). Shechem was then the spot in Palestine most sacred to the Israelites because it was there that God first appeared to Abraham and promised Canaan to his descendants (Gen 12:7). It had a sanctuary implied (1, before Yahweh) and mentioned (26) and an altar (8:30) legitimately erected (Ex 20:24). The ark was probably transported thither and the events narrated 8:30-35 may have occurred on this occasion. 2. The river is the Euphrates; your fathers are generally, Thare particularly, indicated; Abraham is not included among worshippers of false gods. 3. Read after 'Abraham': 'from the land beyond the River and I brought him through all the land of Canaan'. 5b-8a. 'And I afflicted Egypt with what I did therein and I brought you forth.' Your fathers here and in 17 is a gloss explaining that the preceding generation is meant. 9. Read was hostile to for 'fought against'. There was no actual warfare (Num 22-24; Jg 11:25). 11. The nations, probably interpolated, are those of Canaan, not of Jericho. 12. After 'hornets' (cf. Ex 23:28) read 'to drive them out from before you, the kings of the Amorites'. MT has two kings (Sihon and Og), LXX twelve, an incomplete correction since Canaanite kings are meant; cf. ch 12. 15. Apparently some Israelites then as later worshipped idols. 17a. 'Yahweh is our God'; cf. 18b. 22a. Insert against yourselves after 'witnesses'. 25. Read after 'covenant': 'with the people and set before them'. The covenant was with Josue not with God. 26. All these things are the proceedings. The volume of the law is not the Pentateuch, since all these things are absent from it, but a lost record book. For 'oak' read terebinth. 27. Read for 'unto you' against you, for 'that' because, and for 'to you' to us. 30. A Moslem shrine, Neby Ghaith, on a mountain south of Tibneh (cf. 19:50) may preserve the Hebrew name ga'as. 32. The modern Tomb of Joseph east of Jacob's Well indicates approximately the ancient site. On the purchase of the land by Abraham cf. Gen 33:19. Qesitah (DV young ewe) is probably a fixed weight of silver. 33. The Gabaath of Phinees is probably Gibya, NW. of Gifna and conveniently near Shiloh and Thamnath-Saraa. LXX has an addition to 30, again concerned with the knives of circumcision (cf. 21:42), and omits 31. Jos 24:28-31 reappears in Jg 2:6-9 in a different order. Both authors probably used the same source.

d Name—The book of Judges is so called from the title given to the national heroes whose exploits are its main theme. Judge is not an equivalent of ruler. The Philistines were the rulers in Samson's time. Gedeon refused the rulership offered him after his victory. Jephthe stipulates beforehand for rulership in Galaad as the reward of his conquest of Ammon. A judge is one who distributes justice to the people and in particular maintains the rights of the oppressed. The great judges were all raised up by God to defend the rights of the oppressed Israelites against foreign aggressors. Judge is thus equivalent to deliverer, and Samson is so called because he began to deliver Israel from the Philistines. Debora alone is a judge in the strict legal sense of the word before she becomes a deliverer. But no such office can be assigned for instance to Gedeon or Jephthe before their call. The title of the five minor judges on the contrary seems to be understood in its strict legal sense. They are not recorded as deliverers or divinely appointed nor are their exploits mentioned.

Contents—The present book of Judges contains a religious history of Israel from Josue to Samuel in the form of detached episodes. It begins with an account of the efforts of the tribes in Canaan to secure complete possession of their lots. Then comes an appropriate introduction to the narratives of the great judges raised up by God to deliver the people from their various oppressors. Israel's history throughout the period is depicted under the form of recurring cycles of sin, punishment, repentance, and deliverance. The victorious struggles of Othniel with the Edomites, Aod with the Moabites, Debora and Barac with the Canaanites, Gedeon with the Madianites, Jephthe with the Ammonites, and Samson with the Philistines are then described. Between Aod and Debora is a brief reference to the exploits of 'Samgar' against the Philistines. After Gedeon the episode of Abimelech and the Sichemites is related apparently by way of appendix. Immediately before and after Jephthe the five minor judges are recorded. After Samson come the episodes of the origin and institution of the sanctuary of Dan and the outrage at Gabaa and war of the tribes against Benjamin.

Composition and Authorship—The book of Judges has been twice edited. The first edition is indicated by the special introduction to the history of the great judges (2:6-3:6) and the attachment of this introduction to the close of the book of Josue by a textual citation (2:6-9=Jos 24:28-31). It contained the narratives of the six great judges. The second inspired editor added to these an account of the failures and successes in the wars of the tribes in Canaan at the beginning and the episodes of the Danite sanctuary and the outrage at Gabaa at the end. He evidently wished to inform his readers more fully of the anarchy and lawlessness of the period. We might perhaps assign to him the Abimelech episode, attributed usually to the first editor. The brief accounts of the minor judges, not agreeing in concept or treatment with the programme of the first editor, must also be adjudged to the second. Both editors seem to have used the same ancient sources. The critics assign the second edition to the post-exilic period, the first, called deuteronomic or pre-deuteronomic, to the seventh century B.C. Their conclusions are based on the precarious literary criteria of the Wellhausen theory and disregard some facts. The second editor undoubtedly attributes the disorders of 238g the period to the non-existence of the monarchy. Would a post-exilic writer esteem the monarchy so highly after recent experience of the ruin of the state attributed for the most part to the impiety of its kings? It is also quite unlikely that a post-exilic editor would explicitly or implicitly approve infringements of the law of unity of sanctuary. The tacit approval of the ephod of Gedeon (8:28b, 33a) suggests an early monarchical date for the first edition. The ephod oracle seems to have fallen into disrepute after David's reign. The narratives are derived from ancient sources and in some cases at least, such as the story of Gedeon and the two final episodes, are composite. The Hebrew text is relatively well preserved. Several misplaced duplicates (2:11b; 5:11d, 16c; 17:3) and omissions supplied by LXX (after 4:8; 16:13; 18:8, 29; 21:11) are due to scribal negligence. There are some textual corruptions, interpolations and glosses, discussed when important in the commentary.

h Chronology of the Period—The chronology might be considered defined in the text by the years of oppression ($8+18+20+7+18+40=111$) and of rest ($40+80+40+40+6+20=226$) under the six great judges, the years ($23+22+7+10+8=70$) of the five minor judges and the years of Abimelech (3) which make a total of 410 years. We cannot assume, however, that these periods are successive. As they refer in all cases only to a part of Israel some of them may well have been contemporaneous. The numbers also are more commonly formulated in terms of a generation (40) or half a generation (20) or two generations (80), and thus useless for an exact chronology. The period of oppression in 10:8 is clearly a later addition. In 11:26 we are informed that the period between Moses' conquest of Sehon's kingdom and Jephthe's victory over the Ammonites was 300 years. Here again we have apparently a later addition, artificially calculated, since the numbers previously recorded in Jg make a total of 301, and no account is taken of Josue's long leadership. The number given would, moreover, transfer Jephthe to the period of the divided monarchy.

i We are thus forced to determine the chronology of the Judges' period by other data more solidly established, the invasion of Canaan c 1200 B.C. (cf. § 228 a, b), and the enthronement of Solomon c 970 B.C. Making due allowance for the reigns of David and Saul and the judgeship of Samuel we are left with about 150 years (c 1200–1050 B.C.) for the period covered by the book of Judges. The narratives of the six great judges seem to be arranged in chronological order. Othniel, a younger contemporary of Josue, is the first, and Samson, who began the deliverance from the Philistines completed by David, is the last. Debora is expressly indicated as the successor of Aod. It is very likely and suggested in 10:7 that the oppressions of the Ammonites in the east and Philistines in the south-west and consequently Jephthe and Samson were more or less contemporaneous.

j Character of the Period—We have no information on the Judges' period from external sources. The empires of the Hittites and Hurrites no longer existed. Babylonians, Assyrians, and Egyptians had troubles of their own and were not interested in Palestine. The Israelites could thus increase and develop, if not without interference from neighbouring peoples, at least without danger of permanent subjection and deportation. The oppressions were temporary and local. The great judges, chosen naturally from the oppressed, all belonged to different tribes. As they were not always rulers the statement that they judged Israel implies at most that any Israelite might seek justice from them.

k The first editor is chiefly concerned with the northern tribes. Judah engrossed in her struggle with the Philistines and separated from her brethren by the Hevite cities is rarely mentioned. Mt Ephraim is the centre of Israel as in the days of Josue. A great judge, Debora, and a minor judge, Thola, both Issacharites, reside there. Ephraim is the most powerful of the tribes, but his claim to leadership is resisted successfully by Jephthe. The rival claims of Judah are set forth by the second editor (1:2; 20:18). The tribes follow their own ways, but the consciousness of national and religious unity appears clearly in the Canticle of Debora and still more in the war against Benjamin. The Israelites readily desert Yahweh to worship idols. They live in harmony with the Canaanites at Sichem and elsewhere. The crimes of Abimelech, the human sacrifice of Jephthe, the outrage at Gabaa are characteristic of a lawless period.

Religious Teaching—The book of Judges teaches in particular the religious interpretation of the history of the chosen people. The facts are presented, not as the natural result of human causality, but as the execution of a divine plan. God uses the neighbouring nations to punish the sins of his people, and this punishment is an invitation to repentance, the indispensable condition of deliverance. His Wisdom is manifested in the plan, his Justice and Holiness in the punishment of sin, his Mercy in the pardon of the repentant sinner, and his Goodness and Omnipotence in the deliverance of the oppressed. That deliverance is the work, not of man, but of God, is particularly emphasized. The great judges are divinely appointed and divinely inspired. Gedeon must diminish his forces, Barac must descend from Thabor to the plain that the real author of the victory may be known and glorified. Divine intervention is clearly manifested by the inadequacy of natural means. We thus learn that Divine Providence rules the world's history, that God interferes miraculously in human affairs, that national calamities are usually the punishment of sin, and that amendment of life is the best guarantee of the restoration of national prosperity. The religious teaching includes also the exemplary chastisement of grave crimes, such as idolatry and disobedience to God's commands in the dealings of the tribes with the Canaanites, lack of good faith in Abimelech and the Sichemites and flagrant violation of the sacred law of hospitality at Gabaa.

I 1-II 5 War of the Tribes in Canaan—Judges begins with a summary account of the efforts of the individual tribes to complete the conquest of Canaan after the death of Josue. The exploits and failures of Juda and Simeon are first narrated (1-21), then the capture of Bethel by the house of Joseph (22-28), and finally the failures of Manasses (27-28), Ephraim (29), Zabulon (30), Aser (31-32), Nephtali (33) and Dan (34-35). Yahweh reproaches them and reminds them that their failures are the fulfilment of his threat not to drive out the Canaanites before them if they were unfaithful to his covenant (2:1-5).

I 1-3. The beginning of the campaign is assigned by Yahweh, consulted through the Urim and Tummim (cf. Ex 28), to Judah (cf. 20:28), whom Simeon joins since his lot is within Judah's lot. 4. Go up against means attack without necessarily implying an ascent. They defeat the Canaanites and the Pherezites, probably a Hurrite clan, at Bezek (unidentified but near Jerusalem) with great slaughter. 5-7. Adonibezec, whose personal name is unknown since a title, Lord of Bezek, has been substituted for it, was King of Jerusalem. He is represented as a powerful ruler subsequently brought by his followers to that city. The Hebrews cut off his thumbs and his big toes (6a), not to incapacitate him for military service, but as a degrading mutilation in which the sufferer sees an application of the lex talionis. 8. A scribe, incorrectly supposing that the Hebrews brought him to Jerusalem, interpolated in consequence an account of the capture and destruction of Jerusalem not realized before David's time (cf. 1:21; 19:12; Jos 15:63; 2 Kg 5:7). On 10-15 cf. Jos 15:13-19. The capture of Hebron is mentioned (10) as an episode of the tribal war and (20) as an exploit of Caleb. The Cinite nomads, kinsmen of the father-in-law of Moses, who had accompanied the Israelites as guides (Num 10:29-32) and fixed their tents temporarily near Jericho famous 239b for its palms, went with the invaders (16) into the wilderness of Judah in the Negeb of Arad, modern 'Arad seventeen miles south of Hebron, where they dwelt with the Amalecites (LXX, MT the people, Vg him, cf. 1 Kg 15:6). 17. Sephaath, renamed Horma ('anathema'), is the modern Sebaita nearly thirty miles south of Bersabee. Its capture is narrated prophetically Num 21:1-3. 18. For 'took' (MT 17) read did not take (LXX), required by 3:3 and the context since exclusion from the maritime plain (19) implies exclusion from the cities. For 'armed with scythes' DV (19b) read of iron. 21. In Jos 15:63 Judah replaces Benjamin. The situation is different here where Benjamin is blamed for neglecting to capture her chief city. 22. Bethel, recently excavated, was very prosperous and strongly fortified in the Late Bronze Age. This explains why it was not captured by Josue. Its destruction by fire towards the close of the Late Bronze Age is attested by the excavations. The success of the house of Joseph like that of Judah (2) is attributed to Yahweh. 23a. And the house of Joseph made a reconnaissance at Bethel. 24b. For 'the entrance' read the way to enter, not the gate but the best point to attack. 26. The land of the Hittites was north of Kadesh on the Orontes. On 27-29 cf. Jos 16:10; 17:11-13. The responsibility of the tribes is emphasized by changing 'could not destroy' to did not destroy. 30-33. The three tribes of Galilee were particularly negligent and unsuccessful in extirpating the Canaanites. 'Made tributary' (DV) is lit. impressed for labour-gangs. 34-35. The Amorrites after dispossessing Dan were themselves in course of time subjected to forced labour by the house of Joseph. The hill of Heres ('the sun') most probably indicates Bethsames ('house of the sun') elsewhere associated with Aialon and Salebim. 36. 'Amorrhite' is a corruption of Edomite. Since the Ascent of the Scorpion was at the eastern end of the boundary between Israel and Edom (Jos 15:1-3) the Rock indicates the western end at or near Kadesh. II 1a. The Angel of Yahweh is Yahweh himself, who reminds Israel of his past benefits, promise, and threat. For 'place of weepers' read Bethel with LXX. The ascent is made from the eastern border at Galgal. In 5:4 Yahweh comes from the southern Edomite border. 3a. And I said: I will not, etc. may be a past or a present threat. 5. Bokim, lit. Weepers, is a place near Bethel probably identical with the terebinth of weeping (Gen 35:8). The sacrifice offered where Yahweh appeared attests repentance.

II 6-III 6 Introduction to the History of the Judges—

II 6-9. Judges is first attached to Josue by repeating the contents of Jos 24:28-31. 10-19. Then the religious interpretation of the subsequent narratives is indicated. Israel's history appears as recurring cycles of sin, punishment, repentance, and deliverance. II:20-III:6. The domestic enemies are finally discussed: who they were, why they were left in the land, and how they led Israel astray.

I II 6. The Israelites went everyone to his inheritance to possess the land by dispossessing the Canaanites. 7. Omit 'a long time' and read saw for 'knew'. 10b. For 'others' read another generation after them; knew not means had no personal or experimental knowledge. 11b. And they served Baalim belongs to 13 where the pl. Baalim should be read. They are the various local representatives of the chief Canaanite god Baal. For 'Aštāroth', the 'Aštarts', we should probably read 'Aštāroth', the Ašerats, as in 3:7. Ašerat is the ancient Canaanite consort of Baal in the Rās-Shamra Tablets. The regular plural form in 2 Par 19:3; 33:3 attests ancient sources. Aštart, corresponding to the Babylonian Ishtar, was better known at a later date. 14b. Read after 'plunderers' And they plundered them and he sold them. 15a. Insert for evil after them. We should probably supply before 16 the third element of the cycle elsewhere regularly attested: And the children of Israel cried out to Yahweh. 20-23. To punish violations of the covenant and to test Israel's fidelity to Yahweh the Canaanites were not all extirpated. 239f The trial motive and its result are indicated 3:4-6. Benevolent motives are also attributed to Yahweh, that future generations of Israelites might be trained to fight (3:2) and that the land might not be injured by depopulation (Ex 23:29; Deut 7:22). Since God's Justice and Goodness work together harmoniously there is no difficulty in this multiplicity of motives. III 1. After 'left' read: to prove Israel by them, even all who had not experienced all the wars of Canaan, only on account of the generations of the children of Israel to teach them war, only such as formerly knew nothing of them (the wars of Canaan). 3. Mt Libanus here indicates the southern end of the range west of Merg 'Ayyūn called the plain of Lebanon Jos 11:17 (cf. Jos 13:4-5 note). III 7-12 Othniel—As the oppressions are local and the deliverer is usually one of the oppressed, it is improbable that Othniel, lord of Debir in southern Judah, would be chosen to repel invaders from Aram Naharaim, Aram of the two rivers (Euphrates and Chabor), in northern Mesopotamia. The second part of the oppressor's name, Ris'ālayim, 'of double wickedness' (cf. double-dyed), is most probably a Hebrew qualification of the oppressor. Cushan has an Arabic termination and appears (Hab 3:7) in parallelism with Madian as an Arab tribe. There is question therefore of an Arab or Edomite invasion of southern Judah. The original 'Edom' was read 'Aram'—a common error. As there were several Arams, Naharaim was inserted in 8, but not in 10, notwithstanding its remoteness from Palestine. The recent efforts of Jack and Haensler to introduce as the oppressor Tushratta (c. 1390-1360 B.C.), king of Mitanni (geographically identical with Aram Naharaim), fail to identify the names and antedate the event by two centuries. 10a. Read came on him for 'was in him'. 12-30 Aod—Aod, Heb. Ehud, a Benjaminite, delivered his people from the Moabites and their allies, Ammon and Amalec. He seized the opportunity offered by the payment of tribute to slay Eglon, king of Moab, and raise the standard of revolt in Benjamin and Ephraim. 13b. Eglon took possession of the city of the palm-trees, entrenched himself near Jericho to command the ford of the Jordan. 15. Aod was left-handed, lit. disabled in his right hand. Presents is euphemistic for tribute, paid not in money but in kind, and thus requiring many bearers. 16. The sword of Aod was a double-edged poniard with a short hilt so that its whole length was a short cubit (from elbow to knuckles). It was worn on the right thigh for a movement of the left hand towards the right would not arouse suspicion. 18. Read sent away for 'followed'. 19. Aod accompanied the departing bearers as far as the graven images near Gilgal. The reference is obscure. Thence he returns and announces a secret message for the king who dismisses his attendants with the word silence and receives Aod, sitting alone in his cool upper chamber. This was built on the flat roof of the house and had several windows to allow the free passage of air. When Aod declares that the message is from God the king rises out of reverence and Aod draws forth his poniard and thrusts it into him. 22-23. And the hilt went in after the blade and the fat closed over the blade (more probably the hilt, cf. Joüon Bi 21 [1940] 58 f.), for he drew not the poniard out of his belly. And he went out into the vestibule. And Aod went out into the colonnade after shutting the doors of the upper chamber upon him and locking them. The renderings vestibule and colonnade are not certain since the words are only found here. When Aod shot the bolt home he locked the door, for iron pins descended into holes in the bolt and held it fast. The wooden key was only used for opening. It was inserted in a groove in the bolt and had wooden pegs corresponding to the iron pins which pushed them back into their original position and thus allowed the bolt to be withdrawn. Aod's departure was not secret. He got time to escape by locking the door and delaying the discovery of the king's death. 'Till they were ashamed' (25) means

j 31 Shamgar son of Anat—This hero in the present text bears the name of an oppressor of Israel through a misunderstanding of 5:6. The verse moreover is a late insertion since 4:1 closely attaches the Debora to the Aod narrative. Its place is uncertain. Some Greek MSS attach it to the Samson narrative. Shamgar is a Hurrite name. Anat, a goddess, appears also as a man's name. For 'ploughshare' read ox-goad, a wooden pole nine feet long and sharply pointed.

240a IV 1-24 Debora and Barac—The two accounts of the deliverance from Canaanite oppression differ in one essential particular, the name of the oppressor. He is Shamgar son of Anat in the contemporary poem (ch 5) but Jabin king of Canaan reigning at Hasor in the later prose narrative (ch 4). Jabin was slain and his capital Hasor burnt by Josue (Jos 11). The city, moreover, if rightly identified with Tell el-Qēda, was uninhabited in the Judges' period. It follows that some of the contents of Jos 11 have been interpolated into Jg 4. There is one indication that the interpolation was made after the narrative was written, the description of Jabin as king of Canaan, since all scriptural writers agree with profane records in assigning not one but many kings to Canaan. A foreigner like Shamgar might vaunt this title but not the king of a Canaanite city. We exclude therefore from ch 4 Jabin and Hasor as interpolations.

b 1-3. Sisera, general of Shamgar, residing at Haroseth of the Gentiles at the western extremity of the plain of Esdraelon and possessing nine hundred iron chariots, oppresses Israel. 4-7. Debora, prophetess and judge, residing in Mt Ephraim, orders Barac, a Nephtalite, to assemble an army of 10,000 men on Mt Tabor ready to meet Sisera's army at the river Cison. 8-11. Barac obeys after stipulating that Debora must accompany him. 12-13. Sisera hearing of the revolt leads his army to the Cison in the centre of Esdraelon. 14-16. Barac, ordered by God through Debora, descends to meet him in the plain, but Yahweh throws the enemy into confusion and he gains a complete victory. 17-21. Sisera in his flight enters the tent of Jahel, wife of Heber the Cinite, who slays him as he sleeps by hammering a tent-peg into his brain. 22. Barac views the dead Sisera. 23-24. Israel gradually overpowers the oppressor.

c For 'Jabin' read Shamgar and omit 'who reigned in Hasor' (2). Haroseth is identified with Tell 'Amar, occupying a strategic position at the entrance to the plain of Esdraelon, near the village of Hariyye and inhabited in the Early Iron Age. 4. Debora was a prophetess in the strict sense of the word, as her communications to Barac show, and also a judge as the distributor of justice to the people.

d The palm-tree or possibly pillar (cf. Jer 10:5) of Debora between Bethel and Rama has no connexion with the terebinth of weeping (Gen 35:8), but merely indicates the site of her tribunal. Her residence in Mt Ephraim makes Barac's stipulation intelligible and explains the participation of Ephraim and Benjamin in the liberation of the northern tribes. Barac recalls the Punic Barca, 'lightning'. 6. Cedus in Nephtali, modern Kadis, is four miles WNW. of Lake Huleh. 7. Omit the gloss 'general of Jabin's army'. LXX has an addition probably authentic after 8. For I know not on what day Yahweh will give me success. 10. Vg omits 'to Cedus' after 'Nephtali'. MT supposes a muster at Cedus in Nephtali, but does not mention the subsequent march to Tabor. Some hold that Cedus in Issachar between Megiddo and Taanak, mentioned in 11, is meant, but that locality was most unsuitable for a muster of the forces of Nephtali and Zabulon confined to the highlands by the iron chariots of the Canaanites. 11. Heber is introduced before the battle to explain the presence of Jahel. The 240c terebinth in Sa'annim was in the SW. of Nephtali (Jos 19:33), and therefore near Tabor which is ten miles NE. of Cedus in Issachar, here indicated, but thirty miles south of Cedus in Nephtali. The battle was fought on the bank of the Cison between Megiddo and Taanak (5:19). Barac's descent into the plain to meet the chariots on their own ground was humanly unwise but ordered by God to show that he alone could turn defeat into victory. Omit 17b owing to the mention of Jabin and the fact that Sisera did not enter the tent spontaneously but by invitation (18). For 'cloak' read fly-net. 20. The giving of curdled milk instead of water was probably a Bedawin ruse perhaps to induce sleep. While Sisera sleeps Jahel takes a tent-peg (DV nail) and a mallet and drives the peg into his brain and he moved convulsively between her knees (LXX; for he was fast asleep MT), fell back without force and died. The reading of LXX is more natural. 23-24. Omit 'Jabin' and read kings for 'king'.

V The Triumph-Song—The victory was immediately celebrated like that of Jephthē (11:34) and of Moses (Ex 15). Fortunately the triumph-song has been preserved as is admitted by most critics who hold that the intensity of feeling displayed implies personal contact with the events described. Debora can hardly be the author since she is addressed in 7 where the ambiguous form qamti appears from the context to mean thou didst arise rather than 'I arose'. The Aramaisms in the song are explained by poetical style, the peculiarities of the northern Hebrew dialect and the greater similarity between Hebrew and Aramaic in more ancient times. The interpretation is complicated by textual corruptions which may be due to the partial illegibility of the ancient record. The versions give some aid, but the sequence of thought on which the strophic division depends and the parallelism which characterizes all Hebrew poetry are more helpful. We follow generally Burney's excellent rendering. The sequence of thought seems to be: Introduction (1-2), Coming of Yahweh to help his people (3-5), Oppression of Israel before the rising (6-8), Invitation to all to praise Yahweh (9-12), Praise of the patriotic tribes (13-15a), Reproach of the recreant tribes (15b-18), Battle (19-21), Flight (22-23), Exploit of Jahel (24-27), Anxiety and hopes of Sisera's mother (28-30), Conclusion (31a).

1-2 Introduction—Then sang Debora and Barac, the son of Abinoam, on that day saying (when long locks of hair were worn loose in Israel, when the people volunteered), Bless ye Yahweh! The words in parenthesis indicate the occasion of the song, the rising of the volunteers, when warriors vowed not to shear their long locks until victory was won. The title of the song, Bless ye Yahweh, announces a hymn of thanksgiving.

3-5 Strophe 1—Attend ye kings; give ear ye rulers: I—to Yahweh I will sing, will make melody to Yahweh, the God of Israel. Yahweh in thy progress from Seir, In thy march from the fields of Edom, Earth quaked, yea, heaven rocked, Yea, the clouds dropped water. The mountains shook before Yahweh, Before Yahweh, the God of Israel. The renderings 'rocked' and 'shook', supported by LXX, suppose slight alterations of vowels or consonants in MT. Yahweh comes from Edom=Seir, the southern boundary of Palestine in the direction of Sinai (cf. 2:1). The natural phenomena are the regular accompaniments of a theophany. The storm made a swamp of the battlefield, preventing the use of the chariots. 'Sinai' in MT 5 is an incorrect gloss on 'mountains'.

6-8 Strophe 2—In the days of Shamgar ben-Anath, In the days of Jahel caravans ceased. And wayfarers used crooked paths. Villages ceased in Israel, ceased until thou didst arise Debora. Till thou didst arise a mother in Israel. Armourers had they none; armed men failed from the city. Was there seen a shield or a lance among forty thousand in Israel? Failure to recognize that the oppression period described is called the days of the oppressor has changed Shamgar to a deliverer (3:31) and introduced Jahel here. For 'Jahel' read Shamgar (such repetitions are frequent in the song) or perhaps 'Sisera'. 6b. A 241a change of vowels transforms 'roads' (MT) into caravans, a good parallel to wayfarers (6c) who could only travel safely by roundabout paths. Canaanite mastery of the plain made undefended villages non-existent. The second ceased is unmetrical and may belong to a lost stich. 'One chooses new gods: then battling at the gates' (MT 8a) is intelligible in itself but out of harmony with the context. Burney's conjectural emendation adopted agrees well with 8b. The number 40,000 in a contemporary record confirms Jos 4:13.

f 9-12 Strophe 3—Come, ye commanders of Israel! Ye that volunteered among the people bless ye Yahweh! Let the riders on tawny she-asses review it. And let the wayfarers recall it to mind. Hark to the distributors of water at the wells! There they recount the righteous acts of Yahweh. The righteous acts of his arm in Israel. Awake, awake, Debora! Awake, awake, sing psalm! Rise up Barac and lead captive thy captors, O son of Abinoam! 'Come ye' is a slight emendation of MT, 'My heart is with', suggested by parallelism and context. 'Let... review', pl. jussive, replaces sg. imperative in MT. 'Recall it to mind' is a tentative correction of an unintelligible text suggested by the context. Wayfarers and water-drawers represent the common people as opposed to the nobles riding on asses. All must praise Yahweh the deliverer. 'Arm' replaces a word of uncertain meaning. The special part of Debora in the celebration is to lead the women in song like Miriam (Ex 15:20), that of Barac is to marshal the prisoners in the triumphal procession. MT 11d belongs to 13.

g 13-15a Strophe 4—Then down to the gates gat the nobles; Yahweh's folk gat them down mid the heroes. From Ephraim they spread out on the vale. 'After thee Benjamin' mid thy clansmen. From Machir came down the commanders. And from Zabulon men wielding the truncheon. And the princes in Issachar were with Debora; and Nephtali was leal to Barac: To the vale he was loosed at his heel. The encomium on Ephraim, tentatively restored, is represented in MT by 'their root is in Amalec', apparently a vituperative gloss on Judah's later idolatrous rival, the kingdom of Ephraim. After thee Benjamin is the war-cry of Benjamin (Os 5:8). Machir as the eldest son of Manasses represents the western half-tribe. 'Of the scribe' (or, headman) after 'truncheon' (the staff of office) in MT disturbs the metre. 15b. Nephtali replaces Issachar (MT), a scribal error. The inference that Debora was an Issacharite as Barac was a Nephtalite is quite consistent with her residence in Mt Ephraim, anciently the centre of Israel. Cf. also Thola (10:1).

h 15b-18 Strophe 5—Utterly reft into factions was Ruben: Great were his searchings of heart. Why sat'st thou still amid the folds, to hear the pastoral pipings? Galaad beyond the Jordan dwelt, and Dan abideth by the ships. Asher sat still by the shore of the seas, Dwelling beside his creeks. Zabulon is the folk that scorned its life to the death, and Nephtali in the heights of the field. The first verse reappears by error in MT 16b, where searchings replaces the unintelligible 'statutes'. Searchings of heart here mean interchanges of opinion. The rendering folds is conjectural but the alternative 'ash-heaps' has no apparent connexion with pastoral life. Galaad, grandson of Manasses, most probably a tribal name as in Jos 17:1, designates the eastern half of Manasses. As a geographical term it would cover either Gad alone or Gad and eastern Manasses, but tribes, not districts, seem to be indicated. Dan may be still in his original coastal lot or already in northern Palestine engaged in sea-traffic with the Sidonians. His position in the list favours the latter view. The contrast with Zabulon and Nephtali sharpens the taunt of cowardice.

i 19-21 Strophe 6—On came the kings, they fought; Then fought the kings of Canaan; In Taanac by the rills of Megiddo; the gain of money they took not. From heaven fought the stars, From their highways they fought with Sisera. The torrent Kishon swept them off; The torrent of heroes is the torrent Kishon. Bless thou, my soul, the might of Yahweh! The rills are small tributaries of the Kishon from the hills SE. of Megiddo. The gain of money they took not means most probably that they fought whole-heartedly not like mercenaries. The fighting of the stars is a poetic figure. All nature sides with Yahweh. MT 21b reads: Thou treadest down, my soul, might.

22-23 Strophe 7—Then loud beat the hoofs of the horses; off galloped, off galloped his chargers. Curse ye, curse ye Meroz! Curse ye, curse ye her town-folk! For they came not to the help of Yahweh, To the help of Yahweh mid the heroes. In 22 slightly corrected after LXX the repetition is onomatopoeic. 23. MT reads 'Curse ye Meroz, said the Angel of Yahweh', but the Angel of Yahweh is unexpected and a second curse ye is suggested by the parallelism. Meroz is conjecturally identified with Kh. Mārūs 8 m. S. of Cedec in Nephtali.

24-27 Strophe 8—Most blessed of women be Jael, Of tent-dwelling women most blessed! Water he asked; milk she gave; In a lordly dish she proffered curds. Her hand to the peg she put forth, And her right to the maul of the workman; And she smote Sisera—destroyed his head, Shattered and pierced through his temples. 'Twixt her feet he bowed, he fell down, he lay prone; 'Twixt her feet he bowed, he fell down. Where he bowed there he fell down undone. Omit the prosaic gloss 'wife of Heber the Cinite' after 'Jael' (MT 24). Some commentators object that Sisera is lying down in 4:21 but standing here when he receives the death-blow. In both cases however a wooden tent-peg is driven through his temples with a wooden hammer which could only be done when he lay prostrate. Nor could he fall between her feet if he received the blow standing. The description supposes not an erect posture but a convulsive movement before the final collapse. Jael's weapons are naturally those of a tent-dweller. She is praised like Rahab for siding with Yahweh and his people. Her ruse de guerre would be considered legitimate by herself and her primitive contemporaries and is not to be judged by modern standards of morality.

28-30 Strophe 9—And through the window she leaned and exclaimed, The mother of Sisera out through the lattice: 'Wherefore delayeth his car to come? Wherefore tarrieth the clatter of his chariots?' Her wisest princesses make answer, Yea, she returneth her reply: 'Are they not finding—dividing the spoil? A damsel—two damsels for every man: A spoil of dyed stuffs for Sisera, A spoil of dyed stuffs embroidered; Two dyed embroideries for the neck of the queen. 29. 'Princess', sg. for pl., is possible, but the reply given is that of Sisera's mother to herself. 30. Queen is a plausible conjecture for 'spoil' (MT) which ill suits the context. Raham 'damsel' elsewhere in Heb. means 'womb', but 'slave-girl', as here, in the Mesha inscription.

31-Conclusion—So perish all thy foes Yahweh: But be thy friends like the sun going forth in his might.

VI 1-VIII 35 Gedeon—VI 1-10. The Israelites again abandon Yahweh and are oppressed by the Madianites. 11-24. Gedeon is called by God to deliver them. 25-32. He destroys the altar of Baal at Ophra, erects an altar to Yahweh in its place and receives a new name Yerubbaal 'Baal-fighter'. 33-40. He assembles an army and is assured of victory by a double sign. VII 1-8. Yahweh reduces the army to 300 men. 9-15. Gedeon visits the hostile camp by night and hears a dream narrated. 16-22. His men, armed with trumpets, torches, and pitchers, attack and rout the foe. 23-25. The neighbouring Ephraimites intercept the fugitives at the ford of the Jordan and slay two of their leaders. VIII 1-9. Gedeon appeases the offended Ephraimites, continues his pursuit of the Madianite kings and is taunted and denied food for his hungry followers by the inhabitants of Succoth and Penuel. 10-21. He captures the kings, slays the inhabitants, and burns the cities of Succoth and Penuel and finally slays the kings because they had slain his brothers. 22-27. He refuses the rulership offered him, but accepts part of the spoils from which he makes an ephod. 28-35. After a generation of peace he dies and the Israelites, forgetting Yahweh and Gedeon, again worship false gods. The narrative is clear and consistent, b 242b but evidently derived from more than one ancient source. This appears especially in the double account of the erection of the altar. In the second account the immediate occasion is narrated to illustrate the teaching that conversion must precede deliverance. The fact only is related in the first account (VI:24). The vague word there may have indicated in the source the place where Yahweh appeared, but the subsequent narrator must have referred it to in Ophra in the second part of the verse.

e VI 1-10 The Oppression—The Midianites, also called Ismaelites (8:24), joined by Amalecites and the children of the east, Arab tribes east of the Jordan, raided the land periodically. The verbs are frequentative, used to come up, etc. The crevices (DV dens, 2) are lit. places hollowed out by water. Caves, natural and artificial, are common in the limestone hills of Palestine. The raids even reached Gaza, but would not always be equally extensive. The Israelites cry to Yahweh for deliverance and are reminded by a prophet of their sins and ingratitude.

d 11-24 Call of Gedeon—Gedeon was a Manassite of the clan of Abiezer (cf. Jos 17:2), dwelling in Ophra, et-Taiyibe five miles SE. of Endor. He was threshing corn, not with oxen on a threshing-floor, but in a wine-press to save it from Midian, when the Angel of Yahweh appeared to him under a terebinth and gave him his mission. He pleads incapacity, but is promised aid and success. Beginning to realize that his guest is no ordinary person he offers entertainment which is accepted. Minhah, entertainment, either a present or a sacred offering, seems to be intentionally ambiguous. The guest converts the loaves and flesh into a holocaust with his rod and then disappears. Gedeon now realizes who his visitor is and fears death. He is reassured by Yahweh, invisibly present. He erects there an altar called Yahweh is Peace (peaceful, or well disposed). 24b. Render after 'peace': Until this day it is still (there) in Ophra of the Abiezrites.

e 25-32 He contends with Baal—That night, the night after the theophany, Gedeon receives the order: Take ten men of thy servants and a bull seven years old and pull down the altar of Baal, etc. The corrupt text is corrected from 26 and 28. For 'grove' read Ashera (sacred pole). 26. The altar is built upon the top of this stronghold (probably an inaccessible crag) in due form. 31. Joas refuses to surrender his son to his idolatrous townsmen, saying: Will ye contend for Baal or will ye save him? Whoever will contend for him will be put to death at morning; if he be a god let him contend for himself, because he (Gedeon) has broken down his altar. Gedeon's new name means therefore let Baal contend and thus implicitly designates him as a Baal-fighter.

f 33-VII 15 He prepares to Attack the Midianites—On the occasion of a Midianite raid into the plain of Esdraelon the spirit of the Lord entered into (lit. 'was clothed with') Gedeon, who assembled a large army and received assurance of victory by a double sign. The threshing-floor, usually on a flat rocky hill-top, would not absorb the dew like the fleece, so that the first sign was inconclusive and consequently a second, undoubtedly miraculous, was asked and granted. Gedeon now pitched his camp at the foot of Mt Gilboa, having the fountain of Harod, the modern source and river Jalud, between his forces and the Midianite camp in the valley beneath (MT 'from') Mt Moreh, the modern Neby Dahi opposite Gilboa on the north side of the plain. His forces, however, are too numerous for a God-given victory to be manifested by the inadequacy of the natural means used. The departure of the timorous reduces the army from 32,000 to 10,000 men. The numbers are surprisingly large and may have been altered. VII:3. 'Galaad' is perhaps a misreading of 'Galud', ancient name of the hill from which the stream flows. A further reduction of the army to 300 men is effected by rejecting those who bend the knees in drinking and choosing those who drink like a dog, conveying the water with the hand to the mouth. 242g No human drinker laps water with his tongue, but those who convey the water with the hand to the mouth resemble the dog by lapping the water with the hand, and thus satisfying their thirst slowly and unskillfully. The others who bend the knees so as to absorb the water directly and in large quantity with the mouth are more expeditious and resemble not the dog but the camel. The verb used of these drinkers is kara', which means in Arabic to bend the knees in order to absorb water directly with the mouth. The less skilful drinkers are chosen to show that the victory is due not to man but to God. An interpretation favoured by Lagrange and Burney distinguishes between the two classes of drinkers by their less or greater watchfulness in face of the enemy. Those who convey the water with the hand to the mouth are more watchful and therefore rejected. This method of drinking is supposed to have been originally attributed to the second class and erroneously transferred to the first class in the MT. The chosen drinkers resemble the dog by using their hands for support as the dog his forelegs but absorb the water directly. This interpretation is less natural, ignores the comparison between lapping and absorbing and gratuitously supposes an altered text. In 8a we should probably replace 'virtuals', a useless encumbrance, by 'pitchers' and render: And they took the pitchers of the people in their hand and their trumpets. Gedeon now, by order of God, reconnoitres the hostile camp, going down with Purah his servant unto the outskirts of the armed men who were in the camp, where he hears the Midianite's dream, a presage of victory.

VII 16-22 The Battle—Gedeon divided his forces into three bands to assail the camp at three different points and make the enemy believe that they were surrounded. The Israelites had pitchers containing torches in their left hand and trumpets in their right. The din raised by the clashing of pitchers and sounding of trumpets in the dead of night on all sides of the camp threw the Midianites into confusion and panic so that they turned their swords against one another and sought safety in flight. 17b. Read: When I come into the outskirts of the camp do as I shall do. Add after 18: And ye shall say, 'For Yahweh and for Gedeon'. 19. Omit 'three', read the outskirts for 'part' and middle for 'midnight'. The difficulty of carrying simultaneously trumpets, torches and pitchers is imaginary. By passing the handle of the torch through a hole in the bottom of the pitcher both could be carried in one hand. The trumpets could be inserted in bandoliers.

23-VIII 21 The Pursuit—Of the places mentioned in 23a only one, omitted in Vg, is known, Sereda = Saretan (cf. 3 Kg 7:46 and 2 Par 4:17), west of the Jordan near the ford at ed-Damiye (Jos 3:16). Here the Ephraimites intercepted some of the fugitives and Gedeon crossed the Jordan since Succoth, 'booths', modern Tell el-Akhsās, 'mound of booths', commands the ford on the east side. The fords near Beisan would have been held by the neighbouring Nephthalites summoned to join in the pursuit (23). The Midianites therefore fled first eastward to the Jordan valley, then southward to cross the river at ed-Damiye. VIII:1-4. The haughtiness of the Ephraimites and the prudence of Gedeon are portrayed. The inference drawn from the vintage of Abiezer that Gedeon's 300 men were all Abiezrites is unjustified; Gedeon refers to himself. 6. The names of the Midianite kings Zebah, 'sacrifice', and Salmunna, 'shelter refused', are probably altered. 7. That fellow-Israelites should refuse food to the famished warriors of Yahweh was a grievous crime. The punishment threatened and afterwards inflicted was to tear the flesh from the bones as the chaff is torn from the grain in threshing. 8. Penuel is very probably Tulul ed-Dahab, NNE. of Succoth, commanding a ford of the Jabboc. 11. From Penuel Gedeon went towards the way of the tent-dwellers, the modern pilgrimage route from Damascus to Ma'an, east of Nobe and Jegbaa, the modern Agbēhāt in SE. Galaad.

242k 12b. He surprised the Midianites, captured the two kings, and all the host he terrified. 14. For 'described' read wrote down. Writing was then evidently in common use. 18-19. Where are the men whom ye slew at Thabor? And they said, 'As thou art so were they: each resembled the children of a king'. Gedeon asks the kings to produce his brothers. As they cannot do this and their doom is certain, they glory in their deed. 21. For 'ornaments and bosses' read crests.

I VIII 22-35 Subsequent History of Gedeon—Having already erected by divine order a Yahweh-altar at Ophra, Gedeon now determines to establish there also a Yahweh-oracle, and uses for that purpose the golden earlets of the Midianites, his share of the spoils. All the gold, 1,700 shekels (61 lb.) was not expended on the ephod garment, and 27a should be rendered: And Gedeon used it for an ephod. The reasons alleged for interpreting the ephod as an idol are well refuted by Burney. It may be added that establishment of idol worship would be inconsistent with peace in the land (28) and fidelity to Yahweh (33) during Gedeon's lifetime. These texts also imply that the institution of the Yahweh-oracle was not disapproved by the original writer. It follows that 27b is a later addition since whoring (DV fornication) or infidelity to Yahweh, the true spouse of Israel, by worshipping other gods or using foreign religious rites, cannot be reconciled with the fidelity implied in 33. Ephods like altars outside the sanctuary would be tolerated originally, but later condemned as a Canaanite cult incompatible with Yahweh worship. The ingratitude of the people to the house of Gedeon was shown in their toleration of the slaughter of his seventy sons by Abimelech.

243a IX 1-57 Abimelech—Gedeon refused the rulership offered to him and his descendants after his victory, as being a usurpation of the rule of Yahweh (8:23, cf. 1 Kg 8:7). Abimelech, his son, abandoned Yahweh for Baal and secured kingship for himself through his kinsmen in Shechem, then inhabited by a mixed population of Israelites and Canaanites. He was the offspring of a ṣadika marriage between Gedeon and a Shechemite, whose nationality, Israelite or Canaanite, is not indicated. The female partner in this union lived with her own people, not in her husband's house, and the children were regarded as hers. Abimelech was therefore supported by the Shechemites against the Abiezrite sons of Gedeon. Shechem, the modern Balāṭa, about a mile east of Nablus, had very great importance in ancient Palestine owing to its central position and command of all the trade routes. Recent excavations on the site have clarified the references to it in ch 9. There was a lower city on the east side and an upper on the west, each with its own gate. The upper city was artificially elevated above the plain and numbered among its edifices the palace of the ruler and the temple of Baal-Berith. It is twice called Beth-millo (6; 20). The Millo at Jerusalem, lit. 'filling', was an earth-work strengthening a weak point in the fortifications, and had a bēth, fort or tower (4 Kg 12:28). The corresponding Assyrian mulū designates similarly a raised terrace on which a tower or fort was built. The lower city was first captured and those in the upper, informed by fugitives, took refuge in the fortified temple. Baal Berith 'Baal of the Alliance' (8:33b, mistranslated in Vg:9:4), also called El Berith 'God of the Alliance' (9:46), was the principal god of the Canaanites of Shechem. The Canaanite sanctuary on the side of Mt Garizim near Shechem cannot be the temple of El Berith in the Tower of Shechem, since it was destroyed by fire at the close of the Middle Bronze Age.

c The events narrated may be thus summarized: 1-6. Abimelech is made king. 7-21. Joatham's fable. 22-29. Revolt of the Shechemites fomented by Gaal. 30-33. Zebul's message to Abimelech. 34-49. Abimelech's campaigns against the Shechemites ending in the destruction of the Lower and Upper city. 50-54. Abimelech's death. 55-57. Conclusion. A temple had always a treasury and was sometimes the repository of public treasure. 4. Seventy silver shekels (half-crowns) sufficed for the hiring of worthless and reckless followers. 5. Upon one stone has no religious significance but indicates the slayer's ruthlessness. 6a. After 'together' read: and all Beth-millo, and after 'king' (6b slightly corrected): by the terebinth of the Maṣṣēbah, probably the great stone of Jos 24:26. The parable of Joatham contrasts Gedeon and his sons who have worked for the common good with the selfish adventurer Abimelech and indicates the evil results to be expected from the foolish choice of the Shechemites. 7. For 'the top' read a projection. The summit was beyond earshot. Oil has various sacred uses, for temple lamps, bread-offerings, etc. The honour which it confers on man is illustrated by the anointing of distinguished guests. 'Be promoted among' (9 DV) is lit. 'wave over'. Wine was a common drink-offering. The buckthorn (DV bramble, 14) is a low and straggling bush. 15. The invitation to its shelter shows the absurdity of the choice and the fire the misfortunes which will result from it. 16-20. The application of the parable is indicated. The fundamental lack of good faith of the Shechemites in their dealings with Gedeon and his house will appear also in their dealings with Abimelech and result in the ruin of both parties. The city to which Joatham fled was the modern Bira 6 m. N. of Beisān. 22. 'Israel' is a stereotyped expression. Abimelech ruled over a part of Israel. 23. And the citizens (lit. owners) of Shechem dealt treacherously with Abimelech. The evil acts of men are often attributed to God, because, though forbidden by him they are part of the divine plan. 25. Omit 'while they waited for his coming'. The ambushers sought to rob caravans which Abimelech owned or taxed. For 'wasting the vineyards' read gathering (lit. cutting) the vintage and for 'singing and dancing' holding a praise-festival. 28a. Who is Shechem? Shechem means Shechemites as Israel Israelites. 28b. Should not the son of Yerubbaal and Zebul his officer serve the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem? but why should we serve him? The appeal of Gaal, a newcomer, is to the Canaanites of Shechem against the half-breed, Abimelech. 29. Oh, would that this people were under my hand! then would I remove Abimelech and would say to Abimelech, 'Increase thy army and come out'. 31. For 'privately' read to Aruma, probably el-Ormeḥ, five miles SE. of Shechem. 34. For 'places' read bands. 37a. Middle, lit. navel, indicates the central point of the Palestinian mountain range. 37b. Render by way of the soothsayers' terebinth. 41a. And Abimelech duelt in Aruma. 44. For 'besieging the city' read standing in the entry of the gate of the city. The sowing of salt, also recorded in Assyrian inscriptions, was a symbolical act indicating a barren region. Here as frequently the account of one event is completed before that of a second is begun without regard to chronological sequence. 46a. Read They went into the crypt of the temple of El-Berith, and omit the gloss (46b). The word rendered crypt etymologically indicates underground chamber. 49a. Omit 'as fast as he could'. 49b. Read after 'leader' and placed them (the bundles of brushwood) against the crypt and set fire to the crypt. 50. Thebes is probably the modern Tubas, twelve miles NE. of Shechem. 51. For 'princes' read citizens. 53. And a certain woman cast an upper millstone on the head of Abimelech and broke his skull. The upper and revolving one of the two great stones of the hand-mill is indicated. It appears from 55 that Abimelech was supported by Israelites. The sacred writer concludes that Abimelech and the Shechemites were justly punished for their sins.

X 1-5 Thola and Jair—These were minor judges of whom no achievements are related. 1. For 'the uncle of Abimelech' read son of Dodo, a proper name. Shamir may have been on the site of later Samaria. Thola, like Debora, was an Issacharite residing in Mt Ephraim. Jair was a Manassite. Camon is perhaps the modern Kumen near Pella. Havvoth means tent-villages. Their conquest by Jair is related Num 32:41. X 6-XII 7 Jephthe—The Jephthe narrative contains a few later additions and may be composite though

h X 6-16 Sin, Oppression and Repentance—In this introduction to the narratives of Jephthe and Samson the gods of Aram (cf. 3:8), Sidon, and Moab are out of place and probably a later addition. 8a. And they broke and crushed the children of Israel that year, eighteen years. Eighteen years is clearly a later addition. 9. After 'Ammon' read passed over the Jordan to fight against. There is no verb in 11 and the time of deliverance from Egypt is past, from Philistines and Ammonites future. Render Have I not delivered you from the Egyptians and the Amorrites? (11a) and omit 11b. Sidonian oppression is probable though not recorded. 12. For Vg Canaan MT Ma'on read Madian.

i X 17-XI 11 Early History of Jephthe—Maspha is most probably Hirbet Gele'ad, south of the Jabboc on the western border of Ammon. Jephthe was the son of a harlot and a certain Galaad (or perhaps Galaadite). His brothers thrust him out as the son of another mother, and he went and dwelt in the land of Tob (Dubu, now et-Taiyibe, NE. of Galaad), where he collected a band of ne'er-do-wells who followed him on predatory expeditions. When the Ammonite war broke out the elders of Galaad offered to make him their captain. He first objects that it was they who drove him into exile (presumably by supporting his brothers), but subsequently accepts on condition that if victorious he shall be their ruler. XI:10. They reply, 'Yahweh shall be hearer between us, surely according to thy word so shall we do'. Jephthe goes back with them to Maspha, where the agreement is ratified before Yahweh.

j XI 12-28 Negotiations with the Ammonite King—The territory in dispute was that between the Arnon and the Jabboc. The Ammonite was directly interested probably only in the northern part, but the argument used suggested a wider claim. He calls it his land, wrongfully seized by the Israelites during their journey from Egypt to Canaan. Jephthe first defends his ancestors, alleging their forbearance towards Edom and Moab, and their petition for a mere passage through Sehon's land, the territory in dispute. Then he expounds Israel's right, the right of conquest in a war forced upon them. If the king of Ammon has a right to the conquests of his god has not Israel a right to the conquests of Yahweh? This argumentum ad hominem does not imply that Jephthe put Yahweh on the same level as the Ammonite god as a merely national deity. He next argues that Balac, king of Moab, did not contest Israel's right even though the region between the Arnon and Heshbon was ancient Moabite territory, and concludes by asking why the Ammonite reclamation was so long delayed. In 26 read with LXX Jazer (MT Aroer) and Jordan (MT Arnon), and omit '300 years', a later addition. The references to Moab in the dispute are quite natural and do not suggest a quarrel with the Moabites. The only difficulty is the mention of the Moabite god Kamos (24) instead of the Ammonite Malik. This is probably due to an alteration of the text through a misinterpretation of Moloch as king.

k 29-40 Campaign and Vow of Jephthe—Jephthe, inspired by God, crossed from Maspha to Ephraim (MT Galaad, cf. 12:2) and Manasses to raise additional forces and returned to the camp at Maspha. Before the battle he vowed to offer to Yahweh as a holocaust whoever came forth from the door of his (recently acquired) house at Maspha to meet him on his victorious return. The terms used clearly indicate not an animal but a person, not a mere dedication but a sacrifice. Making a detour with his army he surprised and routed the Ammonites. The Ammonite Aroer was east of Rabbath-Ammon (Jos 13:25). Mannith and Abel-ceramim are unidentified. Jephthe was met on his return by a band of women celebrating the victory and led by his only daughter. 35. Mindful of his vow he says, 'Alas, my daughter! thou hast indeed brought me low and art become the supreme cause of my trouble', etc. 37. The heroic daughter encourages her father to fulfil his vow, only requesting 'Let me alone two months that I may go and wander free (MT descend) upon the mountains and weep my maidenhood—I and my companions'. 39. After two months Jephthe fulfils his vow. And she knew no man. Lack of offspring made her death more tragic to the Israelites. Jephthe's religious earnestness and religious ignorance in making and fulfilling his vow are equally apparent. The narrator informs us that he was inspired in his war measures but relates the other events of his career, including his early lapses and his barbarous vow, quite objectively without dissimulation and without comment.

XII 1-7 Jephthe and the Ephraimites—The haughty Ephraimites, again (cf. 8:1-3) offended at a victory won without their intervention, were called to arms and passed over to Saphon. Saphon associated with Succoth (Jos 13:27), is Tell Sa'idiyye, guarding a Jordan ford near the mouth of W. Kafringi. Jephthe's reasonable reply (cf. 11:29) to their challenge does not avert a conflict in which Ephraim is defeated. 4b. Omit the reasons given, partly a misplaced dittography of 5b and partly a gloss. 5. Read after 'return' and whenever the fugitives of Ephraim said. 6. Shibboleth, glossed in Vg, also means 'stream'. A scribe has exaggerated the number of Ephraimites slain. In the World War 1914-18 Turks were similarly detected by Arabs at the crossing of the Jordan through their incorrect pronunciation of the emphatic s in basal.

8-15 Ibsan, Elon, and Abdon—These are the last minor judges. There was a Bethlehem in Judah and in Zabulon. The former is more probably intended as better known and elsewhere (19:1) explicitly indicated. 9. 'And gave to husbands' is a gloss in Vg explaining 'sent abroad'. 12. For 'in Zabulon' read in Ayyalon in the land of Zabulon. Pharathon is the modern Far'ata six miles WSW. of Shechem. 15. The mount of Amalec is unknown.

XIII 1-XVI 31 Samson—Samson is portrayed as a popular hero, dedicated to the service of Yahweh from his mother's womb and charged with the mission of beginning to deliver Israel from the oppression of the Philistines. As a Nazarite and a warrior (cf. 5:2) he may never shear his locks since his dedication and his warfare are lifelong. Victory over the Philistines was reserved to David. He has the three characteristics of the popular hero, bravery, weakness towards women, and mother-wit. His superhuman strength, naturally conditioned by the observance of the essential obligation of his state, is repeatedly attributed to the spirit of Yahweh, and Samson himself when he prays for its restoration recognizes it as a gift of Yahweh. His weakness towards women provides the opportunity for his exploits by bringing him into conflict with the Philistines. It has its place in God's designs but leads eventually to infidelity and betrayal. His mother-wit appears in his riddle and aphorisms and the humorous aspect of some of his exploits such as the destruction of the harvests of the Philistines. The historical and geographical situation is clear and consistent. The remnant of Dan, described as a clan, occupies the region of Saraa and Eshtaol as in 18:2 ff., the scene of the events narrated, and is subject to the Philistines. The neighbouring men of Juda, as elsewhere attested (1:19; 3:3), are under the same yoke and obediently hand over Samson to their oppressors.

The interpretation of the Samson narrative as a solar myth is no longer proposed by critics. It is recognized that the Hebrew historians are not concerned with mythology, but with sacred history and that Samson is manifestly represented as a popular hero. Those who reject the sacred writer's explanation of his superhuman strength attribute his miraculous exploits to popular imagination working, according to some, on a substratum of solar mythology. Thus the solar myth reappears in a new form. Samson's long

- 244b locks are the rays of the sun in his strength, surely a fanciful hypothesis as compared with the historical explanation. His destruction of the harvests of the Philistines is the corn-blight popularly ascribed to the sun's rays. It is gratuitously assumed that this pseudo-scientific theory of later Latin writers was familiar to the Hebrews. A historical instance of scorched earth strategy by means of torches fastened to the tails of dogs and foxes is recorded in Syria in the fourteenth century Mongol invasion (cf. ZATW (1911) 71 f.). Dalila, 'servant' in Babylonian, designates Samson's betrayer as the servant of Ishtar, enemy of the sun-god. This is undoubtedly far-fetched, and if the name has a special significance, the Arabic sense 'informer' is suggested by the context. The pillars upset by Samson at Gaza are a reminiscence of the pillars of Herakles. The Greek solar hero travelled like the sun to the confines of the west. Samson was brought a prisoner to the chief city of his captors, where he performed his last exploit. The pillars are incidental and too ordinary a feature of an edifice to suggest the pillars of Herakles. These are the chief mythological parallels adduced, manifestly superficial and heterogeneous and more indicative of modern research than ancient folk-lore.
- d XIII 1-25 Vocation and Birth of Samson—1-5. The Angel of Yahweh appears to Manue's wife in Saraa, announcing the birth of a son who shall begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines. 6-8. She informs her husband, who begs Yahweh for a second apparition and instructions. 9-14. His request is granted. 15-16. Manue offers his guest a kid, refused as food but accepted as a holocaust to Yahweh. 17-20. The guest reveals himself by ascending heavenwards in the flame of the holocaust. 21-23. Manue fears death because he has seen Yahweh, but his wife reminds him of the gracious character of the visit. 24-25. Birth and youth of Samson.
- e Saraa is Sar'a on the north side of the Wady ʿSarrār opposite Bethsames. Dan is a clan (DV race 2). The law of the Nazarite (Num 6) only considers a temporary dedication. Samson's was lifelong. Wearing the hair uncut was the essential obligation. Wine and strong drink were also forbidden. Unclean foods were prohibited to all. As Samson's dedication was pre-natal some privations were imposed on his mother lest he should be contaminated. 6a. 'The man of God . . . the Angel of God' should probably be a man . . . an angel. 6b. Read I did not ask him and he did not tell me. 12. Now let thy word come to pass what shall be the rule for the child and what shall he do? 15. Manue said, 'Prithee, let us detain thee', since a guest had to be constrained to accept hospitality. 19. For 'libations' read meal-offering. Manue knew Yahweh by his ascent in the flame of the holocaust, but the account of the apparition is concluded before the recognition is narrated. Eshtaol is Eshū', about two miles NE. of Saraa. The camp of Dan (not that of 18:12) is probably the long promontory between the two towns. 25. The spirit of Yahweh is manifested apparently by feats of strength.
- f XIV 1-20 Samson marries a Philistine, slays a Lion and proposes a Riddle—1-4. Samson wishes to marry a Philistine of Thimnah, but his parents refuse their consent, unaware that the marriage is designed by Yahweh as an occasion of conflict with the Philistines. 5-7. On his way to Thimnah to arrange the marriage he meets a full-grown lion and tears it asunder with his bare hands. 8-9. Going again to Thimnah for the wedding he finds a hive of bees and honey in the carcass of the lion. 10-14. The marriage feast is prepared at Thimnah, and thirty Philistines are assigned to Samson, ostensibly as a guard of honour, but really through fear of him, to whom he proposes his riddle. 15-18. They intimidate the bride, who finally receives the solution from Samson on the seventh day and reveals it to them. 19. Samson procures the garments promised to the solvers by slaying and despoiling thirty Philistines of Ascalon. 20. His wife is given to another.
- g Thimnah is probably Hirbet Tibne, about four miles south of Saraa in the plain. The dissent of his parents, who object to Philistines as uncircumcised, obliges Samson to conduct the negotiations himself and to contract a ʿadika marriage, the wife remaining with her people. 'His father and mother' (5) and 'his father' (10) seem to have been interpolated to regularize the marriage. If they had been with Samson they would have known that he slew the lion, and his father would have conducted the negotiations. 6. Samson was inspired by Yahweh in his feat of strength, but not in his courtship. Returning to Thimnah for the wedding, he interrupted his journey to take back the honey to his parents, which is surprising though the way was short. The carcass of the lion would dry up quickly in the hot climate, and the jackals would pick the bones clean. For 'when they saw him' (MT 11) read because they feared him. 13. The shirts are inner garments, lit. linen wrappers. The coats appear from 19 to have been outer garments. 15a. For 'seventh' read fourth (LXX). 18a. 'Before the sun went down' is generally rendered with a slight correction before he (Samson) entered the bridal chamber. 20. As Samson departed in anger his bride was given to the best man, his companion whom he had made his chief friend. 19. Yahweh again inspires him in his feats at Ascalon.

XV 1-20 Samson burns Harvests and slays Warriors h
—1-3. Finding his wife given to another, Samson determines to avenge the wrong done him. 4-5. He burns down the corn-fields, vineyards, and oliveyards of his enemies by letting loose into them torch-bearing jackals. 6-8. The Philistines fail to appease him by putting his wife and father-in-law to death. 9-13. They send an army to seize him at Etam in Judah, and the Judaeans deliver him to them. 14-17. Samson bursts his bonds, seizes the jawbone of an ass, and slays with it a thousand Philistines at Ramathlechi. 18-20. A spring of water gushes from the rock to assuage his thirst.

The husband usually brought a present when visiting his ʿadika-wife. 1b. Omit 'as usual'. 2a. I verily thought thou didst truly hate her. Both verbs are emphatic. 3a. Samson said: I am quits this time with the Philistines. So sure is he of his future vengeance that he regards his obligation to avenge himself as already fulfilled. 3b. The reason he gives, for I am about to do them a mischief, thus becomes intelligible. 4. By foxes are probably meant jackals, which live in packs and are easily caught. Insert the house of before 'her father' in 6b (LXX and 14:15). 8a. And he smote them leg upon thigh. This is most probably a wrestling term, corresponding to the English cross-buttock, 'when the party, advancing his right leg and thigh, closes with his antagonist, and catching him with his right arm, or giving a round blow, throws him over his right hip upon his head'. Etam is probably the rock, called 'Araq Samain, and containing a cave, over two miles ESE. of Saraa. 9. After 'Juda' read spread themselves abroad in Lechi (probably Hirbet ʿS-Siyāj, SW. of 'Araq Samain). 14. Read after 'fire' and his bonds melted from off his hands. Note the inspiration for a feat of strength. 15. Insert fresh before 'jawbone'. An old jawbone would be brittle. Samson said: With the red ass's jawbone I have reddened their right red (lit. I have thoroughly assed them): With the red ass's jawbone I have smitten a thousand men. For the first verb MT has the meaningless 'of an ass of two asses', but LXX has a verb as required. 17. Ramathlechi certainly means the height or hill of the jawbone. If the name existed before Samson's exploit, as is suggested by its mention in 9 and 14 (which may however be proleptical), it would be derived from the shape of the hill like Golgotha 'skull', or Luhith 'little jawbone' (Is 15:5 and CIS Aram 196), and would be only punningly associated with his weapon by Samson. In the alternative hypothesis the name would be derived from the weapon. 19a. Then God clave the mortar that is in Lechi. The mortar was a circular depression in the rock. The spring issued from the mortar, not from k XVI 1-31 Samson at Gaza and with Dalila: his Capture and Death—1-3. Samson escapes from the Philistines with the gate of Gaza on his shoulders. 4-5. He becomes enamoured of Dalila, who is bribed by the lords of the Philistines to discover the secret of his strength. 6-14. Her first attempts are unsuccessful. 15-22. At the fourth attempt Samson reveals his secret, loses his strength when shorn of his locks, and is captured by his enemies. 23-30. Brought to a feast in honour of the Philistine corn-god, Dagon (cf. Burney 384-7), after his hair has grown, he upsets the two pillars which support the edifice and slays more at his death than during his life. 31. His burial.

l Samson's passion leads him into an ambushade. 2. The watch was by day while the gate was open, the silence by night. The gate was of one piece when locked. Hebron is thirty-eight miles from Gaza. The ancient name Sorec is preserved in Hirbet Sūrik, two miles west of Saraa. Dalila was a Philistine. The name may mean informer. 5. She was to discover by what means his strength is great and inform the five lords of the Philistines, who agreed to pay her 1,100 silver shekels (half-crowns) each. 7. The first binding was with seven fresh bow-strings which have not been dried. The Philistines lay in wait in another room. Omit 'twined with spittle' (DV 9). 11. The second binding was with new ropes as in 15:13. 13. For 'how long' read hitherto. 13b-14a. The third binding is complicated by an omission in MT, through homœoteleuton, supplied by LXX. Samson said: If thou weave the seven locks of my head along with the web (and beat up with the pin, then shall I become weak and be like any other man. So when he slept Dalila took the seven locks of his head and wove them along with the web) and beat up with the pin. 14b. Samson on waking plucked up the loom and the web to which his hair was attached. The pin was a flat piece of wood by which the web was pressed together. It is rendered nail (DV) and interpolated ungrammatically before the loom in MT 14. The mention of the hair marks an approach to the secret, revealed at the next attempt. Dalila sees that no test is necessary and summons the lords of the Philistines. 19. And she made him sleep on her knees, and called for a man, and he shaved off the seven locks of his head and he began to be reduced and his strength departed from him. 20. Shake myself means free myself from bonds. 21. Grinding corn, the work of women, was an ignominious imposition. 24a. And when the people saw him apparently refers to Samson and thus 25 originally preceded 24. The scene suggested is a banquetting-hall opening on to a courtyard. Samson first disports himself before those in the court and on the roof, and is then led into the hall. The pillars in 26 and 29 are not those in 25 where Vg interpolates 'two'. Samson after his last prayer for the restoration of his strength, strengthen me only this once, bends the pillars so that the house collapses.

m The secret, revealed at the next attempt. 245a XVII 1-XVIII 31 The Sanctuary of Dan—The establishment of an idolatrous sanctuary at Dan in NE. Palestine is here narrated. The facts are objectively recorded, but the sacred writer evidently disapproves of the erection by private authority of a new religious centre in Israel. The sordid origin of the sanctuary, the high-handed usurpation of the Danites, the idolatrous form of worship speak for themselves. The sanctuary is contrasted with the House of God in Shiloh and its origin is explained by the general lawlessness of the period. It contained a molten image of Yahweh and an ephod like that of Gideon. The image of molten work (cf. the calf of molten work Ex 32:4) became a (graven) image and a molten (image) by the insertion of 'and'. In a second source the image is called teraphim. This obscure word seems to designate an image substituted for the sleeping David (1 Kg 19:13).

It is associated with ephod in Os 3:4 and with divination Ez 21:26. The multiplication of objects of cult in ch 18 is clearly due to interpolation, since it supposes the duplication of the Yahweh-image. The institution of the sanctuary of Micah on Mt Ephraim and his installation of a Levite as priest are first related (ch XVII) then the Danite discovery of a new home at Laiš, their seizure of Micah's sanctuary on their journey thither, their conquest of Laiš, renamed Dan, and their sanctuary and priest (ch XVIII).

Micah is an abbreviation of Micay^{hu}, 'who is like Yahweh?' XVII:2-3. The text is disordered and contains a repetition of 4a. Micah said: The 1,100 shekels of silver which were taken from thee, concerning which thou didst take an oath and didst say also in my hearing 'I do surely consecrate the silver to Yahweh from my hand alone to make a molten image'—behold the silver is with me; I took it; and now I will restore it to thee. And his mother said 'Blessed of Yahweh be my son'. The object of the oath was to bring a curse on the robber if he used the money. Its effect here was prompt restitution (4a). For alone MT reads 'for my son'. The mother had a molten image made from part of the silver and set it up in the house of Micah. To this he added an ephod for a Yahweh oracle (consulted by the Danites 18:6). 5. Fill the hand means install in office. 7. The Levite of the clan of Judah must have been adopted into that tribe. Micah's satisfaction in having a Levite for priest shows the antiquity of the levitical institution. XVIII:1. A territory was assigned to the Danites, but the Amorites and the Philistines restricted them to a small portion of it so that they did not actually receive their lot. 2a. And the children of Dan sent from their clan five men from their whole number (lit. from their extremities) men of valour. 2b. For 'rested' read passed the night. 3. The spies recognized the Levite by his voice already known to them. Their third question, lit. What to thee here? means 'What interest hast thou in remaining here?' 6. The oracle gives a favourable answer: Go in peace: before Yahweh is your journey whereon ye go. On Laiš cf. Jos 19:47. Render 7b, emended from 10b, after 'easy': and there was no want of anything that is in the earth and they were far from the Sidonians and had no dealings with Aram (MT adam, mankind). 8. Render the query What news have ye? 9. The words against (DV to) them in the answer imply an omission in MT supplied by LXX. We entered and travelled through the land as far as Laiš and we saw the people in it dwelling in security after the manner of the Sidonians at a distance from the Sidonians and having no dealings with the Aramaeans. Render after 'fruitful': And will ye be still? Be not slothful to go in to possess the land. 14. Laiš is a gloss. 16. The gate (DV door) implies that Micah's house had a courtyard. The five spies entered the house and seized the image and the ephod while the priest was at the gate with the warriors. 22. Micah's neighbours were called to arms and pursued the Danites, who say to Micah (23b), 'What aileth thee that thou art up in arms?' The pl. Elohim (24) indicates the Yahweh image (LXX), not a plurality of gods (Vg). 25. Enraged is lit. bitter of soul. 27. Read after 'took' that which Micah had made and the priest that had belonged to him, and after 'Sidon' (28) and they had not dealings with Aram. 30. MT has a suspended 'n' after the 'm' of Moseh, thus reading Manasses through reverence for Moses without altering the text. 30b. After 'day' read when the ark (MT land) went into captivity. The emendation is based on the fact that 30 and 31 apparently indicate the same period of time. The capture of the ark and the destruction of Shiloh by the Philistines were practically contemporaneous, but the Assyrian captivity was several centuries later.

XIX-XXI Origin, History, and Consequence of the War XXI Benjamin—The historicity of this narrative is wholly or partially denied by many critics. They argue that the united action of the tribes is out of harmony with the history of the period, and that the references to Jabes Galaad, with which Saul had 245e friendly relations, manifest the intention of the narrator to denigrate the tribe and friends of Saul. Exaggeration of numbers and adaptation of the narratives of the crime of the Sodomites and the capture of Hai are also urged as suggestive of fiction. It may be answered that the disunited activity of the tribes in the Judges' period is explained by the fact that the troubles were local. The crime at Gabaa was a religious matter of universal importance, and particular measures were taken to secure the co-operation of all. There is no trace of special animosity to Saul or Benjamin in the other historical books. The disaffection of Jabes Galaad is paralleled by that of Meroz in Deborah's and Succoth and Peniel in Gedeon's time. Exaggeration in numbers, no greater here than in 12:6, is not uncommon in the present text of the OT and does not affect its historicity. The stereotyped character of OT historical narrative accounts for similarities in recording distinct occurrences. The crimes of the Sodomites and the Gabaites are different. The failures of the early attacks on Hai and Gabaa are not similarly explained. Osee on the other hand attests the outrage when he twice refers to 'the days of Gabaa' as the depth of depravity (Os 9:9; 10:9). Recent excavations attest its punishment, the burning of the city in the period of the Judges. Saul attests its consequence when he calls Benjamin the least tribe of Israel (1 Kg 9:21). Note how Gedeon deprecating a similar honour does not belittle Manasses (Jg 6:15). Would a post-exilic inventor attribute such depravity to the lack of a king or completely disregard the law of unity of sanctuary?

g XIX 1-30 The Crime at Gabaa—A Levite, dwelling in the furthestmost parts of Mt Ephraim, went to Bethlehem to recover his wife who had been vexed with him and returned to her parents. 3b. He came to her father's house where he was warmly welcomed and received the customary three days' hospitality. 4. For 'familiarily' read and they passed the night there. Early on the fourth day he rose up to depart, but his host constrained him in eastern fashion (cf. Lk 24:29) to remain until the evening of the fifth day. The hospitable Bethlehemite is contrasted with the men of Gabaa whose crime, an abominable breach of the sacred law of hospitality, is thus foreshadowed. The guest refuses the last invitation and sets out in the afternoon. Unwilling to spend the night in Jebusite Jerusalem he presses on towards Gabaa. 13. Come, let us draw near to one of the places and stay the night in Gabaa or Rama. Gabaa is Tell el-Ful, three miles north of Jerusalem, partly excavated by Albright 1922-3. The original fortress was 'built toward the end of the thirteenth century B.C., and burned near the end of the twelfth' (Albright in AASOR 4 (1924) 8). It was subsequently rebuilt, and was fortified and prosperous as Saul's capital 1050 B.C. Rama is er-Ram, five miles north of Jerusalem. The travellers at Gabaa vainly await an offer of hospitality in the market-place (DV street) near the gate. Finally an Ephraimite sojourner in the city discovers them and offers entertainment. 18. The house of God is a copyist's error for my house. 19a. Omit 'hay'. 22. Sons of Belial are either worthless persons, interpreting Belial as 'without profit', or abysmally wicked persons, from Belial 'abyss' or 'underworld', or fiends, from Belial the Archfiend. The talmudic derivation in Vg (DV without yoke) is incorrect. According to the present text the men of Belial are first Sodomites, later adulterers and murderers. The Levite however accuses them (20:5) of intentional murder, not sodomy, and actual murder and adultery. The reference to sodomy is an intrusion in the text from Gen. 19. 24. The incorrect form of concubine and the twice repeated masculine instead of feminine pronoun them are evidences of interpolation. For 'the man' (24b) read the woman and for 'him' her. 'Crime against nature on the man' (DV 24) is a mistranslation of wantonness. The men of Belial demand the concubine. To save his guest the host offers his daughter instead. The guest, ready to defend his concubine, nevertheless surrenders her to save his host's daughter. The men of Gabaa, unlike Bethlehemites and Ephraimites, refuse hospitality, and abuse and murder their city's sacred guest. An omission in MT after 29 through homöoteleuton is supplied by LXX. And he commanded the men whom he sent saying, 'Thus shall ye say to all the sons of Israel'.

XX 1-48 The War against Benjamin—Maspha, identified with modern Tell en-Nasbe, was a border city of Benjamin, a mile south of the Ephraimite Bethel. 1. To Yahweh implies the presence of the Ark. Dan and Bersabee are approximately the limits of the territory occupied by Israelites. From Dan to Bersabee (1) and the corners (DV chiefs) of all the people (2a) both mean all Israel (cf. 18:2). Most commentators interpret corners as chiefs. Vg unduly emphasizes the crime by adding 'with an incredible fury of lust' (5), 'so great' (12) and altering 6b because they had committed lewdness and wantonness in Israel. Omit 'in common' (DV 9) and insert after 'Gabaa': We shall go up (accidentally omitted) against it by lot. The Benjaminites refuse to surrender the criminals and assemble in Gabaa to defend it. 16. On left-handed, not ambidexter, cf. 3:15. 18. The oracle was therefore consulted and declared 'Let Judah be the first'. St Jerome incorrectly renders Bethel as 'the house of God', and adds the gloss 'in Shiloh', thus vindicating the law of unity of sanctuary. This law was not observed in the period of Judges, and Bethel, sanctified by the apparitions of Yahweh to Jacob (Gen 35) and his descendants (Jg 2:1), was the temporary abode of the Ark, transferred thither from Shiloh for the campaign. 19. For 'by' read against. 22. After 'Israel' read took courage and set their army, etc. Read And they went up (23a). And the children of Israel consulted Yahweh (27a) . . . saying, etc. (28b). The mention of the Ark at Bethel in those days and of Phinees standing over it in the omitted 27b-28a is clearly a later interpolation interrupting the context. We cannot therefore conclude that the Ark was permanently located at Bethel or that the war was waged in the days of Phinees, a younger contemporary of Josue. The description of the battle is confused by the presence of two accounts and some textual corruptions, but the general sense is clear. The simulated retreat, the ambushade, the fire-signal and the simultaneous attack on front and rear recall the capture of Hai. To draw the Benjaminites into the open country the retreat was made along two highways, the first to Bethel being the northern road from Jerusalem to Shechem, the second not to Gabaa (MT) but to Gabaon, branching off from this to the NW. half a mile from Gabaa. The ambushade was posted on the (south)-west of Geba (LXX), three miles north of Gabaa, where there were caves and whence a secret approach could be made to Gabaa. The fire-signal indicated the capture of the city to both parties. The Benjaminites fled to the desert, but only six hundred reached Rimmon, the modern Ramman, three and a half miles east of Bethel, or the nearer and more suitable Mughâret Gela'y in the Wady Suwêit. 48. The execution of a ban, not explicitly mentioned, on the cities, inhabitants, and beasts of Benjamin is described. For 'the remains of the city' read the Benjaminites.

XXI 1-24 The Survival of Benjamin—The Israelites realizing that the tribe of Benjamin was doomed to extinction by their oath not to contract marriage alliances with its members and their slaughter of the women and children devise two expedients to avert this calamity. They slay all the inhabitants of Jabes Galaad, who had disobeyed the call to arms, except the virgins, four hundred in number, reserved for the Benjaminite survivors. They command the two hundred still unprovided to seize wives at Shiloh from among the unmarried maidens who danced there at an annual religious solemnity. 2. Bethel becomes in Vg 'the house of God in Shiloh' as in 20:18. 5. The reference to the second oath perhaps originally belonged to 8, where 5a reappears more appropriately. 9. And the

JUDGES XXI

2451 people were mustered and behold there was not there a man of the inhabitants of Jabes Galaad. The city is not identified but the name is preserved in Wady Yabis in northern Galaad. 10. For 'ten' read twelve. 11b. But the virgins ye shall save alive. And they did so (LXX, not in MT) is required by the context. 12b. In Shiloh in the land of Canaan is probably a gloss since the description is strange and the camp was elsewhere. 13. Read after 'Rimmon' and proclaimed peace to them. 14a. For 'came' read returned. 14b. And yet so they did not find enough for them. 15. And the people were moved to pity for Benjamin because Yahweh had made a breach in the tribes of Israel. 17. And they said 'How shall a remnant be left to Benjamin, that a tribe be not blotted out from Israel?' 18. The feast was one of the three great annual solemnities. Render 22b, Ye shall say 'Grant them graciously to us; for we took not every man his wife in battle: for if ye had given them to us ye would now be guilty'. The plea is that the middle course adopted avoids the two extremes of seizure in battle which would cause a blood feud and voluntary concession which would violate an oath. 2451

b Place and Subject—In our Greek and Latin Bibles Ruth stands amongst the historical books, at the end of the so-called Octoteach; in Hebrew Bibles it takes its place first or second in the series of five Megilloth or Festal Rolls near the beginning of the Kethubhim or 'Writings'—that is, in the third part of the Bible. Josephus, Melito of Sardes, Origen, and Jerome seem to indicate that its primitive place is really after Judges, as in the Greek and Latin Bibles. Liturgical use may have transferred it to the festal groups consisting of the Canticle for the Pasch, Ruth for Pentecost, Lamentations for Mourning Day, Ecclesiastes for Tabernacles, Esther for Purim.

e The subject of our book is an historical episode belonging to the age of Judges and concerning the ancestry of David. The Moabitess Ruth is its central personage. In consequence of misfortunes governed by the provident hand of God, devotedness to an Israelite mother-in-law brought her to the God of Israel and to Bethlehem-Ephrata. There by a marriage of the levitical type (see § 246g) she entered the world's greatest ancestral line, that of David and the Divine Messias.

d Purpose and Literary Character—Ruth is a history which by its edifying examples of family devotedness or 'piety' glorifies the ancestry of David. Admiration moved the writer, and the honour of David determined him to write. The closing genealogy should be regarded as an integral part of the Book. Because of David and, inspirationally, because of Christ our Lord, the Book of Ruth was written.

Ruth is a charming history charmingly told, an idyll of God-fearing domestic and agricultural life at Bethlehem. The style is simple, fresh, and abundant. The large place given to direct speech, the fascinating repetitions of phrase, and the finesse of the dialogue make it particularly pleasing. In reading it we feel that the eyes of God are on Bethlehem.

e Date and Authorship—On the origin of the Book nothing certain can be affirmed. Driver regarded the language as pre-exilic and equal to the best passages of Samuel. Neologisms and Aramaisms are few and uncertain, and the argument for late origin drawn from the author's reference to a custom 'of former times in Israel' (4:7) can hardly be decisive. The Davidic purpose and the abruptly Davidic ending of the story would indicate that it was written by a contemporary of David.

f Sacred Significance—The Book breathes a deeply religious spirit. It is a mirror of Divine Providence, a writing of great moral edification, and it forecasts the calling of the Gentiles. Though not read in the Missal or the Breviary, the names of Booz and Ruth sound in the Roman Liturgy three times each year, when St Matthew's genealogy of Christ is read; the 'Dominus vobiscum' of Booz is heard eight times in the Latin Mass; words of Noemi (1:20) express the sorrow of the Blessed Virgin in the first Responsoy of 15 September; and words of Ruth (2:13) voice sentiments of the Pure Heart of Mary in the third Responsoy of that liturgical Office.

The Go'el Question—This term is important in connexion with the relationship between Booz and Noemi and Ruth. Gō'-el is the active participle and g'ullāh the abstract noun formed from the verb gā'al. 'Redeemer' and 'Redemption' are their most usual equivalents, but the biblical use of the terms and the notion behind them must be summarily examined here. In Ruth the verb gā'al (in its participle and other active parts only) occurs twenty times, and the noun g'ullāh twice. The words do not directly denote but rather connote 'kinship', the idea inherent in the triliteral g'l being 'deliverance' (Gen 48:16). The notion of kinship comes in, because when the 'delivering' agent is not God but man, the deliverance is normally the act of a kinsman, generally the next of kin. This is in accordance with the primitive concept of family or tribal solidarity. In the Bible goelship is concerned with property, liberty and life only. The word is nowhere used of delivering a widow or her dead husband from childlessness, and consequently levirate marriage (Deut 25:5–10) is not conceived as a direct act of goelship. The vindication of the blood of a murdered relative, or of the liberty of an enslaved relative, or of the property of an expropriated relative are the objects envisaged. It is only in connexion with the liberation of property that levirate marriage, or more accurately marriage of a levitical type, is regarded more or less as an act of goelship, and that only in the Book of Ruth. In fact, the law of levirate marriage in Deut 25:5–10 does not contain the verb gā'al, but the act of levir or brother-in-law (yābām) is designated by the denominative verb in Pi'el (yibbēm): cf. Gen 38:8. We therefore conclude that the custom or law of levirate marriage was primarily concerned with the survival of families ('that the dead man's name might not be blotted out from Israel'), whereas the exercise of goelship was concerned with the vindication of a relative's blood by killing his murderer, or of a relative's liberty by buying him out of servitude, or of a relative's property by purchasing and saving it for him. (The case in Num 5:8 does not differ substantially.) It is as a vindicator of property that Booz contracts a marriage not strictly levitical but of a levitical type with Ruth.

Points of Law—Deut 23:3 excluded Moabites for ever from the community of Israel. How then could Ruth have obtained the recognition of a religious man like Booz? Undoubtedly it was as the widow of Mahalon and by reason of her own subsequent choice of the religion of Israel and—let us add—because of her virtue. Mahalon in exile did not marry Ruth in the face of any express legal prohibition, for the letter of the Mosaic law did not prohibit the taking of Moabite wives but of Canaanites only. Apart from positive law, there would be a natural objection to an Israelite-Moabite marriage, but Mahalon's long exile made marriage with a Moabitess more or less a matter of necessity.

Another question regards Elimelech's land. It is described as the property of Noemi at her return from 246f Moab. How can this be, when Num 27:9-11 seems to exclude widows from inheritance? The silence of the law (apparently positive) would indeed seem to lead to that conclusion, but we know de facto that widows did inherit their husband's property in Israel. Prov 15:25 shows God as the guardian of the widow's boundary, and the widow Judith of Bethulia possessed her dead husband's moneys and cattle and lands (Jdt 8:7 LXX).

j It may also be asked: Does the Book of Ruth 4:10 represent Booz as purchasing his wife? The answer is No. The verb qānāh means to acquire on any other title as well as that of purchase. Booz purchased Elimelech's (now Noemi's) land and thereby had a right and even a pious obligation to marry Ruth, although he was not bound by the strict law of levirate. The Moabitess entered the house of Booz in place of Noemi, who was too old to have children. Hence the Bethlehemite women, with their instinct for the reality of the case, regarded Obed as a son of Noemi. The marriage of Ruth by Booz was what the Germans call an Ersatzehe—a substitute marriage.

247a I 1-5 Emigration and Bereavement—A severe famine in the land of Israel struck Ephrata ('the Fruitful'), in which was Bethlehem ('the Home of Bread'), and compelled a family of some standing to emigrate. Precise dating is not possible, but perhaps the second half of the age of Judges is the most plausible conjecture. The names are evidently real and not symbolic. Elimelech means 'God is King', Noemi (No'mi), 'my Sweetness' or 'Delight', but Mahalon and Chelion can suggest other things besides 'Sickness' and 'Consumption'. After Elimelech's death his sons, necessity excusing, took Moabite wives, Chelion marrying Orpha ('Rich-haired', rather than 'Stiff-necked'), and Mahalon Ruth ('Friendship', rather than 'Refreshment'). Before ten years were out both men were dead.

b 6-18 Ruth's Decision—We note the disinterestedness of Noemi towards her daughters-in-law when they wished to accompany her on the way of return to the land of Judah. Their decision already reveals what a lovable mother-in-law she was. She bade them return each to her own mother's house—namely, to that portion of the women's quarters allotted to their respective mothers in their paternal homes. What Noemi wished for them was a divine requital of their kindness towards their dead husbands and herself and the 'rest' of new marriage settlements. In her second effort to dissuade them, she seems to have thought of levirate marriage (Deut 25:5) as their only hope of second wedlock in Israel. They could only expect husbands from Noemi's own body, a very forlorn hope indeed. The Vg and DV may be right in 13c, but the connexion with 13d (Heb kī) seems to require the translation: No, my daughters, I am in much worse plight than you, for the hand of the Lord has gone out against me. The alleged Aramaism lāhēn occurring twice in this verse probably represents an original lahēm: 'For them would you wait. . . .?'

Thereupon Orpha went back to her Moabite kin and to the Moabite Pantheon or simply to Chamos (Kemosh) the national god. Ruth's words of attachment to Noemi are as beautifully eloquent as they are sublimely heroic (16, 17). It was that cry of devotedness to the claims and pieties of her affinity that, under Providence, brought Ruth into the company of the θεογονάτορες, or progenitors of Christ.

c 19-22 Return to Bethlehem—Bethlehem 'rang' (LXX) or 'was stirred' at the return of Noemi. The womenfolk voiced their surprise in the rhetorical question: 'Is this that Noemi?' 'Rather call me Mara', she said, that is 'Bitter'. The word has an Aramaic ending in most MSS, but is this original or scribal? The beginning of the barley harvest was Psachal time in the month of April.

d II 1-3 Ruth Gleaning—Booz or Bo'az (etymologically, perhaps, 'Living vigour', but popularly='in him strength') is introduced at once as a rich man related by blood to Elimelech—a cousin, perhaps. Because of the poverty of Noemi, Ruth proposed to exercise her right of gleaning (Lev 19:9; 23:22; Deut 24:19) in some field where it would be accorded her with good grace. 3. Her good fortune lighted on a field of Booz who was of the sept or gens of Elimelech (Heb. mišpāhāh).

4-17 Goodness and Kindness of Booz—Booz seems to have arrived towards midday—a noble type of householder, religious, courteous, humane, generous. Note the exchange of religious salutations and his inquiry: 'To whom does this young woman belong?' The end of the overseer's answer (7c) shows textual fluctuation (Heb, LXX, Vg; Syr. omits). Joüon's emendation, though partly based on the LXX, is not entirely convincing. It reads: 'she has not rested even a little'. St Jerome's 'Not for a moment has she returned home' is unlikely. We can only guess that the overseer said: 'She has given herself little or no rest'. See also WV.

We note that Booz, an elderly man, addresses Ruth as 'Daughter' (8), and the latter's humble reply appears in Hebrew (10) an elegant turn: an expression of gratitude for 'noticing an unknown or foreign woman'—a play on the root nkr. The eulogy of Ruth by Booz (11, 12) ends poetically in the metaphor of the protecting wings of the God of Israel, and there is probably an allusion to them in the later words of Ruth to Booz (3:9): 'Spread thy wing (or protecting cloak) over thy handmaid, for thou art a gō'ēl'. Ruth's reply here (13) to the kindness of the good man should begin: 'May I (continue to) find favour in your eyes!' The simple finesse of the dialogue must be felt rather than expounded.

As Ruth obtained 'the freedom of the fields', her gleaning was very successful. Threshed with a stick, it amounted to an ephah of barley, about 8 gallons heaped measure or 1 bushel (not 3 bushels).

18-23 Return to Noemi—On receiving the news of the day, Noemi spoke words (20) which should be rendered: 'Blessed is he by the Lord who (through the action of Booz) has not failed to continue his kindness towards the living (Ruth and Noemi) and the dead (Mahalon and Elimelech)'. She added: 'The man is nearly related to us, one of our gō'īm'. This word, better left untranslated, has been explained in the introduction, and is the key to the rest of the Book. Ruth gleaned till the end of the wheat harvest, after Pentecost.

III 1-5 Noemi plans Marriage—Booz was no levir or brother-in-law, but perhaps custom had extended the ancient (Gen 38:8) and Mosaic institution (Deut 25:5) of levirate marriage to more remote kinsmen, at least as a pious obligation, especially when such a marriage was associated with the vindication of a relative's inheritance. The appeal to the goelship of Booz planned by Noemi does not seem to be a direct marriage petition but undoubtedly she saw that if Booz were to act as gō'ēl, he would take Ruth in marriage. The mode of the petition involved moral risk, but the cause was good, the means merely dangerous—not bad—the persons concerned were virtuous, and Noemi's intention was entirely praiseworthy.

6-18 Ruth's Petition—The idea of lifting the covering from the feet of Booz was that the cold should wake him. At midnight he awoke startled and turned this way and that (to observe), and behold, a woman was lying at his feet'. To his question: 'Who art thou?' she answered, 'I am Ruth, thy handmaid: spread thy wing over thy handmaid, for thou art a gō'ēl'. In itself the gesture of spreading the skirt of the cloak over Ruth would only signify a kinsman's protection, but in the circumstances it was equivalent to a promise of marriage. Booz saw that it was devotedness to the obligations of kinship that prompted Ruth's petition, and he conceived his goelship as including the taking of Ruth as his wife. It is here (12, 13) that the vindication of a property (which Booz undoubtedly had in mind, as the sequel shows) becomes the vindication of a 2471 widow. Verse 13, in which the affixed pronoun is the object of gā'al three times over, may be translated: 'If he (who is a nearer gō'el) claims thee, let him make his claim; but if he does not claim thee, I will claim thee'. (Cf. Jöüon and his note; Kennedy, Gō'el (HDB) cites Driver as making 'claim' the basic meaning of gā'al. Our lexical knowledge of the word is not very perfect, since it does not occur in the cognate languages, except in Samaritan Aramaic—perhaps as a Hebrew loan-word.)

The 'six of barley' which Ruth took home (15) should probably be computed as 6 s'tm, i.e. 16 gallons or 2 bushels.

j IV 1-12 Transaction at the Gate—At the gate, the place of legal business, Booz calls the gō'el by name, but the author of our book substitutes an indefinite So-and-So. In the presence of 10 'aldermen' witnesses, Booz announces as interpreter of Noemi's intention that she is selling a property of Elimelech's. First preference as buyer belonged to So-and-So, as next of kin. He was willing. Booz points out that in buying from Noemi, he must also take Ruth, Mahalon's widow, to provide an heir for the property. 5 should be rendered: 'On the day thou takest (by purchase) the field from the hand of Noemi, Ruth also the Moabitess, the wife of the dead man, thou takest (therewith), to raise up the name of the dead on his inheritance'. The gō'el then declined, because the transaction would involve loss of purchase money to himself and his family. The cession of right to Booz had to be ratified by the ceremonial handing of a shoe (7), the shoe being the symbol of possession (Ps 59:10), as a head-covering is of authority. This ceremony, which had to some extent passed into desuetude when our book was written, is altogether distinct from the penal procedure of Deut 25:9. 247j

Having solemnly witnessed the contract, both elders and people wished Booz all happiness with Ruth. Though only broadly equivalent to the Hebrew, St Jerome's version of their acclamation is very good. The Bethlehemite colour of the wish and its point in regard to the present event is heightened by evoking the memory of the house of Phares, for Phares was the son of levirate marriage, and the Bethlehemites were his descendants.

13-17 Birth of Obed—The marriage was blessed with offspring. The congratulations of the women go to Noemi, for the son of Ruth is to secure the succession of Elimelech's family. The boy shall be the comfort of her old age, and Ruth has proved and shall prove better to her than seven sons (any number, cf. 1 Kg 1:8). Noemi took the child as her own and nursed him. At the suggestion of the neighbours (cf. Lk 1:59) his name was called Obed, 'One who serves', i.e. 'Servant (of God)' or 'Deicola', rather than 'Servant of Noemi'. He was David's grandfather. k

18-22 David's Genealogy—From Phares to David inclusive there are only ten names, grouped apparently as 5 + 5. It is not a complete list. With special mention of the wives of Salmon and Booz, namely Rahab and Ruth, it has the signal honour of finding its place in the genealogy which ends with the words: 'Jacob begot Joseph the husband of Mary, and of her was born Jesus who is called Christ'. l b Title—It is clear from the writings of Origen, Eusebius, Cyril of Alexandria, and Jerome that the first two books of Kings were reckoned under the one title Book of Samuel in the Hebrew Canon. This agrees with the division adopted by the Talmud (Baba Bathra, 14a). The LXX translators of the Book of Samuel divided it and the following books of Kings into four books under the general title Books of the Kingdom. The Vg accepted this division, but substituted 'Books of Kings' for the LXX title. Eventually this division found its way into the Rabbinical Hebrew Bible of Bomberg published at Venice in 1516. By way of compromise with the Hebrew Canon, this edition retained the title Books of Samuel for 1 and 2 Kg. This title does not denote authorship, but focuses attention on one of the principal characters in the early chapters of the book.

c Contents—1 and 2 Kg are a continuation of the history of Israel described in the book of Judges and stand in an even closer connexion with the events narrated in 3 and 4 Kg. They cover a period of transition and development in which the common religion and the common race of Israel were welded into a single centralized State under the monarchy. This transition and development are crystallized round the persons of Samuel, Saul and David. In this way we are given a rough plan of the general contents of the books themselves. The following is a general analysis of the books, but we have adopted a more detailed subdivision in the actual text of the commentary: Samuel, 1 Kg 1–15; Saul and David, 1 Kg 16–2 Kg 1; David, 2 Kg 2–24.

d Composition—Literary criticism beginning with J. G. Eichorn (Eintl. II. Teil, 450 ff.) has been engaged on the problem of the composition of these books since 1790. Yet there has been no solution to the problem of 'sources' such as might win the unanimous approval of Catholic and non-Catholic scholars alike. There has been the usual tendency to analyse these books into various literary strata, redactions, interpolations, duplicate accounts, and fragmentary sources. Their present unity is ascribed to the 'harmonizing' influence of subsequent editors. Following the lead given by *K. Budde (Die Bücher Samuels, Tübingen, 1902), many authors assume that the sources E and J which they claim for the Pentateuch are continued in Kg. An early editor is held to have combined these two sources into one book and later influences of a Deuteronomistic and Priestly-Codex group to have modified the whole work to a considerable extent. To these *O. Eissfeldt adds the source L. This is in keeping with his views on the composition of the Hexateuch; cf. Die Komposition der Samuelisbücher, Leipzig, 1931. Opposition to this claim for Pentateuchal sources comes not only from Catholic but also from non-Catholic authors such as H. Gressmann (Die älteste Geschichtsschreibung und Prophetie Israels, Göttingen, 1921²); W. Caspari (Kommentar z.A.T. herausg. von Sellin, Leipzig, 1926); and J. O. Boyd, art. 'Monarchy in Israel' in the Princeton Theol. Rev. 26 (1928) 42 ff. Much of this literary criticism is of the highest value and can be utilized by the Catholic scholar as a permanent contribution to biblical science. However, a considerable part of it is vitiated by an arbitrary application of the analytical method, by prejudices against anything supernatural, and by a subjective approach to the problems that casts doubts on the truth of Scripture and is quite incompatible with Catholic teaching on the nature and effects of inspiration.

Most modern Catholic authorities admit that some theory of sources must be adopted in solving the literary difficulties presented by 1 and 2 Kg. This is the conviction of writers like J. Schäfers, K. Leimbach, A. Schulz, N. Schlögl, and G. Ricciotti. They safeguard their historicity and for the most part admit that such sources were ultimately based upon the accounts provided by Samuel, Gad, Nathan, the Royal Archives and other documents indicated in the Scriptures themselves; cf. § 224d. According to Schäfers there are two independent sources in chh 8–12. These are called M(ispa), 8 and 10:17–27, and G(ilgal), 9 and 10:1–16; Chh 13–15 also belong to G. A later editor is considered responsible for 13:19–23; 14:47–51. Ch 13:7b–15b is thought to be an interpolated fragment from a traditional account of Saul's rejection. Schulz admits that it is extremely difficult to dissect the various sources incorporated in our present text, and still more difficult to determine their precise authorship and dating. M and G, he thinks, are found in a combined form in 7:2–12:25 and reappear in patches in other parts of the books. The G source originated in the last years of David's reign and the M source was composed during Solomon's time and both were welded into one about this same period. Then for many centuries interpolations, additions, and subsequent editing played their part in giving us our text in its present form. However, a careful reading of the many specialized and general studies published on this subject will reveal that no completely definitive solution has been made so far. In spite of this, it is well to remember that modern scholarship is practically unanimous in holding that these books provide us with contemporary material that is of the highest historical value. This is confirmed not only by the sincerity, perfect simplicity, and graphic minuteness of the accounts themselves, but also by extra-biblical sources which throw light on the social, political, and religious background of Palestine at the time of the early kings of Israel.

Date of Composition—These books were obviously 1

248f written some time after the events they narrate. That is clear from the explanation of obsolete terms (1 Kg 9:9) and customs (2 Kg 13-18). There are also indications that the work was completed after the separation of the two kingdoms in the reign of Roboam. The expression 'kings of Juda' (1 Kg 27:6) presupposes this. It is impossible to say more than that these books were composed some time after the separation of the two kingdoms and some time before the end of the exile. The identity of the author is uncertain.

g Text—Our modern MT leaves much to be desired, and the Hebrew MSS which give variant readings are not of much help in establishing a reliable critical text. Fortunately great assistance is given to the textual critic by the older versions, among which the LXX is facile princeps. The various recensions of this version are divided into two important groups—those based on the Codex Vaticanus (B) and those based on the Codex Alexandrinus (A). St Jerome's Vg follows the MT fairly closely. These together with a few readings from the Old Latin version are the chief materials at our service for the restoration of the text.

h Religious Significance—Few books in the OT can rival 1 and 2 Kgs for strong emotion and dramatic action. The reader is almost compelled to see with his own eyes the more important scenes in this stirring epoch of Israel's history. Through vivid dialogues and graphic detail he is admitted into the counsels of kings, prophets, and warriors. Throughout the book he meets with saints, sinners, 'spoilt' sons, brave men, cripples, scheming women, devoted mothers, noble friends, and traitors. Life and human nature are presented with a realism which makes these narratives invaluable guides to all who would know the soul of man and the eternal background which is the horizon of life. The selection of the incidents and prominence given to the personal element reveal the religious and moral purpose which inspired the author of these early chronicles. The author is not merely writing history: he is interpreting it, so that the vital truths which it illustrates stand out in clear relief. In addition to this wealth of moral instruction these books are of great importance for the study of God's progressive revelation in the OT.

i During the period of the Judges the religion and culture of the Canaanites, the internal discord among the scattered tribes, and external oppression and invasion had reduced the political and religious ideals of Israel to a very low level. At this juncture the cumulative effect of the events associated with the institution of the Hebrew monarchy caused a revival of Israel's national faith. In the first place religion profoundly influenced the whole character and institution of the monarchy itself. Secondly we can note the contemporary repercussions of this on the religious life of the nation, and lastly view its relation to the future and abiding Messianic Kingship of Christ.

j (A) The old theocracy was still at work under a new form. This is seen in the divine sanction manifested in the method of election by lot, which left the designation of the candidate in the hands of God, and in the sacred rite of anointing. This rite was used under divine inspiration and administered by God's representative to inculcate the sacred character of the chosen king and to set the seal of divine blessing on his reign. It underlined the principle that this human deputy was to be king of God's grace and in some measure in God's stead, not as the rival but as the visible reflection of God's sovereignty. He must rule in God's name, by God's spirit, for God's purpose. Pagan kings were sometimes considered to sit on the throne of their deities, and were even regarded as incarnations of their gods. This was impossible in the real monotheistic theocracy; yet so closely was the Hebrew king united to Yahweh, that he bore the exalted title of 'son of God' (2 Kg 7:14) to signify God's fatherly care of him. The sacred sonship of the nation now culminated in the unique sonship of the king. It is worth remembering that the first personal confession of faith noted by St John unites the dignity of sonship and royalty together: 'Rabbi Thou art the Son of God, Thou art the King of Israel' Jn 1:49.

(B) It is not without significance that we know more of David than of most other OT characters. His intense personality with all its faults has impressed the minds of Hebrews and Christians alike. But it is by his religious contribution to the world that his work has proved most enduring. His passionate loyalty to Yahweh and his zeal for Yahweh's glory revived the religious enthusiasm of his people. In making Jerusalem the city of David and dwelling-place of Yahweh's glory, in giving the riches of his psalms to his nation, in striving for the building of the Temple after the humiliations of previous centuries, he gave the Hebrews a new lease of religious fervour. Indeed some scholars like *Winckler (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, 1, 38), *Beer (Saul, David, Salomo, 1, 41), and *P. Haupt in his article 'Midian und Sinai', ZDMG (1909) 506 ff., exaggerate this influence. They believe that until David's time, Yahweh had been nothing more than a local god of thunder worshipped in the north of Canaan. He became the national God of Israel only after David had the Ark brought to Mount Sion. Until that time there was religious disunion between the north and south with two rival centres of worship—the one in the north kept the Ark, while the south clung to the Tabernacle as its centre. This theory not only contradicts what we know of monotheism in Israel in pre-Davidic time (cf. *König, Geschichte der Alttest. Religion, Gütersloh, 1924, 335 f.), it fails to give convincing evidence of this religious disunion based on the distinction between Ark and Tabernacle. The fact is that the Tabernacle, from Josue to Saul, was first at Galgal in Ephraimite territory (Jos 4:19; 9:6; 10:6 f.), then at Shiloh in a predominantly Canaanite region (Jos 18:1; Jg 18:31; 21:19). During Saul's reign it was kept in Nob, a priestly city of the tribe of Benjamin, whereas under David it was at Gabaon until the building of the Temple (1 Par 16:39; 21:29; 2 Par 1:3). These changes from town to town up and down the country would hardly have been possible if Yahweh had not been recognized as the God of the whole of Israel before David's day. What we can say is that it was David's great achievement to have founded an earthly kingdom which won the support of both priest and prophet, and which was so suffused by his deep religious spirit that it was seen to be the earthly expression and willing instrument of Yahweh's kingdom. In a word, it was more than a preparation for, it was the imperfect embodiment of something that was destined to raise men's minds to thoughts of God's everlasting kingdom.

(C) Much of David's work was swept away by the events of later history. The nation was split politically in two and at last even Judah lost her independence. But the abiding spiritual glory of his dynasty was part of Yahweh's sure mercies to David. From that Davidic line would arise the Great King, the Supreme High Priest, the greatest of the Prophets. After David's reign it is possible to draw a line through the Messianic teaching of the prophets and see that only a Davidic king in whom all the energies of Yahweh's transcendental kingship had become incarnate could be worthy of the everlasting kingdom of Yahweh's anointed; cf. Is 9:6; 11:1 ff.; Jer 23:5; Ez 34:24-26. When the prophets paint the picture of the future kingdom they are led by God's irrevocable oath to David to use the colours of the past. In the fullness of time what many kings and prophets desired to see came to pass. One whom David called his 'Lord' was born in the city of David and of his kingdom there is no end.

THE FIRST BOOK OF KINGS

I-III Birth, Dedication, and Prophetic Call of Samuel— 249a Anna, the Elizabeth of the OT, is the childless wife of Elcana. When her prayer for a son is heard, she dedicates him to the service of Yahweh in the sanctuary

249a at Shiloh. In contrast to the corrupt sons of the High Priest Heli, this boy Samuel grows in grace before God and man. God summons him to be his special prophet and gives him as the burden of his first prophecy the doom threatening the house of Heli.

b 1:1 The name Ramathaim means 'Two Heights'. The district of Sophim was probably called after Elcana's ancestors, cf. 1 Par 6:26. Mount Ephraim gives the impression of a single mountain. What is meant is the mountainous district of Ephraim. Probably the modern village of El Ram occupies the site of Ramatha. It lies about five miles north of Jerusalem, just east of the highroad to Ramallah, and it was at Ramatha that Samuel was born, lived and was buried. 2. Elcana had two wives in accordance with the custom tolerated by the Mosaic law (Deut 21:15-17). Anna means 'Grace' and Phenenna means 'Pearl'—the equivalent of our 'Margaret'. 3. 'Upon the appointed days': MT has 'year by year', or lit. 'from time to time'. The Law commanded every male to appear before the Lord three times in the year at the central sanctuary (Ex 34:23; Deut 16:16). Shiloh: At this period there were some other minor sanctuaries, e.g. at Shechem, Galgala, Gabaon, Hebron, but Shiloh had a unique prestige. It was central and in the heart of the powerful tribe of Ephraim, and above all it had the Ark of Yahweh which implied the special presence of God. Thus it became the political and religious capital of the nation. Many obstacles stood in the way of the strict and literal observance of the Mosaic law (Deut 12:4-28) on the centralization of worship. The sporadic nature of the conquest, the dispersal of the tribes, and the lawless state of affairs during the period of the Judges, all militated against the ideal of a single centre of divine worship. But it is well to remember that the non-observance of a law does not mean its non-existence. Shiloh was the nearest practical approach to the ideal under the circumstances. It now corresponds to the site called Khirbet Seilun. 4. 'the day came': the time for appearing at the sanctuary. 5. 'One portion': part of the sacrifice consumed by the worshipper and his family. Like Sarah, Rebecca, and Rachel, Anna had to suffer the shame of being childless before she became the mother of an illustrious son. 6. 'her rival': the cruel scorn of Phenenna ruined the happy atmosphere of the feast. 7. Anna was so upset with grief that she refused to share in the sacrificial meal which was the climax of the religious celebration.

d 9-18 Anna's Prayer and Vow—9 'Anna arose': LXX 'she rose after she had eaten and stood before Yahweh'. Heli sat watching her from his seat at the gateway of the sanctuary. He was a descendant of Ithamar, the younger of the two surviving sons of Aaron. Originally the high-priesthood was in the family of Eleazar, the elder of Aaron's two surviving sons. We are not told how this office was transferred to the family of Ithamar to which Heli belonged. Officially he was both High Priest and Judge, but he lacked the greatness of a Gedeon or a Deborah. We see him only in his old age, a man of mediocre ability and without any power of vigorous leadership. He was incapable of inspiring the fire of religious or political enthusiasm. Most of the active duties of his priestly office seem to have been handed over to his two sons with disastrous consequences. His affection and care for Samuel show that he was not without a spirit of benevolence and kindness, yet his whole character suffered from moral weakness. Hence his sinful leniency in dealing with the scandalous conduct of his two sons. On the whole, in his own passive and ineffectual way he was devoted to Yahweh. 11. 'Look down on the affliction of thy handmaid': LXX has 'the lowliness of thy handmaid'—the words used by our Lady in her Magnificat. 'I will give him': like Samson her child would be a life-long Nazarite with the characteristic long, unshaven hair, symbolizing the complete dedication of the whole man with all his powers to Yahweh. 16. 'daughters of Belial': no satisfactory Heb. derivation of the word Belial has been found. It may have been a foreign importation and in NT times was used of Satan. Here the phrase means: 'I am not a disreputable woman.'

19-28 Samuel's Birth and Consecration—The child of prayer was born and given the name Samuel. While still a child he was brought to the sanctuary of Shiloh in fulfilment of his mother's vow. 20. 'Samuel': the Heb. name 'Shemuel' is connected here with the verb š'al 'to ask' and according to this popular etymology his name means 'Asked of God'. This is grammatically untenable for it does not account for the mem in the middle of the name. Some authors suggest other possible meanings based upon the Heb. text—'Heard of God' and 'His name is God', i.e. 'Yahweh is God'. 21. 'his vow': this assumes that Elcana had made some vow similar to that of Anna. 22. 'till the child be weaned': in the east this might mean until the boy was two to three years old. Yahweh's sanctuary and its sacred associations were to be the earliest memories in the child's mind. 23. 'his word': Elcana prays that Anna's hopes for Samuel's future may receive complete fulfilment. LXX, 'The Lord establish that which has gone forth from thy mouth'.

II:1-10 Anna's Hymn of Thanksgiving—This is sometimes called 'the Magnificat of the OT'. Both Mary's song and Anna's canticle are poetry and prophecy. St Luke's narrative (Lk 1:46-55) shows how deeply Anna's words had affected our Lady's mind. But when they pass through her soul, they catch something of the fragrance of her personality and are clothed with her own quiet restraint and selfless humility. In the present context, the leading idea seems to be the praise of Yahweh who has given deliverance to Anna. The proud and boastful must be silent before him, for he weighs all their thoughts and actions. In his sovereign government of the world he can reverse the positions of weak and strong, mighty and lowly. This great moral principle of his rule will receive its complete fulfilment in the judgement of the world and the exaltation of Yahweh's anointed King.

1. 'My horn is exalted': a symbol drawn from animals tossing their heads in the air as in pride. 2. 'strong like our God': MT has 'there is no rock like our God'—a frequent metaphor describing the strength, solidity and unchangeableness of Yahweh's care which meets the needs of the weak and fickle souls of men. 3. 'let old matters depart': better 'let not insolence or arrogance come forth from your mouth'; 'are thoughts prepared': the hidden springs of man's actions are weighed and estimated at their true worth. 4. This knowledge and justice of God are often vindicated in the lives of individuals such as Anna, and receive their fullest justification in the ultimate triumph of Christ and his Church. 5. 'the hungry are filled': by a slight alteration of the text we can read: 'have ceased to labour', and this gives us a perfect antithesis to the rich being forced to hire themselves for bread. 8. 'dunghill': the mound of rubbish accumulating near an oriental town. Beggars often spend the night on it in default of a lodging. 'the poles of the earth... set the world': omitted by LXX which has 'granting his petition to him that prays and blesses the years of the just'. 9. 'silent in darkness': perish. 10. 'exalt the horn of his Christ': the thought of God's judgement leads to the thought of the ministers and instruments of that judgement. It dwells first on its partial fulfilment in the future monarchy and its complete fulfilment in the Perfect Anointed One of Yahweh. This is the first time the word 'Messias' occurs in Scripture. There may be an allusion to this verse in the Benedictus of Zachary (Lk 1:69 f.). 11. A study of the LXX readings will show that the original text had: 'She left him there before Yahweh and went to Ramatha; but the boy ministered to Yahweh in the presence of Heli the priest'.

12-26 The Unworthy Priests of Shiloh—The evil conduct of Heli's sons is set forth in vivid contrast to the faithful ministry of Samuel. As they fall into open profligacy, he grows in grace before God and man.

249 They are 'sons of Belial', i.e. degraded men. They lack the basis of all true religion, knowledge of Yahweh (cf. Os 4:1; 6:9), and being ignorant of his character, they completely misunderstand their obligations to him and to his people. Their sin was twofold: (i) They robbed the people by taking more than their share of the sacrifice allotted to them by law. (ii) Between the offering and the burning of the sacrifice they intervened to procure 'raw flesh', thus interrupting and profaning the offering made to Yahweh. Their father rebuked their conduct in vain. In these same sacred surroundings where the sons of Heli degenerated into criminals we can note three stages in Samuel's growth: his physical growth, 18, which his mother must have observed during her yearly visits to Shiloh; his moral growth, 26, as his conduct won the approval of Yahweh and his people; his spiritual growth, 3:19-21, when the revelation of Yahweh set him apart as God's prophet to the nation. 18. 'linen ephod': there are three kinds of ephod mentioned in the OT. The special ephod worn by the high-priest (Ex 28:6 ff.), the garment worn by priests and occasionally by others taking part in religious ceremonies (22:18; 2 Kg 6:14), and lastly, the ephod which was some kind of liturgical object used to discover the divine will (Jg 8:27). 19. 'a little coat': the Heb. word me'il is used of a kind of upper garment worn by people of eminence. 20. 'Blessed . . . said . . . went': the Heb. suggests an action often repeated or customary. 25. 'who shall pray for him': the crimes of Heli's sons were sacrileges against God whom sacrifices were meant to placate and not to outrage. 'the Lord would slay them': only extraordinary graces would triumph over their evil dispositions, and their impenitent wickedness was making them more and more unworthy of being saved from the punishments God had in store for them; cf. Rom 9:18.

k 27-36 Rejection of Heli's House—27. 'a man of God': a title given to messengers of God such as Moses, Samuel, Elias. This unknown prophet's questions are merely emphatic ways of making statements. 'in the house of Pharaoh': LXX 'in slavery to Pharaoh's house'. 29. 'kicked': treated with dishonour. Klostermann and others give provisional reconstruction of the MT to make it agree with the LXX, which has 'look upon with an evil eye'. The meaning is much the same. 30. 'But now saith the Lord': God had promised the house of Aaron and all its branches that they should be the ministers of his sanctuary; but now the decree has been reversed on account of the outrageous conduct of Heli's sons. 31. 'Cut off thy arm': i.e. destroy thy strength. LXX applies the threat to Heli's 'seed'. At least a partial fulfilment of this warning can be seen in the slaughter of the priests at Nob (22:18 f.). 32. 'thy rival': in the person of his posterity, when Israel would be most prosperous, Heli would see the priesthood pass into another family. A reference to the deposition of Abiathar under Solomon (3 Kg 2:27). 34. 'a sign to thee': the certain fulfilment of the one prediction will be a terrible guarantee of the fulfilment of the remainder. 35. 'a faithful priest': most commentators see in this a reference to Sadoc whose posterity remained in office till the end of the monarchy (1 Par 6:8), and the phrase 'before my anointed' evidently presupposes the existence of the monarchy. 36. 'to somewhat of the priestly office': the descendants of Heli will be reduced to the state of clerical beggars, anxious to share in the most menial services of the sanctuary to earn enough to keep them alive.

250a III:1-21 Call of Samuel and approaching Doom of Heli's House—1. 'was precious': to emphasize the significance of Samuel's prophetic call, the author shows that in the degenerate days of Heli, there were few revelations made to Israel through God's prophets. 3. 'Before the lamp of God': this sanctuary lamp was lit every night and burned till morning (Ex 27:20). Samuel's vision must therefore have been some time before daybreak. 'slept in the temple': the sanctuary of Shiloh is called 'temple' as in 1:9. Samuel did not sleep literally inside the 'temple' but in some room near the Ark. 7. 'did not yet know the Lord': he knew him like every pious Israelite, but not by any personal revelation. 11. 'both his ears shall tingle': i.e. as if they had been struck by a sudden blow. This is a phrase used by Jer 19:3, who also compares the destruction of Jerusalem to the destruction of Shiloh (Jer 26:6). 12. 'I will begin': not a single detail of God's punishments will be omitted—his threats will be carried out to the very end. 13. 'did not chastise them': he did rebuke them, but failed to remove them from those priestly functions which were the occasions of their sins. In this he failed as father, high-priest, and Judge of Israel. 17. 'May God do so and so': Samuel shrank from wounding one he loved and revered, and Heli adjures him by oath to tell everything. This formula is found only in the Books of Kings and Ruth. It may come from the ceremony of slaying a victim when an oath was taken, in which the parties prayed that the fate of the victim might be theirs, if their oath was broken. 18. 'It is the Lord': when it is too late to do God's will, Heli at least loyally resigns himself to it. 19. 'Not one of his words fell': God ratified and authenticated his prophetic mission to Israel, so that his words were recognized to be true. 20. 'from Dan to Bersabee': from the most northerly town in Israel to Bersabee (Beersheba) in the extreme south, i.e. the whole country accepted Samuel as the accredited prophet of Yahweh.

IV 1-22 War with the Philistines—This is the first mention of the Philistines in the Bks of Kg. They were already well known in the Aegean world, including the coasts of Asia Minor, and attempted a landing on the Egyptian coast as early as 1190 B.C., at the time of Rameses III. Some of them seem to have entered the Egyptian imperial service and were used to garrison strategic points along the coast of Palestine, over which Egypt still claimed to exercise formal suzerainty. For more detailed information about their relation to Egypt and Palestine as well as the problem of their early origins, cf. *Garstang, Joshua Judges (London, 1931, 284, 311 ff.), and *W. J. Phythian-Adams, 'Philistine Origins' in BBSAJ Bulletin No. 3 (1923) 20 ff. In the small land of Palestine, it was almost inevitable that the two great waves of Philistine and Hebrew immigration should come into conflict.

3. 'Let us fetch . . . the ark': In Num 10:35 we read that the Ark was carried in battle and the same was true at the siege of Jericho (Jos 3:4). On this occasion a false and mechanical trust in the material presence of the Ark was disastrous. There was a similar false trust in the Temple in the days of Jeremias (Jer 7:4). 4. 'The two sons of Heli': mentioned here because their fate is involved in that of the Ark. 6. 'Hebrews': they are called Hebrews here as is generally the case when foreigners speak of the Israelites (29:3) or when Israelites were contrasted with foreigners (13:7). 13. 'Heli sat upon a stool': LXX 'Sat by the gate watching the road'—probably the gate of the sanctuary as in 1:9. 18. 'when he named the Ark of God': defeat, slaughter, personal bereavement mounted up into the unbearable climax—the Ark of God is taken. 21. 'Ichabod': 'Without glory', for the visible sign of God's presence in Israel had gone leaving them in darkness and despair—a fitting name for the son of the man chiefly responsible for the disaster.

V:1-12 The Ark among the Philistines—1. Azotus was one of the five cities of the Philistine confederation. Two others are mentioned later, Geth, 8, and Accaron, 10. 2. Dagon was the favourite Philistine god (Jg 16:23). If the name has a Semitic root, it may mean 'corn'. The fertile land of Philistia would fit the idea of worshipping a 'corn-god'. 6. 'afflicted Azotus': not only was their national god humiliated before Yahweh, but the people also suffered from emeralds or boils and possibly from an outbreak of something like our bubonic plague. 8. 'lords of the Philistines': the 250d chiefs of the five Philistine cities, though enjoying independent authority over their own districts, were united in a defensive and offensive alliance. They set up a combined council of state to meet the emergency which had arisen. Their official title of 'Seren' is preserved in the MT.

e VI:1-VII:1 Return of the Ark—The epidemic of disease in the Philistine cities due to the presence of the Ark struck the Philistines with panic. At first they were determined to keep this great trophy of victory at all costs within their own territory, but the scourge of Yahweh's wrath impelled them to send it away with votive offerings of appeasement.

f 1. 'in the land of the Philistines': LXX adds 'their land swarmed with mice'. 3. 'empty': they must make some compensating offering for the infringement of Yahweh's rights. 5. 'golden mice': Hitzig, Wellhausen, and Dhorme agree against Smith that these golden mice were symbols of the pestilence. Smith says there is no analogous Hebrew case. But it is a question of finding analogies amongst other heathen people, and there is abundant evidence for this kind of practice (cf. Dhorme, 59). 7. 'shut up their calves': the natural instinct of cattle would make them stay with their calves. If they went away over the Israelite frontier, it would be a sign of some over-riding divine compulsion. 12. Bethsames: the site of Bethshemesh is now identified with the modern mound of Ain-Shems in the vale of Sorec, and as its name implies, it was a centre of sun-worship. 19. 'he slew of the men of Bethsames': as it stands the text suggests that the mere looking at the Ark was a profanation punishable by death. Certainly all irreverent curiosity about the Ark was strictly forbidden (cf. Num 4:19f.). More probably in this case the real reason is stated in the LXX text: 'The sons of Jeconias rejoiced not with the men of Bethshemesh when they saw the Ark'. Through lack of all religious feeling, they did not enter into the spirit of rejoicing which the Bethsamites displayed and were punished for their apathy. 'fifty thousand' obviously a gloss based on a corrupt text. LXX has 'seventy'. 20. 'this holy God': different aspects of the divine nature are expressed in the Bible by the word 'holy'. Here it means that God's transcendent majesty and zeal for his honour are the objects of man's awestruck adoration, before which he is convicted of sin. 21. Cariathiarim: 'city of forests'—a town some nine miles north of Bethshemesh, near the modern village of Qaryat el-Enab. Here the Ark remained for twenty years till removed to Jerusalem by David. The fact that no attempt was made to send it to Shiloh seems to imply that Shiloh had already been destroyed by the Philistines; cf. P. Nagle, 'De prima Siluntis destructione effossionibus recentibus illustrata' in Antoniarum 6 (1931) 401-416. Cariathiarim had a large Canaanite population and could be regarded by the Philistines as neutral territory. The Philistines would be satisfied with preventing the rebuilding of Shiloh as a sanctuary for what they considered to be the symbol of their victory over the Israelites. In this way the Ark fell into comparative obscurity and explains why Saul and Samuel seem to have had little to do with it during this period. VII:1. 'they sanctified Eleazar': they set him apart to be keeper of the Ark.

251a VII:2-17 Samuel as Reformer and Liberator—During this period of national disgrace Samuel was not idle. He acted as Judge in the political sphere and as Levite in the work of religious reformation. By defeat and oppression Israel's self-confidence had been shattered and its trust in Yahweh was at a dangerously low ebb. The mass of the people were preoccupied with problems of personal security and the necessities of daily life. They began to turn to the local cults of Baal and Astaroth who were the heathen patrons of bountiful harvests and abundant flocks. Their allegiance to Yahweh became divided and debased by idolatrous practices and other forms of religious syncretism. To counteract this Samuel strove to pro-

251a mote the pure worship of Yahweh and build up the political reorganization of Israel. This work led to a religious revival and the defeat of the Philistines at Eben ha-ezer.

2. 'Israel rested': MT has: 'mourned after the Lord'. The idea may be that Israel, like some wilful child whom its father has punished, kept following after God with tears of repentance and a longing for reconciliation. 3. 'Baalim and Astaroth': the principal heathen gods and goddesses worshipped in Canaan. 5. Masphath (Mizpah): 'The Watch-Tower'. Its conjectured site is Nebi Samwil, on a mountain some five miles north-west of Jerusalem. It was suitable for religious gatherings and concentration of troops. 'I may pray for you': Samuel was a child of prayer and a man of prayer. He is linked with Moses himself as an example of powerful intercessory prayer (cf. Ps 98:6; Jer 15:1). 6. 'poured it out before the Lord': no exact parallel to this rite can be found in the OT; but it must have symbolized, as the Targum points out, the outpouring of their hearts in repentance (cf. Lam 2:19). 'judged': acted as chief religious and civil magistrate. 7. 'Philistines heard': they suspected a rising and determined to crush it at once. This would be easy, because the Israelites at their religious gathering were probably unarmed. 10. 'they were overthrown': the sequel to Samuel's prayer and sacrifice showed that it was Yahweh who overthrew them; the Israelites merely completed the rout. 13. 'did not come any more': i.e. during Samuel's personal rule as Judge. It is not applicable to the period of the monarchy. 14. Amorrites were among the old native inhabitants of Canaan. 15. 'all the days of his life': must be understood in a qualified sense, for he appointed his sons judges, and Saul was king before Samuel's death. It claims that he always enjoyed great influence and authority in all civil and religious matters affecting the nation. 'aforesaid places': they are all within a twenty-mile radius from Jerusalem.

VIII:1-22 The Demand for a King—Hitherto Israel e had been a theocracy pure and simple. God was its Invisible King. Yet the idea of human kingship in some form was not excluded completely from divine revelation. In Deut 17:14-20 we have the Law of the King. Junker (Das Buch Deuteronomium, Bonn, 1933, 81) and others consider that this text in its present form has been re-edited by a later scribe in the light of the actual history of the monarchy, but some of its substantial features may belong to a much earlier period. However in actual practice God did not raise up kings but exceptional individuals called judges to act as his instruments of deliverance and administration in times of crisis. Meanwhile various political crises, and the silent social revolution which followed the conquest of Canaan, were straining the religious fabric of the theocracy. Until things reached their breaking point in Samuel's day, the national consciousness of Yahweh's immediate kingly sway neutralized the abortive attempt at human kingship which took place under Gideon.

Samuel himself must have felt the need of stability and permanence, for his appointment of his sons as judges was a break with tradition. It was a semi-concession to the new ideas that were gaining ground amongst the people. Once that compromise broke down through his sons' venality, and the Philistine menace reappeared, something had to be done. The less conservative Israelites were convinced that the only alternative to political anarchy was to set up a properly constituted monarchy. In their eyes there could be no via media. Hence their demand for a king such as other nations had. The whole tone of their demand, the ideal they had formed of their type of king—like that of other nations—showed a purely earthly concept of the inner spirit and privileges of the theocracy. Those who made it implicitly voiced their weariness with theocratic government, as if the pressing calamities were the result not of their own faithlessness to God, but of some flaw in God's rule. Their attitude was a d Apart from his own personal feelings in the matter, it was enough to fill Samuel's mind with forebodings, and many a far-sighted patriot must have shared his misgivings. Egypt, Edom, Moab, Assyria, and other nations round Israel had monarchic government. Their worldly prosperity and military efficiency were often the product of violence and despotism, which would be directly opposed to the sturdy independent spirit of the Israelite tribes. It seemed the height of imprudence and ingratitude to overthrow the traditional form of government and embark unreservedly upon a convertible experiment at a critical moment in their history. If Moses could make them a great nation without becoming king, there was nothing to prevent Yahweh from renewing his past mercies to Israel, provided they sought the solution of their difficulties in loyalty to his rule instead of dabbling in new systems of government. Samuel therefore gave the people one last warning. A king would claim the rights of a typical oriental despot. He would dispose of their property, conscript them for forced labour, and levy excessive taxes (cf. 1 Kg 22:7, 17; 3 Kg 21:1-16; 5:13-18; 12:4 for instances where such abuses eventually happened). Political and social freedom could hardly survive in such an atmosphere.

This sombre account of the institution of the monarchy must have expressed the feelings of those Hebrews who viewed the kingship with disfavour. Probably later redactors who witnessed the melancholy tragedies of so many kings gave additional emphasis to the accounts, especially in 8:1-22 and 10:17-24. On the other hand chh 9-10:16 adopt a more favourable view of Israelite kingship. Naturally these political preferences are likely to have had a double repercussion on the sacred narratives. Yet it must not be forgotten that this double view of the monarchy expresses more than the respective preferences of later writers—it expresses something that was inherent in the historical situation itself (cf. Ricciotti, Storia d'Israele 1, 320 f.). In the end God gave them a king, but not kingship incompatible with the very nature of the theocracy. The divine sanction is seen in the method of election by lot which left the designation of the candidate in the hands of God, and in the other sacred ceremonies, especially of anointing, which hallowed the kingdom as the medium through which the mercy-covenant of Yahweh could still attain its ends.

e 2. Joel: 'Yahweh is God'. Abia: 'Yahweh is my father'. 4. 'elders': the official spokesmen of the people; it was therefore an official deputation to Samuel, not simply a matter of popular outcry.

252a IX:1-26 The Meeting of Saul and Samuel—A providential meeting of the two men who held the key to the national crisis of their day. Saul, son of Cis, of the small and warlike tribe of Benjamin, was searching for some lost donkeys. Samuel who is mentally searching for the nation's future leader, meets him at a sacrificial meal at Ramath and arouses Saul's mind to thoughts of a higher destiny.

b 2. Saul: Heb. Šā'ul—'Asked', i.e. of God. Between Saul in the OT and Saul in the NT (Ac 7:57) this name became the most outstanding in the history of the tribe of Benjamin. Unlike Saul of the NT (cf. 2 Cor 10:10) the OT Saul had a very impressive presence—he looked every inch a king (cf. 9:2). 9. 'Prophet . . . Seer': for the meaning of these two terms, cf. § 409 f. 12. 'high place': bāmāh (plur. bāmōt) always denotes a place of worship. Originally this term may have been applied exclusively to a sanctuary built upon a hill or mountain, but it was applied to other places of sacrifice, e.g. in the valley of Hinnom, Jer 7:31. Generally speaking these high places are expressly condemned in the Bible as being places of idolatrous or illicit worship. Here the term is not used in this pejorative sense. There was no central sanctuary for Israelite worship at the time and Samuel was simply carrying out the spirit of the Mosaic law, Ex 20:24. 15. 'revealed to the ear': lit. 'uncovered his ear'. A metaphor used to describe someone pulling aside the usual eastern headress the better to whisper a secret into a person's ear. 20. 'as for the asses': i.e. why need you worry about three paltry asses, since the best of everything in Israel will be yours? 21. 'a son of Jemini', i.e. a Benjamite.

27-X 8 Saul is anointed King—The earliest mention of anointing as a piece of court ceremonial occurs in Syrian territory about the sixteenth century B.C. during the period of Egyptian suzerainty over Syria. In Israel anointing had hitherto been reserved to priests. It should be noted that Saul is anointed privately in 10:1 as Nāgīd 'Prince'. In 10:24 he is publicly elected as King and then confirmed in his position after his Ammonite victory, 11:14 f. The history of the anointing of Israelite kings shows that it was a sacred rite used under divine inspiration and administered by God's representative to inculcate (a) the dedication of the king to Yahweh; (b) the outpouring of Yahweh's Spirit upon him to fit him for his arduous duties; (c) to set the seal of divine blessing upon his reign and mark his person as sacred. Although the sum total of Messianic hope is not limited to the picture of an ideal theocratic king, yet it is significant that in men's minds all such promises have entwined themselves round the title 'Messias'—'the Anointed'. With the unction of the Holy Ghost (Ac 10:38), he was fitted to rule the everlasting kingdom of Yahweh.

X 1. 'prince': Probably in Samuel's mind this was not an unconditional anointing to kingly dignity. For the present Saul was made leader of the people in the struggle against the Philistines. 'shall be a sign': Samuel promised Saul three significant signs as confirmation of his new dignity: (a) the lost asses would be found; (b) at Tabor men would offer him part of their sacrificial gifts to God; (c) the spirit of prophecy would come upon him. The first sign was to convince him that he really was King by God's will, the second that as King it was partly as God's representative and subordinate to him, and the third that he must be King with the help of God's Spirit. 3. 'going up to God': to offer sacrifice. By giving Saul part of the sacrifice the men unconsciously paid tribute to the new dignity Yahweh had conferred on him. 6. 'thou shalt prophesy': not in the sense of predicting the future, but of giving enthusiastic expression to religious feelings in hymns and praises. 12. 'Who is their father?': Saul's neighbours expressed surprise that he should now be numbered among the 'prophets'; on the nature of these prophets see § 410c. An onlooker rebukes them by asking who is the father of the other prophets, i.e. parentage and heredity have little to do with the free outpouring of God's gifts. The people of Nazareth were likewise surprised at the words and works of Christ, Mt 13:54-7.

X 17-27 Saul's Public Election—This account is a continuation of 8:22. 25. 'law of the kingdom': Dhorme, 90, and Smith, 74, consider this to be 'the custom of the king' already mentioned in 8:9-19. Leimbach, 52, thinks it was a legal document in the style of Deut 17:14-20, binding both king and people.

XI 1-15 Saul's Victory over Ammon: he is acclaimed by the People—Probably the expedition against the Ammonites took place before Saul's election described in 10:17-25. For 12:12 presupposes an Ammonite invasion before Saul was made king. If this is so, then his success and popularity may have convinced Samuel that Saul had indeed won his spurs.

1. Jabes Galaad: the capital town of Gilead, east of the Jordan. The Ammonites occupied territory north of Moab in Transjordan. This is the first mention of them since their defeat by Jephthah Jg 11:21. 5. 'following oxen': so Cincinnatus was ploughing when messengers came to offer him the dictatorship, Livy III, 12. 7. 'sent them': he sent the bleeding remains of the oxen like a fiery cross to the chieftains of Israel 252g with the grim threat against all who failed to follow him in the fight for their countrymen. 8. Bezek : on the hills west of the Jordan and practically opposite Jabes Galaad. 'three hundred thousand': as figures of the actual available fighting men these numbers are highly improbable, and are in striking contrast with the numbers mentioned in 13:15. They seem to be an addition made to the text when the division between Israel and Judah was an accomplished fact. 14. 'renew the kingdom': it was time to proceed with what we should call the coronation service. Those who had questioned the ability of the tall enthusiast of Benjamin had been reduced to silence by his victory. We have then three stages in the development of Saul's full kingship. He is privately anointed as 'Prince' in Ramah; elected by lot at Maspha, but only partially acknowledged and finally acclaimed by all the people at Galgal. There may have been a public anointing, for LXX has 'and Samuel anointed Saul there to be king'.

h XII 1-25 Samuel's Farewell Address and Resignation

—Israel stood at the threshold of a new era. Samuel was the living link between the past and the future. At this moment the greatness of his character and importance of his work stand out in clear relief. Long years of devotion to Yahweh and the religious needs of his age had made him a venerable and awe-inspiring figure—the last and greatest of the Judges. There could be no doubt of the sheer force and scrupulous integrity of the man even in the minds of those who asked for a change of government. He was an Israelite in whom there was no guile. Whatever the cost in personal suffering, once God's will was known, he would carry it out with all the unwearied energy at his command. This unflinching devotion to God's will made him the counsellor and friend of Saul in his early years, until a new need arose and he was ready to give all his support to the rising power of David. In this way his work did not end with his death but culminated in the final establishment of monarchy described in 2 Kg. Before resigning Samuel solemnly reviewed the past with its gracious revelations of Yahweh's loving-kindness. If Israel had co-operated with them, human sovereignty would have been superfluous. Now that kingship was an accomplished fact, he outlined the religious principles which must guide both king and people in the future and assured them of the protection of his intercession.

1 2. 'goeth before you': like a shepherd walking before his flock. 3. 'Speak of me': put my life on trial—you take the part of accusers—let Yahweh and his Anointed be the Judges. 6. 'It is the Lord': LXX 'Yahweh is Witness'.

j XIII-XIV Saul's Wars of Independence and Early Reign—The account of Saul's early campaigns against the Philistines ends with an episodic list of similar wars with the Edomites to the south and Moabites to the south-east, and with certain Aramaean tribes in the north. We must not forget, however, that Saul's victory over the Philistines was not completely decisive. Local border raids and reprisal counter-attacks continued intermittently throughout his reign. The digression wedged into the narrative in 7-15a is an account of the preliminary breach between Saul and Samuel. It prepares us for his final rejection in ch 15. Saul's lack of faith blinded him to the fact that his extremity was God's opportunity and his impatience must not set aside the supreme thing in life—God's will.

k XIII 1. 'a child of one year': an obvious absurdity due to some copyist's error. We have no means of recovering the original number save by conjecture. The whole verse is lacking in the more important Gk MSS. 2. Machmas: about 7 miles north-east of Jerusalem. 3. 'smote the garrison': the Heb. word n3iḥ which DV translates 'garrison' is kept as a proper name in LXX as if it denoted the resident Philistine official of the fortress. 'Philistines had heard of it': LXX gives grounds for reading 'the Philistines heard (the report), saying, the slaves (or, the Hebrews) have revolted'. 5. 'thirty thousand': the numbers need revision. So many chariots in mountainous country would have been useless. Lucian's recension and the Gk codd. 83, 93, 108, give the number as 3,000. 7. 'some of the Hebrews': LXX 'they that went over crossed the Jordan to the land of Gad'. Many fled into Transjordan because they had lost all confidence. 8. 'he waited': Saul was chosen by God to free God's people, but not to act till duly commissioned by God's representative to do so. 13. 'Thou hast done foolishly': the penalty may seem excessive at first sight, but the whole principle of theocratic kingship was at stake. Saul in a moment of crisis chose to act autocratically and not theocratically. It was this inner weakness that led to the great tragedy of his life. 15. 'Samuel arose': a clause, fallen out of MT, should be restored from LXX: 'And Samuel arose and went up from Galgal and went his way, and the rest of the people went after Saul to meet the men of war and came from Galgal to Geba of Benjamin'. 17. 'three companies': the first group went north, the second west, and the third eastwards. Saul and Jonathan still barred the way to the south. The Philistines may have hoped to entice them out of their strongholds. 20. 'down to the Philistines': proof of the unarmed state of the Israelites. They could sharpen ordinary tools, but for any work which required a forge they had to apply to the Philistine authority.

XIV 4. 'The name of the one was Boses': this means 'shining' and refers to the gleaming chalky surface at the top of the cliff. Sene means 'the thorny' and may refer to the acacia trees in the district. 6. 'It is easy for the Lord': cf. the noble words of Judas Maccabeus before the Battle of Beth-horon (1 Macc 3:16-21). 12. 'will show you a thing': a piece of provocative bantering. 18. 'Ark': read with LXX 'Ephod' instead of Ark. The Ark was still at Cariathiarim and was not used as an oracle of consultation. 19. 'Draw in thy hand': Saul characteristically interrupts the consultation, too impatient to wait for knowledge of the divine will. 21. 'the Hebrews' are distinguished from the Israelites. Those who had been conscripted by the Philistines would be called Hebrews by their masters. 27. 'eyes were enlightened': lit. 'sparkled', i.e. shone as renewed strength spread through his exhausted body. 31. 'from Machmas to Ailon': gives the course of the battle—from Machmas in the north, then westwards to Bethaven, then down the pass of Bethhoron to Ailon in the plain of Philistia.

XV 1-35 Amalekite Campaign and Rejection of Saul—

253a For centuries there had been a legacy of hatred between Israel and Amalec. They had fought against Israel at Raphidim and God's judgement on them was recorded in Ex 17:14: 'I will destroy the memory of Amalec from under heaven'. They were a rapacious and cruel people. 2 ff. Samuel mentions some of their king Agag's recent brutalities. Ruthless severity was the only argument such a barbarous people could understand. It was a holy war and the herem or sacred ban was to be applied in all its rigour. This meant that all living creatures were to be slain in honour of Yahweh as had been the fate of Jericho and Achan, Jos 6 ff. Here Saul was weighed in the balance and found wanting. At the beginning of his career he seemed to justify the hopes that had been placed in him. He was tall, endowed with manly strength, courageous, simple in his tastes and manner of life in contrast to the luxury and magnificence of later kings. He created the beginnings of a standing army and increased the sense of national unity. These were valuable foundations for the later achievements of David. In religion he was a rugged and simple-minded follower of Yahweh, and died in battle against the uncircumcised enemies of his people. At first his impassive, stolid, moody character must have left an unfavourable impression on some onlookers. 'How shall this man save us?' (10:27). But the Spirit of God soon set his heart aflame with power and enthusiasm to fulfil his great destiny as first king of Israel. That new kingdom was the master-

253a ambition which gave meaning to his life. Yet his imperious self-will, his impetuous rashness, and wilful disobedience led him to grasp at the shadow of an earthly kingdom and miss the underlying principle of true theocratic rule. The threats of Samuel whom he loved, the rise of David, the misfortunes that were gathering around him gradually reduced his mind to a psychopathological state of remorse, fear, suspicion, obstinacy, excitability, and cruelty. The night before he died, in the witch's cave at Endor, he heard the sentence of his doom from the man who had anointed him king.

b 3. 'utterly destroy': the Heb. means 'to devote', and what was devoted to Yahweh was withdrawn from common use and might not be taken as spoil. The same idea of exclusive dedication can be seen in the word 'harem'. 6. The Cinites (Kenites) belonged to the tribe of Moses' father-in-law and were old allies of Israel. 11. 'Samuel was grieved': MT has 'he was angry'—deeply upset at the course of events. His sympathy was still with Saul and he cried to Yahweh with protests and intercession, but in vain. 16. 'Suffer me': Heb. has 'stop'. Samuel cuts short his excuses. 22. 'Doth the Lord': the whole of this rebuke is couched in poetical rhythm like a prophetic oracle. It summarizes much of the teaching of later prophets like Amos, Osee, Micheas, and Isaiahs, and is taken up by the greatest of the Prophets in Mt 9:13; 12:7. 28. 'The Lord has rent thy kingdom': the accident was turned by Samuel into a parable; cf. Ahias' symbolical action 3 Kg 11:30 ff. 29. 'the triumph in Israel': a title given to God in this passage only. 30. 'Honour me now': he still clings to the external honours of his position. 35. 'Samuel mourned for Saul': Saul must ever remain one of the greatest figures in human tragedy. There is pathos in his story as he is summoned to fill a position to which he proves unequal—a story of brilliant beginnings, failure, sudden outbursts of goodness and badness with utter desolation at the end.

c XVI 1-XVIII 5 David's Introduction to Public Life—Of David's Heb. name Dāwīd it is not possible to give a certain derivation. The principal sources for his history are to be found in 1 Kg 16-3, Kg 2. Further details are given in 1 Par 2-3; Ruth 4:17-22 and in some of the titles of the Psalms. Just as we have had two complementary accounts of the institution of the monarchy, so in the same way we seem to have a two-fold source for some of the facts of David's life, e.g. the killing of the giant Goliath and the apparently double account of David's introduction to public life. In ch 16 David is a shepherd lad specially skilled in music who is recommended to Saul and becomes his page. In ch 17 he is absent from court in time of war, and only accidentally becomes known to Saul and Abner. To reconcile these differences it has been pointed out that (a) 17:15 implies that David went freely to and from his home, and therefore did not reside permanently at court. David may have been summoned at long intervals when the king was actually suffering from a fit of melancholy. If Saul was abstracted with his own gloomy thoughts, he might easily fail to recognize him at a later date; (b) the fact that the sacred writer calls him 'armour-bearer' in 16:21 proves very little, because it is quite consistent with the style of a Hebrew historian to make this statement by way of anticipation; (c) the questions in 17:55-58, it should be noted, concern David's parentage rather than David himself and Abner may not have previously troubled about the family history of a minstrel boy; (d) LXX in Vatican Codex B differs from the present MT by omitting 17:12-31, 41, 50, 55-58; 18:1-5, 10 f., 17-19, and by itself forms a complete account without any of the difficulties implied in the MT. Yet the LXX itself may have resorted to a harmonistic treatment of the text precisely to remove these inconsistencies. Ricciotti prefers to hold that the account comes from two complementary sources. The compiler of these two sources presupposes that his readers already know the full details and makes a selection of the more important facts which unfortunately are insufficient for us to dogmatize on the exact relation between them.

16:1-18 David's Secret Anointing—Samuel is divinely instructed to anoint one of Isai's sons as successor to the rejected Saul. To safeguard the secrecy of his errand, Yahweh tells Samuel to hold a religious gathering in the district. Contrary to all expectation Yahweh's choice falls on the youngest son David. He was the man according to God's heart, cf. 3 Kg 15:3, 11; 4 Kg 14:3; 18:3. His life as a whole can be said to justify such an epitaph. His magnetic personality and achievements bear the stamp of real greatness. He began life as a shepherd lad, and became musician, poet, hero of a hundred battles, outlaw, prophet, loyal friend, true patriot, devoted father, noble king, saint and sinner whose words and deeds have altered history. In spite of the obvious mistakes and failures of his life, Yahweh's honour and the glory of Israel are the real mainspring behind it all. He always understood the religious foundation of his kingly office, and was able to bring national and religious unity to Israel. In many incidents of courage, humility, unselfishness, wisdom, and tenderness he has won the affection and gratitude of men in a way that not even the shadows of sin can ever wholly destroy. His isolated unworthy deeds are forgotten and forgiven when we see him conscious of the greatness of Almighty God, thirsting after glimpses of his beauty, awe-struck before his inscrutable judgements and filled with gratitude at the immensity of his loving kindness. That, we feel, is the true David who won the heart of God.

1. 'Isai the Bethlehemite': a grandson of Ruth the Moabitess and a native of Bethlehem of the tribe of Judah, about six miles south of Jerusalem. 5. 'Be ye sanctified': this involved purification from all ceremonial defilement. 7. 'man seeth': while Samuel was musing within his own mind (wayyōmer is sometimes used in this sense of 'saying to oneself'), Yahweh warns him that the unseen qualities of the mind and heart rather than bodily appearance are the causes of the divine choice. 12. 'beautiful to behold and of a comely face': lit. 'with beautiful eyes and good in appearance'. Fair skin and fine eyes are rare enough in hot countries of the East. 13. 'anointed him': the full significance of this was hidden from his family. They may have imagined it meant that David was simply to be Samuel's closest friend at the sacrifice.

14-23 David at the Court of Saul—As Saul brooded over his broken life, his mistakes, and his loss of Samuel's friendship which had been the pledge of divine support, a sense of futility and helplessness plunged his mind into the depths of despair. Yahweh withdrew his grace and a melancholy akin to diabolic possession reduced him to fits of depression bordering on madness. David was chosen to soothe Saul by his music.

17. 'can play well': the power of music to restore the harmony of the mind is well known. 18. 'prudent in his words': eloquent and tactful. These qualities and his attractive appearance and a certain invincible winning charm which God gave him, coupled with a unique spiritual force, are partly the foundations of his future greatness. 22. 'David stand before me': as a court attendant. Here David would see the leaders who were determining the course of Israel's history, and gain an insight into the nation's needs.

XVII 1-58 David and Goliath—The Philistines invaded Judah and marched in a north-west direction up the valley of Elah (i.e. 'the terebinth') to Socho, now Shuweikeh, W. of Bethlehem on the road to Gaza. The Israelites encamped on the eastern, the Philistines on the western slopes of the valley. As already noted 12-30 are not found in Codex B of the LXX and have the marks of an independent story.

4. 'Six cubits and a span': about ten feet. This giant may have been a descendant of the old race of Anakim (Jos 11:21, 22). 8. 'a Philistine': lit. the Philistine—the official representative of my people. 17. 'fru-

254d menty': unripe ears of corn roasted. 20. 'place of Magala': the Heb. root of this word suggests something round. It may refer to some kind of entrenchment or barricade round the camp. 28. 'was angry with David': Eliab jealously accuses David of neglect of duty and arrogance. 29. 'not cause to speak?': LXX and Vg 'numquid non verbum est?' have given rise to two interpretations. Some take it to mean 'Can I not ask a harmless question?' Klostermann and Schlögl prefer 'was there not every reason for my conduct?'. 32. According to LXX this text stands in close connexion with v 11. 45. 'in the name of the Lord': it was not only a question of skill against brute strength, but a struggle between the might of paganism and the absolute trust of the true worshipper of Yahweh. 47. 'the Lord saveth': a lesson emphasized in both OT and NT; Ps 43:6, 7; Os 1:7; 1 Cor 1:27. 51. 'slew him': later (2 Kg 21:19) we shall deal with the account which seems to make Elhanan the killer of Goliath. 54. 'brought it to Jerusalem': Jerusalem was still in the hands of the Jebusites. A little later we find Goliath's sword at Nob, which was close to Jerusalem. It may be an anticipatory remark of a later redactor; cf. 2 Kg 5:7. 55. 'when Saul saw David': this whole section of Saul's inquiry is not in LXX (B).

g XVIII 1-5 The Friendship of David and Jonathan—Before the story of David's life darkens in an atmosphere of intrigue, rivalry, and bloodshed, we have a glimpse of an ennobling friendship between Jonathan, the heir-apparent, and David. These verses too are omitted by LXX (B).

f 1. 'the soul of Jonathan': the same phrase is used of Jacob's love for Benjamin, Gen 44:30. 4. 'Jonathan stripped himself': to ratify their bond of friendship and to show his public esteem for David.

g 6-30. Saul's Jealousy—The main events of this later history of David's fortunes are preserved in LXX, though it omits 10-11, 17-19. MT tells how when Saul's jealousy deepened into deadly hatred he tried himself to kill David and gave him promotion to expose him to new dangers. LXX continues and shows how Saul's daughter, Michol, being in love with David, Saul tried to use this love to ensure his death, but all in vain. 28b, 29b and 30 are not in LXX (B). 10. 'Saul . . . prophesied': i.e. raved in a mad frenzy; cf. § 410c. This incident may not give the psychological growth of Saul's enmity, but there is nothing incredible in this sudden outburst of passion in a man of Saul's character. 18. 'what is my life?': i.e. I am a poor man. What dowry can I offer for a princess? 19. 'Molathite': from Abel Mehola in the Jordan valley. 21. 'In two things': the Heb. can only mean 'under two conditions', but these are not specified. Klostermann and Schlögl emend MT and read 'in two years', but this seems unwarranted. Others understand the phrase to have a caustic meaning, 'by the second', i.e. by one at least of my daughters, thou shalt be my son-in-law.

h XIX-XX Immediate Results of Saul's Jealousy—These were open violence against David, a meeting with Samuel at Rama, and complete separation from his friend Jonathan. The kingship was not yet a well-established institution and each incident in David's career served as fuel for Saul's jealousy. David's victory over Goliath eclipsed Saul's own military prowess. His unique personal charm won the friendship of Saul's son, the love of his daughter, and the affection of his subjects. Many textual critics say that these chapters are late compilations by a redactor (R) from sources designated as E and J. No doubt such topics as Saul's jealousy, David's friendship with Jonathan, and Michol's love, were favourite themes of popular tradition and were incorporated by the redactor in different degrees into his book.

i 2. 'Jonathan told David': it was difficult to know whether these outbursts of passion revealed Saul's true mind or were simply passing fits of madness. 11. 'Saul sent his guards': we can join the phrase 'that night' of v 10, as LXX does, to 11, 'And it came to pass that night that Saul sent'. Smith, 178, conjectures that David's wedding night is intended, when he would be unsuspecting and his friends dispersed after the marriage feasting. In this way he accounts for the fact that in this section David seems unsuspecting of the king till warned by his wife. However, it may have been that David hoped to use Michol's influence with her father to calm his rage. The fragmentary condition of some of the accounts makes it difficult to assign the real chronological sequence of events. 13. 'an image': MT has the plural 'Teraphim', a kind of household charm in human shape, sometimes used for divination, Ez 21:19-22. Originally they were part of a fetish cult, but Michol may have regarded this image as nothing more than a household mascot, because she treated it with scant respect. 18. 'Najoth': the word means 'dwellings', a district near Rama, possibly the quarter of the town where the prophets lived in common to carry out their spiritual exercises under Samuel's direction. 24. 'stripped himself also': the religious excitement of the prophets was contagious and affected Saul even more than it had affected his messengers so that he cast off his outer garments and lay helpless on the ground. This was to teach him that in contending against David he was contending against a Spirit that could override the petty schemes of men. The memory of this extraordinary event must have encouraged and convinced David that he was under divine protection. 'Is Saul': the old proverb about Saul 10:12 receives a new lease of life under circumstances which must have been a sad reminder to Saul of graces he had lost.

XX 1. 'came to Jonathan': if, as some commentators think, 1a 'David fled from Najoth' is only an editorial addition, this section may precede 19 chronologically. If not, then it shows David's unwillingness to give up hope till absolutely forced to do so and he may have thought Jonathan might effect a reconciliation. 5. 'is the new moon': a religious festival; cf. § 113d. 8. 'covenant of the Lord': David's pact of friendship with Jonathan had been witnessed and ratified by Yahweh. 14. 'If I live': the whole scene is full of the most noble-hearted friendship and there is pathos in the thought that Jonathan could foresee the downfall of his house and the rise of David. 19. 'The stone called Ezel': the name 'Stone of Departure' may have been given to it later. LXX 'Beside yonder heap of stones'. 23. 'concerning the word': the pact of friendship we have just made. 26. 'not clean': had incurred some ceremonial defilement. 30. 'Saul being angry': Saul burst out into coarse abuse and the sting of the insult lay in the insinuation that Jonathan was no true son of his. 37. 'is there further': Jonathan's loud cry to the boy who had actually reached the place of the arrow had no real reference to the exact position of the arrow. It was meant to make sure that David understood the significance of the sign they had agreed upon.

XXI-XXVII 32 David the Outlaw—Throughout this period David was not a rebel and never set himself up as a rival claimant to the throne. It was a time during which he grew to physical and spiritual maturity. Dangers, difficulties, and suffering taught him the great lesson of complete dependence on God—a lesson which Saul never learnt and which was essential to a ruler of a theocratic kingdom. Moreover his experience and training in military strategy and his leadership of armed men were invaluable preparations for future successes against the enemies of his kingdom. At first his band of followers numbered only 400. Two hundred more joined him when he returned to Judah from Moab. In 1 Par 12:1-22 we have a list of others who came later. David met with complete success in the end partly through his own daring exploits and shrewdness, but principally through the overruling Providence of God. It is quite possible that single stories of David's adventures as an outlaw existed in separate texts, and that these were threaded together in different ways, e.g. the b XXI David's Flight to Nob and Geth—1. Nob: a priestly town a little to the north of Jerusalem and the resting-place of the Tabernacle which has not been mentioned since Heli's days. David fled thither to obtain weapons and provisions and also to find out the divine will. Achimelech: the great-grandson of Heli. All the signs of hurried flight filled him with misgivings. 2. 'The King hath commanded me': to allay suspicion, David pretends to be on a secret mission for Saul. 4. 'holy bread': the Shewbread or the 'Presence-Bread'; cf. § 194b. Only the priests are allowed to partake of it. Our Lord quoted this incident Mt 12:3 f. to show that ceremonial law must give way to man's necessity. 5. 'David answered the priest': he settled the priest's scruples by assuring him that both the persons of his followers and their baggage for carrying the bread were in accord with liturgical law. 'this way is defiled': the versions give us little help in solving the obscurities of this passage. The general sense seems to be: 'In all my expeditions (when there is danger of defilement) my followers observe ritual purity; how much more so in carrying out this present business of the king'. 10. Achis: David hoped for safety in the territory of Israel's traditional enemy. It has been maintained that this first visit to Achis is a duplicate account of his second visit to the same prince. The two visits, however, are clearly distinct, and the treatment experienced on each occasion was quite different. A practically defenceless exile was a different person from the leader of a large band of reckless and well-armed adventurers offering their services in war. 11. 'king of the land': the courtiers repeat the exaggerated rumours which exalted David above Saul in popular estimation. 13. 'stumbled against the door': LXX has 'drummed on the doors of the gate'. He battered against the doors like a raving lunatic. As lunatics were held in special awe in the East, as being possessed by some powerful spirit, David was immune from attack.

c XXII 1-5 David at Odollam—David hurried farther south towards the home of his boyhood, to the stronghold of Odollam, some twelve miles SW. of Bethlehem. It was in Canaanite territory and within reach of his kinsmen in the south. He was joined by a mixed group of clansmen, malcontents, outcasts, and adventurers from neighbouring tribes and kingdoms. For safety's sake he placed his parents amongst the Moabites, because Jesse was the grandson of Ruth the Moabitess. Against David were the veteran troops of the royal army and the prestige of legal authority behind them, but probably the sympathies of the Judæan peasantry were with David, and as long as he acted on the defensive, the lives of his men were safe.

d 3. Maspha of Moab: mentioned here only. Jewish tradition claims that David's parents were murdered by the king of Moab and that David exacted signal vengeance on them in his later conquest of Moab, 2 Kg 8:2. 5. Gad: the first mention of this prophet who was to become the friend, counsellor, and chronicler of David's reign.

e 6-23 Saul's Vengeance on the Priests at Nob—David's falsehood to the priests at Nob had fatal consequences. Doeg, the Iago of Hebrew history, told Saul all he had seen there. Achimelech and his house were charged with high-treason and ordered to be slain. No one but the Syrian Doeg could be induced to carry out this sacrilegious murder; cf. g. Abiathar alone escaped and told David. The doom on Heli's house was being fulfilled, but in fulfilling it Saul was destroying his own. One by one the better elements of his court were being antagonized and forced to leave it. Shiloh had been destroyed, the Ark was at Cariathiarim, and as Abiathar fled with the Ephod, Saul had no legitimate means of communicating with God.

f 7. 'said to his servants': a sarcastic speech designed to arouse their tribal jealousy. 'You expect David, a hunted freebooter to give you more than I do, who am your kinsman!'. 9. 'Doeg was chief': better with LXX, 'Doeg the Syrian who was set over Saul's mules', which explains his presence at court. 15. 'Did I begin today?': he pleaded that he was accustomed to act in this way for one whom he regarded as the king's favourite. 19. 'children and sucklings': a deed of cruel vengeance which he did not attempt to do against a heathen nation at God's command, 15:3, he now carries out against an innocent city of his own kingdom. XXIII 1-28 Saul Seeks David's Life at Maon—Though technically a rebel, David was recognized as loyal to the Hebrew cause. Ceila was raided by the Philistines and David went to the rescue. The ingratitude of the inhabitants forced him to flee from Saul to the wilderness of Ziph. During the period of pursuit Jonathan and David met for the last time.

1. Ceila: three miles south of Odollam. 'the barns': these raids took place after the harvest when the corn was stacked ready for threshing. 11. 'Will the men of Ceila': it was ungrateful, but David's band of freebooters may have been a heavy burden on the resources of the citizens. Philistine pillage had been exchanged for exactions of another kind. Moreover, they probably feared to share the fate that had befallen the citizens of Nob. 15. 'the desert of Ziph': the wild country between the mountains of Judah and the Dead Sea. 16. 'strengthened his hands in God': reminded him of God's promises and renewed his courage. 18. 'his house': at Gabaa. 19. Hachila: a hill in the wilderness of Ziph, lying to the south of Jeshimon, or 'the Waste'. 23. 'thousands': i.e. families. The term is used in this sense also in 10:19; Jg 6:15; Jos 22:14. 24. Maon: a district some seven miles south of Hebron. 28. 'Rock of Division': because there Saul was, as it were, torn away from David, through the intervention of Providence.

XXIV 1-23 David Spares Saul's Life at Engaddi—Ch 26 gives a similar incident which some commentators believe to be the same. The differences of scene, conversation, and other circumstances make this unlikely. On both occasions Saul owed his life to the man whom he was hounding to death. David showed himself the true conqueror who could, by his self-evident moral greatness, wring recognition and friendship from his bitterest enemy. Assassination was a quick way to the throne; David chose the longer and surer way. His restraint revealed an ever-deepening insight into the sacred character of 'Yahweh's Anointed' which fitted him to become a type of that ideal in the future.

1. 'strongholds of Engaddi': on the western shores of the Dead Sea. The district is honeycombed with caves. Coming in from the light into the intense darkness of the cave, Saul could be seen but could not see well himself. 6. 'David's heart struck him': even the slight indignity he had done to Saul caused him scruples of conscience. 8. 'stopped his men': lit. 'tore' or 'lashed'—a strong expression to show that David restrained his men only with the greatest difficulty. 9. 'worshipped': made an act of reverence and homage in recognition of Saul's kingly dignity. 10. 'words of men': evidently David had enemies at court. Doeg was one. Chusi the Benjamite (Ps 7) was another. Such men inflamed Saul's already irritated mind by their baseless calumnies. 13. 'the Lord revenge me': David will not injure Saul, but if Saul persists in his persecution, then Yahweh will avenge such injustice. 14. A wicked heart produces evil. If my heart were evil, I should have killed you. 15. 'A dead dog': Saul brought out his army against an insignificant individual who could do him no harm. 17. 'my son David': a momentary gleam of the old affection for David broke through the cloud of suspicion. 21. 'now as I know': Samuel's words, 13:14, were still in his mind. He gives a practical proof that David will be king by exacting a promise that David would not kill Saul's family when the dynasty changed hands—a common practice of new oriental monarchs. 23. 'David and his men': that Saul k XXV 1 Death of Samuel—This has little connexion with what precedes or follows. The Israelites mourned for Samuel as they had mourned for Moses, Deut 34:8. He was the greatest figure since that time.

l XXV 2-44 David, Nabal, and Abigail—David's followers were largely dependent upon the hospitality of friendly clans, who in return were assured of protection against more dangerous marauders. Nabal, a mean boorish sheikh of the district of Carmel in Judah, refused to pay his tribute. The charm and wisdom of his beautiful wife saved David from murdering him. As a result of his debauched life and Abigail's account of David's intentions, Nabal had a fatal stroke and David married Abigail. In the course of the story we gain a valuable light on the way in which some sections of popular opinion regarded David's cause. Abigail's speech brings out the following facts. (a) Many Israelites knew that David was destined to be the future king of Israel. (b) His prudent and noble conduct had made a great impression on the people. (c) The people were convinced that he must wait God's own good time for the fulfilment of his promises.

m 2. Maon: seven miles south of Hebron. Carmel: in the hill country of Judah, not that in north Palestine. 3. Nabal: means 'fool' or 'reckless'. 15. 'These men were very good': the justice of David's courteous demand is vouched for by Nabal's own men. 17. 'no man can speak to him': everyone was afraid of one of his ungovernable outbursts of rage. 18. 'and took two hundred loaves': great festivities usually marked these times of shearing and abundance of choice supplies would be at hand. 29. 'as in the bundle of the living': his life was like something precious carefully wrapped up and treasured by Yahweh. The lives of his enemies would be cast away like stones from a sling, signifying complete rejection. 31. 'a scruple of heart': restraint now will ensure the absence of remorse later, and David will come to the throne with no stain on his honour. 32. David always had 'the power of recognizing and of profiting by his mistakes. 37. 'his heart died': probably an outburst of fear and rage brought on a stroke which was none the less a divine judgement on his folly. 43. 'Moreover': 43 f. are an appendix to the story of Abigail. From the reference to Achinoam in 27:3 and 30:5, it would seem that David had married her before meeting Abigail. Jezebel: not the town of the tribe of Issachar in the north, but a town in the south in the territory of the tribe of Judah. 44. 'Saul gave Michol': he considered David's flight as the equivalent of desertion, but David never gave up his claim to Michol; 2 Kg 3:13. Gallium: the only other reference shows that it was in the territory of Benjamin, Is 10:30.

256a XXVI 1-25 David spares Saul's life again—We may note in passing some of the details which distinguish this incident from that related in ch 23. In the first case, Saul is alone, in a cave, where David is hidden with his men. Part of his robe is cut off and David makes himself known in a personal interview. In the second, Saul is in the midst of his camp surrounded by his men at night. David and Abisai steal their way alone to reach the sleeping king. This time David does not make himself known, till he is safely across the ravine to the opposite side of the hill. He does not trust himself to Saul and invites one of Saul's men to come and collect the king's property that he has stolen.

b 5. 'in a tent': LXX 'in a chariot' is a mistake, otherwise there could be no question of pinning him to the ground with one blow; cf. 8. 6. Achimelech: this man was a Hittite like Urias, 2 Kg 11:3. This is the only time he is mentioned in the Bible. Abisai: he and Joab were the sons of Sarvia, David's sister; cf. 1 Par 2:16. He saved David's life in a campaign against the Philistines, 2 Kg 21:17, shared the command of the army with Joab, 2 Kg 10:10, joined in the murder of Abner, 2 Kg 3:30, and stood by David at the time of Absalom's rebellion. A brave man, but hard-hearted like his brother Joab. 7. 'his spear': a symbol of his authority. He held it in his hand while he gave judgement; cf. 22:6. 10. 'unless the Lord': Saul may die as a direct visitation of God, or by a natural death, or die in battle, but there must be no murder. 19. 'If the Lord': if Saul is simply Yahweh's instrument punishing David for his sins, David will seek to placate Yahweh by offering sacrifice. If, however, his persecution is due to the counsels of wicked men, they will be cursed by God. For they have cast him from among the people of God, from the land which Yahweh has chosen for his divinely revealed worship. Such banishment was equivalent to bidding him serve false gods. 20. 'seek a flea': a copyist's error which has crept into MT from 24:15. LXX has 'my life'.

XXVII 1-XXVIII 2 David Vassal of Achis, King of Geth—Circumstances now forced David to guard against the insecurity of his present way of life. With the death of Samuel there was no power left in Israel strong enough to withstand the king. As chief of a large band of soldiers of fortune he entered the service of the Philistine king of Geth. But he had to reconcile two opposing loyalties. He must do nothing to alienate the goodwill of his Hebrew countrymen, and at the same time win the confidence of his Philistine overlord. At his own request David was made Achis' feudal vassal over the territory of Siceleg on the southern Philistine border. Here, with greater freedom and independence, he could build up his army and satisfy his Philistine masters with raids against the Amalecites who were ravaging their territory. Ostensibly these raids were against the Israelites. In reality they were directed against desert tribes who were in alliance with the Philistines. It was a dangerous game where one slip would spell disaster.

5. 'why should thy servant': it is too high an honour. David was angling for greater independence, away from the jealousy of Philistine courtiers where he could save his soldiers from being merged into the Philistine army. 6. Siceleg: is mentioned in Jos 15:31, 19:5, but its exact site has not been identified. The compiler of this narrative regarded it as part of the crown estates of the kings of Judah, and therefore must have written this after Solomon and before the captivity. 7. 'four months': MT has 'a year and four months'. A longer period than four months is implied by 29:3. 8. Gessuri and Gerzi: these were heathen tribes of southern Judah. Amalecite, i.e. such as had survived the attack by Saul, 15:8. 'These were of old': with most commentators emend MT to 'For these nations dwelt in the land from Telam (a city in south Judah) until thou comest to Shur and to the land of Egypt'; cf. 15:7. 10. Jerameelites: descendants of Hesron who settled in south Judah (1 Par 2:9). Ceni: a clan in friendly relations with Israel. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite; cf. 15:6. All these expeditions were in the south country and David led Achis to believe that they were directed against his own countrymen. To make sure that no one would live to tell the truth, he massacred those he had plundered and took no prisoners. We cannot justify every action of David by the standards of Christian morality. His dangerous position was only made bearable by falsehood and ruthless barbarity. 12. 'Achis believed David': Achis naturally thought that raids against David's own countrymen were the greatest proof of his loyalty. He promoted him to be the king's personal bodyguard and the next step involved David in an impossible dilemma. XXVIII 2. 'David said': his answer was deliberately ambiguous, but Achis took it to be a fresh protestation of loyalty. Fortunately the suspicions of the Philistine commanders saved the situation, 29:3.

XXVIII 3-25 Saul and the Witch of Endor—The incident related in this passage breaks the thread of the account of David's adventures amongst the Philistines. Its logical position is immediately before

f 3. This verse explains why Saul appealed to the witch at Endor. 4. 'camped at Sunam': opposite Gelboe. The armies were facing each other across the plain of Esdraelon. 7. 'hath a divining spirit': lit. 'that hath an 'ob''. This word often signifies the spirit speaking through the medium, or the possessor of such a spirit. It has been suggested that the 'ob' may have been some part of the human body, e.g. a skull used for magical purposes. Endor: a little village on the north slope of Little Hermon, about ten miles from Gelboe, behind the Philistine army. 13. 'I saw gods ascending': supernatural beings from the region of Sheol. The witch describes the spirit, and Saul recognizes Samuel from the description. The weight of both Jewish and early Christian commentators seems to give an affirmative answer to the question: Did Samuel's spirit really appear? This interpretation agrees with the plain and natural meaning of the account; cf. Eccles 46:23 and the LXX addition to 1 Par 10:13. It was God rather than the witch who summoned Samuel to make clear the connexion between Saul's present misfortunes and past sins. 14. 'with a mantle': such as Samuel used to wear when alive; cf. 15:27. 19. 'Israel with thee': the sins of the king involve the nation. 'with me': i.e. in Sheol, the abode of the dead.

g XXIX 1-11 David's Dismissal from the Philistine Army—In a general war of all the Philistine princes against Israel, the Philistine chiefs distrusted the presence of David in their ranks. His loyalty to Achish was never put to the test, as the Philistine king was forced to dismiss him and his mercenaries.

h 1. Aphec: unidentified, probably lying in the plain of Esdraelon. Jezrahel: an important strategic town linking the plain of Esdraelon with the Jordan valley. It was the scene of Naboth's murder and the killing of Jezabel; 3 Kg 21:13; 4 Kg 9:30. 2. 'marched': the Heb. participles used in this verse imply continuous action. The native army and the band of Hebrew mercenaries took part in a military parade past the five Philistine generals. 9. 'as an angel of the Lord': a comparison which occurs 2 Kg 14:17, 20; 19:27. The wording of this speech of Achish has been influenced by an editor of MT. It is unlikely that Achish used such a comparison and it has been omitted in LXX (B). 10. LXX adds 'and go to the place which I have appointed you (Siceleg) and put no evil design in thy heart for thou art good in my sight'. Achish tries to smooth the ruffled feelings and desire for revenge which he imagines a man like David must harbour in his mind because of his dismissal from the army.

i XXX 1-7 Amalekites sack Siceleg in David's Absence—On his return David found desolation and ruin. The Amalekites had raided the undefended town, burned its buildings, and carried off the women for spoil. This was a cruel shock to his men and there was danger of serious mutiny.

j 8-31 The Pursuit and Division of Spoil—David found an outlet for the mutinous feelings of his men in an annihilating raid on the retreating Amalekites. With characteristic foresight David sent a share of the spoils to various authorities in Judah. This was partly in gratitude for their former goodwill and partly to secure their support when his hour should come.

k 2. 'had not killed anyone': they would be more valuable if sold in the Egyptian slave-market. 9. Torrent Besor: unidentified. 13. left me': the heedless cruelty of his Amalekite master was to cost the master dearly. 14. 'south side of the Cerethi': a 256k tribe in the south country closely allied to the Philistines. 24. 'equal shall be the portion': the success of their efforts was due to God. Those who guard supplies play an essential part in military strategy and deserve a share in the spoils. 27. Bethel: not the Bethel in the territory of Benjamin, but Bethel near Siceleg in south Judah. Jether: a priestly town in the hill country of Judah. Aroer: also in south Judah and not to be confused with Aroer on the Arnon. Sephamoth: site unknown. Esthamo: about eight miles SSW. of Hebron. Rachal: not mentioned elsewhere. LXX has 'Carmel'. Jerameel . . . Ceni: these cities must have been in the Negeb or South Country. Arama: an ancient Canaanite city where the Israelites were defeated in the time of Moses (Num 14:45). Asan: in the extreme south of the Negeb, originally allotted to Judah and later to Simeon (Jos 15:42; 19:7). Athach: not mentioned elsewhere.

XXXI 1-13 Battle of Gelboe and Death of Saul—The fortunes of Saul were now drawing to their fateful close. His army was routed and his sons lay dead. He himself was severely wounded and feared the mockery of his pitiless heathen foe, if taken alive. To avoid this he committed suicide. Next day the Philistines found and mutilated the body of the dead king. Only one touch of human feeling redeems the sordid scene. The men of Jabes Galaad who had not forgotten their debt to Saul, 11:1-11, rescued his body and buried it under a famous tree in their city.

4. 'fell on it': Saul died by his own hand. The m whole tragedy of his life is there. He himself was the instrument of his own ruin. 10. Bethsan: a city in the Jordan valley overlooking the modern village of Beisan. 12. 'burnt them there': though cremation was not a Hebrew practice, it was resorted to in this case to prevent the Philistines from inflicting any further indignities on the dead bodies, if they captured Jabes Galaad.

THE SECOND BOOK OF KINGS

I 1-16 David learns of Saul's Death—The division of 257a the books is purely artificial and there is no break between the two. The Amalekite who claimed to have dealt the final blow which killed Saul and delivered David from his enemy was simply a liar. He was a typical oriental thief who plundered the dead. He miscalculated David's reactions to his tale, and paid for it with his life. There may have been a mixture of policy and impulse in David's act of vengeance. He might reap the advantages of Saul's death, but it must be made clear to the nation that he had in no way connived at it.

17-27 David's Lament for Saul and Jonathan—A poem b of great artistry and beauty revealing the innate nobility of David's mind. David invites the people to join with him in lamentation. He thinks with horror of the exultation of the Philistines, and the scene of the tragedy is cursed. He thinks of those he knew to be the great men of Israel. He bids the maidens remember what Saul had done for them and the nation. Then in one last passionate cry he voices his mighty love for Jonathan and his own bitter sorrow at his loss. This elegy was embodied in a national collection of poetry called the Book of Jasher, mentioned in Jos 10:13. The text has some obscurities which make the work of reconstructing the original extremely difficult.

18. 'the use of the bow': this cannot be right. The c bow was already widely used. LXX omits the word 'bow' and has 'he commanded to teach (it) to the children of Judah'. Some commentators consider 'the Bow' to have been the title of the elegy from the reference in 22 to Jonathan's bow. 21. 'fields of first fruits': Nature is summoned to sympathize by withholding its fertilizing dews, so that no fruitful field will be left from which first-fruit offerings can be made to Yahweh. 'not anointed with oil': in the Heb. not Saul but his shield is the subject of the anointing.

257c Dhorme renders, 'the shield of Saul was not anointed with oil, but with the blood of the wounded and the fat of heroes'. The Heb. (reading māšû h) could mean, 'For there was the shield of heroes dishonoured, the shield of Saul, no more to be anointed with oil, for now (it is) without the blood of the slain'. In other words, it was the glory of a warrior's shield that it needed anointing to wipe away the blood of the slain; but now the warrior himself lies dead and no such anointing will ever be needed again. 22. 'The arrow of Jonathan . . . the sword of Saul' are poetically described as devouring the bodies of their enemies. The bow was Jonathan's favourite weapon and the pledge of his friendship with David; cf. 18:14. 26. 'As the mother loveth': a marginal gloss introduced into the text.

d II 1-11 David King of Judah; Ishobeth King of Israel

—The disaster of Mt Gelboe left Palestine without a leader. In the south David occupied Hebron and was anointed king. Here he ruled for over seven years. In northern Palestine, Saul's able commander, Abner, succeeded in placing Ishobeth on the throne. The internal condition of these respective kingdoms was very different. David's was compact, united, and externally secure, and his courteous message to the men of Jabes Galaad suggests that he was exploring the possibility of further dominion. Ishobeth's position was weakened because there could be no real supreme direction from a king who was personally insignificant and completely dependent upon Abner who ruled the army. Furthermore the Philistines had no intention of allowing an effective revival of Saul's kingdom. They were masters of all western Palestine and the rivalry between the north and south would serve their interests and prevent any revolt on a large scale. It is significant of the dwindling prestige of the Northern Kingdom that the royal city was moved to Mahanaim on the Jabbok east of the Jordan. This fact is obscured by the DV which gives 'the camp' for Mahanaim (8).

e 1. 'Shall I go up?': Saul's death removed the chief obstacle to the throne which God had promised David. Before taking any decisive step in that direction, David asks for divine guidance. 6. 'anointed him': David had already received royal anointing from Samuel. Here it was a question of public and official recognition by the people. Later he was again anointed as king over all Israel, 2 Kg 5:3. 8. 'Abner . . . took Ishobeth': Abner, son of Ner, the son of Abiel, was the great-uncle of Ishobeth (cf. 1 Kg 14:50 f.). He was the real power behind his incompetent and jealous nephew. The name Ishobeth ('man of shame') was originally 'Ish-baal' (1 Par 8:33), i.e. 'man of Baal'. As 'Baal' means 'Lord', it could be applied to Yahweh, but was usually applied to pagan gods. Hence to avoid even pronouncing the hated name of 'Baal', the scribes substituted for it bōšēf 'shame'. 10a. 'forty years old': this is a copyist's error or the writer has used the well-known round number 40. Ishobeth's eldest brother Jonathan was probably about the same age as David, i.e. about thirty at the time of his death. 10b. 'two years': his reign practically coincided with David's seven and a half years at Hebron, but it may have taken Abner five years to win recognition for his master over all Israel.

f 12-32 War between the Kingdoms—War broke out through the rivalry of the leaders Abner and Joab. David's men had marched northwards into the territory of Benjamin and were met by an Israelite force at Gabaon. In the encounter which followed Abner slew Joab's brother and thereby sealed his own fate. The whole chapter reveals that Joab was becoming indispensable to David, and that gratitude and self-interest prevented David from removing a man who was so unscrupulously devoted to his cause.

g 12. Gabaon: the site of this city is occupied by the modern village of El-Jib, five miles NW. of Jerusalem. 13. Joab: the son of David's sister, Sarvia. His name means 'Yahweh is father'. He was a ruthless vindictive character whose one virtue was a passionate devotion to David. His services to David for good (2 Kg 12:26; 18:2) and evil (2 Kg 11:14 ff.) made him more and more the king's master. 14. 'play': a euphemism for a trial of arms in friendly rivalry. It soon developed into mutual slaughter. 16. 'fellow': his antagonist. 18. 'one of the roes': noted for their swiftness and grace. 22. 'Go off': Abner was a seasoned warrior conscious of his superior skill, and had no wish to start a blood-feud between Joab and himself. 23. 'stood still': grief-stricken and horrified at the sight of the young man's corpse.

III 1-22 Abner negotiates with David—1-5 are an editorial note on David's family at Hebron. Three of the sons mentioned, Amnon, Absalom, and Adonias became notorious in various ways. The other three are not mentioned again. 6-12. Ishobeth had inherited the harem of his father. Abner, who regarded him as a mere puppet, took one of Saul's concubines for himself. According to Eastern ideas, this was equivalent to high-treason. Abner rejected Ishobeth's expostulations with contempt and entered into negotiations with David to unite all Israel under him. 13-16. David insisted on the return of his wife, Michol, as an essential condition. This public act was a blow to the prestige of Ishobeth and a reminder to the northern tribes of David's connection with the house of Saul.

12. 'Whose is the land?': is it not in my power to make you king over all Israel? Omitted by LXX. 16. Bahurim: a Benjaminite village on the road from Jerusalem to the Jordan fords. 19. 'Abner spoke to Benjamin: while sounding the heads of the tribes on the change of allegiance to David, he would require special diplomacy to win over Saul's fellow-tribesmen. 21. 'enter into a league': the heads of the clans would insist on some mutual agreement which safeguarded their interests in return for their loyalty. 22. 'slain the robbers': lit. 'came from the troop', i.e. from a raid or plundering expedition. There were no regular taxes and this was the only way of paying the army.

23-27 Joab murders Abner—24. 'Joab . . . said': his masterful character stands out in this upbraiding of the king. He accuses David of failing to carry out the law of tribal blood-feud by leaving Abner alive and insists that he must be a deceiver.

28-39 David's Curse on Joab and Lament for Abner—David denied any complicity in the crime, and the sincerity of his grief was accepted as proof of his innocence. He was not in a position to execute Joab, but Yahweh would chastise the guilty with fearful punishment. He gave Abner honourable burial and composed a special dirge for his funeral. 29. 'come upon Joab': untimely death, venereal disease, and effeminacy will be the lot of the guilty house of Joab in each succeeding generation. 'holdeth the distaff': either effeminate or a cripple who supports himself with a crutch. Either of these would be curse in the warlike family of Joab. 33. 'as cowards': lit. 'as dies a fool must Abner die?'—an ignoble death for so brave a man! 34. 'hands were not bound': thou wert free to defend thyself. Only treachery could have killed thee.

IV 1-12 Assassination of Ishobeth—Abner's death deprived Ishobeth of all real support for his kingdom. When Ishobeth was murdered, the way was clear for David to ascend the throne Yahweh had destined for him. 4 is inserted to show that no direct representative of the house of Saul was left except Jonathan's cripple son Miphiboseh. Time had been on David's side against Ishobeth and there was no need or justification for murder. Immediate execution of the assassins cleared David from any charge of complicity.

3. Berothites: the writer wishes to emphasize that the murderers were of Ishobeth's own tribe of Benjamin. He reminds the reader—without explanation—that the Gibeonite city of Beroth was regarded as belonging to the tribe of Benjamin; cf. Jos 9:17. Its exact site is uncertain. Garstang, 362, locates it at Tell el Nasbeh some seven miles north of Jerusalem. 4. Miphiboseh:

258b his real name was Merib-baal; cf. 1 Par 8:34. As is usual in the Bks of Kgs, bōšē 'shame' is a pious substitution for the hated name of Baal, and Merib has been corrupted into Miphi. 5. 'house of Isboseth': at Mahanaim.

c V 1-5 David King of all Israel—David's hour had come. By his courage and nobility of character in trial and victory, he stood out as the one man able to govern and fight the battles of Israel against the Philistine. In offering him the throne of all Israel, the people were convinced that they were offering it to one whom Yahweh himself had chosen to be a man of destiny.

d 1. 'We are thy bone': three reasons given for their choice—David-kinship, his military record, and the will of Yahweh. 2. 'feed my people': like a shepherd feeding his flock. Kings were frequently described as shepherds of their people. It was especially appropriate in David's case; cf. Ps 77:70-72. 3. 'made a league with them': probably some charter defining the rights of king and people.

e 6-16 The Capture of Jerusalem—This event probably took place after the war against the Philistines mentioned in 17-25 and 21:18-21, or during a propitious lull in one of the Philistine campaigns (cf. Ricciotti, Storia d'Israele, I. 342). It is introduced here to show the culmination of Israel's strength and unity under her one king. Certainly the new kingdom needed internal unity, for rivalry between the north and south might well come to a head over the question of a capital. David determined to choose a place that would be best from a political, civil, military, and religious point of view. Jerusalem was that place. It was midway between the southern and northern tribes and on neutral ground. If there was to be one sanctuary to which all were bound to come, Hebron was too far south. Jerusalem would serve well too for centralized civil administration, and as a fortress among the hills of the central plateau, it was magnificently situated.

f 6. Jerusalem is mentioned as early as 2000 B.C. under the name of Ursalim in Egyptian texts found at Luxor in 1925. It is also mentioned in the Tell el Amarna letters c 1400-1370 B.C. It had never been captured permanently from the Jebusites. For details of topographical and archaeological interest, cf. H. Vincent in RB (1911) 566 ff.; (1912) 86 f.; Weill, Revue des Etudes Juives (1926) 103 f.; J. W. Crowfoot, G. M. Fitzgerald, PEQ (1929); Krauss, 'Zion and Jerusalem', PEQ (1945) 15. 6. 'shalt not come': read—'Thou shalt not come in hither unless thou take away the blind and the lame, saying (or meaning by that) David shall not come in hither'. The Jebusites thought Jerusalem so impregnable that a band of cripples and blind men could hold it. 7. Sion: many authorities maintained that Sion occupied the south-western hill of Jerusalem. In more recent times all the evidence leads to the identification of Sion with the eastern hill upon which stood the Temple. By a gradual extension the names of Sion and City of David covered the whole of Jerusalem. 8. 'David offered a reward': Vg is a paraphrase of this obscure and incomplete text. 'David said in that day: Whosoever smiteth the Jebusite (let him go up by the water-gully) and (smite) the blind and the lame, that are hated of David's soul! Therefore it is said, the blind and the lame shall not come into the house.' 1 Par 11:6-9 may give a clue to what was the original text. LXX has 'house of the Lord'. David takes up the taunt of the Jebusites and in a spirit of contempt calls the garrison 'the blind and the lame'. Entry to the Temple was not forbidden to this class of persons, but they were forbidden to minister in the Temple, cf. Lev 21:18. Here it is not a question of the Temple but of the citadel. The proverb may have been something of an exclamation. 'Blind and lame! he (an enemy) cannot come into the house!', i.e. the blind and lame are sufficient to defend it.

g 9. Mello: part of the fortifications of Jerusalem. 11. 'Hiram king of Tyre': 11-16 are probably not in their strict chronological order, and are meant to show how 10 was gradually fulfilled. According to Josephus' 258g account in C. Apionem 1, 18 Hiram I of Tyre was king during the last 7 years of David's reign, whereas David's palace was built before his last 8 years. Abiba'al, the Tyrian king's father, seems like David to have been the founder of a dynasty, and was his contemporary, and the more familiar name of his son may have been substituted in the text. It is however possible that Abiba'al had been preceded by an earlier Hiram of whom we know nothing except what is here said, or the sacred writer may be using the name Hiram in a comprehensive and anticipatory sense, based on the fact that it was he who subsequently sent building materials to David for the construction of the temple. Tyre was one of the most important cities of Phoenicia, renowned for its art, wealth, and commerce. 14. 'names': a list is given also in 1 Par 3:5 ff.; 14:4 ff. Nothing is known of any of them except Solomon and Nathan. 17-25 David at War with the Philistines—The Philistine overlords quickly understood the menace behind David's growing power and independence. A concerted attack on a large scale was their answer. They spread out over the large fruitful valley of Rephaim; cf. 18. David was forced to adopt the fighting tactics of his outlaw days in the cave of Odollam. At a moment announced by Yahweh, David's men broke through the Philistine ranks and partly avenged the battle of Gelboe. A second attempt by the Philistines in the same valley ended in their being completely routed and driven back to the coast.

17. 'a stronghold': probably a place he had learned i to use in his outlaw days, e.g. the cave at Odollam. 18. Valley of Rephaim: stretching SW. from the neighbourhood of Jerusalem. 20. 'divided my enemies': lit. 'The Lord hath broken down my enemies like the breaking of waters'—like a river in full flood sweeping through every obstacle. 21. 'their idols': as Philistines had once captured the Ark, so now the Israelites capture the Philistine gods which had been carried into battle to ensure victory. 23. 'fetch a compass behind them': go round behind them and attack them in the rear. 24. 'pear-tree': the 'Baka-tree' was a kind of balsam tree. When they hear a rustling, it will be a sign that Yahweh is marching in front of their army.

VI 1-23 The Ark is brought to Jerusalem—To make 259a his new capital a religious as well as a geographical centre, David transferred the Ark from the territory of Ephraim to Jerusalem. His design suffered a set-back in the death of Oza, but after the Ark had remained in the house of Obbededom, David's project was crowned with success. Just as the Davidic kingdom was a visible monarchy with its centre in Jerusalem, so the inspired vision of the prophets foresaw a regenerated Sion, the City of the Great King, whither the nations would flock in vast numbers to walk in the paths of the God of Jacob; cf. Ps 47:2; Am 9:11; Is 44. The NT writers likewise emphasize the One City which God himself frames and constructs on eternal foundations to be the new metropolis gathering men into unique fellowship before God. 'To this city you are come, to Mount Sion, and to the city of the living God, and to a heavenly Jerusalem . . . and to Jesus the mediator of the New Testament', Heb 12:22-24.

3. Gabaa: some hill near Cariathiarim. The writer b of 1 Par 13:5 f. gives a more elaborate account of the whole incident. 7. 'struck him': Num 4:5, 15, 19 forbade under pain of death any but priests to touch the Ark except with the staves provided for that purpose. The unapproachable holiness of Yahweh and the incomparable majesty of his Being placed a decisive gulf between Israel's God and the degraded deities of its neighbours. But it would take the wayward people of primitive Israel centuries to learn that most essential lesson thoroughly. It had to learn it the hard way, if divine revelation was to be preserved for mankind. No other way would impress a young nation surrounded by a world of licentious polytheism. The sudden death of Oza was a drastic reminder that the new era of c VII 1-17 The Davidic Covenant—David proposed to build a temple for Yahweh. Yahweh rewarded this desire by promising rather to build him a royal house which would endure for ever. The force of this divine oracle was to bind his seed and house irrevocably to the kingly dignity of the future Messias. Most authors admit its great importance for the growth of the Messianic Hope in Israel. There are, however, two main modes of interpretation accepted by scholars.

(1) The one applies part of the prophecy to Solomon and part of it to Christ, or accepts what is affirmed literally of Solomon as something to be applied typically to the Messias. In other words 'thy seed' is understood in an individual sense. (2) More recent authors such as Dhorme, Ceuppens, Denncfeld, Leimbach, and Kittel understand the word 'seed' in a collective sense, as embracing not only Solomon but the whole Davidic dynasty and including the culminating figure in that dynasty—the Messias. In their opinion the oracle does not deal exclusively with Solomon. 13 and 16 can hardly be true of Solomon's reign from 980-938 B.C. Secondly, 19 shows that David understood it to cover all his posterity, and the author of Ps 88:30-38 in his reference to this oracle obviously accepts it in a collective sense. Neither can this prophecy refer exclusively to the Messias for 14 cannot be applied to him, but is applicable to the dynasty of David as a whole. Hence according to this interpretation the prophecy is Messianic in the literal

d and not only in the typical sense, and promises that the posterity of David will reign forever, but certain things in it cannot be affirmed in the strict literal sense of each and every member of the royal line, e.g. 14 cannot be applied to the Messias, and of him only can be understood literally the king's divine sonship. The true fulfilment of the everlasting kingdom of David and the fullness of divine sonship are shown in Lk 1:32 f. and Heb 1:5. Père Desnoyers sums up the significance of this divine promise in these words: 'His (David's) whole mind is centred round the divine promise that his people are established as the people of Yahweh, and that his dynasty will reign forever over the people of his God. . . . Not only is the old covenant between Yahweh and Israel proclaimed anew, but the kingship itself, in spite of its newness, now shared in the solidity of that covenant: the work of Moses is completed by the work of David. Therefore the dynasty of David will have the duty of collaborating with the work of Yahweh on earth. Their destinies are linked together for all time', Peuple hébreu, 3, 707 f.

e 1. 'when the king sat in his house': This ch is not in strict chronological relation with ch 6, but its subject-matter, the building of a temple for the Ark, does form a logical connexion. 1b would point to the later years of David's life. But 12 shows that Solomon was not yet born. We cannot deduce the exact date with any certainty. 2. Nathan: one of the great religious leaders of David's reign. He rebuked David for his adultery (12:1), was tutor to Solomon (12:25), and wrote a history of the reign of David, and part at least of Solomon's reign (1 Par 29:29; 2 Par 9:29). 5. 'Thus saith the Lord': the logical sequence of thought in 5-16 is fairly clear. Hitherto Yahweh had not expressed any desire for such a house or temple as David had in mind. David's kingdom was not completely established—wars had to go on—and the time was not yet ripe to build what was to be the temple of that kingdom. Nevertheless Yahweh's past mercies to him are to reach their culmination in a fresh covenant of grace with the house of David. The day will come when Yahweh shall build David a royal house that shall stand forever in his sight. 12. 'thy seed': should be understood collectively, because it refers to a royal house that will endure forever. It includes Solomon, 3 Kg 8:15-20; then the line of kings who sat on the throne of Judah and finally Christ in whom it finds its highest fulfilment, Ac 2:29-30; 13:22 f. 13. 'he shall build': explicitly this refers to David's dynasty in general, but implicitly it refers to Solomon who was one of its members. 14. 'I will be to him a father': in view of Israel's special election by God, the theocratic people as a whole was the 'son of Yahweh', Ex 4:22. In virtue of this special covenant, the sacred sonship of the nation culminated in the unique sonship of the king of Israel. Hence Christ, the Son of God, came in his Father's name, revealing His Father's mind, and speaking with his Father's authority. Jn 1:49; 5:43; 10:30; Heb 1:5.

18-29 David's Prayer of Thanksgiving—19. 'is the law of Adam': lit. this is the instruction of man. Ewald compares this obscure phrase with the text of 1 Par 17:17 which he translates 'and thou allowest me to look on the succession of men upwards', i.e. far into the future of my offspring. By changing the initial word tôrâh Dhorme reads 'and this thou hast announced to man'. Man is now made aware of the things God has destined for the future.

VIII 1-15 David's Conquest—The development of David's kingdom is shown in this summary account of his victories over the Philistines, Moab, Soba, Damascus, and Edom. The power of the Philistines was broken along the Mediterranean sea-board, and by the conquest of Moab, and later, Ammon, David's kingdom became the dominant power of Syria, stretching from Lebanon to the Red Sea. These victories also opened on every side the highways for foreign trade which contributed so much to the opulence of Solomon's reign.

1. 'bridle of tribute': MT meleg-hā-'ammāh. The Chronicler, 1 Par 18:1, read 'Gath' for meleg, and understood 'ammāh in the sense of 'mother-city' or metropolis. Sayce prefers to compare it with the Babylonian meleg-ammāti which would signify 'the highroad of the mainland' of Palestine, and would refer to the command of the highroad of trade which passed through Canaan from Asia to Egypt and Arabia. 3. Soba: a small Aramaean kingdom north of Damascus. 7. 'brought them to Jerusalem': LXX addition notes 'And Susakim [Sheshak], king of Egypt, took them when he went up to Jerusalem in the days of Roboam the son of Solomon'. 8. Bete, Beroth: both unidentified. 9. Emath: a town of considerable importance on the Oronates. 13. Valley of the saltpits: on the borderline of Judah and Edom—the last place where we should expect to find Syrians. By reading daleth for resh, instead of Syrians, we can read 'Edom', which lies to the south of the Dead Sea.

16-18 David's Officials and Administrators—This list names the holders of the chief offices of State. Another list is given in 20:23-26. Joab was commander-in-chief of the army. Josaphat was something more than a recorder; he was head of civil affairs. He kept the king informed of the business of state, and gave his counsel, like a Vizier of oriental courts. Saraias had the duty of drafting and keeping official documents, and perhaps of recording outstanding events of the reign. In religious affairs the chief priests were Sadoc and Abiathar whose name should be read second; Achimelech had already been killed by Saul. Sadoc became the sole chief priest when Abiathar was deposed after Solomon's accession. In addition to the standing army the king had a personal bodyguard of foreign 259f troops, something like the Swiss Guard at the Vatican. These Cerethi (Cretans) and Phelethi (Philistines) could be depended upon in every crisis. In case of rebellion or disaffection among the people, they would have no scruple in fighting the king's fellow-countrymen and at the same time the position of trust made them feel that they were as much the king's subjects as the Israelites themselves.

j 17. Sadoc belonged to the house of Eleazar, 1 Par 6:4-8. He joined David after Saul's death, 1 Par 12:28, and remained faithful to him all his life, and finally after sharing the priesthood with Abiathar was appointed the sole high priest, 3 Kg 2:35. 18. 'princes': The Heb. word for priest, kōhen, used here in MT, is derived from a root meaning 'to serve' or 'to minister', and is sometimes used of ministers at court, cf. 1 Par 18:17 which gives the paraphrase 'were chief about the king'.

260a IX 1-18 David and Miphiboseth—Chapters 9-20 are admitted by all to be a literary unit derived from a single document recording incidents of David's court life. They are of the utmost value as historical documents written close to the events they describe. Many a new dynasty has ensured its ultimate security by the complete destruction of every member of the house it has supplanted. In facing and in solving this question, David showed once more his noble generosity and political wisdom. He sought out Jonathan's lame son Miphiboseth, bestowed on him Saul's family estates and treated him like his own son. At the same time he kept him under his own eye at Jerusalem, and appointed Siba to act as bailiff of Miphiboseth's estates. The nobles of Benjamin would be less likely to think of the rights of Saul's house when Jonathan's son was out of the way.

b 3. 'the mercy of God': in fulfilment of his vow to Jonathan, 1 Kg 20:14-17, 42, David's kindness would be like God's kindness, enduring and bountiful. 4. Machir must have been an important personage in Lodabar, judging from his welcome to David when fleeing from Absalom, 17:27. Lodabar: a town E. of the Jordan, probably near Mahanaim. 10. 'may be maintained': though a guest of David, he needed the revenues from his estates to support his household. 11. 'And Siba said': the second half of this reply is out of place as the words of Siba. It is better to follow LXX which has 'So Miphiboseth ate at David's table, as one of the king's sons'.

c X-XII War with the Ammonites—On his accession to the throne of Ammon, Hanon (Hanun), the son of Naas, treated David's ambassadors in a most shameful fashion. This led immediately to war with Israel. The whole incident was intended to precipitate a crisis. David's growing power and undisputed independence aroused the suspicions of the neighbouring kingdoms. A settlement was becoming inevitable. A coalition of Aramaean kingdoms lying to the east and north-east joined with Ammon in opening hostilities. Joab, commander of David's army, met the united forces of the Ammonites and their Syrian allies. He divided his troops into two forces, one of which, under his brother Abisai, was to engage the Ammonites, while he countered any attack from the rear. The Ammonites fled to their city of Rabbath and the Syrians were routed, but the battle was not decisive. In a second campaign, 15-19, the Syrians were defeated by David, and the lesser kings in the neighbourhood also submitted. A year later Joab was sent to besiege the Ammonite capital.

d 2. 'shewed kindness to me': there is no express reference in Scripture to this kindness to David. Probably as an enemy of Saul he had sheltered David during his early wanderings. 4. 'shaved off the one half': the greatest of insults in a society where the beard was a symbol of manhood. They added to this by inflicting indecent exposure on the inviolable persons of ambassadors. 6. Rohob: a town in the Lebanon district near Dan. Maacha: a small kingdom in the same region as Soba. Istob: 'the men of Tob'—unidentified. The text of 1 Par 19, gives other details, but the mention of 32,000 chariots must be due to a defective reading. 12. 'city of our God': an unusual phrase. Klostermann conjectures that the Ark of God must have been there. More probably it was simply equivalent to our expression 'For God and Fatherland'. 16. 'the river': the Euphrates. 17. Helam: unknown.

XI 2-27 David's Adultery—At the height of his triumphs David fell into adultery with Bethsabee. To conceal his guilt he procured the death of the man he had wronged. Joab carried out David's orders, and Bethsabee married her seducer. Divine condemnation and punishment were announced by the prophet Nathan. David repented but the child of the union died. Saints and sinners have found in this story a lesson for all time, a warning of the power and consequence of sin, and a message of hope for the humble and contrite heart. Moreover the incident is important historically. It explains the sudden eclipse of the good fortune of David's prosperous reign. It also illustrates the great vigour and austerity of the moral standards of Israel which bound king and subject alike. 'To the ordinary eastern mind, for the king to take the wife of a subject is quite normal and natural, for the sovereign is well within his rights. Few men in David's position would have found it necessary either to conceal the act or get rid of the husband. But in Israel a man was a man, even though he were a subject and of foreign birth, and his property and rights must be respected. Characteristic, also, are the rebuke of Nathan and the repentance of the king. Neither would have been conceivable in any other nation of the ancient east', *T. H. Robinson, A History of Israel, I, 225.

1. Rabbath: twenty miles east of Jordan. 3. Urias f the Hethite: though a Hittite by race, his name, meaning 'light of Yahweh', seems to show that he was a worshipper of Israel's God. 5. 'she told . . . David': the Mosaic law ordered the death penalty for adultery, Lev 20:10, but Bethsabee relied on David to find some way out of the difficulty. 6. 'David sent to Joab': 6-25 are a pitiless exposure of all the sinner's subterfuges. They show to what a grovelling level David's sin had reduced the once chivalrous idol of his people. 13. 'made him drunk': to make him forget his resolution not to go home to his wife. 14. 'by the hand of Urias': this brave officer was made to carry his own death-warrant. 21. 'who killed Abimelech': an interesting reference to Jg 9:50-4, which shows a familiarity with that period. 22. After this verse LXX adds that David was angry and spoke to the messenger in practically the same phrases as occur in 20 f. This addition may well be genuine, though it may seem strange that Joab should anticipate David's words so accurately. However it was probably an established maxim of Israelite warfare not to approach the walls of a besieged city too openly, and this was phrased proverbially by a reference to Abimelech's ignominious death. 24. 'king's servants': LXX gives the number as 18.

XII 1-31 Nathan's Parable—As if consulting David g about a case of heartless oppression of the poor by the rich, Nathan skilfully aroused the king's hatred of everything that was mean and cruel, until David seems the very embodiment of avenging justice. We can sense the dramatic pause after 6, and then like the thrust of a sword Nathan's 'Thou art the man' tearing open David's inmost soul. Henceforth he is a changed man. He has tangled a coil of difficulties and sorrow around his life which will have terrible results in the future.

10. 'the sword shall never depart': an allusion h to the indirect consequences of David's sin in the deaths of Ammon, Absalom, and Adonias. 11. 'I will raise up evil': God would allow the same ungovernable passions that had mastered David, murder and lust, to be scourges of his sin. 23. 'I shall go to him': implies a belief that man lives on in Sheol after death. 24. Solomon: his name in Hebrew, Šlōmōh, means 'Peaceful'. His other name Jedidiah, 'Beloved of Yahweh', comes from a root cognate to that of David's 260h own name. 26. 'Joab fought': the account of the siege of Rabbath is resumed. 30. 'a talent of gold': about 100 lb.—too heavy to be worn, but the talent may refer to its great value rather than to its weight. 31. 'sawed them': lit. he put them on the saw. Probably it means he made them his industrial slaves by employing them in sawmills and brickmills, etc.

261a XIII 1-38 The Sin of Amnon and its Consequences

—The later years of David's life were clouded by the crimes of his own family. The dangers of his polygamous court now reveal themselves in the character and deeds of his sons, Amnon and Absalom. Amnon was tormented by the same passion that ruined his father. By the advice of the unscrupulous Jonadab, Amnon used trickery to commit a shameful outrage against his beautiful half-sister, Tamar—the full sister of Absalom. His crime and its brutality are described with a realism which is common to all these early denunciations of immorality. He was David's eldest son and his conduct was a cruel blow to his father; yet David did not punish him, because he still loved him. David's weakness in the matter aroused Absalom to take the law into his own hands. He imitated his father's treachery in dealing with Urias, and where his father had been guilty of homicide, he became guilty of fratricide. To avoid the vengeance of Amnon's kinsmen, Absalom fled to his grandfather's court at Gessur.

b 6. 'two little messes': two little cakes suitable for an invalid. 13. 'he will not deny me to thee': perhaps a last desperate expedient suggested by Tamar to gain time. Such marriages had been tolerated in patriarchal times, but were forbidden by the Mosaic law, Deut 27:22; Lev 18:9. 20. 'hold thy peace': a public scandal must be avoided, and Absalom intended to take full vengeance for the crime. If nothing was said, Amnon's fears and suspicions would be allayed. 21. 'exceedingly grieved': the rest of this verse is not in the MT. Many of the world's worst criminals are trained in homes where parents are too weak or selfish to insist on those vital lessons of discipline and justice which are the only bulwarks against the inevitable temptations of life. 27. 'he let Amnon . . . go with him': even David is made an unconscious agent in the tragedy which followed. 32. 'he was appointed by the mouth': Jonadab, the same man as in 3, sets aside the exaggerated rumours of wholesale slaughter. He tells David that the look on Absalom's face foretold who his victim was to be. 34. 'young man that kept the watch': a sentinel on one of the towers of the city. LXX has an additional variation: 'And behold much people were coming in the way behind him by the side of the hill at the descent. And the watchman came and told the king and said: "I have seen men coming from the way of Oronen, by the side of the hill". And Jonadab said', etc. This Oronen probably represents Beth-horon, NW. of Jerusalem. 37. Tholomai: the father of Absalom's mother. 'mourned for his son': Amnon, not Absalom. His first feelings towards Absalom were those of anger. 38. 'ceased to pursue': in LXX the subject of 'pursue' is not the king, but 'the spirit of the king'. AV describes the spirit of David as 'longing to go forth unto Absalom', but the Heb. word does not bear that meaning here. The general sense required by the context is that David's active hostility to Absalom was dying away with the passing of the years.

c XIV 1-33 The Return of Absalom—After two years of exile Absalom enlisted the help of Joab to procure his return to his father's court. Joab sent a shrewd woman from Thecua near Bethlehem with a pathetic story which would appeal to David's sympathy. As in the case of Nathan, before he realized the drift of the appeal, he was committed to applying the principles of the story to his own case, and the old smouldering fire of affection for Absalom burst into flame. At first Absalom was not admitted into the king's presence, but with Joab's intervention the reconciliation was completed.

d 2. Thecua: 5 miles south of Bethlehem, the home of the shepherd prophet Amos. 7. 'quench my spark': 261d if the demand for blood-revenge is carried out, it will mean the destruction forever of her family. 9. 'may the king': she insinuates that the king is dismissing her with mere promises. This forces David to commit himself by oath that the woman's son shall be saved. 13. 'Why hast thou': David had admitted there were possible exceptions to the general law of blood-revenge; why did he not apply the same principle in the case of Absalom, his own son, where there was every reason for doing so? His obstinacy in this matter was an injury done to God's people since it deprived them of an heir to the throne. He is acting against his own son like the blood-avengers in her own story. 14. 'We all die': life is uncertain and no harshness to Absalom will bring back the dead Amnon. 19. 'neither on the left hand': David's question had lighted on the exact truth. 26. 'according to the common weight': rather 'according to the king's weight'. 200 ordinary shekels would mean about 61 lbs. Either the king's measure must have been much smaller, or as is often the case with numbers, some error has crept into the text. 27. 'three sons': not named because none of them lived very long, cf. 18:18. 29. 'he would not come': Joab was the soul of loyalty and hesitated to deal with one who was not yet a persona grata with David.

XV 1-XVI 23 Absalom's Rebellion—After four years (the 40 of v 7 is a copyist's error), Absalom used the technique of a demagogue to win his father's throne. By his intrigues he implicated a great number of the nobility in the conspiracy at Hebron. David fled from Jerusalem, but the prominent men of his court remained faithful to him: Joab, the priests Sadoc and Abiathar, Chusai his counsellor, and his noble Philistine friend Ethai. David refused to take the Ark with him, and the two priests together with Chusai were sent back to Jerusalem to sabotage the enemy's plans. During his flight, Sibah, who was Miphiboseth's estate-agent, met him with a welcome present of provisions. A second incident was humiliating to David. The resentment of those Benjaminites who still remained faithful to Saul, found expression in the jeers and curses of a certain Semei (Shimei).

7. 'forty': this should be 'four' according to the 1 Qeri of MT, Josephus, Syr. and Arabic versions. 9. Hebron: the old capital of Judah which might still be jealous of the growing prestige of Jerusalem. 11. 'two hundred men': these special guests were in a compromising situation. Their presence at the feast would seem to betoken complicity in Absalom's plot, and if they showed any lack of enthusiasm, they could easily be held as hostages. 12. Achitophel: there is a strange parallel between this Judas of the OT and the Judas of NT times, cf. Jn 13:18 ff. Treachery and suicide are the marks of both. 18. 'all his servants': the LXX rendering agrees with our MT with the addition of readings from a more primitive Hebrew text: 'And all his servants passed on beside him, and all the Cerethi and all the Phelethi, and halted at the olive tree in the wilderness. And all the people marched by close to him and all his attendants, and all the mighty men [Gibborim] and all the warriors, six hundred men, and were present by his side, and all the Cerethi and all the Phelethi, and all the Gethites, the six hundred men who came after him from Geth, marched on before the king'. In this march-past of the troops, the general body of David's men come first, then the foreign mercenaries, and finally more recent reinforcements who were probably under the leadership of Ethai, mentioned in the next verse. 19. 'said to Ethai': David suggests that this foreigner need not embroil himself in the king's misfortunes. He is free to enlist in the service of whatever king rules in Jerusalem. 23. 'the brook Cedron': in the valley east of Jerusalem, mentioned in the NT when our Lord was leaving the city that had rejected him, Jn 18:1. 32. Arachite: the Arachites are mentioned in Jos 16:2 between Luza and Ataroth.

261g XVI 3. 'Siba answered': he pretended that Jonathan's son was hoping that Absalom's revolt would benefit the house of Saul. David was hurt by this seeming ingratitude and without further inquiry made over Miphiboseh's estates to Siba. 10. 'the king said': David refuses to adopt the feelings of these Sons of Thunder of the OT. In his old age he was not so magnanimous, cf. 3 Kg 2:8. The Kethib is to be translated, 'If he curseth, and if the Lord hath said to him, "Curse David", then who shall say . . . ?' The Qeri makes better sense: 'So let him curse, for the Lord hath said . . . and who shall say . . .'. Semei is only an instrument of Divine Providence permitted by God to make David suffer for his sins. 14. 'came weary there': evidently some place-name has fallen out of the text. Lucian inserts 'beyond the Jordan'. 18. 'Chusai answered': he pretends that 'vox populi, vox Dei' has won him over to Absalom's cause. 21. 'Achitophel said': Absalom must take possession of his father's harem. This act of royal authority would convince waverers in the party that nothing could now heal this final breach with his father. Otherwise they might well fear a possible reconciliation and then they would be left to face the consequences. 22. 'spread a tent': the bridal tent of Semitic peoples, a relic of which may be seen in the Kuppah or canopy still used in the marriage ritual of modern Jews. 23. 'as if a man': men listened to his advice as if they were listening to some divine oracle.

262a XVII 1-29 Achitophel's Counsel Defeated by Chusai—With great skill Chusai opposed Achitophel's proposal that David must be annihilated without the slightest delay. To give David time to rally stronger forces, he emphasized the need for the utmost caution in dealing with a man of David's reputation. He played upon Absalom's personal vanity by telling him that he must lead the army in person, and sent word to David telling him how to act. In the duel of wits, the crafty Chusai won the day. His rival Achitophel knew that his whole policy had received its death blow. When he committed suicide, Absalom's rebellion lost the brain which alone could have brought success.

b 3. 'I will bring back': the copyist has obviously omitted some other words which are retained in the LXX. 'I will bring back all the people to thee as the bride returns to her husband; only one man thou seekest—and all the people will be at peace', i.e. there is no need for civil war, it is a question of one man disturbing the peace between Absalom and Israel. 8. 'not lodge with people': either an experienced warrior like David will be hiding in some stronghold where he will not allow himself to be surprised by his enemies, or (if we take the verb as a hiph'il) he will not allow his men to rest, but will have them ready to ambush Absalom's men. 11. 'thou shalt be': a flattering picture of Absalom leading an immense and victorious army. 17. Rogel is probably Bir Ayyub near the junction of the valleys of Kidron and Hinnom. 22. 'over the Jordan: he halted finally at 'the camp', i.e. at Mahanaim as in 2:8. 25. 'Jethra of Jezrael': MT has 'Ithra the Israelite', but it would be superfluous to add his nationality, unless he were a foreigner. In 1 Par 2:17 he is called the Ishmaelite, and this seems more probable. Naas seems to be another name for Jesse in 1 Par 2:13, 16.

c XVIII 1-33 Defeat and Death of Absalom—When reviewing his troops before battle, David publicly commanded his three generals, Joab, Abisai, and Ethai to spare Absalom's life. Thousands of Absalom's men lost their lives in the thickets and bogs near the battlefield. Joab paid no attention to David's wishes, as often when they ran counter to his own. To him Absalom was a rebel and a serious threat to David's kingdom, and he made sure of his death. David's cry of heartbroken grief for his son remains one of the most moving passages in all literature.

d 3. 'to succour us': by sending reinforcements, if need be. 8. 'consumed': the pits, swamps, and trees so hindered those who fled that they were easily overtaken and slain. 9. 'his head stuck': the mule riding at full speed left Absalom with his head wedged in the forked branch of an oak. 17. 'great heap of stones': a monument of shame like that over the grave of Achan, Jos 7:26. This is in contrast with the splendid tomb Absalom had intended for himself, cf. next verse. 21. 'Joab said': as his name implies, Chusai was probably an Egyptian or Nubian slave who, unlike Achimaas, had nothing to lose by being the bearer of bad news.

XIX 1-40 David's Return to Jerusalem—At first, e David's outburst of grief for Absalom threatened to cause dismay and desertion among the troops. Once more Joab came to the rescue of his royal master. The good sense of this old soldier's gruff speech forced David to make a public appearance for the sake of the people who had indeed saved his throne. A general amnesty was granted to the rebels. On his way to Jerusalem he met the now obsequious Semei and Miphiboseh. His host Berzellai declined an invitation to come to court.

8. 'Israel fled': those of the people who had followed f Absalom, as contrasted with the rest of the nation. This prepares us for the account of the negotiations necessary for the full restoration of David to his throne. 10. 'Absalom is dead': the people remembered the advantages of David's rule, now that Absalom was dead. The LXX 'And the word of all Israel came to the king' implies that rumours in favour of his restoration had reached his ears. 11. 'ancients of Judah': these elders hesitated about the king's return, because so many of their tribesmen had taken a prominent part in the rebellion. 13. Amasa: David promised him Joab's post as head of the army. This was David's solitary attempt to curb his outspoken general. 21. 'the Lord's anointed': to curse the king was to curse the representative of Yahweh himself and therefore akin to blasphemy. 20. 'house of Joseph': the ten tribes of Israel as distinguished from Judah. 22. 'a satan to me': an opponent of my true interests; cf. Mt 16:23. Later by his command to Solomon, 3 Kg 2:8 ff., David broke the spirit, if not the letter, of his promise of clemency to Semei. 24. 'had not washed': all these signs of neglect were marks of sorrow. 25. 'at Jerusalem': should probably be emended to 'from Jerusalem'. A number of LXX MSS support this correction. 29. 'divide': David insists on a compromise in order to placate both parties. 37. 'Chamaam': Berzellai declines David's kind invitation because of his advanced age, but suggests that his son should take his place.

41-XX 22 Seba's Rebellion—The deep-rooted jealousy g between the tribes of the north and south was not destroyed by David's restoration. The men of Israel accused Judah of receiving preferential treatment from the king. Taking advantage of this quarrel, Seba, a Benjamite, raised a revolt. David commissioned Amasa to muster the army and deal with the rebellion, but Amasa lacked Joab's energy and prestige and was unable to carry out the king's orders. In desperation, David ordered Abisai to march against Seba. On this occasion Joab occupied a very subordinate position, and the murder of Abner with which Joab had begun his career, was repeated in the treacherous murder of Amasa at the close of it. Joab took command and the insurrection was soon at an end. He returned with his army to the capital to continue as the grim, invincible power behind the throne.

41. 'Stolen thee away': why have the men of Judah, h who were so slow in recognizing David as king again, been allowed to escort the king home, when only a fraction of the northern tribes were present? The men of Judah are acting in this way to secure a monopoly of royal favours! 'and all the men of David with him': this may mean, as Dhorme suggests, 'After all, all David's men are (equally) his people'—not merely the tribe of Judah. 42. 'Have we eaten': they have not had any material benefit, if that is what these Israelites are insinuating. XX 1. 'there happened to be there':

262h in this tense atmosphere of sectional interests, Seba ambitiously asserted the rights of the tribe of Benjamin to the throne. His clan traced its descent back to Bochri, the second son of Benjamin, cf. Gen 46:21. 8. 'great stone': a well-known landmark; cf. 1 Kg 6:14 ff. 10. 'Amasa did not notice': LXX has "the sword came out and fell down". He purposely let his ordinary sword fall down, as he approached Amasa, in order to disarm his suspicions, while he killed his rival with a dagger concealed beneath his military cloak. 15. 'Abela and in Bethmaacha': Abel-Beth-Macaacha is a place in the northern extremity of Israelite territory and is called Abel-Maim, 'Abel of the Waters' in 2 Par 16:4. 19. 'overthrow a mother': this city is so renowned for its wisdom and traditions, that Job should not destroy it, but pay it the veneration due to a mother. 22. 'Joab returned to the king': we are not told how David received him, but he must have realized that Joab was now indispensable.

I XX 23-26 David's Ministers—A list of people who held administrative posts at David's court concludes this account of his reign. The remaining chapters are in the nature of an appendix. An earlier list of officials has been given, 8:16-18. This second one must have been drawn up in the latter part of his reign. The material of these summaries is repeated by the Chronicler, who adds in 1 Par 27:25-34 a list of twelve officials who had charge of the royal estates and herds. David's reign had brought the country the benefits of organized administration and all the machinery of a civilized oriental state. Joab was head of the War Department. The names and offices of Josaphat, Sadoc, and Banaïas occur again. Siva is apparently another name for Saraïas of 8:17. Ira the Jairite's name is substituted in place of that of David's sons. A more important addition is the name of Aduram (LXX, Adoniram) who was head of the Royal Treasury, but his actual duties were more like those of the Ministry of Labour. One of Solomon's ministers called Adoniram was in charge of the labour gangs which were raised under a system of corvée. Probably he held a similar post in David's time.

263a XXI-XXIV Appendix—The four remaining chapters contain six appendices, derived from various sources and inserted here in order not to interrupt the narrative account of David's reign. The logical sequel to 20:26 is 3 Kgs 1:1.

b XXI 1-14 The Story of Respha and the Famine—A three years famine forced David to inquire of Yahweh why the land had suffered in this way. The answer was that it was due to Saul's breach of faith and slaughter of the Gabaonites in spite of their covenant with Israel. The Gabaonites demanded blood for blood. David shielded Miphiboseh, but two sons of Respha (Saul's concubine) and five sons of Merob were taken to be sacrificed. With the heroic devotion of motherhood Respha kept her terrible watch beside the dead. Day after day she beat off the vultures and birds of prey. Night after night she drove away the prowling beasts which came to feast among the dead. In the end when there was little left but bleached bones, David insisted on giving them honourable burial beside Saul and Jonathan.

c 1. 'in the days of David': the literary style and primitive religious ideas of this narrative reveal its early date. It may be closely connected with the events of ch 9. 'his bloody house': LXX seems to be nearer the Heb. original: 'Upon Saul and his house is blood-guiltiness'. Yahweh is represented as the avenger of the broken covenant between the Gabaonites and Israel (Jos 9:3 f.), though we are not told the exact details of Saul's crime. The sense of the rights and responsibilities of each individual was as yet undeveloped, and in these early days the sins of the heads of families were thought to involve all its members in their consequences. Later divine revelation made it clear that each individual conscience was responsible for its own guilt, Ez 18:2-4. Yet there is a deep psychological truth behind these primitive conceptions of family unity. We are all bound to one another intellectually, socially, and spiritually, each of us in some measure is a product of all that has gone before. This solidarity of mankind is raised to a divine unity in the doctrine of the Mystical Body of Christ. 2. 'Now the Gabaonites': this is an explanatory gloss introduced into the text. 3. 'the atonement': i.e. make some expiatory offering which will appease Yahweh's anger and bring a blessing upon Israel. 4. 'any man': we have no quarrel with the Israelites in general, only with the house of Saul. 6. 'crucify them': the exact meaning of the Heb. verb is uncertain. The general meaning of LXX suggests hanging. 'in Gabaon': this was to be the scene of the execution. Some MSS omit Saul's name. Then instead of b'hîr Yahweh ('the chosen of Yahweh') we can read b'har Yahweh ('in the mountain of Yahweh'). Thus the execution of vengeance would be a religious act done in the presence of Yahweh as in 1 Kg 15:33. We know from 3 Kg 3:4 that there was a special sanctuary at Gabaon in Solomon's time. 7. 'Miphiboseh': not to be confused with Isbeseh who was Saul's son. 8. 'Michol': a copyist's mistake for Merob who was married to Hadriel. The Targum says these sons were adopted by Michol. 9. 'barley began to be reaped': i.e. towards the end of April. 10. 'water dropped': until October, unless the rainfall was earlier.

15-22 Exploits against the Philistines—All commentators remark that the text here and in 23:8-39 is very uncertain. The main outline of the account seems to be that (a) David's life was in danger from a giant Philistine, but Abisai came to the rescue in the nick of time. (b) At Gob (unidentified) three more Philistines are slain. It is to be noted that 1 Par 20:47 gives a parallel account of the events narrated in 18-22 of this section. There seems no reason for doubting that the Goliath in 19 is the same person as in 1 Kg 17, and both David and Elhanan cannot have killed the same man. Hence many modern critics consider 1 Kg 17 embodies a later tradition in which the exploit of Elhanan was attributed to his royal master. This overlooks the fact that it must have been precisely some such astounding feat of arms which first brought David into public notice. Ewald suggests that the name of Goliath was borrowed from the conflict of the real Goliath with Elhanan to denote the Philistine giant slain by David. Jerome (Quaest. Heb., ad loc.) makes David the same as Elhanan. Another solution put forward is based on the text of 1 Par 20:5. 'Elhanan (Adeodatus), son of Jair, slew Lahmi the brother of Goliath of Geth,' so that not Goliath, but Goliath's brother was Elhanan's victim. The Heb. letters of the word Bethlehemite (bêl hallahmî 'êl) could easily be confused with 'êl-lahmî 'hî ('Lahmi the brother of').

16. Arapha: the first vowel represents the Heb. article in Hā-Rāpāh, a collective term for the prehistoric inhabitants of the land. 17. 'put out the lamp': by losing his life the king would plunge the nation into the darkness of sorrow and disaster; cf. Ps 131:17; 3 Kg 11:36; 4 Kg 8:19. 18. Sobochai: one of David's generals; cf. 1 Par 27:11. 21. Jonathan: a nephew of David's. David's brother is called Semmaa in 13:3; Samma in 1 Kg 16:9; and Simmaa in 1 Par 2:13.

XXII 1-51 David's Song of Thanksgiving—This song is repeated in the Psalter as Ps 17, where see commentary.

XXIII 1-7 David's Last Words—There is no way of determining the exact date of this psalm of David's. Like Moses before his death (Deut 32) David is represented as giving his last will and testament in a prayer. It sums up David's confidence that Yahweh will keep his promise of an eternal covenant with the house of David. It is obviously poetic in structure.

1. Oracle of David son of Jesse,
Oracle of the man raised up on high,
The Anointed of the God of Jacob,
Sweet psalmist of Israel.

- 263g 2. The Spirit of Yahweh spoke by me,
And his word was on my tongue ;
3. The God of Jacob has spoken—
The Rock of Israel said to me—
He that ruleth over men justly, Ruling in the fear of God ;
4. (He) is like the light of morning at sunrise,
The sun of a cloudless morning,
Making the green earth glisten after rain.
5. Yea, my house standeth firm with God,
For an everlasting covenant has he made with me ;
Firmly established in all things, and he will keep it,
For all my salvation and delight are in him.
6. But the wicked shall not flourish,
They are all like desert thorns,
They cannot be gathered by hand,
7. Nor can any man touch them,
Unless armed with iron and spear,

b There are many textual obscurities in this passage, but its general sense is quite clear. It should be considered as complementary to the divine promise made in 2 Kg 7. It celebrates the special glory of the Davidic dynasty, some features of which were partially realized in Solomon and the more noble of the kings of Judah, but completely so in Christ alone. As the Targum of Jonathan says : ' These are the words of the prophecy of David concerning the end of the age, concerning the days of consolation which are to come '. Many of its characteristic features are emphasized in the writings of later prophets. Ruler, e.g. Mic 5:2 ; Justice, Is 11:1-5 ; Jer 23:5 ; 33:15 ; Fear of the Lord, Is 11:3, and the closing words of the last prophet re-echo these last words of David, Mal 4:2.

i 1. ' said ' : lit. ' the utterance ', n'ûm, the technical Heb. word for a divinely inspired utterance ; cf. Num 24:3 ' The man . . . Christ ' : this follows LXX. The Old Latin has ' quem suscitavit Deus '. ' God of Jacob ' : the story of Jacob's wanderings, his trust in God's care, and God's covenant with him have their parallel in David's life. ' excellent psalmist ' : lit. ' delightful in Israel's psalms '. He educated and developed the religious life of the nation as much by his psalms as by his rule as king. 3. ' God of Israel ' : he claims divine inspiration for his oracle—the Ruling Force, the central Rock of the whole nation speaks in him. ' the ruler of men ' : in a few words he draws the portrait of the ideal king, completely under the guidance of the fear of God. 4. ' light of the morning ' : the blessings of his reign can only be compared to life-giving sunshine and the fresh greenness that follows a springtide shower of rain. 5. ' Neither is my house ' : this negative seems to be the very opposite of what David wishes to say. For this reason some authors translate the Heb. particle lô' in a negative sense demanding an affirmative answer. ' firm in all things ' : carefully drawn up in every detail like a legal document. 6. ' as thorns ' : in contrast to the fresh green of the kingdom in its prosperity, there is the evil growth of thorns which cannot be touched with the naked hand ; they must be torn up with iron hooks.

264a 8-39 A List of David's Heroes and their Exploits—Under the warrior-king David both the army and methods of war were greatly improved. The Supreme Commander was Joab. As a rule the entire force was divided into three divisions and their leadership entrusted to chosen generals. A selected number called the Thirty, whose exploits and bravery were outstanding, provided the nucleus for a further corps of officers. In addition, a central mobile force of sixty picked men, called the Heroes (2 Kg 10:7) formed a body of household troops. Later in David's reign we meet with a special royal guard of professional soldiers of foreign extraction, but the Three divisional commanders and the Thirty Heroes formed the backbone of the army. Some of their deeds of bravery reveal a magnificent spirit of daring and chivalry. The parallel account in 1 Par 11:11-41 is put after David's election as King of Israel, and has a better preserved text. Logically this section seems to have been a continuation of 23: 15-22, and must have become separated from it in the course of time.

b 8. ' Jesbaham, sitting in the chair ' : the text is better preserved in 1 Par 11:11, and we should read : ' Jesbaham, a Hachmonite. ' chief among the three ' : 1 Par 11:11 has ' chief of the Thirty '. Confusion in the Heb. text of this section could easily arise, for the Heb. words for three, thirty, and aide-de-camp are very similar. ' tender little worm ' : MT is very corrupt ; lit. ' he is Adino the Eznite, over eight hundred slain at one time '. LXX also introduces ' Adino the Aseonean is he who drew his sword against eight hundred warriors at once '. 1 Par. omits Adino and reads : ' Jesbaam . . . lifted up his spear against three hundred wounded by him at one time '. The reading usually adopted by commentators from this obscure collection of Heb. consonants is ' brandishing his spear '. ' three hundred ' : MT has eight hundred. In these exploits, he would probably be accompanied by his armour-bearers, 1 Kg 14:6. 9. Ahohite : a certain Ahoe is mentioned in 1 Par 8:4 as belonging to the Benjamite clan. ' were with David ' : the text does not say where, but it can be supplied from 1 Par 11:13, ' in Phesdomim ', the scene of the battle between David and Goliath. 13. ' three who were princes ' : not the three already mentioned, but belonging to the Thirty Group. It is hard to determine whether these Thirty mighty men numbered exactly thirty, or whether it was only an ideal number and actually more numerous, for this ch gives thirty-seven such heroes. But some of these may have been appointed to take the place of others who died in battle. To be allowed into this privileged body of men was equivalent to receiving the V.C. 15. ' drink of water ' : David was gazing at the scene of his childhood with all its happy memories crowding into his mind. 16. ' would not drink ' : the selfless bravery and deep affection of his men had changed the water of Bethlehem into the wine of sacrifice—something too precious for merely human use. 18. ' chief among three ' : there must have been a second trio of which only two names are given here. If we add these to the Three and Thirty and include Joab, we get 37, the number given in 39.

XXIV 1-25 David's Census of the Nation—Popular feeling against David's census of the people was expressed by Joab, but we are not told why this normal act of administration was sinful. David may have intended merely compiling a register for the organization of military service, fresh taxation, and forced labour for his building schemes. However it was a common belief amongst ancient Semitic peoples that whoever knew the name of a person, the number of his possessions, herds, and household acquired a mysterious power over them ; cf. RB 53 (1946) 178. Hence David's action implied that he had absolute rights over his people, whereas he was merely Yahweh's representative in a strictly theocratic state.

d 1. ' again kindled ' : this must refer back to the previous famine in ch 21. In the corresponding account of 1 Par 21, 1-27 Satan is the instigator of David's action. The case is like that of Job 1:12 ; 2:10 where we have both the permissive action of God and the malicious initiative of Satan. 3. Joab : Père Desnoyers, op. cit. 3, 351, n. 3 suggests that the league mentioned in 2 Kg 5:3 had as one of its clauses the prohibition of any census, to safeguard the rights of the nation against excessive demands by the king in matters of war and finance. A shrewd general like Joab would realize the danger of underrating this passion for freedom against external control which was strongly developed amongst the Israelites. It was part of the inheritance they had received from their forefathers and was ultimately based upon a religious conception of man. ' The ancient Semitic nomad would not have understood the term democracy, but he had deeply implanted within him an unconscious theory of life which corresponds to the attitude which that word 264d indicates in common speech. That which the free Athenian citizen of the fifth century B.C. boasted as his highest achievement was taken for granted by the ideal ancestors of Israel' (T. Robinson, A History of Israel, I, 105). 5. Aroer: probably identical with Kh. 'Arâ'ir which stood on the N. bank of the Arnon, some four miles SW. of Dibon (Dhiban), with which it is associated in Num 32:34. Joab's officials moved from SE. Palestine to the extreme N.; then they turned W. and worked their way southwards. 6. Hodsi: no certain locality has been found for this name. Some MSS of LXX give 'to the land of the Hittites to Qadesh', on the Orontes. 9. 'sum of the number': these numbers are clearly exaggerated, cf. Desnoyers, op. cit. 2, 266, and conflict with those of 1 Par 21:5. Apart from any question of textual corruption, the sacred writer reminds us that he is not accepting these numbers as the official statistics from authoritative national archives, cf. 1 Par 27:24. 18. 'seven years': LXX and Chronicler's 'three years' are more in accord with the symmetrical 'three' in each punishment. 17. 'It is I': David takes full responsibility. The ancient world in the East had a strong sense of the social and spiritual solidarity of men. This was particularly true of kings who represented their people before their gods; cf. L. Dürr, Ursprung und Ausbau der israelitisch-jüdischen Heilandservartung (Berlin 1925) 139 ff. The later disasters which followed in the wake of those kings of Israel whose hearts were not right with Yahweh were God's own commentary on the real vocation of the monarchy to represent Israel in his sight; cf. 1 Par 10:13; 2 Par 12:2, 12. 18. 'thrashing floor of Areuna': this was on Mt Moriah, the site of Solomon's temple, where now stands the Moslem Dome of the Rock. Areuna is called Ornan in 1 Par 21:15. 25. 'offered holocausts': Mosaic legislation reserved to priests the right of offering sacrifice, Num 16:39, 40; 17:7. According to Van Hoonacker, Claire, and Kugler, this and similar passages are only apparent exceptions to the general rule, i.e. the king offered sacrifice through priests. Schulz, Schlögl, and Desnoyers prefer to consider such occasions as exceptions made by divine authority to the law of priestly sacrifice.

b Title and Contents—3 and 4 Kg (Vg; DV; LXX, 3 and 4 Kingdoms) formed originally in the Hebrew one book. The division, which is artificial, appeared first in LXX and seems to have been occasioned by the normal size of the book-roll, too small to contain the whole in one roll. The Hebrew text was divided, into 1 and 2 Kg, only in the 15th cent. 3 and 4 Kg take up the narrative of 1 and 2 Kg (Hebrew, 1 and 2 Samuel) with an account of the last days of David and the accession of Solomon. Then comes the reign of Solomon, with the building of the temple. After the death of Solomon, the history falls readily into two divisions, the separate kingdoms of north and south, and the kingdom of Judah alone, till the destruction of the temple and the exile. This covers more than 400 years. For a general view of the events of this period, see §§ 63d-66f.

c Scope—The usual tripartite division (the united, divided and surviving monarchy) does not quite correspond to the author's view-point. For him the first part of the story ended with 3 Kg 10: the Kingdom of David enjoying idyllic prosperity as the reward of faithful worship of Yahweh centred upon Solomon's temple. The second part of the story, running to the end of the book, was the decline and fall of the Kingdom of David, envisaged as the punishment of the worship of false gods introduced by Solomon. The fact that Israel in the north and Judah in the south went separate paths to their doom does not affect the unity of this conception. But in this second part, there is again a turning-point in the history of each kingdom. In the north, it was the worship of Yahweh under the form of a bull, 3 Kg 12. Up to this, Jeroboam, like Solomon before his sin, had enjoyed God's blessing. The illegitimate worship, to which was then added the cult of the Tyrian Baal, made Israel's destruction inevitable, though it was postponed as often as the northerners responded to the guidance of the prophets. In the south, the turning-point was delayed till the reign of Manasses, 4 Kg 20. The last chapters stand in the same relation to the idolatry of Manasses as the whole of the great second part to the idolatry of Solomon. The book is in fact composed for the specific purpose of religious edification. Like the other OT historians, the author's interest is not primarily political narrative. His purpose is to show how Yahweh enforced his law of retribution in the course of history, rewarding obedience with prosperity, punishing sin with suffering.

Composition—This 'pragmatic' stand-point of the author appears both in his personal contribution to the book and in his use of sources. He composed a frame-work within which the individual kings were dealt with, from the division of the kingdom onwards. For the kings of Israel, the introductory formula is: 'In the xth year of King N. of Judah, N., son of N., became King of Israel for x years'. For the kings of Judah: 'In the xth year of King N. of Israel, N., son of N., became King of Judah. He was x years old when he became King, and he reigned x years in Jerusalem. His mother's name was N.'. For Israel, the closing formula is: 'The rest of the history of N. and all his feats are available, as is well-known, in the Book of the History of the Kings of Israel. So N. was gathered to his fathers and was buried in Samaria, and his son N. reigned in his stead'. For Judah: 'The rest of the history of N. and all his feats, are available, as is well-known, in the Book of the History of the Kings of Judah. So N. was gathered to his fathers and was buried with his fathers in the city of David, and his son N. reigned in his stead'. These formulas may vary slightly, or be omitted in whole or part as circumstances demand, e.g. where a king died by violence, or in the case of the usurper Athalia. The order of the narrative is determined by the date of a king's accession. For instance, Achab of Israel and Josaphat of Judah were contemporaries. But since Achab, 3 Kg 16:29, became king a little earlier than Josaphat his whole reign is narrated, and then, 22:40, the writer turns back and narrates the reign of Josaphat to its close, though in the meantime two kings had succeeded Achab in Israel.

With the framework is linked the writer's verdict on each king. For Israel it is invariably: 'And he did evil before the Lord', the evil being 'the sin of Jeroboam'. This blame is accorded even to Zimri, 3 Kg 16:19, who reigned only a week. In Judah, eight kings are praised, Asa, Josaphat, Joas, Amasias, Azarias, Joatham, Ezechias and Josias. But the praise of the first six is restricted by a reference to their tolerating shrines of Yahweh outside Jerusalem. The remaining kings of Judah are condemned, the last six, significantly, in the terms applied to the kings of Israel: 'And he did evil before the Lord'. The sin of Jeroboam was the calf-worship, with the consequent organization of a non-Levitical priesthood at the illegitimate shrines, 3 Kg 12:26-31. These things were forbidden by Deut 4:15 ff.; 9:8-21; 18:1 ff. Deut 12:2-18 is the source of the condemnation of the shrines of Yahweh in the south. Indeed, the constant recurrence of Deuteronomic phrases, e.g. 2 Kg 2:3 (cf. Deut 4:9) is characteristic of the author's work. A full list of parallels may be seen in Driver LOT, 200-2. The fullest formulation of his 'theology of history' is given in the long comment on the fall of Samaria, 4 Kg 17:7-23. Within the setting of these synchronisms and moral judgements, the author incorporated his sources, sometimes almost unchanged, e.g. 3 Kg 17-19, sometimes interwoven with Deuteronomic considerations, e.g. 3 Kg 14, which appears in LXX 12:24 g-n (Rahls) without the characteristic phrases.

265f Sources—The writer refers once to the 'Book of the Acts of Solomon', 3 Kg 11:41, 17 times to the 'Book of the History of the Kings of Israel', 15 times to the 'Book of the History of the Kings of Judah'. 'The Book of the History' is a technical term for official records; cf. Est 2:23; 6:1; 10:2; Neh 12:23; 1 Par 27:24. Possibly the Mazkir 'Remembrancer', 3 Kg 4:3, was responsible for them. But what are cited in Kg were probably not the original state documents, but later compilations based on them, comparable to the prophetic writings of Nathan, Ahias, etc. cited in Par. The History of the Kings of Judah is cited for the last time for Joakim, 4 Kg 24:4, hence it was compiled under Sedecias, by someone who saw the coming peril and wished to save the substance of the threatened documents. The 'Histories', according to the allusions to them in Kg, described 'the activities', 'the victories', 'the wars', and 'the buildings' of the kings. By repeatedly referring the reader to these documents for information in these matters, the writer showed that his own object was not to give complete political narrative.

g Other material at the author's disposal, readily distinguishable from the Histories by its special contents and fullness of presentation, included accounts of Jeroboam, Achab and Jehu in the north, and of Joas, Ezechias and Josias in the south, and various histories of prophets. To these must be added the writer's own account of Joachin and Sedecias, 4 Kg 24:10-25:21. The high literary value of 3 Kg 1 (accession of Solomon), 3 Kg 17-19 (Stories of Elias) and 4 Kg 9-10 (Jehu) has often been remarked.

h His use of sources is influenced by his dominant idea, that Yahweh rewards obedience and punishes sin. The law of the one central sanctuary was particularly dear to him. Hence he gave special prominence to the building of the temple, and dwelt on incidents which touched its history, 3 Kg 14:26 ff., 15:18, 4 Kg 11-12. Fidelity to Yahweh demanded also obedience to the prophets, whose mission it was to proclaim the divine principle of retribution, 3 Kg 11:29, etc. Hence he retained the stirring details of the lives of Elias and Eliseus, and added accounts of false prophets, 3 Kg 20 and 22, to show the unhappy results of disregarding divine guidance. To illustrate his general principle, he could incorporate matter which had no direct relation either to the cult or the prophets. In the episode of Naboth's vineyard, for instance, 3 Kg 21, the lesson is the dire consequences of a 'divided heart' in the service of Yahweh.

i A result of the pragmatic stand-point is the omission, or compression into a passing reference, of much that must have been of great historical importance. This is most apparent in the treatment of Omri and Jeroboam II. They were the greatest of Israel's kings, but since the 'principle of retribution' could not be applied here immediately and in detail, the author confined himself to a reference to the 'History'. The same interest in the logical connexions of events led him at times to disregard the chronological order. For instance, 4 Kg 20 contains earlier matter than 18-19. But since Ezechias' fault illustrated the direction of history better than his triumph over Sennacherib, it was placed after the latter, as the real introduction to the decline which set in under Manasses.

j Historical Value—As the author's aim was not to be complete, but to expound the decisive factors in the period under review, the validity of his structure must be judged by the significance of his selected facts. Had they really the influence which he ascribed to them? A preliminary question is the historicity of the selected episodes. The usual criterions give a positive result. (1) Where the facts can be checked by 'profane' sources, they are found to be in accord with the general history of the period. See §§ 79d, 80c-f. Details are noticed in the Commentary. For the rest of the facts, the seriousness of the author and his constant appeals to documents by which his work could be checked, must be sufficient guarantees of his reliability. (2) The particular history of Israel, as reflected in the prophetic books, Amos to Jeremias, shows the same situations as Kg. (3) He is objective and dispassionate. See especially the account of Solomon's accession. He does not hide the faults of his 'heroes', like Ezechias, nor the fine qualities of his 'villains', like Achab or even Jezabel, 4 Kg 10:30 ff. Prophecies too are kept in their authentic obscurity, with no attempt to harmonize their terms with the details of their fulfilment; see especially 3 Kg 19:15. Again, though upholding the law of one sanctuary, he does not attempt to show that it always had the importance which he accorded to it. Thus Solomon's sacrifice at Gibeon, 3 Kg 3:4 ff., and Elias' on Carmel are recorded as acceptable. And in general, the attitude of the great northern prophets towards this law is left undefined. A less conscientious writer might have made them pronounce in its favour. (4) On the miraculous elements in general, see §§ 87-91. Here it must suffice to remark that the miracles have the same serious attestation as the rest of the book, and that the careers of the great prophets would be inexplicable without them. How indifferent the people was to the mere preaching and personality of the prophets may be seen from 3 Kg 18:21.

The accuracy of the author's interpretation of events is guaranteed ultimately by the inspiration of the book, whose place in the Canon of Sacred Scripture has never been questioned. The rise and ruin of the Kingdom of David could indeed be traced to natural causes. But from the author we learn that God had a special purpose in raising up a David and a Solomon at the time when Assyria and Egypt were weak, and in depriving Judah of competent statesmen when the neo-Babylonian empire was most aggressive. Even from the merely historical view-point, however, the safety of the kingdom depended on its religion. The admission of idolatry set up divisions in the State between Yahwistic and anti-Yahwistic parties. It also led to a 'communio in sacris' with other countries, and so to political alliances which involved the two small states in great international conflicts. Had the reformation of Josias succeeded, Jeremias would not have preached submission in vain, and Judah might have survived Nabuchodonosor, a milder foe than Sennacherib. Thus the inequalities in the author's work—his brevity where we should expect fullness, his disproportionately long accounts of matters which history might ignore—are justified by the ultimate significance of his chosen events.

Date and Person of the Author—The book was finished before 538, since there is no mention of the end of the exile, and cannot have been begun before the fall of Jerusalem, 587, since this dominates the conception of the history. If 4 Kg 25:27-30 belonged to the first draft, it must have been written after 561, 'the 37th year of the captivity of Joachin'. Sanda and others consider these verses an addition to the original, as being abrupt, isolated from any context, and betraying a mode of reckoning used only in Babylon. This last feature is explained by the author's habit of incorporating sources unchanged. The logical connexion with the foregoing is explained by the frequency with which God's promises to the house of David, 2 Kg 7:12-16, had been recalled, 3 Kg 2:4, 24; 3:6; 6:12; 8:25 f.; 9:5. The emphasis thus laid on the only trace of 'Messianism' in Kgs demanded the hopeful sign of 4 Kg 25:27-30.

Jeremias was named as author by the later Jews (Talmud, Baba Bathra 15), a tradition accepted by A. Lapide, Vigouroux, Cornely, Höpfl and others. The absence of the prophet from the history of Kg points in that direction, and the view-point of Kg agrees well with Jeremias. There are also similarities in phrasing; cf. Sanda I, xxxvii. More, however, cannot be proved than that the author was familiar and friendly with Jeremias. The prophet would have been nearly 100 in 561, before which the book cannot well have been written.

286c Text—MT preserves the original very well, better than in the prophetic books, but not so well as in the Penta-teuch. LXX is important, not so much for the reading or explanation of difficult words in the Hebrew, as for the elimination of interpolated matter. The most remarkable features of LXX are its changes in the order of the text and the addition of some big sections. The chief variations are (1) 3 Kg 4:20-28; (2) 7; (3) 16:28a-h (LXX) where the reign of Josaphat appears before that of Achab, contrary to MT. In (1) LXX gives a better order of verses; in (2) it describes the furniture of the temple before the palaces; (3) results from a difference in chronology; according to LXX Josaphat had come to the throne in the 11th year of Omri. The chief additions in LXX are (1) 3 Kg 2:35a-o; (2) 2:46a-l; (3) 12:24a-z. (1) and (2) contain practically nothing that does not occur somewhere in the Hebrew of 3-11. (3) seems to have come into LXX independently of the canonical Hebrew, from sources similar to those of Kg; see Skinner, 443 ff. It contains matter which is historically helpful (see Commentary) but has itself been worked over and glossed according to MT. From this brief summary it will be seen that LXX interests textual criticism more than exegesis.

d Chronology—See § 124 for the general data of the chronological problem. The year 841, when Jehu paid tribute to Shalmaneser III provides a sure basis for the chronology between the division of Solomon's kingdom and the simultaneous accession of Jehu in Israel and of Athalia in Judah. As Achab was alive at Qarqar, 853, 12 years is the most that can be allowed for his successors, Ochozias and Joram. This suits the text of the Bible perfectly. Ochozias came to the throne in the 17th year of Josaphat, and reigned two years, 3 Kg 22:52. He died in the 18th of Josaphat, 4 Kg 3:1. The two years include the year of his accession and of his death, and are numerically one. Joram's reign is given as 12 years, and should be reckoned similarly as 11. Ochozias and Joram reigned 12 years altogether and Achab died in 853.

e The division of the kingdom was 37 years, 3 Kg 6:1 and 11:42, after the foundation of the temple (probably 968), therefore 931. Now Joram of Israel and Ochozias of Judah died the same year, 4 Kg 9. The totals of the reigns of the kings of Israel and Judah should be equal. In Israel, Jeroboam is given 22 years, Nadab 2, Baasa 24, Ela 2, Omri 12, Achab 22, Ochozias 2, Joram 12: total, 98. In Judah Roboam is given 17, Abias 3, Asa 41, Josaphat 25, Joram 8, Ochozias 1: total, 95. Subtract, however, from each total the number of years reckoned as 2 but really one, as above: 8 in Israel, 5 in Judah. The result is 90 in each case. It may be noted that this chronology is based on three independent sources: Josephus (for the temple; see Kugler, 172-5), the Assyrian annals (for Qarqar and Jehu's tribute) and the Bible. If the battle of Qarqar is to be placed in 854 and Jehu's tribute in 842, as is done by many historians, the variation is insignificant.

f For the last period of the monarchy (Ezechias to the fall of Jerusalem) a start can be made, with some certainty, by dating the death of Achaz to spring 726. This date is indicated by Is 14:28 ff., as first suggested by H. Hänsler, Bi 10 (1929) 262-70; so too (independently) J. Begrich, Die Chronologie der Könige von Israel und Juda, 1929. It was soon after the death of Tiglath-pileser IV (Dec.-Jan., 727-726), to which the 'breaking of the rod' Is 14:29 refers. We assume that in this period the reigns in Judah are 'post-dated'. Note the synchronisms: '1st of Ezechias = 3rd of Osee, 4 Kg 18:1, 4th of Ezechias = 7th of Osee, 4 Kg 18:7. They differentiate between the year of Ezechias' succession, 726, 3rd Osee, and his first regnal year, 725, 4th Osee. Now Ezechias is given 29 years, Manasses 55, Amon 2, Josias 31, Joachaz 3 months, Joakim 11 years, Joachin 3 months, Sedecias 11 years: total, 139 years. Jerusalem fell in the 18th year of Nabuchodonosor (see on 4 Kg 24:12), 587. From 726 to 587 is 139 years, and so the chronology of Kg is exact, as in the period from 286f 931-841.

In the present state of the text, the remaining period, 841-726, causes difficulties. The reigns of the kings of Judah total 160 years, or 154 if allowance is made for ante-dating. This is at the least 38 years too much. The reigns of the kings of Israel total at least 138 years. And the last two kings, Peqah and Osee, are credited with a total of 29 years. That would put the accession of Peqah in 749, whereas it is certain that his predecessor but one, Menahem, was king in 738, when his tribute to Tiglath-pileser III is recorded. It is therefore imperative to reconstruct the chronology, correcting the corrupt text where necessary, but assuming that the chronology is fundamentally sound, as in the other two periods.

Some corruptions are obvious. 3 Kg 15:1 for instance places the accession of Azarias of Judah in the 27th year of Jeroboam. But since the last 15 years of Amasias coincided with the first 15 of Jeroboam, 3 Kg 14:17, the accession of Azarias should be the 16th of Jeroboam. Another corruption is in 15:30, which speaks of the 20th year of Joatham, whereas 15:33 gives him 16 years all told.

The chronology adopted in the commentary is based on the dates of the kings of Judah as given in Kg, with the corrections consequent on the assumption that Azarias, who is credited in the text with 52 years, reigned at most 13-14 years. The dates of the kings of Israel are brought into line with this, and it is supposed that Menahem was king some years before 738 (see above) and that Peqah lost the throne soon after Tiglath-pileser's action against Damascus and Syria (AOT 346-7), at the latest in 732. The figure 52 years for Azarias can be maintained only on the assumption of a co-regency with his father Amasias, dating from 785, and a co-regency with his son Joatham, extending over the whole reign of Joatham, and further, a co-regency of 8 years with his grandson Achaz. Now so far from the Bible's suggesting a co-regency of Azarias and Amasias, it states expressly that Azarias was enthroned, as a boy of sixteen, after his father's death, 4 Kg 14:19-21. Joatham was undoubtedly co-regent with Azarias for some time, but reigned alone after Azarias' death, 4 Kg 15:6 f. There is no trace of a co-regency with Achaz. Since the co-regency with Joatham is expressly mentioned, the silence of the text with regard to others is equivalent to exclusion (pace § 64c). Relying then on all figures (for the kings of Judah) except the 52 years of Azarias, we arrive at the system: Athalia 841-836, Joas 836-797, Amasias 797-769, Azarias 769-756 (and some years co-regency), Joatham 756-741, Achaz 741-726, Ezechias 726-697. Some confirmation of this system may be found by working back from Achaz to Amasias, on the basis of the probable age of each king at the birth of the crown prince. Achaz was 20 at his accession in 741, 4 Kg 16:2. He was born in 761 when his father Joatham was c 20. Joatham was therefore born c 781, when his father Azarias was c 20. Azarias was born in 801, when Amasias was c 20. Amasias was therefore, on this rough average, 52 when he died in 769. Now 4 Kg 14:2 gives his age at his death as 53. The agreement shows that the system is probable, though of course a margin of error of one or two years must be allowed throughout.

THE THIRD BOOK OF KINGS

I 1-53 The Struggle for the Succession—David's debility explains how a crisis arose. 1-4. He was bedridden, cf. 47 and 1 Kg 19:13, though only about 70 years of age, 2 Kg 5:4; 3 Kg 2:11. The method used to restore his circulation was recommended by ancient doctors (Galen etc.). The maid of Sunam (today Shölem), on the northern rim of the plain of Jezreel, was regarded as a wife of David, see 2:22; her remaining a virgin is mentioned to excuse Adonias later. 5-7. Adonias gave himself the royal privilege

- 267a of a bodyguard, like Absalom, 3 Kg 15. He was the eldest (surviving) son, personally attractive, and the general choice, 2:15. His chief supporters, the generalissimo Joab, 2 Kg 20:23, and Abiathar, 2 Kg 15:24-36, were devoted to David, but were ready to force his hand by presenting him with an accomplished fact; his acquiescence in Adonias' conduct b led them to believe that he would welcome it. 8-10. David, however, was engaged to Solomon by oath, ever since the divine predilection had been manifested through the prophet Nathan, 17, 30; see 2 Kg 12:24 f. This must have been public, at least at court, for Adonias excluded from his inaugural banquet Solomon and his friends. They included Banaias, the commander of the standing army, 2 Kg 20:23, and his soldiers; Semei is perhaps the future minister of Solomon, 4:18. Rei, 'friend of', is probably not a proper name, but the title of David's aide-de-camp. Rogel, the 'Fuller's Well', is now Bir Ayub, 'Job's Well', SE. of Jerusalem; Zohleth was the name of the smooth slope of rock which led down to it, today ez-Zahweileh, 'the Slide' (L.-H. Vincent, Jérusalem Antique, 139 f.). 11-31. Nathan's approach to David had to be cautious, since the king knew exactly how things were shaping and was apparently satisfied. He worked on his pride and on his affections, by maintaining that his authority was being flouted, and that his best loved wife and her son were in danger of being treated as rebels. By pretending throughout that the king could not possibly have wavered, he c stung him to a belated sense of duty. 32-40. The loyalty of the foreign mercenaries who formed the Palace Guard was a decisive factor; see also 2 Kg 15:18; 4 Kg 11:4. Solomon was made co-regent. To explain the chronological data of 3 and 4 Kg, it may be assumed that other kings followed David's example in transferring the crown to their successors. Gihon, in the Cedron valley, is today the 'Spring of the Lady Mary'. 41-49. Half a mile farther south, the old warrior Joab was the first to hear the sound of the trumpet. This life-like touch contributes to making the story of the succession one of the most picturesque in the Bible. David bowed like Jacob, Gen 47:31. 50-53. The altar provided sanctuary; its horns, upward projections of the four corners, were particularly sacred, Ex 29:12, etc. Adonias could wring from Solomon only a vague promise of safety; the king reserved the right to take vengeance almost at will, and forbade Adonias to approach him; cf. 2 Kg 14:24, 28.
- d II 1-11 David's Testament and Death—1-4. Solomon needed courage, not to bear up under his father's death, but to observe the Law, for the good of the dynasty; for the language, cf. Deut 31:7 etc., Jos 1:6 f. 5-6. Joab had twice taken treacherous revenge for blood shed in fair fight; thus, said David, 'staining the girdle upon my loins and the shoes upon my feet with innocent blood' (LXX). David, who had given Joab the power which he had abused, felt responsible for the murders; but unrequited murder brought evil on the land, 2 Kg 21; David's charge to Solomon must therefore be regarded as conscientious and public-spirited. He had not dared, or perhaps liked, to move himself against an old comrade-in-arms. 7-11. The case of Semei is more difficult. David's humility had turned the curses into blessings, 2 Kg 16:12; his clemency had sufficiently upheld the royal dignity. But he could lawfully have punished any further misdemeanour. He could therefore urge Solomon to seek an occasion to exercise strict justice. David died c 971. The 'City of David' was on the SE. hill, running along the Cedron valley towards the pool of Siloah. Here David's descendants were also laid, at least till Achaz, 4 Kg 17:20.
- e 12-45 Removal of the King's Opponents—12-21. The Queen Mother, who had an official title (g'birāh, 15:13) was an important personage in the ancient east. Adonias asked her to obtain for him a poor substitute, as it were, for the kingdom which was rightly his.

Solomon treated the request as a renewal of his claim 267e to the kingship itself. To take over the women of a ruler was looked on as an exercise of the royal power, 2 Kg 16:21 ff; cf. 3:7; 12:8. 26-27. Anathoth, the home of the prophet Jeremias, today 'Anāta, was some 4 m. NE. of Jerusalem. Banishment excluded Abiathar from priestly functions. Here appears the Deuteronomic principle that worship could be offered only at one central shrine. The line of priests descending from Aaron's younger son, Ithamar, was closed. 28-35. Solomon's plea, in killing Joab, was that either the general or the royal house had to expiate his crimes. Sanctuary covered manslaughter, but not murder, Ex 21:14. There is no accusation of new treason; 28 refers to the struggle for the succession. Thus the execution of Adonias remains questionable. Sadoc was descended from Aaron through Eleazar, 1 Par 6:8. 36-46. The rashness of Semei, which had led him to curse David before his army, finally destroyed him. Solomon could claim that Semei's curses were no longer a menace to David's house, since they had exhausted their force upon their author. This idea of thwarting a curse by diverting it back upon the speaker, seems to lie behind the many attempts, in subsequent history, against the lives of the prophets who foretold evil.

III 1-28 Solomon's Piety and Wisdom—1. These g happy auguries were followed by a striking success in external affairs. By marrying the daughter of Pharaoh (? Siamon, of the 21st dynasty), he made his own the fruits of the Egyptian victory over the Philistines (cf. 9:16) and achieved the recognition of his empire as a great power. 2-4. 'High places' were shrines, mostly but not always on hill-tops, Jer 7:31 etc.; for their prohibition, see on Deut 12. The 'Mosque of the Prophet Samuel', on the top of the hill 5 m. NNW. of Jerusalem, probably corresponds to the 'high place' of Gabaon, today el-Jib. 5-9. Solomon's unselfish prayer was unique among those of ancient kings: cf. 11 and E. Dhorme, La religion assyro-babylonienne, 249-55. To 'walk before', like 'stand before' means to serve (Koehler). Solomon was about twenty years old; cf. 14:21. 10-15. In the answer, as in the prayer, conventional hyperbole is introduced, which asserts no more than a superlative. Solomon had everything but perseverance, a special gift of God which even the choicest graces do not guarantee. 16-28. An instance of his judicial wisdom follows. Some hold it to be true merely in the sense that it evokes accurately the impression which Solomon made on history: the motif re-appears in other literatures. But essential traits of human nature, such as are at work here, can show themselves in many environments.

IV 1-19 Administration—1-2. The place of honour h is given to the high-priest. 'Son' here is for grandson; cf. 1 Par 6:8. The following list therefore refers to a late date in the reign; 4 is an earlier fragment. 3. Two Secretaries of State attended to official documents; the Recorder was annalist, and in practice, Prime Minister. 5. A son of Nathan was over the provincial governors (MT); another son (omit 'priest' with LXX) was aide-de-camp; cf. on 1:8. 6. There was a chamberlain over the palace, and a minister for public works, over the conscrip labour. 7. For taxation, i Israel, as distinct from Judah, was divided into 12 districts. The palaces and store-houses excavated at Lachish, Beth-Shemesh and Megiddo show how the provincial capitals were equipped. 8. Part of the edge of the document here quoted was missing, as the absence of the proper names of the first four governors shows: son of Hur etc. The first district was based on Mount Ephraim, and ran from Joppa to the Jordan. 9. The second, SW. of the first, comprised the hill-country of the southern settlement of Dan. 10. The third, N. of the first, embraced the coastal plain of Sharon. 11. The fourth ran NW. of the third to Carmel. 12. The fifth ran in from Carmel across the plain of Esdraelon to the Jordan. 13. The 2671 sixth, N. and S. of the Yarmuk, was transjordanian Manasses. 14. The seventh ran S. of the sixth to the Jabbok. 15. The eighth was E. Galilee, along the lake and upper Jordan. 16. W. Galilee, marching with the kingdom of Tyre, was the ninth. 17. The tenth was S. of Galilee, around Mount Tabor. 18. The eleventh was the eastern part of the territory S. of the province of Ephraim, to the NW. of Jerusalem. 19. The twelfth was the most southerly of the three provinces E. of the Jordan, Gad (LXX), between the Jabbok and the Arnon. In 19a the reference to Schon and Og seems to be a gloss; in 19b read prob. 'a (chief) governor was over all (the governors) in the land'; cf. MT and 5. Districts eight to twelve followed old tribal divisions; the rest natural boundaries. But the organization maintained fundamentally the dualism of N. and S., for Judah did not come under the general system: see A. Alt, Israels Gasse unter Salomo; F.-M. Abel, Géographie de la Palestine, II, 79-83.

J 20-25 Extent and Riches of the Empire—21. Solomon may not have occupied much territory beyond David's conquests, which reached Riblah on the Orontes; but his overlordship was acknowledged by tribute from as far N. as Thapsacus on 'the river' Euphrates. 22-23. 30 cors = c 340 bushels; the quantities, enough for 14,000 persons, have probably been touched up by a scribe. 24. 'Beyond the river' is a term derived from Assyrian administration; from the Jewish standpoint, the territory was the near side of the river. 25. From the source of the Jordan to the edge of the southern desert, each Israelite had his own land and could live on its produce: proverbial felicity, Mic 4:4; Zach 3:10 etc. The revolt of Edom and Damascus late in the reign did not affect the general situation.

K 26-28 Armaments—26a. 4,000 is the original number of stalls according to LXX, 10:26; 2 Par 9:25; this corresponds well to the 1,400 chariots of 10:26, allowing two horses and a reserve to each chariot. 26b. The strength of the cavalry is exceptional; in 853, at the battle of Qarqar, Damascus had only 1,200 (inscription of Shalmaneser III, AOT 340 f.). Solomon's horse-trade perhaps explains it. Stables of Solomon's time excavated at Megiddo held at least 450 horses; other depots have been found at Ta'anak, Gezer, Tell el-Hesi (? Aiglon), Haşor. 28. This provision was for the Palace Guard, which went on circuit with the king.

I 29-34 The Philosopher-King—29. Besides being a statesman of genius, Solomon was a sage, of penetrating and comprehensive insight, whose interests were so varied that they could be compared to the sands of the sea. 30. The bent of the wisdom of the desert tribes and of the Egyptians was moralizing; Egyptian collections of maxims go back to 2000 B.C. 31. Of the four sages only the fame is known. 32. On Solomon's extant proverbs, cf. Prov 10:1-22:16; 25:1-29:27; (see § 364d, e, i); for his lyrics, see on Pss 71; 126. 33. He was not a scientist, but drew on plant and animal life to illustrate his sayings; cf. the imagery in Job 39-41; Prov 6.

M V 1-18 Preparations for the Temple—1-3. The embassy was to congratulate Solomon on his accession. Hiram had supplied materials and skilled workmen to David, 2 Kg 5:11. The historians Menander and Dios spoke of Hiram's great constructions at Tyre (Jos. Ant. 8, 5, 3; C. Ap. 1, 18). 4-5. Settled conditions called for a temple to Yahweh, Deut 12:9. 6. Sidon, the northern partner of Tyre, had lost the hegemony of the Phoenicians, but they were still called Sidonians (cf. 16:31) as late as Antiochus IV, 175-164 B.C. 7-8. The famous voyage of the Egyptian Wen-Amon in 1100 B.C. was to obtain cedar-wood from Lebanon; in spite of continual exploitation, it was still 'full of cedars, pine and cypress, marvellous in size and beauty' when Diodorus was writing, 1st cent. B.C. Some of the few cedars still there today are 75 ft. high. b'rdî 'fir' is often rendered 'cypress', but though the use of the latter is not to be excluded, 'fir' should be retained; cf. Bi (1920) 496 ff. 9-11. 267n The rafts were beached at Joppa, 2 Par 2:16. Wheat (20,000 cors, 230,000 bushels) and olive oil (20 cors, 1,800 gallons; LXX 180,000) were articles of commerce, not the workmen's food. This 'purest' oil was won by hand-pressure in a mortar. 12-14. Work on sub-alpine Lebanon and raft-transport by sea were confined to the three summer months; thus each draft had two of the working months free. 15-16. The second group were Canaanites, 2 Par 2:17, and worked in the hills of Judaea, where there was excellent marble (cf. 'costly stones' 17) and limestone, Abel I, 181 ff. Their lot was permanent slavery, 9:20 ff. 17-18. The skilled foreign workmen included the Phoenicians of Gebal (Byblos), famous ship-wrights, Ez 27:9.

VI 1 The Foundation of the Temple—The original 268a form of the record, placed here by LXX, may be seen at 37: 'In the 4th year was the House of the Lord founded in the month (yērah) Zio'. This was April-May c 968. 'The same is the second month' (hōdeš), seems to be a late gloss: the original writer would hardly use another word for month in the same verse; and beginning the year in Nisan, March-April, seems to be late usage. See § 83i-j. For another view, see § 169c. No deduction as to the date of the Exodus can safely be based on this '480 years', which attempts to date the temple midway between the Exodus and the return from the Babylonian exile. The figure was perhaps arrived at by counting 12 generations of 40 years, 12, a perfect number, symbolizing the stable possession of the Land; cf. Deut 12:9. In the chronology as it stands, the reigns of the kings to the exile total 430 years; with 50 years of exile, this gives a second period of 480 years. If the figure arose in this way, it is post-exilic, and so may be treated as a gloss, since the book was finished during the exile.

2-10 General Structure—Cf. L.-H. Vincent, La Description b du Temple de Salomon, RB, 16 (1907) 515 ff. (on which the following account is based); K. Möhlenbrink, Der Tempel Salomos (1932). Till the discovery of a 9th cent. temple at Tell Tainât in N. Syria in 1936, the nearest analogy was in the classical Greek temple, with its pronaos, naos and adytos corresponding to the porch, nave and Holy of Holies of the Hebrew temple. This tripartite structure was a Syrian development which the Tyrians adopted and spread: see W. F. Albright, Archaeology and the Religion of Israel, 142 ff. 2. On the basis of the 'ancient' cubit (see § 82c) the temple was approximately 103 ft. by 34 ft. by 51 ft. 3. The porch was as wide as the main building, and was 17 ft. deep. 4. The windows, whose frames held trellises, were high up in the walls. 5. For built on to the outside was a cincture of rooms to serve as sacristies. 6. This addition was 9 ft. wide on the ground-floor; the floor-beams of the two upper storeys did not pierce the walls of the temple, but rested on the ledges formed by the walls where they were stepped in twice. 7. The use of dressed stone did not exclude carpenter's work at the actual building. 8. The entrance to the ground-floor of the side-buildings was on the south. 9. The ceiling of the temple was of cedar, the joists and beams forming compartments (MT), visible from beneath. The roof was flat, since altars could be erected on it, 4 Kg 33:12. 10. Cedar was used to roof the side-buildings also, each storey of which 'round all the House' was 9 ft. high. The three ceilings rested on (the wall of) the House by means of cedar beams.

11-14 God's Promise—This was given, probably c through a prophet (cf. 11:9 with 3:5 and 9:2) to encourage Solomon in the difficulties of building. The meaning was: 'If you keep my commandments, I will keep my promises'.

15-22 Interior—The main features described are the d woodwork, the division into sanctuary and nave, the altar of incense, the decorations. 15. The temple was lined with cedar and floored with fir (or cypress; see on 5:8). 16. The rear wall, to the height of 34 ft., formed the back of the innermost shrine, 'the oracle' (d'bir—from a root meaning hinder part; St Jerome 268d connected it with dabbēr 'to speak'). It was a perfect cube, 20a, so there was a space of 17 ft. between its ceiling and the roof. 17. The main hall, the nave, was 52 ft. long. 18. There were carvings on the cedar walls: colocynths and garlands of flowers (MT). These probably linked the cherubs and palm-trees of 29. 20b-22. To the cedar facings and the carvings a third element of decoration was added: gold-leaf, probably used only on the low relief of the carvings. So understand the generalization of 22, which says that 'everything' was covered with gold. The text of these verses is badly confused, partly by the glosses of scribes who felt the urge to exaggerate the richness of the gilding. So too 30, where the interpolator is betrayed by the meaningless 'within and without'. From 21b it may be gathered that the doors of the Holy of Holies (cf. 31) had golden bolts (MT); and from 22, that there was an altar (for incense) in the nave, in front of the Holy of Holies, and that its cedar was embellished with gildings.

e 23-30 The Cherubim—See P. Dhorme and L.-H. Vincent, Les Chérubins, RB 1926. Sentinel figures with wings outstretched to shelter it awaited the Ark, 19. The word k'rub derives from the Babylonian, where kāribu 'intercessor' was used anciently of minor gods who presented the prayers of suppliants. Later these kāribu appeared with human head on winged bodies of lions, etc., and were associated with the guardianship of temples and palaces from Mesopotamia to Egypt. The small figures which flanked the Ark in the Mosaic Tabernacle were in human form; cf. § 177b. Reproduced here on a gigantic scale, they must also be supposed to be human in form. Hence Ezekiel's address to the king of Tyre, 28:14: 'Thou, Cherub, anointed protector'. In 7:29 cherubs are distinguished from lions and oxen. Though they no longer formed the throne of Yahweh, as in the ancient Tabernacle, they still manifested his presence, and evoked reverence for his majesty; cf. Gen 3:24; Ps 17:11. Since they were offered no cult and were not thought of as intercessors, they derive only in name and form from non-Israelite figures. On 29f., see on 18 and 22.

f 31-35 The Doors of the Sanctuary and Nave—31. 'For the entrance of the Holy of Holies he made doors of olive wood. The frame was pentagonal'. This means that the lintel was triangular. 32a repeats 31a; for 32b see on 35a. 33. On the door from the porch into the nave, the lintel was flat, so the ordinary rectangular opening resulted. Each of its two main leaves was of two sections, turning upon pivots (MT, g'ililim); the two centre pieces provided a convenient entrance for daily use. 35a. The decorations are the same as those on the inner door; the gilding was confined to the carvings, as elsewhere in the temple. 35b shows how all the gold overlay is to be understood: 'a thin layer applied with precision' (MT)—gold-leaf. The idea that the temple was walled and floored with plates of gold is a late fantasy.

g 36 The Inner Court—The court in which the temple stood was within the great court, 7:12, which embraced all the king's buildings. Every three courses of stone were succeeded by one course of wood, a reinforcement once necessary in brick walls.

h 37-38 Duration of the Work—This ancient record preserves two Canaanite names of months; cf. Phoenician zib, B-I. Bul was Oct.-Nov. The regnal year began in Tishri, Sept.-Oct. Thus the work lasted from the eighth month of Solomon's fourth year to the second month of his eleventh, six and a half years, roughly seven. In the parenthesis, the months are reckoned from Nisan, March-April; see on 1.

i VII 1-12 Palaces—1. These were begun only when the temple was finished; cf. 9:10. 2. Furthest south from the temple was a great hall, intended for ceremonial occasions; cf. 10:21. Larger than the temple, it was 172 ft. by 86 ft. by 52 ft. The three (LXX) rows of lofty pillars, fifteen to a row, gave the impression of a cedar forest, hence the name. 3-5. It was not an open portico, for MT and LXX mention doors and windows 'facing each other in sets of three'. Details are uncertain, 268i for the text is corrupt, especially in Vg. 6. Next came a smaller hall of pillars, possibly the ante-chamber, 7, to the Throne-room, where Solomon dispensed justice. 8. Closest to the temple were the royal palaces: 'his own dwelling-house was in another court, inwards (towards the temple) from the Throne-room' (MT). 9. The stone was dressed on all faces, 'within and without'. 10-11 f. 17 ft. blocks went into the lower courses: larger are still to be seen in the 'Wailing Wall' of Jerusalem. 12. The whole complex of buildings was enclosed in the 'Greater Court', whose walls were of the type described 6:36.

The position of the Great Court was too well known to be mentioned. Today it is the Haram esh-Sherif, the 'Noble Sanctuary' of the Mohammedans, an esplanade some 550 yards long and 320 yards wide, on the NE. hill. The site of the temple is occupied by the paved platform which surrounds the so-called Mosque of Omar, really the 'Dome of the Rock'. Inside this is a rock, some 60 ft. long and 40 ft. wide, rising nearly 6 ft. above floor level. On this was erected, as is generally agreed, the Altar of Holocausts; cf. 2 Kg 24:25; 3 Kg 8:64. The temple was a little to the west, its façade looking east over the altar towards the Mount of Olives.

13-22 Jachin and Boaz—Tyrian architects had built the temple after their own models, and a Tyrian craftsman supplied the standard fittings. 15-16. Standing free before the porch were two columns, 40 ft. high, 6 ft. in diameter, of hollow copper or bronze $3\frac{1}{2}$ inches thick (4 fingerbreadths, LXX, Jer 52:51). Their capitals were crowned with bowls (41, 'cords'), upon which were gratings ('network, chainwork'—seven comes from a scribal error). These features, and the 'lilywork', when understood as knobs, 19, 22, suggest that the columns were stylized reproductions of the tall incense-stands or cressets (fire-altars) before many ancient temples. So W. F. Albright, 144 ff.; usually they are compared with the stone columns or obelisks of Egypt etc. 18, 22. Two necklaces of metal pomegranates decorated each capital; cf. 42. 21. The names suggest inscriptions like 'May Yahweh establish (yākin) the temple' or dynasty, and 'In the strength (b'ōz) of Yahweh'.

23-26 The Sea—From the 3rd millennium a reservoir known as Apsu, the primeval fresh-water ocean, was usual in the temples of Lagash, Eridu, Ur, Babylon, etc.; basins on stands of oxen are pictured on the reliefs of Nineveh. Such decorations became common in the early Iron Age. 'The Sea' was at the SE. corner of the temple, 39, of metal nearly 4 inches thick, with castings of open buds; to hold 2,000 baths (18,000 gallons) the sides must have curved outwards. 27-39 Water-wagons—Water for ablutions, 2 Par 4:6, was carried from the 'Sea' in wheeled stands, also common in ancient temples. The obscure and confused text has been illustrated by archaeological finds, such as the tiny model, probably an ex-voto, of the 2nd millennium, found in Cyprus, DBV IV fig. 260. The sides were panelled and decorated, and a small basin was set in a round opening in the top. 32-36 give a slightly varying account of the same things.

40-51 Other Furniture—40 adds utensils used in sacrifices, 41-45 recapitulate the objects described in 15-39. They were of polished bronze, an alloy of copper and tin, or pure copper; brass, an alloy of copper and zinc, was not known. 46. The foundries were near the mouth of the Jabbok. 47-51. The Altar of Incense was of cedar, 6:20, but it was finished in gold-foil, like most of the larger objects; see on 6:35. For the loaves of proposition, see § 177d; for David's votive offerings, 2 Kg 8:11 f.; for an Inerrancy problem, see § 37g.

VIII 1-11 Dedication—1. The entry of the Ark was the central rite, by which Yahweh took possession of his temple, his presence being in a special manner attached to the Ark. 2. It was ten months after the completion of the building. Ethaniam ('perpetual streams', the b 12-13 Solomon's Hymn—With the help of LXX it may be thus restored: 'Yahweh has set the sun in the heavens. But he has decreed to dwell himself in great darkness. I have succeeded in building you a mansion, the fixed place of your abode for ever'. The abrupt change to direct address shows that this is only an excerpt from the whole psalm, which LXX says was preserved in a collection called 'The Book of the Just'; cf. Jos 10:12; 2 Kg 1:18. LXX here mistook yāsār 'just' for šār 'canticle'. The hymn is not merely to thank the creator for being content with the temple; it rather marvels at Yahweh's deliberately choosing darkness as the mode of his presence: his mysterious nature is thus better expressed than even by the brightness of the heavens. Further, it sees in the temple a permanent bond between Yahweh and the dynasty.

c 14-61 Inaugural Address—After dedicating the temple on his own behalf, the king spoke for all. He began with an address to the people, 15-21, which proclaimed the temple the work of Providence, a sign of Yahweh's past and future faithfulness. A long prayer, 22-53, recommends the people to Yahweh enthroned in the temple. An epilogue, 54-61, blesses the people and exhorts them to perseverance.

14. The blessing here is a greeting, as 4 Kg 4:29; the strict sense in 55; cf. 57. 15-21. For the prehistory of the temple see 2 Kg 7; Deut 12. Since the name of Yahweh is attached to the temple (1) he watches over it as his property; cf. Deut 28:10; Is 4:1, (2) his personal being is there, ruling and working; cf. Is 30:27; 40:26. 22-26. Solomon placed himself on his knees, 54, to pray for the complete fulfilment of the prophecies. 27-30. According to 12 f. Yahweh dwelt in the temple. 27 does not deny this, but makes explicit the immensity of the Creator, already asserted in 'Yahweh has set the sun in the heavens'. The reminder that Yahweh watches from heaven, 29 f., guards against considering the ark as a fetish to which his presence was slavishly bound. 31. The temple is to be the theatre of God's judgements; cf. Num 5:21 f. 33-40. Calamities are the punishment of sin; the efficacy of prayer depends on sincere repentance. 41-43 refer to strangers' visits, like that of the Queen of Sheba (Saba) or Merodach Baladan's embassy, 4 Kg 20:12 ff. This is the climax of the prayer: the temple as the herald of God's glory to the ends of the earth. The systematic share of proselytes in the cult is not envisaged. 44-50. For prayer in the direction of the temple, cf. Dan 6:10 and the Mohammedans' turning to Mecca. 51. The furnace is a metaphor for a dreadful fate, Deut 4:20, possibly because of its use as a death penalty; cf. Dan 3. 54-61. The king is ideally a 'Father Always', Is 9:4; hence the paternal blessing, 57; cf. Ru 2:4. Praise of God precedes it; cf. 15 ff. The bishop's blessing still begins with 'Sit nomen Domini benedictum'. The prayer for grace promises co-operation.

The prayer, 14-61, is hardly in its original tenor: note, e.g. the abrupt insertion of later theological precautions 27 ff. (KTW V 254 f.); 44 ff. are a variation on 33 ff.; exile is vividly envisaged; 52 f. are loosely attached to the preceding. In its present form the passage seems to date at least from the time of the first great deportations, 734-701, and interprets the sentiments evoked by the dedication for the benefit of the readers.

62-66 Inaugural Celebrations—The numbers are not correct: 1,800 an hour, 12 hours a day for 7 days! 64. On holocaust, meal and peace-offering see §§ 111d-j, 183b, 184b-c. 65. The seven days coincided with Tabernacles, § 113j. The plain about Riblah and Kadesh on the Orontes was the 'Entrance of Hamath', Abel II 78; the 'River of Egypt' was the Wady el-'Arish, c 50 m. S. of Gaza.

IX 1-9 Concluding Vision—The substance of the revelation has been elaborated by the inspired writer to meet a difficulty of the exiles. If the temple has perished, it is not because Yahweh was too weak to protect his own, but because he was too holy to tolerate evil in them. For 'example' (MT 'elyōn 'lofty') read 'ruins' ('iyyin) with Old Latin, Syr.; cf. Mic 3:12.

10-28 Finance and Public Works—10-14. Solomon had to borrow to build, and ceded temporarily, 2 Par 8:2, part of E. Galilee with its revenues. Hiram's discontent was echoed in the name of the chief town, the most easterly of the tribe of Aser, Jos 19:27. Kabul perhaps suggested K^{bal}, 'like nothing at all'.

15. A record follows of how conscript labour was used. g

The Mello (cf. 11:27) seems to have been a massive fortification on the W., between Sion and the temple area; cf. L.-H. Vincent, Jérusalem I 171-87. Haṣor (Heser; prob. Tell el-Qedah, where great stables have been excavated; cf. on 4:27) SW. of Lake Huleh, guarded the northern approaches. Megiddo, Tell el Mutesellim, commanded the plain of Esdraelon. 17.

The rebuilding of Gezer signified that Solomon was to be sole master in Palestine. Relations with Egypt were henceforth less friendly; cf. 11:14 ff. The events of 16 were early in the reign. 18. For 'Palmira' read Tamar (MT), S. of the Dead Sea. 19. Solomon fortified 'all the towns where he stored provisions' and the cavalry depots; cf. 4:7-26. There were iron mines as well as forests to be exploited on Lebanon. 20-22.

Only the remnants of the non-Israelite peoples were conscripted permanently; cf. on 5:12 ff. 23-28. David's conquest of Edom had given Solomon command of its copper and iron mines, as well as access to the Red Sea. Copper refineries of Solomon's time have been found at Tell el-Kheleifeh, the ancient Ezion-Geber, now ½ m. inland on the Gulf of Aqabah (Ailath). The site of Ophir is still debated: Somaliland, supposed to correspond to the Egyptian Punt, is credited with exports like those of 10:22, cf. W. F. Albright, 133; the most ancient tradition, LXX, Josephus etc., says India; more probably S. Arabia, a gold-producing country (cf. Job 22:24) inhabited by the Jectanides; cf. Gen 10:29. For 420 talents, LXX has 120.

X 1-29 Prestige and Wealth—Further proofs are adduced to show how Yahweh fulfilled his promise to Solomon, 3:12 ff. 1. The later Sabacan kingdom was in the Hadramaut, SW. Arabia. But the Sabaeans are constantly met with along the EW. trade route in N. Arabia before 700 B.C. See Tiglath-pileser's inscription of 728, Luckenbill I No. 799, and Gen 10:30; 25:3; Ez 38:13, etc. The name may still persist in the Wady esh-Shaba, near Medina, Abel I 293. Possibly the northern Sheba was a set of outposts of the southern. Tiglath-pileser mentions five Arab queens. The 'hard questions' of the queen of Sheba were riddles and allegorical proverbs, of which Samson's, Jg 14:12-19, are examples. 2-10, 13. Solomon's wisdom was proved as much by his riches as by his answers: poverty would have been no recommendation of his prudence. Our Lord made the generous admiration of the 'queen of the South' a reproach to his incredulous hearers, Mt 12:42. 11-12. The sources and display of Solomon's wealth follow, in a series of disconnected notices. One great source was the joint naval expeditions with Hiram (cf. 22) exporting iron and copper, 9:26 ff. Thyine is citron-wood: MT 'almuggim, conjectured to be sandal-wood—impossible if found on Lebanon, 2 Par

- 2691 2:8. 14-15. The figures have suffered. 16-17. His guardsmen had ceremonial shields which, between parades, hung in the Lebanon Hall; cf. 7:2. About 8 lb of gold (LXX) was used on each large shield, about 4 on the small: in 17 read '3 minas' (MT) for '300 lb'. 18-21. Ebony thrones inlaid with gold and ivory were carried off from Megiddo by Thothmes III c. 1480. 22. The traders sailed in Tarshish-ships (MT), i.e. ocean-going vessels, such as those used by the Phoenicians sailing to Tarshish (in Spain and Sardinia). 'Peacocks' (tukkf, Malabar logai) is doubtful; W. F. Albright, 212, 'monkeys'. 26. See on 4:26. 28-29 give another source of wealth; 'The trade in horses, which was in Solomon's hands, between Egypt and Coa (E. Cilicia) was as follows: the kings' merchants procured them from Coa at the current price; and a chariot was exported from Egypt at the rate of 600 silver shekels, a horse from Coa at 150; at this rate they delivered them to all the kings of the Hittites and of Syria'. Cilicia was a great horse-breeding country; Egypt manufactured chariots; see Albright, 135. There is no need to substitute Musri (Cappadocia) for Egypt (Misraim), as is often done; besides, Solomon's middlemen could hardly have established a monopoly in a merely northern trade.
- 270a XI 1-8 Solomon's Sin—A final trait of Solomon's glory, the magnificence of his harem, links the sentence passed on his sin with the blessings bestowed on his piety. 1-3. The spirit of Ex 34:16 and Deut 7:1-4, which forbade marriage with Canaanites, is here authentically interpreted to exclude all foreigners. Reasons of state, however, could have excused Solomon, like David, 2 Kg 3:3; 1 Par 3:2. It was customary for kings to send their daughters to one another's harems. Amenhotep III received from Nahrina the princess Giluhipa with 317 ladies, Breasted, Ancient Records II 867. But Solomon surrendered himself completely to the will of his wives; cf. Gen 3. 4-8. Astarte was the fertility-goddess of the ancient east; there were local Astartes like local Baals. Milkom, 5, 7, was the Ammonite form of Malik or Muluk (Moloch), a god common to the Semites. The shrines were S. of the Mount of Olives, 4 Kg 23:13.
- b 9-13 Condemnation—Solomon, like Saul, 1 Kg 15:23, should have lost all. Judah, the one tribe left to his son, was to absorb Benjamin, perhaps by force; cf. 2 Par 11:23. The enmity of foreigners, 15 ff., 25, was of long standing and the disaffection of subjects natural, 12:4. But since God did not intervene to check their course, or to remedy the defects of statesmanship, they appear in the following as the consequence of the sin which God had foreseen.
- c 14-22, 25b Revolt of Edom—15. l'qabbēr 'et-hah' l'alim, 'to bury the slain' is generally read l'baqqēr 'et-hah'ōrim, 'to search the caves'. 17-18. The direct route being barred, the refugees gained Egypt by Madian, E. of the Gulf of Aqabah, and Pharan, N. of the Sinai peninsula. The young prince was of marriageable age: the same term was used by Solomon at his accession, 3:7. With Genubath, cf. Egyptian genbt, 'lock of hair': that of a crown prince was characteristic. As long as the Pharaoh was friendly to Solomon (see on 9:17) he detained Adad. 25b. Later Adad set up an independent state in Edom (LXX), which in the end must have hampered Solomon's Red Sea trade.
- d 23-25a Revolt of Razon—Solomon maintained his hold over Coele-Syria, 2 Par 8:3, but a new power arose in Damascus, which was to be the terrible enemy of Israel for 200 years.
- e 26-40 Rebellion and Flight of Jeroboam—26-28. That the first sign of internal dissension came from an Ephraimite is significant. Jeroboam was in a position to share and exploit the resentment of the northerners under forced labour. For Sareda, cf. the valley of Serida, in the centre of the hill-country E. of Joppa, Abel II 457. For the Mello, see on 9:15. 29-31. The prophet from Shiloh, long the resting-place of the Ark, supported Jeroboam, while affirming the divine choice of Jerusalem, 32, and David, 34. For the symbolic action cf. 1 Kg 15:27; Is 8:1-4; Jer 19:10. 32-35. The count, ten tribes and one, disregards one tribe; cf. 13. Jerusalem lay in Benjamin, and Judah was to include also Simeon and part of Dan. The prophet is not concerned with arithmetic. 36. The lamp corresponds to 'hearth and home'. The metaphor means that the family of David would not become extinct. 37-38. Jeroboam is placed on an equality with David, but with the same obligations. 39, not in LXX, may be considered a gloss. 40. Shosheng (or Sheshong), the founder of a new dynasty, had no ties with Solomon. At 12:24 LXX adds (24a-z in Rahlfs) a variant account of Jeroboam, from which may be retained the fact that he began his abortive rebellion by seizing the fortress which he had just constructed for Solomon at Sareda.
- 41-43 Death of Solomon—One of the author's sources is given: 'the Annals of the Reign of Solomon'. For the compilers see 2 Par 9:29. He died c. 931; LXX here adds that Jeroboam returned at once from Egypt to his native city. Under Solomon, Israel had advanced rapidly to its greatest power and prosperity. The international situation was favourable, with Assyria and Egypt passive, and the genius and energy of Solomon seized the opportunity to build up a great political and commercial empire. In the splendour of his royal dignity, which shone out in his wisdom and piety no less than in his buildings and armaments, he pre-figured the Messiah and his spiritual kingdom. Initially, 8:66, south and north were united in enthusiastic loyalty towards his person. But he failed to weld them into an organic whole. Instead, he used his powers to submit his people, and not impartially, to oppressive taxation and conscription. Some of the fruits of empire went to strengthen its defences, but much went to maintain the magnificence of his court. Most of his subjects were ready to desert him by the time that he deserted his God.
- XII 1-24 Secession of Israel—1. Shechem (near Nablus) was central, and by reason of its religious associations, venerable, Gen 12:6; 33:18; Jos 24:32. But its choice for the national assembly shows that the northerners were insisting on consideration. In principle they all recognized the right of the heir of David to the throne. 2-3a to 'came' should be omitted with LXX (B, Lucian); cf. 20. 3b-14. The delay in answering a reasonable demand must have caused resentment; the answer was provocative in the extreme, because the whip was not just a metaphor. Forced labour was done under the lash; the scorpion was a scourge fitted with hooks. 15. The rashness of Roboam, a turning-point in the history of the people was a disposition of Yahweh (MT). Prudence could have saved Solomon's empire, but grace was withheld. 16. The old cry of the discontented northerners was revived; cf. 2 Kg 20:1. Their land did not lie in Judah. Why then should they recognize David as king? 'To your tents' means 'Return home'. Here it was a refusal to remain under Roboam's orders. In future 'David' must confine his attentions to his own tribe. 17-24. The king's bodyguard failed to protect Adoniram (LXX, Syr.; cf. 4:6), and it is doubtful if even the full muster of the South, though equipped with Solomon's armaments, could have imposed his will on the North.
- 25-32 Religious Schism—Jeroboam fortified Shechem and made Phaniel, on the Jabbok, his base to protect the provinces E. of Jordan. 26-27. Jerusalem still drew pilgrims, 2 Par 11:16. 28. The 'young bulls' were two images of the one Yahweh, as the appeal to Ex 32:4 shows; the verb 'brought' is in the plur. in MT, but was originally in the sing.; cf. Neh 9:18. The Decalogue, Ex 20:4 etc., forbade images designed for worship, including in fact those of Yahweh (cf. Deut 4:15) but could possibly be interpreted as forbidding only images of false gods. The cult was not idolatrous, but the way was open for confusing Yahweh with his image, and his cult with that of the Phoenician and 270h Canaanite Baals, also represented as bulls. The bull was the symbol of strength and life-giving force. It has been maintained (cf. W. F. Albright, *From the Stone Age to Christianity*³, 229 f.) that the bull was merely the pedestal of Yahweh, like the cherubim of the Mosaic ark. But the Bible makes it clear that it was an image, and therefore the great sin and scandal of

1 Jeroboam—not a mere ‘rubrical’ innovation. 29. Bethel (Beitin) 10 m. N. of Jerusalem, was rich in memories of Abraham, Gen 12:8; 13:3, and of Jacob, Gen 28:10–22; 35:1–16. Dan (Tell el-Qādi) near the source of the Jordan, had been the shrine of a famous image, Jg 18:1–31. Thus the law of the one sanctuary was violated. 31–33. But in restoring the ancient shrines, Jeroboam could present himself as the upholder of ancient traditions; cf. 4 Kg 18:22. Priests were recruited from all classes, the Levites having migrated to Jerusalem, 2 Par 11:13. In 32 f. the text is disturbed by repetitions; omit the first ‘in Bethel’. The feast of Tabernacles was a month later than in Judah; cf. 8:2, 65. Bethel became the Chapel Royal, Am 7:13.

J XIII 1–10 Threat to Bethel—Three prophets condemned the impiety of Jeroboam, first a Judaeon, then a northerner, 32, then Ahias, 14:7 ff.—his former patron; cf. 11:29. 1. Jeroboam was pontificating at the altar. 2. The gravest ritual impurity was from contact with corpses, Num 19:18. 3–10. The prophet’s aloofness marked the ‘excommunication’ of the cult.

K 11–34. The Northern Prophet—11–15. His motives are obscure. Possibly he wished to gain popular credit by winning a special mark of favour from the wonder-worker. 16–19. The Judaeon, though he had had a revelation to the contrary, accepted his mere word without demanding a sign. 20–22. Revelation was not confined to blameless characters; cf. Balaam, Num 31:16, and Jonas. The Judaeon had, publicly at least, disavowed the mandate of Yahweh; the judgement on him had to be public (cf. 25) to restore the impression made by his sign. Burial among strangers was abhorrent; cf. Gen 47:30; 50:25. 23–28. Lions were native to Palestine, 1 Kg 17:34 etc., and, it is said, did not become extinct there till the 12th cent. A.D. 29–32. Add with LXX ‘that my bones may be undisturbed with his’, at 31b. For the fulfilment of his hopes see 4 Kg 23:18. ‘Samaria’ is an anachronism, one of several signs of the late redaction of the story. ‘To fill the hands’, a technical term, is to give the insignia or rights of priesthood; cf. P. Joüon, Bi 3 (1922) 64. 34. ‘This was the sin of the house of Jeroboam’ (LXX)—not merely the calf-worship but the non-Levitical priesthood.

I XIV 1–20 Doom of Jeroboam’s House—1. The link with the foregoing is vague; it was probably late in the reign; cf. 10. 2. Ahias was no longer friendly. The disguise sought to avert the worst. Jeroboam regarded the prophet as a magician who could sway the future, but could be tricked into giving a favourable verdict. 3. The modest presents, which were in keeping with the disguise, included ‘cracknels’, perhaps ‘raisin bread’ (niquḏim ‘dotted’). 4–6. The failing sight of Ahias heightens the miracle of his inspiration. 7. This, with 12–14, is the original kernel of the sentence pronounced against Jeroboam’s ingratitude. The rest, 8–11, 15 f., is an expansion of the theme in conventional terms. 8. See 11:6, 31; Deut 12:25; 13:19; 21:9. 9. ‘Above all that were before’ can hardly refer to Solomon; the phrase is part of the style; cf. 16:25, 30, 33. 10 refers to all male descendants; cf. 16:11; 21:21, etc. ‘The fettered and the free’ means ‘everybody’, Deut 32:36 etc., who supported him. 11 is again conventional; cf. 16:4; 21:24.

M 12–14. Honourable burial was to be denied to the house of Jeroboam, but not to Jeroboam himself, 20, nor to the innocence of youth. The prophet looks beyond the brief reign of Nadab to Baasa, 15:27. 15–16. The exile of 721, beyond the River, the Euphrates, was the last of a series of staggering blows. For ‘groves’ see on 23 f. 17. Read with LXX Sareda; cf. 11:26. Baasa was to make Thersa his capital. 18–20. The wars of Jeroboam included (a) 270m the defence of Transjordan, 12:25, possibly against the Ammonites; (b) skirmishes with Roboam, 14:30; (c) open war with Abiam, 2 Par 13:2 ff.; (d) possibly war with Damascus (cf. 15:19); (e) the invasion of Shishak; cf. on 25 ff. These formed part of the Annals. He died c 909.

21–31 Roboam of Judah—21. He reigned c 931–915. N For the kings of Judah, the mother is regularly named; cf. on 2:12; 15:9 f. Her influence no doubt furthered the idolatry which Solomon had favoured. 22–23. In the Canaanite cults, stone pillars (DV ‘statues’) and wooden posts (DV ‘groves’) flanked the altars. The pillars represented Baal, the posts Ashera, his consort; MT, passim, uses the proper name of the goddess, in the plur., ^a*šērim*, for the wooden posts. LXX, Vg render ‘groves’. The Greeks used the name Hermes both for the god and for the pillar surmounted by his head. For the tree-trunk, supposed to be an ashera, excavated at Ai, see L.-H. Vincent, RB (1947) 248 f. Ashera, originally perhaps a sea-goddess (cf. Albright, 77 f.), was now more or less interchangeable with Astarte, goddess of fertility, of which green trees were the emblem. 24. Sacred prostitution, involving both sexes, was a permanent feature of these cults; cf. Herodotus 1.199; Lucian, de Dea Syria. Not all the country shrines were idolatrous. The ‘high places’ tolerated even by good kings (cf. 15:14; 22:44 etc.) were shrines of Yahweh. But they were against the law of one sanctuary, and their installations were apparently modelled on the Canaanite. Stone pillars could be legitimate (cf. Gen 28:17 f. with 35:7 and Ex 24:4) but their associations were pernicious. Hence the drastic action of Ezechias and Josias against them. 25–29. Sixty northern towns are included in the inscription of Karnak which records the Palestine expedition of Shishak (Egyptian Shoshenq or Sheshonq) c 922. Possibly Jeroboam’s neglect of promised tribute (cf. 11:40) was the cause of the raid; it is placed here as the chastisement of Judah’s impiety. 30–31. Border skirmishes were frequent, the new boundaries still being fluid. Full-scale war had been averted, 12:19.

XV 1–8 Abiam of Judah—1–2. He reigned c 915–913. 271a Daughter stands for grand-daughter here, as in 4 Kg 8:26. Maacha’s father was Uriel of Gibeon, 2 Par 13:2, husband of Absalom’s daughter Tamar, 2 Kg 14:27. 3–7a. With the continued religious decline, the dynasty would have gone the way of Jeroboam’s, but for David’s merits. 7b. Abias even maintained the cult at Bethel, after capturing this and other towns from Jeroboam; cf. 2 Par 13:9; 15:8.

9–24 Asa of Judah, 913–873—9–10. After the early death of Abiam, Maacha, Asa’s grand-mother, retained the dignity of queen mother; cf. on 2:12; 14:21. In Babylon and Assyria also the king’s mother received special honours, witness the legendary fame of Semiramis (Sammuramat, whose son, Adad-nirari III, called her ‘Queen of the palace, his Lady’; cf. E. Schrader, KIB, 1, 193). 13. After some years, when the young king’s piety could assert itself, ‘he removed Maacha from being queen mother, because she had made a hateful image [Vg, in sacris Priapi] of Ashera [Vg, et in luco eius]. It was apparently not the plain wooden post, but probably an Astarte, usually represented naked and with obscene exaggerations. 14. The country shrines of Yahweh were left undisturbed, in spite of the law of one sanctuary. They were not as yet contaminated with heathenism, hence Asa’s heart could be said to be perfect. 15. Abiam had won booty from Jeroboam, 6 and Asa from the Cushites; cf. 2 Par 14:12. 16–17. When the Israelites re-took Bethel, they advanced to within 5 m. of Jerusalem. 18–19. The alliance between Tabrimmon and Abiam may explain Jeroboam’s defeat; cf. on 7b. 20. Ahion (Tell Dibbin), Dan and Abel-beth-Maacha (Abil), lay round the source of the Jordan; Cenneroth (Tell el-Oreimeh), from which the lake of Galilee took its ancient name, was the most southerly point of the Syrian invasion. The territory

271c was not permanently occupied (cf. 4 Kg 15:29) but Israel hardly regained it without making concessions of the type indicated in 20:34, as it covered the trade routes to Tyre and Egypt. All later wars had this prize in view. 21. Baasa's capital, Thersa, possibly Gemmain, c 8 m. S. of Shechem, cannot be identified with certainty; cf. Abel 11 485. 22-24. Asa's new fortresses fixed the frontier a few miles N. of Ramah. At Mizpah (Maspha; Tell en-Nasbeh) walls of this era have been found up to 26 ft in width.

d 25-XVI 14 Dynastic Changes in Israel—25-26. During the long and happy reign of Asa in Judah, six kings, involving three dynasties, were to succeed each other in Israel. 27-28. As Nadab (910-909) was with the army, his slayer must have been a general. Gibbethon (Tell el-Melât, between Jerusalem and the coast) was left in Philistine hands; cf. 16:15. 29-XVI:6. Baasa (909-886) disappointed the orthodox and led the people to defeat; cf. 15:21. The prophet's denunciation spurred the discontented to action. 7. Jehu outlived Ahab and Josaphat, 2 Par 19:2; 20:34. Omit the reference to his death (not in MT). 8-14. With Ela (886-885) perished all the connexions who were bound to avenge him, his 'goëls'; cf. Num 35:19-27.

15-20 Death of Zambri—Though energetic and brave, he was not a good organizer, and had not time to muster his supporters. These were numerous, as the subsequent civil war shows, and probably represented the Ephraim-Manasses group of tribes, from which Jeroboam came. Omri (Amri) had land in Issachar (cf. ch 21) and so represented the more northerly group of tribes, like his patron Baasa, under whom he had conquered and governed Moab (Mesha Stone, §80j). 17. 'All Israel' is the army, 15. Contrast 'the people of Israel', 21, whose division later split the army.

e 21-28. Omri, 885-874—21-22. LXX (B, Lucian) shows that Joram, brother of Thebni, continued the civil war. 23. It lasted four years, as Zambri died in Asa's 27th (15) and Omri's undisputed reign began in Asa's 31st. The twelve years are reckoned from Zambri's death (cf. 16) ending in Asa's 38th (29). 24. Samaria (see §80d-e, for fortifications, palaces and ivories), re-founded by Herod as Sebaste (now Sebastiyeh), was a central and strong position, on an almost isolated hill which dominated its neighbourhood by 300 ft. 25-26. The severe blame (cf. Mic 6:16) is for introducing Phoenician worship and giving it state establishment, which he did when he married Ahab to Jezabel. 27-28. The marriage was one of his earliest political moves (Ahab's grandson was 22 years old in 841, 4 Kg 8:26), and one of his ablest, since the Tyrian alliance kept Damascus in check. He was a great ruler, and the Assyrians knew Israel henceforth as 'the Land of the House of Omri'.

f 29-34 Ahab, 874-853—Two enormities, the Baal temple and human sacrifice, heralded the religious crisis which Elias was to meet. 29-31. Ethbaal had become king of Tyre and Sidon (cf. on 5:6) by killing his predecessor, according to Menander (in Josephus, C. Ap. 1, 18, 23). The new dynasties supported each other. Ahab apparently paid a state visit to worship Melqart ('king of the city'), the Baal ('lord') of Tyre. He was however also a worshipper of Yahweh, as the names of his children show (Achazyah; Joram, 'Yahweh is exalted'; Atalyah). Prophets of Yahweh will be found in his entourage. 32-33. Beside the altar, he set up an ashera (cf. on 14:23) and naturally, other asheras and massebahs (pillars) throughout the land, 4 Kg 3:2. 34. Excavations have shown that Jericho, deserted since c 1250, was re-built at this era; cf. L.-H. Vincent, RB (1909) 274; (1932) 268. The sacrifices, common at such undertakings (cf. L.-H. Vincent, Canaan, 199), were to avert calamity; the orthodox looked on them here as the fulfilment of the curse of Jos 6:26.

g XVII 1-9 Intervention of Elias—1. Eliyyahû (Elijah), 'my God is Yahweh' fits the great fighter admirably. The name is preserved in the hill of Mar Elias, near el-Istib (Thisbeh). The drought, recorded also by Menander for Phoenicia (Jos. Ant. 8, 13, 2) was at once the punishment of idolatry, Lev. 26:19 ff., Deut 28:23 ff., and a challenge to Baal, the sky-god, whose proper name was Hadad. It was the climax of a long struggle. The date will have been c 857, for Eliseus (cf. 19:19) cannot have been called much earlier, since he was still working under Joas, 798-783, 4 Kg 13. Elias appears suddenly and unannounced; this seems to be deliberate (cf. 13:1; 16:1; 21:7) to symbolize the sovereign and direct intervention of Yahweh into human history. 2-7. The raven snatches eggs, chickens, etc. from farm-yards: there is the usual economy of means in the miracle. 8-9. Sarephtha, now Sarafand, on the sea till the time of the Crusades, is now 1 m. inland.

10-16 The Widow's Faith—Her blind obedience to the movement of grace (cf. 9b) may be compared to Abraham's readiness to sacrifice his son. Her reward pre-figured the inexhaustible graces to be bestowed on the gentiles by Christ, Lk 6:38; 4:25.

17-24 Raising of the Dead Child—18. The exclamation of surprise, mah li wâlâk, has various nuances; here: 'What does this mean?'; cf. Jn 2:4. The prophet's presence had seemed a blessing, but in the end only called Yahweh's attention to her sins. 19-23. The rite which accompanied the prayer, (cf. 4 Kg 4:34, Ac 20:10) signified that the warmth of life should pass from the wonder-worker to the child. 24. The mother re-affirms her faith in the divine mission of the prophet, and further, that Yahweh had been faithful all along to his first promise of blessing.

XVIII 1-15 Return of Elias—1-6. The new year had come around twice in the drought, which lasted probably from after the March rains of one year till the November rains of the following year. The 3½ years of Lk 4:25, Jas 5:17 seems to be idiomatic, like the '3 days and 3 nights' of Mt 12:40. U. Holzmeister, VD (1939) 167 ff., takes it literally. But in such a spell, all vegetation and cattle would have been destroyed. The expeditions hoped to find wells and watered valleys where green fodder still grew. Ahab does not seem to have been personally hostile to the true religion, since his chamberlain was a strict 'servant of Yahweh', as his name implies; the persecution is ascribed to Jezabel. 7-10. Ahab was on good terms with the neighbouring kings of Tyre, Syria, 20:34, Judah, 22:5; he was ruler of Moab; hence he could make them swear that Elias was not to be found. 11-14. The spirit of Yahweh is considered as an external force (cf. 46) whose plans the prophet cannot comprehend, 17:20, or guarantee. The contrast in our Lord's use of divine power is instructive. 15. Elias was the servant of him who was about to reveal himself as 'Yahweh, (God) of hosts': i.e. lord of all earthly and heavenly forces; cf. Gen 2:1 (nature), 1 Kg 4:4 (armies), Deut 4:19 (stars), Jos 5:14 (angels).

16-24 Challenge on Carmel—17. Ahab's anger died away with the prospect of relief. 19. The majestic wooded range of Carmel was naturally sacred in the eyes of pagans (Tacitus, Hist. 2, 78; Suetonius, Vespasian 5; Iamblichus, Pythagoras 3:15) and was the site of a shrine of Yahweh, like Mt Nebo (Mesha Stone). Tradition placed the meeting at the height El-Muhraqa 'Burnt Offering', at the S.E. end of the range, close to the Qishon, 40, and Jezreel, 46. A lower point near by, Bir el-Muhraqa, with a spring, 34 f., suits the text better, as the sea was not visible without a climb, 43 f. Omit 'the prophets of the grove' as an interpolation, not in LXX (Hexaplar); cf. 22, 40. 21. The reproach, 'How long will you limp from side to side?' supposes that the people were already familiar with the exigencies of monotheism. It was not a novelty introduced by the great prophets, as so often said. The dilemma, 'Yahweh is all or nothing', left no place for the henotheism which was content to worship one god while not denying the existence of others. The clear and peremptory message of Carmel ranks with that of Sinai in the history of revelation.

271k 22-24. The ending of the drought might have been attributed to chance; lightning was decisive, especially as Baal, Hadad, 'Lord of Heaven', was the great storm-god.

l 25-40 Fire from Heaven—26. 'They danced by the altar': the Baal Marqod 'lord of the dance' had a shrine on Lebanon, and the ritual dances of Cybele and the Dea Syria were well known to antiquity. 27. According to R. de Vaux (Les prophètes de Baal sur le mont Carmel, Bulletin du Musée de Beyrouth, 1943), Elias mocked four aspects of Baal: (1) the philosopher-inventor ('he is meditating'); (2) the patron of Phoenician merchants ('he is busy'); (3) the patron of his sailors; (4) the winter-sleeper, for whose awakening a feast was held in Tyre and Carthage, Jos., Ant. 8, 5, 3. The last trait shows Baal as the vegetation-god. 28. As a mourning-rite at least, self-wounding was prevalent, Deut 14:1, Jer 47:5. Originally based perhaps on the idea of blood-alliance with the god, it was here an intense mode of prayer. 29. 'Prophe-sying' means 'in a frenzy' (cf. 1 Kg 19:23 f., 4 Kg 9:11) like dervishes, who also gash themselves. 29-31. The time, 3 p.m., was fixed according to the temple ritual, and the twelve tribes were represented by the twelve stones of the altar. Elias seems to have wished for the united prayers of Judah and Israel, just as he acted in the interest of both. 32. The narrow, shallow trench would hold 'two seahs of corn' (MT), c 3 pecks. 33-35. The drenching was not to produce rain by 'sympathetic magic', but to heighten the effect of the miracle. 36-39. As on Sinai, Yahweh revealed himself by fire, the one God who in the past had converted to himself the people's fathers. 40. Elias used the enthusiasm of the people to eliminate the prophets who were outlaws in the realm of Yahweh.

m 41-46 Miracle of the Rain—41-42. Hearing its approach in spirit, Elias crouched down in an attitude of intense prayer. 43. For 'foot' read 'hand' (MT). 44-46. The prophet's solicitude for the king is friendly; with the final demonstration of his superhuman power, cf. Ps 18:6. Jezreel (Zerin) was c 15 m. away.

272a XIX 1-8 Flight to Horeb—1-2. Jezabel did not dare to kill Elias, but, to uphold her authority, banished him by threats. 3. He could not long rely on Achab and the fickle public: 'rising up, he fled for his life', without pausing in Judah where since c 865 Josaphat's son Joram was married to Athalia, daughter of Achab and Jezabel. 4. Under the shade of a broom (rôtem = genista) the hardships and disappointments of his fugitive life wrung from him a plea for release, since his strength was but human. Prophetic energy and insight were transient, not permanent gifts; cf. Jon 4:3. 5-8. The 300 m. pilgrimage to Horeb (Sinai) was to seek counsel and to pray for the faithless people, 14. He may have had other food from traders making for Aqabah, 9:26. But his strength came fundamentally from the miraculous food. This is a figure of the Eucharist, 'strengthened by whose vigour', says the Council of Trent, 'Christians are enabled to travel this pilgrimage of misery, and come at last to their heavenly fatherland', Dz 882.

b 9-14 Theophany—9-12. Yahweh's coming was heralded by hurricane, earthquake and fire (lightning?). But he was not therein—contrast Ex 19:18, Ps 17:12. His presence was felt only in the quiet of a gentle breeze, because his being is peace, his attributes wise counsel and calm constancy. As the zephyr contrasts with the hurricane, so the peaceful manifestation with the tempestuous zeal of Elias. 10-14. Elias, depressed and bewildered, seems to ignore Carmel. But the miracle had not repaired the ravages of years. The revival of the threat to his life seemed to promise a revival of Baalism. The people who would not defend the wonder-worker were not likely to build well on the new foundation. He had come therefore to Horeb for help. Yahweh appeared in fact, but unmoved by the menace to his kingdom which racked the prophet. The reproof addressed to Elias in this striking revelation may perhaps be expressed in St Augustine's words:

'Thou regardest thy few days and in them thou dost wish all things to be fulfilled', PL 37, 1176.

15-18 The Divine Plan—Elias' life-work was nearly over, but God had other instruments. 15. The desert of Damascus is here probably the pasture-land E. of the Sea of Galilee, then held by Syria. Hazael was a dignitary of Benhadad III, 4 Kg 8:7 f., who was yet to succeed Benhadad II. 16. Similarly, before Jehu, two kings were to succeed Achab. Thus, according to the immediate meaning of the text, Elias was to anoint Hazael and Jehu c 13 years before they came to the throne. In fact, it was only through Eliseus that Elias carried out his mandate. The prophecy was fulfilled substantially, but the terms were not modified to suit the event exactly. 18. The 'Remnant' (this is the first instance of an idea common in the 8th cent. prophets), from which flourishing religious life was to grow, is given in a figurative number, the 7 suggesting health. Perhaps however the actual number of the orthodox in the North is indicated. For kissing as a religious rite, see Os 13:2, Job 31:27.

19-21 Vocation of Eliseus—19. The homeland of Eliseus ('lîsâ' 'God has saved') was Abel-Meholah, 16, prob. Tell Abu Sifri, near the Jordan, S. of Beisan. The gesture with the distinctive mantle of the prophet (cf. 4 Kg 1:8, Zach 13:4, Mt 3:4) intimated the call. 20. Elias' answer, 'Go, return, for what have I done to (hinder) you?' seems to be a concession. More probably it means 'Come, turn (after me), for (think) what I have done to you!'. 21. For Eliseus seems to have understood that Elias demanded an immediate break with the past; cf. Lk 9:62. The anointing as prophet came later, probably just before the events of 4 Kg 2. Meanwhile Eliseus was considered merely the servant of Elias, 4 Kg 3:11.

XX 1-21 War with Syria—LXX (B, Lucian) puts ch 21 before 20, leaving the connexion between 20 and 22 unbroken. 1. It was probably c 858, before the drought; for the causes see on 15:20. Benhadad II (c 875-845) put into the field at Qarqar, 853 B.C., 1,200 chariots, 1,200 horse, 20,000 foot, Luckenbill I no. 611. There, against Assyria, 11 kings were allied; the 32 here must be chiefs of Syrian tribes. 2-9. Achab was prepared to pay a certain contribution, but not to submit to an inspection in view of a general confiscation. 10. Benhadad threatened to raze the city, claiming to have so many soldiers that its dust would not make a handful for each. 11. Achab's reply was that a man putting on his armour should not boast like a victor laying it aside. 13. Jezabel's persecution had not started. The prophet is not Elias, for tradition is inclined to ascribe rather more than less to an outstanding figure. 14-21. Achab, a brave and devoted leader (cf. 18:6; 22:35) headed a sortie of picked troops, so few that the Syrians did not anticipate serious fighting. A full-scale attack routed them. The tactics are not made clear. The writer's intention was simply to show that victory came from Yahweh, 13.

22-34 Another Campaign—22-23. The heart of Israel's territory was upland; Yahweh was compared to the Baal Hermon or Baal Lebanon. The principle that chariots and cavalry could be better employed on plains than among hills was clothed in religious form. 24-26. The undisciplined or untrustworthy sheikhs were replaced by regular officers, and Benhadad advanced along the E. of the Sea of Galilee (cf. on 19:15) basing his forces on Apheq (Fig, a few miles N. of the Yarmuk). 27-30. Yahweh was proved God of the plains as of the hills, therefore universal lord, since the battle was fought probably on the plateau SW. of Fig. The numbers are not correctly transmitted; cf. on 1. 30. The walls were undermined, and house to house fighting followed. 31. A burden on the back could be slung from a band round the forehead; hence the rope on the head to signify submission. Josephus, Ant. 8, 14, 4, explains it as a custom of Syrian suppliants. 32. 'Brother' was the normal form of address between kings of equal standing; cf. 9:13. 33. Vassals of Assyrian kings spoke of themselves as running beside g 35-43 Condemnation of the Treaty—In attacking twice against odds, Achab had obeyed Yahweh and been rewarded; in making terms he had been guided only by politics and was punished. 35. The 'sons of the prophets' were disciples grouped round a recognized prophet; cf. § 410e-f and on 4 Kg 2:3. In 38 and 41 they are simply 'prophets'. 36. One of them favoured Achab's policy to the extent of disregarding a 'word of the Lord'. 37-38. The object of the wound, which presumably could be seen bleeding, was to distract attention from the bandage (MT, LXX) round his forehead, which merely concealed (tattoo-) markings by which a prophet could be known; cf. Ez 9:4 ff. 39-41. Like David before Nathan, 2 Kg 12:5, Achab passed sentence on himself. 42. The captive was not his to dispose of, but Yahweh's—'the man doomed to destruction by me'; cf. Jos 6:17 etc. The misplaced clemency of Achab involved Israel in foreign commitments which in the end brought ruin. 43. The true prophets aimed at preserving Israel as 'a people apart', Deut 33:28 etc. It was possibly for their stand at this stage that Jezebel was allowed to proceed against them, 18:4.

h XXI 1-16 Murder of Naboth—After the Syrian wars, the events of chh 17-19 are probably to be inserted before this episode. 1. The coveted vineyard was in Jezreel, as follows from 4 Kg 9:21-25; from 19 and 22:38 it might have been thought to be in Samaria. Hence the gloss 'who was in Samaria', 18. 2-3. Achab's request was not against Lev 25:23-28, for Naboth would not be left landless, nor against Num 36:7, since the land would not pass from the tribe of Issachar; cf. on 16:16. Naboth was obstinately conservative. 4-8. It was the sharpness of the refusal that angered Achab. Hence the repetition in 4 and 6, to contrast the courtesy of the offer. But he was a constitutional monarch, educated to the Ten Commandments, and did not think of force. The pagan despot, Jezebel, was ruthless. Her irony stung Achab into delivering her the royal seal. The scene is characteristic for her power over Achab. 9. The fast, suggesting impending calamity, Jl 1:14, Jg 20:26, built up an atmosphere of tension in which the people would be swift to punish an evil-doer. 10. The two witnesses (cf. Deut 17:6; 19:15) were 'sons of worthlessness' (b'liya'al), scoundrels; P. Joüon, Bi 5 (1924) 178 explains the term as 'devil'; cf. 2 Cor 6:15. The double blasphemy was against Lev 24:16, Ex 22:28. 11-13. Naboth was stoned on his own land (cf. 19) property outside Jezreel, to which the kings rode out to meet Jehu, 4 Kg 9:21-26. The vineyard was in the town beside the palace. His sons were killed too, 4 Kg 9:26, to leave no heirs to dispute the confiscation of the property. There was no legal pretext for their death. But a king's enemies were always destroyed root and branch, 1:21 etc. 14-16. Achab must have learned the details and certainly sanctioned the murders.

i 17-29 Condemnation and Repentance—19. The prophecy was fulfilled vaguely in 22:38, but more precisely, as Jehu understood, in 4 Kg 9:25 f. Achab's blood flowed in Joram's veins. 20. Achab confessed that he was caught in the act. His misgivings show that he had still a lively sense of justice. Elias' 'sold' is apt; Achab had sold himself to Jezebel for the price of a vineyard. 21, 22, 24 are a conventional interpretation of the prophecy by the writer; cf. 14:10 f.; 16:2 ff. 23 is original, but awkwardly placed; a fuller form in 4 Kg 9:10, 36 f. In 24 read with MT 'Him that dieth of Achab' etc. 25. The mention of Jezebel's influence is not to excuse but to explain Achab's conduct; a similar remark was made about Solomon, 11:3 f. 26. The Amorites are a prototype of Canaanite Baal-worshippers as in Am 2:9, Ez 16:3. Achab had noble traits; cf. 20 and on 20:14, which are faithfully recorded in spite of the writers unsympathetic attitude. There is an unmistakable ring of triumph in the pardon which reminds us of the parables of Lk 15; and perhaps the fiercely zealous Elias needed the lesson there taught by the father to the elder son. This episode is taken from a different source than that of chh 17-19; there the official cult of Baal is the chief factor in the downfall of the dynasty; here, as in 2 Kg 2, the contribution of the king's personal sin is stressed.

XXII 1-28 Micahs and the False Prophets—1-3. 273a

Israel probably regained territory E. of the Sea of Galilee after the victory of Apheq, 20:34, but Syria still held the border-town of Ramoth (Tell Ramith), on the trade route from Damascus to N. Arabia. The battle of Qarqar (spring 853) had not appreciably weakened the Syrians, for the Assyrians had to return to the attack four times in the next 12 years. But Achab had been able to put 2,000 chariots into that battle, compared to Damascus' 1,200, Luckenbill I no. 611. He was therefore strong enough to take the offensive (autumn 853). 4-5. Josaphat was allied both politically and by marriage to the house of Omri; cf. on 19:3. 6. The prophets who had survived persecution (18:4; 19:14) had 'bowed the knee to Baal', 19:18, but still claimed to speak for Yahweh. 7. Knowing their history Josaphat asked 'Is there not some other prophet of Yahweh?' (MT). 8. This Micahs, who had kept up the menaces of 20:42, was confused with the eighth-century author of the prophetic book by the glossator of 28b. 9-14. The false prophets counted for little, since the verdict of Micahs could outweigh theirs. He had not as yet received a revelation; it came while he was on his way; cf. 17, 'I saw'. 15-17. After echoing sarcastically the words of the false prophets, he foretold defeat, without stating clearly that Achab would die. The flight or capture of the king might have explained the leaderless state of the army. For the terms cf. Num 27:17 (Mt 9:36). 18. The king sought to nullify the effect of his words by ascribing them to personal malice. 19. Micahs therefore gave details of his revelation. 20. 'Fall at' (nāpal b') could be rendered 'fall upon'; cf. Jos 11:7, 2 Kg 17:9, Job 1:15. The reference to Achab's death is still veiled. 21 manifests belief in spiritual beings, distinct from God and closer to him than men. 22-23. The false prophets are branded as conscious liars, though Micahs grants that Yahweh is in some way responsible; cf. 2 Kg 24:1, 1 Kg 26:19, Ex 4:21, 2 Kg 16:10. No distinction was made between direct causality and mere permission. The Israelites were satisfied that Yahweh was the ultimate cause of every event and did not ask how precisely he was the cause both of good and evil. 24-28a. Having warned the false prophets that they would have to fly for their lives one day (cf. 4 Kg 10:26) Micahs finally stated clearly that Achab would die in the battle. 28b. Cf. Mic 1:2.

29-40 Achab's Last Campaign—29-30. Achab was 6 determined, if the end was come, to die among his soldiers, but he did not mean to make it easy for his destiny to overtake him. The Syrians were not to recognize him. He cannot have known their order of the day. Josaphat was in no special danger; the silence of Micahs in his regard was reassuring. 31. With possible future alliances against Assyria in view, the king of Syria planned to end the war with as little loss as possible on either side. 32. Josaphat gave the Judean war-cry to rally his men. 34. The arrow struck between the joints of the armour (?)—MT. 35-37. Achab did not allow himself to be taken to the rear, but, to avoid disheartening his troops, remained upright near the front ('against the Syrians') till he bled to death. 38. See on 21:19. 39. Jericho was one of Achab's undertakings. For the fortifications and ivories of Samaria, see DBV (S) 3, 386-8 or W. F. Albright, Archaeology of Palestine, 137. His palace was 273e decorated with ivories, Am 3:15, Ps 44:9; they appear mostly as inlay for furniture. See § 80d-e.

- d 41-51 Josaphat of Judah, 873-849—41-47. Continuing the reforms of Asa, he eliminated ritual prostitution; cf. 15:12. 48. Edom had been re-conquered; cf. 11:14-25b. 'A governor ruled' (LXX), who was a native sheikh, 4 Kg 3:9, probably with Jewish ministers. 49-50. After a set-back, the Red Sea trade was apparently resumed. To bring 2 Par 20:35-37 into line with this passage, 'Achab' may be read there for 'Ochozias'; the enterprise was hardly delayed till the end of Josaphat's long reign. 51. Some idea of the importance of Josaphat as an administrator may be gathered from 2 Par 17-19. His measures included fortification of towns, re-organization of the army, re-distribution of provinces, provision of religious instruction and division of the judiciary.

THE FOURTH BOOK OF KINGS

- e I 1-2 Ochozias of Israel, 853-852: Invocation of Beelzebub—1. The loss of Moab (cf. Mesha Stone, § 80j) and the illness of the king are seen as chastisement for provoking Yahweh, 3 Kg 22:54. 2. Baal Zebub (Beelzebub) means 'lord of flies', cf. LXX and Jos., Ant. 9, 2, 1; he warned off the bearers of disease, like the Zeus Apomuios of Olympia. Zebub however is probably a contemptuous alteration of the original Zebul 'lofty mansion'. He was thus 'lord of the temple' of Accaron (Eqrôn, a Philistine town). The true form and meaning survived in the NT, Mt 10:25 etc., though the later Jews associated it with zibbul 'dung'. The Râs-Shamra texts mention Z-b-l B-'l, from which the sense of 'sublime, lordly' cannot be excluded. Ochozias disavowed Yahweh as the true God and as the God of Israel.
- f 3-18 Intervention of Elias—3-7. It is remarkable that he was not known to the soldiers. But he had always held aloof from the capital; cf. 20:13; 22:8. 8. His hairy mantle was distinctive; cf. on 3 Kg 19:19. 9. The command was to come down to Samaria; cf. 15. Elias was not on an inaccessible crag. 10-12. The answer involved a grim pun: not the man, 'if, of God, but fire, 'if, of God (MT 12) was to come down. 11-16. Why the destruction? (1) Elias was defending his life; cf. 15 and 3 Kg 19:2 f. (2) Disrespect for the prophetic office was visited with the extreme penalty; cf. 2:23 ff.; 3 Kg 20:36. The soldiers were executing an evidently sacrilegious order and the captain's 'man of God' was sarcastic. (3) The people needed to be deterred from the sensual cult of Baal by the fear of God. Hence the prophet's appeal to motives of fear, 3 Kg 17:1; 21:21; 22:17. It was not a prophet's duty to preach, 3 Kg 20:42, or practise, 3 Kg 18:40, love of enemies. The perfection of charity was reserved for the NT; cf. Lk 9:51-55. 17-18. The dating has suffered from interpolation. Joram's accession was the 22nd year of Josaphat. They campaigned together, 3:6 ff.
- g II 1-12 Assumption of Elias—1. The manner of his passing from this world is unique except for Enoch, Gen 5:22. It has been maintained, in view of Mal 4:5, that he is to return before the Second Coming; but contrast Mk 9:10 'Elias is already come', in the person of the Baptist. There were several Gilgals, 'circle of stones', the simplest type of shrine. This was probably the famous Gilgal between the Jordan and Jericho; cf. 5:38; 6:3. 2-8. They went (LXX) to Bethel, which was much higher. Elias paid a last visit of encouragement to the prophetic colleges (see § 410e-f) though he was not their head; cf. 'thy master', 3. They did not foresee his permanent disappearance (cf. 16) and they were not to witness his passing. Moses too had passed away alone, with no one to know his grave, Deut 34:6. Elias and Eliseus must have returned to the Jordan somewhere above Jericho, for there was a ford lower down, 2 Kg 19:40 f. The miracle (cf. Ex 14:21, Jos 3:13) prevented the others' following, and the bush then hid the pair from view. 9. Two-thirds was the portion of the firstborn, Deut 21:17; Eliseus wished to inherit, with the office, the miraculous power and the primacy of Elias. 10. Elias doubted whether such extraordinary signs as he had wrought would be repeated in favour of an ungrateful people; cf. 3 Kg 19:14 ff. 11. The vision granted to Eliseus, however, was one withheld from ordinary men; cf. 6:17. Elias ascended in a storm, like that in which Yahweh descended, Ez 1:4; Job 38:1. 12. Elias, 'Israel's chariots and cavalry' (MT), had been worth an army to his people. The event took place prob. in 851, after the death of Ochozias and before the Moabite campaign; cf. 3:11, and 13:14 below.

13-18 The Mantle of Elias—13-15. After repeating h

Elias' miracle, the former servant was acknowledged as master. The text of 14 is disturbed; omit 'and they were not divided' with MT. 16-18. The prophetic college had had only a vague idea of what was to happen to Elias. Apparently Eliseus did not enlighten them.

19-23 Healing of the Waters—19. The water at I

Jericho was brackish and the land caused miscarriages.

20-22. A new vessel was required for a sacred action, cf. 3 Kg 11:30; the salt signified preservation from

23-25 The Bears—23. The hostility at Bethel suggests j that the prophet inveighed against the calf-worship.

'Baldhead' was probably a current sneer against the distinctive tonsure worn by the prophets, and familiar from the college at Bethel. For the Jewish idea of the collective responsibility of parents and children, see § 109m and § 110e. 24. The children were torn to pieces; cf. on 1:11 ff. 25. Eliseus' own house was in Samaria, 5:9; 6:32. But he toured the country

at Carmel, Sunam, Gilgal, Jericho and Dothain.

III 1-3 Joram of Israel, 852-841—1. For the dating, k see on 1:17. 2. Joram started well, impressed by the events of 1:2 ff. But he did not interfere with Jezebel's installations in the capital, and later there was a recrudescence of Baalism throughout the country;

cf. 10:21. Hence Eliseus' sharp reproof, 13, and his support of Jehu, 9:1 ff.

4-8 Campaign against Moab—4. Mesha recorded his I successful revolt on the memorial stone found at Dibon in 1869, now in the Louvre, § 80j; see M.-J. Lagrange,

RB 10 (1901) 522 ff.; A. Vaccari, VD 2 (1922) 274 ff.

The sheep-rearing is referred to on the stone, l. 30.

It also speaks of '40 years' subjection'; see on 3 Kg 16:15-20. 5-8. Mesha had seized the fortresses N. of the Arnon, Medeba, Qiryathayim, Ataroth, Nebo and Yahas. The attack was therefore launched from the SE., after a march round the S. of the Dead Sea and across the plateau of Edom.

9-20 Water in the Desert—9-10. For the vassal-king m of Edom, see on 3 Kg 22:48. On the border of Moab, 21, the army was exposed to attack when weakened by thirst. 11. Eliseus was not well known. This places the campaign c 851. The Orientals did not dip their hands into a basin, when washing before and after meals: a servant poured for them. 13. Joram's plea,

'Say not so!' For it is indeed Yahweh' etc., was a confession of faith. The true God alone could help.

14-15. The ritual music (cf. § 414b) was to aid recollection. 16-17. Rains over the plateau, too far away to be remarked, could fill the wadis lower down. Eliseus' foresight was supernatural. 18-20. The order to devastate Moab was of exceptional severity; cf. Deut

21-27 Invasion of Moab—21-22. The rising sun n reddened the waters. 'Those who have visited the southern banks of the Dead Sea know what strange colours can change the look of things', Lagrange,

RB 10 (1901) 542. Older writers spoke of the red earth; but the text is clear. 23-24. The Moabites could easily suppose that the king of Edom had turned on the others. 25. Only the capital, Qir Hareseth

(DV 'brick walls'; cf. Is 16:7, 11) resisted the invaders.

26. Mesha tried to break through to the Edomites, to make common cause with them. 27. Then he had 273n recourse to human sacrifice, the Crown Prince probably offering himself freely, like Marcus Curtius in the Roman Forum or the Carthaginian general Hamilcar, who made himself a holocaust at Himera in 480 for the success of his army. Thus Mesha thought to avert the wrath of his god Kemosh (cf. Mesha Stone, lines 5, 6) and to render his ramparts inviolable. Then 'there came great indignation (of Yahweh) upon Israel'; cf. Jos 9:20 etc. Some calamity, probably a pestilence, forced the Israelites to retire. According to Stade, Sanda, Kittel, etc., the original narrative said 'the indignation of Kemosh'. But this would be at variance with ancient ways of thought, especially Israel's; the Assyrians attributed a reverse to the anger of Nana, the Babylonians to the anger of Marduk. Mesha rebuilt his towns and remained unsubdued (Mesha Stone, lines 21-33).

274a IV 1-7 Miraculous Multiplication of Oil—This and the next three chapters are chiefly concerned with the miracles by which Eliseus continued the extraordinary mission of Elias. 1-2. Insolvent debtors could be sold as slaves, Lev 25:39; Am 2:6; a father could sell his children, Ex 21:2-7. Loyalty to Yahweh had been costly under Ahab. The widow had therefore special reasons for hope. 3-7. The miracle was less lavish than that of Elias, 3 Kg 17, which was worked to avert the more enduring menace of famine.

b 8-10 Hospitality of the Lady of Shunem—8. For Shunem (Sunam), see on 3 Kg 1:3. 9-10. 'Holy' here is not so much 'good' as 'sacred'; hence Eliseus was lodged apart, in a 'walled chamber on the roof' (MT). Such installations were sometimes only huts of leafy branches, 2 Kg 16:22; Neh 8:16. The furniture was a further mark of respect. Poor people sat and slept on the floor.

c 11-16 Promise of a Child—11-12. The prophet holds himself notably aloof, treating with the lady only through his servant. This may be understood also in 16. 13. His influence at court is understandable after the Moabite campaign. But the lady had clansmen to defend her interests. 16. The promise was: 'In a year's time, at this very hour, you shall embrace a son' (MT).

d 17-37 The Dead Child restored to Life—17-19. The child died of sunstroke; cf. Jdt 8:2 f. The translation misses some of the simple pathos of the original 'My head, my head!' (MT). 20-23. It was evidently the custom to visit the prophet on holy days to seek instruction and counsel. This practice was perhaps the origin of the later Synagogues. The father's question was indifferent. He did not know that the boy was dead, and further discussion was cut off by a curt 'good-bye' (MT). 24-28. As the return journey was made the same day, 32, Eliseus may have been at El Muhraqa (cf. on 3 Kg 18:20), about 15 m. from Shunem. Out of politeness, he sent Giezi to meet the lady. She countered the conventional inquiry with an evasive answer. 29-31. Two explanations of the mission of Giezi are possible. (1) Eliseus mistakenly thought that his staff would work a miracle, like Moses', Num 20:11. But earnest prayer was indispensable; cf. Mk 9:28. (2) It was now evening, and the household at Shunem might have discovered the death. Eliseus therefore wished to take possession of the corpse, to prevent its being buried, or even mourned over, before his arrival next day. Giezi, however, who was crude and officious (cf. 27; 5:20 ff.), presumed that he was to be the agent of a miracle, 31. The former explanation is simpler and perhaps preferable. 32-34. Eliseus had thought to send the lady back with Giezi; that he yielded to her insistence is perhaps a proof that he had not expected his staff to work a miracle. He followed the procedure of Elias, 3 Kg 17:21. 35. The boy sneezed as life returned. 36-37. The mother's gratitude is admirable; she paused before the prophet before turning to her son.

e 38-41 'Death in the Pot'—38. The famine is perhaps that of 8:1 ff. Eliseus did not live in community with the prophetic guild, since he had to make special provision for entertaining them. Köhler suggests Dwarf Mallow for 'wild herbs' ('öröt'). The creeping plant from which the gourds (paqqū'ot) were gathered was probably the colocynth (Vg.). It abounds in the Jordan valley (Hagen, Lexicon Biblicum), which suits the situation of Gilgal. 40. The colocynth is still used in purgatives; it is not poisonous, but it is very bitter. 41. The meal would not make the dish edible without a miracle.

42-44 Multiplication of Bread—42. Baal-shalisha may be Keft Thilth on the coastal plain, Abel II 250 f. A hundred were fed by the miracle, more than 'the great pot' could cater for. The scene is therefore different, in spite of the resemblance of 'the people' in 41 and 42 f. The prophet perhaps took the place of the priests as recipients of the offerings of first-fruits, Lev 2:12 ff.; 23:14-20. 44. The fragments recall Mt 14:20.

V 1-14 Naaman the Leper—1. The king of Syria was probably Benhadad II, whom the Assyrians attacked in vain; cf. on 3 Kg 22:1. Yahweh is represented as universal Lord, even of the Syrians, as in 3 Kg 19:15-17. Naaman's disease was not real leprosy, for he remained at court, 18, whereas it was understood that lepers were segregated, 7:3. 2. Syria, though at peace with Israel, 5-7, could not control all its restless frontier tribes. 4. As a high official Naaman needed leave of absence. 5-6. The courteous opening and ending of the letter have been omitted. The request was not so peremptory as it now reads. Naaman's gifts were princely, as befitted his state; contrast 3 Kg 14:3. It was universally recognized that one should not approach a 'man of God' with empty hands; cf. 1 Kg 9:7. But the bulk of the presents was probably for the king, who was supposed to have the prophet at his beck and call like a court magician. 7. The king was probably Joram, who had already received the rebuff from Eliseus—'Go to the prophets of thy father and thy mother', 3:13. He had therefore no illusions as to his standing with Eliseus. But his demonstration of alarm was meant to reach the prophet's ears. 8-10. Eliseus did not abate his customary reserve (cf. 4:12) even for the great lord. 11. Naaman however expected personal attention from the prophet, and some familiar ceremony, such as 'to wave his hand'. Against LXX and St Jerome, some modern commentators translate further, 'towards the (Holy) Place'. But the hands were raised or outstretched in prayer, not waved; cf. Ps 27:2. The adverbial phrase is perhaps to be omitted with LXX (Hexaplar). 12. The Jordan is narrow and turbulent; the great rivers of Syria, the present Nahr Barada and Nahr el-A'waj, are broad and clear. 13-14. Naaman was loved and respected by his servants; cf. 3. Like the favour bestowed on the Phoenician, 3 Kg 17:9 ff., the miracle was to have great significance in religious history, prefiguring the call of the Gentiles to the Messianic blessings, Lk 4:27.

15-19a Naaman's Faith—15. Naaman recognized in Yahweh the one true God. He begged Eliseus to take a farewell-present. 16. Eliseus refused. The holiness of Yahweh was reflected in his prophet's detachment from earthly things. The prophets took presents from Israelites (cf. on 5-6); but they were better instructed than this neophyte as to the nature of Yahweh. 17. Naaman's desire to have Israelite earth for an altar does not mean that he had returned already to the pagan notion that gods were powerful only on their national territory. He recognized correctly that God is not indifferent to the way in which men worship him. 18. The ancient Semitic storm-god, Hadad, became the 'Lord' (Baal) par excellence. As national god of Syria he was known as Ramman. To refuse to conform, at least externally, to his worship would have been looked on as rebellion. 19a. What Naaman proposed to do was unlawful. But Eliseus did not feel bound to enlighten him as to the full extent of his obligations. 19b-27 Punishment of Giezi—19b. Naaman 'departed from him a certain distance' (MT). 20-21. While Giezi thought with contempt of 'this Syrian', Naaman was so respectful, even towards the servant, that he 274j alighted hastily (wayyippōl; cf. Gen 24:64). 22. To show that the request was not unwelcome, he insisted on giving more than asked. With two talents of silver Omri had bought the site of Samaria, 3 Kg 16:24. 24. 'When he was come to the Hill'. This was apparently a well-known part of Samaria. The term, which the versions confused with a similar word meaning darkness, is used elsewhere only of the SE. spur of the temple hill in Jerusalem; but it is found on the Mesha Stone. 25-27. Greed met with poetic justice; but the story also inculcates reverence for the prophet (cf. 1:2 ff.; 2:23 ff.; 3 Kg 20:36 ff.), whose standing had been endangered by the abuse of his name. The leprosy was like Naaman's. Hence Giezi too could still move about freely, even at court, 8:4.

k VI 1-7 The Floating Axehead—1-2. The group from Jericho, 2:5, or Gilgal, 4:38, is involved in this homely incident, which shows the kindness and power of the prophet and the affectionate regard in which he was held. The richly-wooded banks of the Jordan supplied tamarisk, wild olive, poplar, etc., Abel I 213. 3-7. What part the piece of wood played in the miracle is not clear; perhaps it plunged into the axehead and floated it ashore.

l 8-23 'There are more with us than with them'—8-10. This incident was perhaps part of the campaigns which led to the re-capture of Ramoth-Gilead, 9:1, some time before 841. The Syrians were harrying Israel by a series of raids, 23, possibly in the hope of seizing the king; cf. 3 Kg 22:31. 12-14. They knew of Eliseus since Naaman's cure; if the incident is connected with 24-7:20, which was probably much later, he had also figured in the anointing of Hazael, ch 8. 18. Dothan (Gen 37:17 Dothain) was c 12 m. N. of Samaria. 14. It was illogical to hope to surprise the far-sighted prophet; they did what they could. 15-17. The fiery escort (cf. 2:11) did not intervene directly; the vision was only for the believers. 18-20. The Syrians did not lose their sight, but 'their eyes were held'; cf. Lk 24:16. 21-23. Eliseus saved their lives, on the ground that they were not the king's prisoners. The custom of killing prisoners at will apparently extended to Israel. To avoid this implication, MT reads: 'Do you kill those whom you have captured?'. Vg gives the original; cf. LXX (Lucian). The ending of the raids was not a mark of gratitude towards Eliseus, but a recognition of his powers.

m 24-33 Siege and Starvation—24. The weakness of Israel, 7:13 (cf. 13:7) points to a date much later than 841; cf. on 8-10. After that date, Hazael reigned in Syria till c 800. The Benhadad is therefore the third of the name. The king of Israel was Joachaz, 814-798, rather than Joas, 798-783, who loved and respected Eliseus, 13:24; contrast 31 ff. 25. The coarsest food reached fantastic prices. 'A pint of earth-nuts cost five silver shekels'. MT's ḥārē yōnīm 'pigeons' dung', seems to be a scribal error for ḥaršōnīm, the edible tubers of the Star of Bethlehem, ornithogalum umbellatum; so *I. Löw, Die Flora der Juden I 601, cf. Vaccari, Bi 19 (1938) 198 f. Among other conjectures are ḥarūbīm 'carob-pods' (cf. Lk 15:16) and ḥaršannīm 'unripe grapes'. 26-29. Cannibalism was not unheard-of; see Deut 28:53-57, Lam 2:20, Ez 5:10; it is recorded of Ashurbanipal's siege of Babylon (Schrader KIB II, 190) and of Titus' siege of Jerusalem (Jos BJ, 6, 3, 4). 30-31. Eliseus was held responsible. He must have encouraged resistance, when it was possible to come to terms, by holding out hopes of divine aid (cf. 33); the king's penitential garb suggests the influence of the prophet. 32-33. The role of the messenger is not clear. The attempt on the life of Eliseus may be re-constructed as follows: the king first sent an executioner, then came himself when the officer returned to say that he could not enter. By this time the king's anger had died down and he (not the messenger; cf. 7:2) made what was really a last plea for aid, though he professed to despair.

275a VII 1-20 Unexpected Deliverance—1. Sufficient though not superabundant relief was promised; the prices are still high, at least according to later reckoning (Mishnah, 'Erubin 8, 2). But a whole city had to be fed. 2. The adjutant granted that Yahweh could send rain but doubted the food. In other words, Yahweh directed the ordinary course of nature, but could not or would not intervene miraculously. 3-4. The lepers were allowed to live in the no-man's-land between the city and the besiegers. 5-7. Hittite states, now mostly Aramaean in population, survived in N. Syria (Luckenbill I 595-611); they included Patin, Samal, Gurgum and Carchemish. Samal was allied later with Tiglath-pileser against Damascus, Bonkamp, 401 f. North of these states lay Musri, which figured at Qarqar (Luckenbill I no. 611) and this may be intended here by 'Egypt' (Misraim). Since it is a question of panic, there is no point in asking how these invaders could have traversed Syria, or how Egypt, if that be the original reading, could have put an army in the field, in view of her weakness at this period. The historical situation remains sufficiently thinkable. 7. The horses left behind were re-mounts; the asses were pack-animals. 8-12. The king was not over-cautious; Ai had been captured by the stratagem which he feared, Jos 8:2-21. 13. 'Five horses' seems to be vague, like our 'half a dozen'; cf. 1 Kg 5:3, Is 30:17. 14. If 'five' is to be taken strictly, there was an out-rider with the two chariots. 15. It was about 30 m. to the Jordan near Bethshan, from which a highway ran E. of Lake Galilee to Damascus, Abel II 219. 16-17. It is hardly likely that an officer was stationed at the gate merely to keep order while the people rushed out. Nor have the fixed prices much sense in a general pillage. Probably the king impounded the provisions while the people seized the rest of the booty. Then he set up a market in the usual place, the gate. The adjutant was knocked down accidentally; he was weak from hunger. 19-20. The moral of the story is again reverence for the prophet; see on 5:25-27.

VIII 1-6 Power of the Prophet's Patronage—1. The famine was due to a series of poor harvests; the land still produced something; cf. 6. 2. The plain round Gaza was fruitful in corn. 3. Some 14 years had passed since the miracle of 4:8-39. The lady had probably migrated under Joram, and returned under Jehu; the tenant thought to profit by the revolution. Her family was no longer influential; contrast 4:13. Her aged husband, 4:14, was dead. 4-6. But Giezi had apparently prospered on Naaman's money and had a place at court, which his type of leprosy did not forbid him; see on 5:1, 25 ff. It is hardly likely that the healing of Naaman had not yet taken place. Jehu's contemporary in Syria was Hazael, and their relations with Eliseus would have been different from those described in ch 5; see the following. The lady had asked only for her property and rent; she was granted her revenues in addition.

7-15 Eliseus in Damascus—7. Elias had left to Eliseus the task of anointing Hazael, 3 Kg 19:15. Perhaps it was the report of Benhadad's illness that showed Eliseus that the time was come. His fame is easily explained if the healing of Naaman had already taken place. 8-10. Wishing to spare a doomed man Eliseus told Hazael to soothe the king with a conventional re-assurance. A Lapidé and others explain that as Eliseus had been asked only about Benhadad's illness, he answered that it was not mortal in the ordinary course of events. The ketib is: 'Say: thou shalt not recover'. This is to avoid the semblance of a lie in the prophet's mouth; but then the Hebrew negative would not be in its normal place (P. Joüon, Grammaire de l'hébreu biblique, p 352) and one would expect 'for' to introduce the next sentence. It is best to keep the more difficult reading, with the qere, 18 Heb. MSS, and the Versions. 11. Then Eliseus 'look on a fixed look and was deeply moved', as the prophetic vision rose up before him. 12. Horrified, but not reproachful, war being what it was, Am 1:13, Ps 136:9 etc., he proclaimed Hazael as the scourge of God; cf. Is 10:5; 45:1-7. 'Thy servant a dog' is conventional humility,

- 275d 2 Kg 9:8, Lachish Letters RB 48 (1939) 250 ff. Some hold that the king died unexpectedly under a cold compress intended to ease the fever. But it was not the business of a great official like Hazael to nurse the king. Rather, the words of Eliseus worked on Hazael 'like the witches' prophecy in Macbeth' (Skinner). Shalmaneser, his contemporary, calls him 'the son of a nobody' (a usurper), Luckenbill I no. 681.
- e 16-24 Joram of Judah, 849-842.—16-17. The meaningless 'and of Josaphat' etc., is a scribal error. 18-19. It is generally assumed that his wife Athalia, 26, was the daughter of Jezebel. Under her influence Joram allowed a temple of Baal to be erected in Jerusalem, 11:18. There was a reaction which he suppressed bloodily, 2 Par 21:4, 13. 20. See on 3 Kg 22:48. The success of Moab, ch 3, encouraged Edom; cf. 2 Par 20:1-10. 21-22a. The text may be in disorder. The 'people' (army) which fled home must be the Judeans. Apparently Joram was surrounded in Sa'ir, 5 m. NE. of Hebron, but cut his way out. 22b. Libnah (Tell es-Safi), a Canaanite town not far from Geth, probably allied itself with the Philistines, who, with Arabians, Moabites and Edomites, formed a hostile block in the South, 2 Par 21:16. 23-24. His defeats were attributed to his impiety, and he was denied burial in the royal tombs, 2 Par 21:20; see on 3 Kg 2:10. The second 'with his fathers' (MT) is to be taken vaguely or omitted.
- f 25-29 Ochozias of Judah, 841-25-27. His reign actually lasted only 2 or 3 months. The youngest and only surviving son of Joram, 2 Par 21:17, he was dominated by his mother, the grand-daughter of Omri, 2 Par 22:3. The Baal-cult was maintained in Jerusalem, 11:18, and his political advisers were northerners, 2 Par 22:4. 28. Ramoth-Gilead had been returned to Israel some time after 853 (cf. 3 Kg 23), probably as payment for help against Assyria. Hazael had been beaten off, but the army remained in the field to forestall any surprise attack. 29. Joram's wound was slight (cf. 9:21); the kings had left the field because victory seemed secure. Relations between the two courts had perhaps never been closer; cf. 10:13. The destinies of the kings were linked together.
- g IX 1-14 Anointing of Jehu—1-2. The work of Elias and Eliseus was about to bear fruit. The strict worshippers of Yahweh now formed a strong party (cf. 3 Kg 19:18), which was doubtless also opposed to the costly anti-Assyrian policy of the house of Omri; see on 3 Kg 20:34-43. One of Jehu's first moves was to send tribute to Shalmaneser III, Luckenbill I no. 590. 3-10. As in the case of Hazael, 8:13, it was through Eliseus that Elias executed his mandate of anointing Jehu, 3 Kg 19:16. The secrecy left Jehu with the choice of the moment to strike. 11. 'Madman' (m'sugga') was popularly applied to prophets, Os 9:7, Jer 29:26, with reference to their ecstasies; cf. 1 Kg 1:10 etc. Jehu was evasive—'It's all foolishness'—till he sensed that his fellow-generals had guessed the truth and were with him. 13. With the laying of garments under his feet, on the [very = bare] steps, cf. Mt 21:8. It was in recognition of his kingship. The army was won over at once.
- h 15-26 Death of Joram—15-19. Suspecting bad news from the front, Joram sent horsemen, who could arrive with tidings faster than the chariots. 20. Jehu must have been known as a dashing leader of a division of chariots. 21. The field of Naboth was not the vineyard, which was beside the palace, 3 Kg 21:1, but some land E. of Jezreel. The kings hurried out to hold a council of war at once if necessary. 22. Jehu proclaimed himself as the champion of the religion of Yahweh. The fornications and sorceries of Jezebel were the idolatrous practices which she promoted. They were in fact often licentious. 23. Joram himself was driving; in his haste he had not taken a charioteer nor put on armour. 24-26. Jehu, as adjutant of Achab along with Bidkar, had been present at the meeting with Elias, 3 Kg 21:19-20. He made himself responsible for the fulfilment of the prophecy, which he knew had been transferred to Joram, 3 Kg 21:29; cf. 10:10. 275h
- Two striking details are added to the oracle as given in 3 Kg 21:19. (1) 'Yesterday': Achab had gone to claim the vineyard the very next day; (2) the death of Naboth's sons. The oracle was felt to justify Jehu's action and confirm his claims to the throne.
- 27-29 Murder of Ochozias—27. 'The garden house' should be read as a proper name, Beth haggan, the En gannim of Jos 19:21 (modern Jenin). Ochozias had made about 7 m. when his pursuers came within bow-shot, at the rise of Gûr, near the modern Belameh; the Bileam of 2 Par 22:9 is another form of Yibleam. They gave up the pursuit after wounding him; they had already driven over 50 m. since leaving Ramoth. He was followed later and killed, according to 2 Par 22:9, where 'Samaria' may be understood as 'the land of Samaria'. Jehu's attack on Ochozias is explained by the closeness of his relations with Joram; see on 8:25-29. In the event of a war with Judah, the adherents of the house of Omri would have declared against Jehu. But after Ochozias' death, at the age of 22, there was no heir to the throne who could threaten Jehu.
- 30-37 Death of Jezebel—30. Jezebel did not lack courage, and made no attempt to placate, still less to charm Jehu. She was over sixty; cf. on 3 Kg 16:27 ff. Her attitude was: 'Show me, my women, like a queen; go fetch my best attires' (Antony and Cleopatra, V, 2). Stibic stone (pûk 'antimony') was a cosmetic which made the eyes appear larger and more lustrous; cf. Jer 4:30. 31. Her sarcastic 'Hail, Zambri, murderer of his master' branded Jehu as a treacherous upstart destined to perish quickly, 3 Kg 16:8-16. 32. Jehu answered the taunt with contempt (Vg, LXX); according to MT, he cried out, 'Who is with me—who?' The chamberlains declared for him at once. 33. Jezebel's gruesome end was characteristic of Jehu's cruelty. 34. He did not wish, however, to give extreme offence to her royal kinsmen of Tyre. 35-37. But the scavengers of eastern cities had been at work (cf. Ps 58:7, 15) and the once feared and famous lady had been utterly disgraced.
- X 1-10 Slaughter of the Israelite Princes—1. 'Sons' stands here for all the male descendants of Achab; cf. 'daughter' 8:26. Not all were minors. 2. The challenge was addressed to the civil and military governors, the elders (cf. 3 Kg 21:8) and the guardians of the young princes. They controlled the chariots and garrisons of the capital and other fortress-towns. 3. But there was probably no competent leader in the royal family, and Jehu's combination of aggressiveness and sarcasm completely intimidated Samaria. 6. The command was ambiguous. It might mean: 'Bring me the chief men among the king's sons'. 7-8. The heads arrived in the dark, and were piled in a pyramid, Assyrian fashion. 9. Jehu disowned the deed. He evidently could not claim that his call to the throne justified him. 10. But he asserted that in overstepping his mandate, the responsible agents were Yahweh's instruments; cf. 3 Kg 21:29. The people dared not disagree, and Jehu, under the cloak of zeal, could go on to further enormities.
- 11 Massacre at Jezreel—The scene was the home-town of the Omri family; see on 3 Kg 16:15. The object was to eliminate all possible avengers; see on 3 Kg 16:11. Read therefore 'his kinsmen' (gô'âlau) for 'his chief men' (g'dôlâu) with LXX (Lucian) and Old Latin (Leg).
- 12-14 Murder of the Judean Princes—12. Beth Eged of the Shepherds is generally identified with Beit Qad, 4 m. E. of Jenin. But it did not lie on Jehu's route. Keft Qud W. of Jenin is more suitable. 13. The brethren of Ochozias were distant relatives; see on 8:25; 2 Par 21:4. The sons of the queen are distinguished from the sons of the other ladies in the royal harem. It is surprising to find the princes N. of Samaria four or five days after the revolution. Possibly they had gone on to Megiddo and attended the dying Ochozias; cf. 9:27. On their way back they gave the d 15-17 Jonadab: Further Massacres in Samaria—15. The Rechabite clan, whose austere nomadic way of life is described in Jer 35, looked on Jonadab as their second founder. At a time when Baalism threatened the South as well as the North, he made the separatism of his clan the defence of monotheism. Jehu feared that he would see through his façade of zeal. Hence his distrustful question. But Jonadab pinned his faith in him, as Eliseus had done. The history of the North shows prophet after prophet entrusting the work of God to candidates who deceived them once they were helped to power. 16. Jehu's language reminds us of what the historian von Pastor called 'Cromwell's revolting Puritan jargon'.

18-28 Elimination of the Cult of Baal—18-19. It seems that Jehu first gathered the official ministers who were in Samaria. They had to prepare the feast. 20-21. Then he gathered the ministers from the country shrines. They feared the worst, but dared not refuse the invitation. The worshippers of Baal in general were too numerous to be summoned, unless perhaps there was question only of those who worshipped Baal exclusively. It is hardly possible to restrict the number to those whom fanaticism blinded to their danger (Médebielle). 22. Special dress was often prescribed for religious ceremonies; see Ex 19:10, Gen 35:2; M.-J. Lagrange, ERS 149. 23. The main gathering was in the court of the temple. 24-25a. Soldiers guarded the exits while Jehu and a bodyguard entered the temple proper. Jehu himself offered sacrifice (MT), then sent his guards back into the court. 25b-27. The text has suffered. For maššēbōt (DV 'statue', 26), ʾāšērāh may be read; cf. 3 Kg 16:33. The wooden upright could be burnt, but not a stone pillar. The destruction of the latter is mentioned in 27: 'And they smashed the maššēbāh of Baal' (MT). 'Unto this day' shows that the original account was written when the locality was still well known. 28. It was the end of Baalism as an official cult, but remnants of it survived; cf. 3 Kg 19:17.

f 29-36 Reign of Jehu—29-31. Jehu was praised for destroying the house of Achab, but the divine approval of his conduct ends there. Hence his dynasty was promised only a limited duration. Contrast the conditional promise of perpetuity made to Jeroboam, 3 Kg 11:38. His mass murders were not condoned. He himself recognized that he was going too far, 10:9; and a hundred years later, the memory of his crimes was still appalling: 'Thus saith the Lord: a little while yet, and I will visit the blood of Jezreel upon the house of Jehu, and I will make an end of the house of Israel', Os 1:4. 32. Meanwhile Israel was punished for its long apostasy; cf. 3 Kg 19:17. Read perhaps: 'Yahweh began to cut away parts of Israel' (MT). Jehu had estranged Judah and Tyre, and the Assyrians, in spite of his tribute, gave him no help. After attacking Damascus in 841 (Luckenbill I no. 672), they appeared in the west only once, in 838, in the next forty years. 33. Eastern territory lost to Hazael included the northern part of Moab. Jehu had evidently driven the Moabites back S. of the Arnon once more. In 33b Galaad is taken in its strict sense, of the territory S. of the Yarmuk. 34-36. Jehu died in 814.

g XI 1-3 Usurpation of Athalia—1. Joram, Athalia's late husband, had killed all his brothers, 2 Par 21:4. Ochozias was the only one of his sons to survive the Arab invasion, 2 Par 21:17, and he, with the forty-two princes, had been killed by Jehu, 9:27; 10:14. There was no one to oppose Athalia. What her intentions were with regard to the succession it is hard to say. Possibly, as grand-daughter of Ethbaal (cf. 3 Kg 16:31), she meant to hand over the kingdom of David to her kinsman Mettenos of Tyre. 2. Josaba hid Joas in the bedchamber, probably that of the high-priest (her husband, 2 Par 22:11). 3 suggests that the high-priest had a house attached to the temple; cf. 1 Kg 3:3 ff.

Priests had quarters E. of the Great Court of the temple 276g at a later date, Neh 3:28.

4-12 Coronation of Joas—4. Joiada relied on 'the officers of the Carians and of the Guards'. 'Carians' (cf. 19) may be a scribal error for 'Cerethi', 2 Kg 7:18 etc. The loyalty of these foreign mercenaries was traditional, 2 Kg 15:18 ff.; 3 Kg 1:38. 5-6a. The execution of the plot was planned for a Sabbath, when the changing of the guard took place. 6b seems out of place, and is obscure; perhaps it is a gloss, giving the ordinary stations of the temple guard. The gate of Sur was possibly the eastern or main entrance. The gate of the Guards (cf. 19) was on the south, since it led to the palace. The house of Massah is unknown. 7. The finite verbs should be participles (MT); so too 6a. The soldiers first receive their orders in 8. The guards were in three battalions, two in the palace during the week and one in the temple. On the Sabbath it was the other way about. This particular Sabbath, the temple battalion was to stand firm, instead of retiring to the palace, when the other two marched in to relieve it. Thus the palace would be stripped of soldiers. 9-11. The soldiers were already armed; the officers, 2 Par 23:9, were given the venerable trophies of David, in honour of the occasion. 12. The ceremony included a renewal of the covenant, which was both religious and political, 17; hence the imposition of the 'testimony' (ʾēdūt), the Book of the Law; cf. Deut 17:18 f. A common but unnecessary emendation for ʾēdūt is ʾādōt 'bracelets'; cf. 2 Kg 1:10.

13-21 Death of Athalia—14. There was a special place for the king (cf. 23:3), by the pillar, Jachin or Boaz; cf. 3 Kg 7:21. His most enthusiastic supporters were 'the people of the land', the common people or the country-folk (cf. 18, 19, 20); they played an important part in a similar situation, 21:24. 16. Athalia was brought back to the palace by an entrance on the East, corresponding to the Gate of the Horses; cf. Jer 31:40. 18. She and her Tyrian cult must have had followers among the city-folk. Hence the temple was guarded. 20. If 'the people of the land' means the country-folk, there is special point in the remark that the city was quiet; it submitted. 21. Joiada became regent, 12:3. XII 1-5 Joas of Judah, 836-797—1-3. By the time the king was about 25 years of age (cf. 6), the temple had been built for nearly 150 years and was in need of repairs. 4. Read ʾereḱ 'assessment' for ʾōbēr 'those that pass by'; omit 'which is offered for the price of a soul' as a gloss (cf. LXX B, Lucian; Syr.), and translate: 'all the money brought to the temple as sacred gifts: the money prescribed for each man, and all money which of their own accord' etc. Moneys prescribed were, e.g. the 5 shekels paid for each first-born male, Num 18:16; payments on the occasion of certain vows, Lev 27:2-9; the poll-tax, Ex 30:13. 5. Each priest was to take the money 'from his acquaintance' (makkār); possibly each dealt with his clansmen, and the 'acquaintance' would be his 'parishioner'.

6-16 Restoration of the Temple—6-8. The priests were not conscientious; perhaps they resented the king's interference. 9. Their role was then confined to seeing that each man paid his due. 10. The administration of the money was supervised by a high court official; cf. 18:18; 3 Kg 4:3. 11-13. Each contractor received a lump sum, and worked on an estimate, not on what we call a 'time and material' basis. 13. New utensils came later, 2 Par 24:14. 14-15. The contractors gave satisfaction, and had not to give an account of their expenses and profits. 16. Money accompanied or perhaps replaced certain sacrifices; two are mentioned: 'trespass' (ʾāšām), offered on the occasion of restitution for damage, Lev 5:14-16; 6:1-7; 'sin' (ḥaṭṭāʾ), offered in reparation, Lev ch 4.

17-21 Troubles and Death of Joas—17. Joas may have sent help to the Philistines, who interfered with the Egyptian trade of Damascus. 18. The two preceding 276 l kings had enriched the temple, in spite of their support of Baalism. 19-21. According to 2 Par 24:17-25, there was a reaction against the priestly party after the death of Joiada; cf. 2. Foreign cults were brought back, and Joiada's son was stoned. The king paid for it by defeat, illness and a violent death.

m XIII 1-9 Joachaz of Israel, 814-798—1. It was the 22nd year of Joas; cf. 10:36; 12:1. 2-4. Syria had a free hand against Israel (see on 10:32) till Adad-nirari of Assyria attacked Damascus c 800. 5. He may be 'the saviour'; some think of Jeroboam II, 14:25 ff. 6. The ungrateful people re-introduced even an ashera; see on 10:26. 7. Achab had had 2,000 chariots at Qarqar; Israel was brought very low.

n 10-19 Joas of Israel, 798-783; Last Prophecies of Eliseus—14. Eliseus was now nearly 90; see on 3 Kg 17:1. The king mourned the loss of the champion who was worth an army; see on 2:12 and 6:8-7:20. 15-16. With the laying on of hands, to signify the passing of supernatural power from one to the other, cf. 4:34 f. Apheq was the scene of a former victory, 3 Kg 20:26-30. 18-19. Eliseus' anger shows that the king was at fault; he would be too negligent to press home his victories.

o 20-21 Death of Eliseus—20. He was buried with his fathers at Abel-Mehola in the Jordan valley; cf. 3 Kg 19:19. With Israel so weak, the border foray is understandable. 21. Cf. Eccles 48:14 f. From Eliseus, the chain of prophets went back through Elias, Jehu and his father Hanani, 3 Kg 16:1, 2 Par 16:7, Ahias, 3 Kg 11:29, and Nathan to Samuel. Within 30 years, Osee was at work. The prophetic tradition was therefore unbroken in Israel till the Exile.

p 22-25 The Promised Victories—22. If this statement is pressed, Hazael survived Joachaz; but 25 suggests that Benhadad III had succeeded him before the death of Joachaz; see on 6:24. It is hardly possible to refer 'which he took' to Hazael. 24. Adad-nirari's inscriptions (Bonkamp 380 f.) call the king of Damascus in 802 'Mari'. This is a title ('my lord'), not a proper name, R. de Vaux RB 43 (1934) 514-8; probably Benhadad is meant. 25. The cities must have been W. of the Sea of Galilee, as the land E. of Jordan had been lost under Jehu, 10:33.

277a XIV 1-6 Amasias of Judah, 797-769—1-4. The verdict on Amasias is interrupted by an unusual restriction in 3b ('but yet' etc.), which reads like a gloss based on 2 Par 24:15 (his idolatry). 5-6. He could not condone the action which had given him the throne; cf. 2 Kg 11:1-16; 4:1-12. The principle enunciated in Deut 24:16 was not always put into practice; cf. 9:26, Ez 18:20.

b 7 War with Edom—The trade route to the Red Sea, closed since the revolt of Edom over 50 years before, 8:22, was at stake; cf. 22. The Valley of Salt, E. of Beersheba, 2 Kg 8:13, may be the present Wady el Milh. 'He took Petra by storm'. This natural fortress, c 40 m. S. of the Dead Sea, became famous as the capital of the Nabataean kingdom, 100 B.C.-A.D. 100. Amasias made it a military outpost; the new name, Yoqt^eel 'Yahweh destroys', refers to the slaughter of Edomites, 2 Par 25:12.

c 8-16 War with Israel—8. Joas probably demanded the return of territory annexed by Judah during Israel's decline. 7-10. The fable pointed out the folly of Amasias' offer to fight it out. There does not seem to have been any request for the hand of an Israelite princess; that could not have been treated as presumptuous. 11-12. Bethshemesh, now 'Ain Shems, was c 25 m. W. of Jerusalem; Joas took the initiative; cf. on 8. 13. According to Josephus, Ant. 9, 9, 3, the breach was made for the entry of the victors. It was in the northern wall, starting from the western corner, at the present Jaffa Gate.

d 17-22 End of Amasias—17-19. His apostasy was the cause of the revolt, 2 Par 25:14-27. The stronghold of Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir) was c 36 m. SW. of Jerusalem. 21. Azarias was also known as Uzzias, the only name used of him in Par, Os, Am, Zach, Is. According to Sanda, Azarias was used in the Annals of the kings of Judah, Uzzias was the popular name. 22. He followed up Amasias' victory over Edom by fortifying the terminus of the trade-route, at the head of the Gulf of Aqabah.

23-29 Jeroboam II of Israel, 783-743—23. During the long and prosperous reign of Jeroboam, Damascus, defeated by Zakir of Hamath c 785 and invaded by Shalmaneser IV in 772, was no longer a menace. 24. The prophets Amos and Osee attest the decline of religion. 25. For the 'Entrance of Hamath', see on 3 Kg 8:65; the Sea of the Wilderness was the Dead Sea. Jeroboam attacked the Ammonites, Am 1:13, and as Azarias shared the spoils, 2 Par 26:8-10, it seems that Israel and Judah were allies again. The prophet who foretold Jeroboam's conquests has only the name in common with the author of the prophetic book; the latter lived probably in the 7th cent., when Nineveh was capital of Assyria. Gath ha-Hepher, Jos 19:13 (now El-Meshed or Khirbet ez-Zurra) was a few miles N. of Nazareth. 26-28a. For the last time, Israel was experiencing the divine favour, under perhaps the greatest of her kings. 28b. Read possibly 'how he warred against Damascus and turned away the wrath of Yahweh'; MT is unintelligible.

XV 1-7 Azarias of Judah, 769-756—1. Read 'the 15th year of Jeroboam'; cf. 14:2, 23. The chronology in chh 15 and 16 has been systematically glossed. Corrections are indicated in the commentary; for their basis, see § 266d-j. 2. He must have been about 30 years of age; his reign lasted 14 years. 5. Read 'he dwelt in his house free from duties' (MT). The regency did not last long, as Joatham was only 25 when Azarias died; cf. 7, 33. 6. His reign was prosperous, Is 2:7-16. 2 Par 26 recounts his organization of army, armaments and fortifications, his successful maintenance of the trade route to the Red Sea against Philistines and Arabs, his promotion of agriculture and sheep-rearing. 8-13 Zacharias of Israel, 743—8. Read 'the 14th year of Joatham'. 10. Jabesh suggests Gilead, 1 Kg 11, where Syria must have gained partisans during her long occupation of the land. The dynasty of Jehu had probably remained pro-Assyrian; see on 9:1 f. The revolt may have been a move in international politics; but the social injustice described by Amos and Osee must have counted. Read 'in Yibleam' (LXX, Lucian; cf. 9:27) for 'publicly' (qobol'-ām). 12. The house of Jehu was being punished for the 'blood of Jezreel', Os 1:4.

13-16 Shallum of Israel, 742—13. It was the 15th of Joatham. Gilead belonged to transjordanian Manasses, Yibleam to cisjordanian, Jg 1:27. 14. Possibly Menahem led an Ephraimite party; he was pro-Assyrian; cf. 19. Is 9:20 speaks of strife between Ephraim and Manasses. Menahem's base, Thersa, was in Ephraim; see on 3 Kg 15:21. 16. Tappuah (LXX, Lucian) was a few miles to the east.

17-22 Menahem of Israel, 742-737—17. It was Joatham's 16th year. As the avenger of the dynasty of Jehu and upholder of its foreign policy, Menahem had a solid backing. Read '6 years'. 19. Tiglath-pileser III (cf. 29) bore the name Pul in his quality of king of Babylon. In 738 he marched against a league headed by Azriyau, king of Yaudi in Syria, and pressed on S. to Raspuna, probably the Hellenistic Apollonia, now Arsuf, c 12 m. N. of Joppa. Among the kings who paid him tribute were Rasin of Damascus (cf. 37) and Menahem, Luckenbill I no. 772. 20. If the talent was 3,000 shekels, 60,000 rich men paid about 80 dollars each.

23-26 Pekahiah of Israel, 737-736—23. Read 'the 5th year of Achaz'. The new year occurred once in the reign. 25. The dynasty supported by Assyria did not last long. The party which Shallum had represented was at work again, for Pekah had with him a picked force of 50 Gileadites; hence the alliance with Syria, 37. Read 'with Argob and Arie'; these were perhaps faithful officers of Pekahiah. The treason and turbuk 27-31 Pekah of Israel, 736-732—27. Read 'the 6th year of Achaz' and '5 years'. 29. By 734 the king of Damascus, looking like Israel (cf. Os 7:11) to Egypt, organized an anti-Assyrian league which included the Arabs and all the southern states of Palestine except Judah; cf. 37. Tiglath-pileser's records of the ensuing war state that he annexed 'the city of Gal'aza, the city of Abillakka on the border of Bit-Humria [Israel = the land of Omri], the broad land of Naptali', Bonkamp, 391. Gal'aza is Gilead (z for d as in the inscription of Zakir of Hamath, Bonkamp 395n); Abillakka is Abel Beth Maacha (cf. 3 Kg 15:20); Janoah was E. of Tyre; Qadesh, N. of Lake Huleh; for Hasor, see on 3 Kg 9:15. Israel thus lost all her western territory N. of Mt Tabor, and the whole of her transjordanian land. Of the deportations Tiglath-pileser writes: 'I carried away to Assur the people of Bit-Humria, all its inhabitants'. Deportation was standard Assyrian policy: 'Tiglath-pileser transported the peoples from the east to the west and from the west to the east' (Inscription of Bar-Rekub, G. A. Cooke, no. 63).

l no. 63). 30. In 733 Tiglath-pileser attacked Damascus, and some time later a revolt in Samaria spared him another siege. 'They overthrew their king Paqaha; I established Ausi [Osee] as king over them'. This inscription (Bonkamp, 392) connects the change of rulers with the fall of Damascus in 732. Another inscription (Bonkamp, 397) speaks of a further invasion of Israel, Is 8:23. Some time therefore elapsed again before Osee was installed (? 731). His official reign was dated from 730; cf. 17:1. It was the 11th or 12th year of Achaz.

m 32-38 Joatham of Judah, 756-741—32. Read 'the 28th year of Jeroboam'. They were contemporaries, 1 Par 5:17. 35. Joatham was a great builder, 2 Par 27:1-9. He added a third entrance, from the north, Ez 9:2, to the inner court of the temple. There was already one on the east, Ez 11:1, and one on the south, 4 Kg 11:6, 19. 37 must be referred to the time of Achaz, 38. It is clearly out of its proper context. Even if it referred to Joatham's reign, it should be before 36.

278a XVI 1-4 Achaz of Judah, 741-726—1. Read 'the second year of Menahem'. 2. For the decline in religion under Achaz, see Mic 5:9-13; 6:16. 3. Child sacrifice, especially that of the first-born son, was always common among the neighbours of Israel, 3:27; 17:31. It was forbidden to Israel, Lev 18:21, Deut 12:31. 4. See on 3 Kg 14:22 f.

b 5-9 Appeal to Assyria—5. Achaz, having refused to be drawn into the anti-Assyrian league (see on 15:29), was to be deposed, and a nominee of the league put in his place, Is 7:1-9. He was attacked from all sides, 2 Par 28:16 f. 6. Troops from Syria restored Elath ('Aila'; see on 14:22) to Edom. 7-9. In 734 Tiglath-pileser overran Galilee and Gilead, 15:29; then he marched south and plundered Gaza. Ascalon, Ammon, Edom and Moab paid tribute, and with them is named Yauhazi of Yauda, AOT 348. 'Achaz' therefore was a popular form of the theophoric name 'Yahweh possesses'. Damascus was invested in 733 and fell in 732, Bonkamp, 400. The inhabitants were deported to Qir, a region originally Aramaean, Am 1:5; 9:7, probably in S. Mesopotamia, near Elam, Is 22:6. Judah had lost an enemy, but the new friend was to prove a greater menace.

c 10-20 The New Altar—10. It was Tiglath-pileser's boast that 'in every country which I conquered, I set up a temple for the god Assur; and in every country I made an image of my royalty, and set it up as a sign of victory, and of the dominion which I held over the nations, by the command of Assur, my god', Bonkamp, 393 f. The altar which Achaz dutifully admired was therefore in several tiers, the ziggurat-form common in Assyria and Babylonia; see on Ez 43:13-17. 12-13. Inaugural ceremonies included all the types of sacrifice mentioned at Solomon's dedication, 3 Kg 8:64.

14-15. King Achaz ordered the ancient altar to be put aside 'until I can attend to it'. 17-18. It probably shared the fate of the other bronze installations, 3 Kg 7:23-39, and of the Musach ('covered walk'?), and the royal door, which were removed at the same time. Their costly metals went towards paying the tribute to the king of Assyria. He was exigent, 2 Par 28:20. Achaz meant to convey to Tiglath-pileser that he acknowledged the gods of Assyria. But the actual introduction of Assyrian cults (cf. 21:3 ff.; 23:4, 11; Jer 44:17; Ez 8) may also be ascribed to him, as well as the fostering of Baalism, 4. Neither Ezechias nor Josias could undo his work. See § 267d.

XVII 1-4 Osee of Israel, 731-722—1. The 12th year d of Achaz was 730; see on 15:30. 2. The last king was not the worst. There was a strong party of Yahweh-worshippers in Samaria, 2 Par 28:9-15, and Osee favoured them. 3. Shalmaneser V became king in Jan. 726. Menander (cf. Jos., Ant. 9, 14, 2) records a campaign against Phoenicia, which ended in Elulacus of Tyre and his allies paying tribute. War was renewed when they fell away. This fits in with the Bible. 4. Osee paid tribute in 725 (the Assyrian lists state that there was no campaign in 726, Bonkamp 412). He withheld it in 723, having paid it for two years at the most. Sua (MT So'), to be read Sēwe, cf. ketib the Sib'e of Sargon's inscriptions (Bonkamp, 416-9), was commander-in-chief of Musri (Egypt) under its king Pir'u, possibly the Pharaoh Piankhi. As Sib'e had power to make war or peace, his popular designation as king is justified. Some hold that Musri here is an Arab state. But a king in the background with a viceroy in the Delta suits Egyptian conditions; and Egypt was certainly involved, Os 7:11. Shalmaneser held Osee when he came to excuse himself. Josephus however, Ant. 9, 14, 1, says that Osee was taken when the city fell, and the long resistance certainly suggests the presence of the king during the siege. Thus 4b may anticipate events to round off the career of Osee. On the other hand, Sargon nowhere mentions Osee. Ordinarily the Assyrian annals mention the names of kings captured with their cities. It is best therefore to keep to the primary sense of the text and take it that Osee was captured before the siege. This would account for the 9 years' reign (cf. 1)—731-723.

5-6 Siege and Capture of Samaria—5. The only land e left to Israel lay between the northern rim of the plain of Jezreel and the boundary of Judah. The rest had been annexed 734-732. Samaria was well placed for a siege; see on 3 Kg 16:24. The Assyrians could winter in their new province of Damascus. 6. Shalmaneser died at the end of 722, before the end of the siege. His brother Sargon, who succeeded him in January 721, actually took Samaria, as he claims in four of his inscriptions, Bonkamp 414 f. It was in the interval before his official enthronement in Nisan. He states that he deported 27,290 captives, placed a governor over the land, and imposed on the inhabitants the same taxes as they had paid to their former kings. The city became the capital of an Assyrian province. Some of the deportees were settled at Halah, on the western slopes of the Zagros mountains; others in Gozan, by the river Habor (Khabur), which flowed into the Euphrates near Carchemish; others S. of the Caspian Sea.

7-23 Reflections on the Ruin of Israel—7-17. The f political process having been sufficiently explained, the deeper causes are recapitulated. One new grief is adduced, star-worship, 16; see on Amos 5:26. 18. The long preparatory 'because' culminates here in a 'therefore'. 19-20 repeat 18, inserting an anticipatory verdict on Judah, and give perhaps an afterthought. 21-23 retrace cause and effect for the third time. Read: 'For Israel was rent' etc. The exile is the penalty of the calf-worship. The 'sin of Jeroboam' dominated the author's thought throughout his history of Israel. 21-23 contain perhaps the original verdict, of which 7-18 is an elaboration.

24 New Settlers—The usual transfer of rebellious g

278g populations followed. It was not completed all at once. Cutha, the Sumerian Gudua, lay c 20 m. NE. of Babylon. Possibly the Cuthaites and Babylonians migrated freely. Sargon had no reason to deport them. But 'the king of the Assyrians' may be taken as a general term. Sennacherib may have deported Babylonians to Israel after sacking Babylon in 689. They were among the strangers sent by his successors Esarhaddon and Ashurbanipal, Esd 4:2, 9f. The deportations from Syria followed the defeat of Hamath in 720. Avah (MT 'Awwah) is perhaps the Phoenician town called Ammia in the Tell el-Amarna letters; Sepharvaim, the Syrian Shomeriya on Lake Homs (cf. 18:34; 19:13; Sānda II 224f). In 715 Sargon settled Arabs in Israel, AOT 349. But Cuthaites predominated, for later Jews called the Samaritans simply Cuthaites, Jos., Ant. 9, 14, 3 etc.

h 25-28 The Cult of Yahweh—25. From 734 to 721 cultivation had suffered; wild beasts could no longer be kept down. 26. After Assyrian custom, Sargon had carried off the golden effigy from Bethel and abolished the cult; Tiglath-pileser had done the same at Dan. 27-28. Sargon's concession was based on the belief that each country was under the control of a national god, whose goodwill was essential to the country's well-being. The restored cult bound new and old inhabitants together, 32; it was still flourishing in the time of Josias, 23:15.

i 29-41 Samaritan Religion—29. Yahweh was of course not worshipped exclusively. And it must be supposed that most of the Israelites, to whom syncretism was no novelty, joined the new-comers in worshipping their gods. 30. In Sochothbenoth may be recognized the Babylonian Sakkuth and Sarpanit; cf. LXX Banit. Allowance must be made throughout for textual corruption of strange names. Nergal, god of the underworld, had a temple in Cutha. Ashima, probably the goddess-consort of Eshmun, was worshipped in Hamath; cf. M. Lidbarski, Ephemeris 2, 323 f. She occurs perhaps later in Ashim-Bethel; see A. Vincent, La religion des Judéo-Araméens d'Éléphantine, 654-80. 31. The Babylonian Nebo may be seen in Nebahaz; he was worshipped in Syria; cf. Sānda II 230. The Eblazer of LXX however suggests 'Baal the Helper'. Thartac is perhaps the Syrian Artagatis, the Atar (Astarte) of Attis. Adramelech identifies Milk (biblical Molech), the deity of child-sacrifice in Syria etc., with the storm-god Hadad. Anamelech may identify him with Anu, one of the supreme Babylonian triad, Anu, Marduk and Ea. Anu and Adad had a joint temple in Assur at this time, Albright, 163. But Anamelech may represent the goddess Anath, consort of Hadad. 32-41. After this fusion of religions and races, Jerusalem came ultimately to disown the northerners, Esd 4:3. The kingdom of Israel had perished spiritually as well as politically.

279a XVIII 1-2 Ezechias of Judah, 726-697—The third year of Osce agrees with 9, 10 if the reign of Ezechias is 'post-dated'; see § 124i. Then the year during which he came to the throne is not counted (cf. the Assyrian rēš šarrūti) and 3 Osce = 0 Ezechias, 7 Osce = 4 Ezechias etc. The speeches attributed to Ezechias in the beginning of his reign, 2 Par 29-30, suggest that Samaria had already fallen and that his accession be placed in 721 or later. But the references to defeat and exile can be explained by 15:29, 37; 16:5 f.; 17:3. More probably, the speeches represent a comprehensive statement of the motives which sustained the reform throughout the reign.

b 3-12 Reforms—3. The prophets Isaías and Micheas found a strong and zealous champion. The fall of Samaria, recounted 9-12, re-inforced their message, Mic 1:9; 3:12; cf. Jer 26:18 f. 4. Not only the pagan shrines of Achaz, 2 Par 28:25, but shrines of Yahweh outside Jerusalem were abolished. This follows (1), from the absence of the formula, 'but the high places he did not destroy', used even of pious kings; (2) from 22. Even the memorial of the miracle of Num 21:9 was destroyed. 'It was called N^hhūstān'. The name seems to express both the material (n^hhōstē 'bronze') and the object (nāhāf 'serpent'). For the serpent as emblem of vegetation-deities, see J. Coppens, La Connaissance du Bien et du Mal et le Péché du Paradis. It is attested in Palestine, DBV(S) I 952; II 361; on the bronze serpent of Gezer, see L.-H. Vincent, Canaan 174 ff. Since Ezechias was combating fertility-cults, his action against the apparently harmless object is understandable. 7-8. The campaign against the Philistines was probably connected with the revolt against Assyria after the death of Sargon in 705. Ashdod, Ekron, Ascalon and Gaza were then ruled by nominees of Assyria, Bonkamp 433 n. 4.

13-16 Invasion of Sennacherib—13. See § 66b. It was the 36th year of Ezechias. Sargon's son was detained in the East till 701. Then he turned against the West, where Phoenicia, Philistia, Edom, Moab and Judah were allied, with Egypt supporting them. 14-16. The capture of the great fortress of Lachish is depicted on the famous bas-relief of Sennacherib in the British Museum. Ezechias pleaded for peace, and Sennacherib agreed to withdraw at the price of a crushing indemnity. Some of it no doubt was paid at once, but the rest was sent after Sennacherib to Nineveh; see his own account, Luckenbill II no. 240, where the figures tally with the Bible, except that the silver is given as 800 talents. Probably the Hebrew text has suffered; the cuneiform was never copied. Judah was almost beggared. Subsequently, it could pay only 10 silver minas yearly as tribute, while Ammon and Moab paid 2 and 1 gold minas respectively, R. H. Pfeiffer, JBL (1928) 185 f. A humiliated Judah barely escaped the fate of Samaria. Thus 13-16 summarize the campaign. The details of it, and the miracle which forced Sennacherib to be content with less than surrender, are told in 17-37; 19:1-36. The supplementary account is from another source whose style and interests are different; the king's name is written Hizqiyāhū throughout. Contrast Hizqiyāh, 13-16.

17-37 First Summons to Surrender—17. The narrative continues 13; cf. Is 36:1 ff. The besieging army surrounded Jerusalem, as Sennacherib relates, and the commander-in-chief (the Turtan or Tartān), the general (the Rab-šāqē) and the royal chamberlain (the Rab-sāris) came to parley. At the SE. of the city, the aqueduct from the Upper Pool (Gihon), 3 Kg 1:33 = 'Ain Umm ed-Daraj or 'Ain Sitti Miryam debouched into the Lower Pool (Siloah = Birket el-Hamrah). The 'Way of the Fuller's Field' ran along a crest almost as high as Gihon. See Vincent, DBV(S), 942 ff. and Is 7:3; 22:9. 18. For the Jewish delegates, see on Is 22:15-22. 19-20. Ezechias, as a rebel, 20, is given no title. He had not yet humbled himself and paid tribute; cf. 14 f. 21-25. The prospect for Jerusalem was hopeless according to the Assyrians. Egypt was of no avail, 21, nor Yahweh, firstly, because he was angry with Ezechias, 22; then, because he had no natural resources to build on, 23 f.; finally, he was on the side of Sennacherib, 25. This was based on Sennacherib's conquest of the country. 26-28. Aramaic was then becoming the common language of business. The tactics of driving a wedge between king and people had been used successfully by Ashurnasirpal (Schrader, KIB 1, 64) and Tiglath-pileser, 15:30. The crude expression of 27 meant that the people faced starvation. 29-32. The alternative was a truce for refreshment, followed by the gift of goodly lands abroad. The fundamental object of the deportations was not so much to punish the common people, as to mingle the elements of the empire in a harmonious whole. In their own way, the Assyrians anticipated the policy of Alexander. 33-35. The ultimatum culminated in the blasphemous statement that the real reason why Yahweh did not help, 22-24, was that he could not. Arpad, N. of Aleppo, is added to the states of 17:24. 36-37. The actual terms of the military ultimatum are not given. But the fine rhetorical gradation of 19-34 does not alter the negotiations substantially. Assyrian soldiers chanted hymns to Ashur and Ishtar when marching to war; the kings' inscriptions attri-f XIX 1-7 Anguish and Hope—1-2. Isaiah was another Eliseus; cf. 13:14. He had constantly opposed Ezechias' policy. 3. The king, through his own fault, was in a painful and dangerous situation. 4. He based his hopes rather on Sennacherib's excesses than on his own merits. 5-6. It was precisely the blasphemy that was answered. 7. Yahweh was to induce a mood (of anxiety) in Sennacherib. Under its influence, disturbing news from home would decide him to return. The spirit was to be put in him (MT); it is a disposition (cf. Num 5:14, 30, Is 61:3, Os 4:12, Rom 8:15). The message cannot be news of the Egyptians, 9; that rather delayed his return. He did not meet his death till 681. But prophecy gives causal, not chronological connexions.

g 8-19 Second Summons to surrender—8. The siege and the campaign continued. Perhaps the general took back with him an offer of tribute. For Libnah, see on 8:22. 9. Tirhakah (Theraca), son of Piankhi (see on 17:4), last Pharaoh of the 25th (Ethiopian) dynasty, was the great power in the Delta since 715, under the Pharaohs Shabaka and Shabataqa. His title 'king' may refer to this or anticipate his accession, c 690. According to Herodotus, 2:141, Sennacherib advanced to meet him, and Tirhakah did not venture across the border. However, the battle of Eltaqe, where Sennacherib states he routed the kings of Musri, may have taken place at this juncture. 9-11. The new situation explains the second message. 12. The countries, named from E. to W., lay around the Upper Euphrates. On Gozan, see 17:6; on Haran, Gen 11:31; Thelassar may represent Til-baseri in the Aramaean principality of Bit-Adini. 13. See on 18:34. This is the real turning-point of the narrative: Sennacherib himself blasphemed, not merely his delegates. 14-19. But instead of bringing up all his forces for a full-scale assault, he had merely sent a letter. Ezechias took it as the first sign of the promised relief. Hence he addressed Yahweh directly; contrast the penitential approach to Isaiah, 3-5.

h 20-34 Second Prophecy of Deliverance—20. Before the message, 32 ff., is inserted a later poetic elaboration of it. 21-22. The Assyrians are pictured as retreating. 23. Sargon and Sennacherib used similar phrases, Schrader, KIB II, 40, 86. 24. 'I dug, and drank of foreign waters; and dried up . . . all the waters of Egypt'. The Assyrians invaded Egypt for the first time in 673. 25-28. Yahweh had really performed the feats which Sennacherib ascribed to himself. The theme is Isaian; cf. Is 10:6 ff.; 45:1 ff. 29. Ezechias would survive till better days. The promise would appear as a sign, or miracle, in the light of its unexpected fulfilment; cf. Ex 3:12. 30-31. The gaps made by the deportations would be repaired. 32-34. The message makes explicit what was only implicit in 7. Sennacherib claimed that he threw up earthworks against Jerusalem. But apparently he never attacked it personally with his whole army.

i 35-37 Retreat of Sennacherib—35. Some catastrophes struck the invaders. This is known also from Herodotus, whose version (2:141), suggests bubonic plague. The angel of the Lord struck through pestilence, 2 Kg 24:15 ff. 2 Par 32:31 gives no figures; they have suffered from scribal exaggeration here. 36. Sennacherib, already anxious to close the campaign, 7, gave up all idea of conquering Jerusalem and accepted tribute instead, 18:14-16. The miraculous deliverance is celebrated Pss 45-47; Is 31:8. Ezechias could not but send the tribute on to Nineveh. His losses had been severe, and Assyrian governors threatened him in Damascus and Samaria. To explain the payment of tribute and the double summons to surrender, it has often been assumed that we have here a conglomerate account of two or more expeditions of Sennacherib. But the analysis given above shows sufficiently that the account is a self-consistent unity; 19:9-34 is not a mere doublet of 18:17-19:8, but a progressive development of one situation, which fits into the framework of 18:13-16. Nor do the Assyrian annals give any grounds for postulating further invasions. Another explanation of the course of events is that Sennacherib first accepted tribute, 18:13-16, and then demanded unconditional surrender. Treachery however was not an Assyrian trait. They made harsh demands but contented themselves with their fulfilment. Besides, this explanation does not take into account the difference of sources in 18:13-16, and 18:17-19:37, nor the statement of Sennacherib that the tribute was sent after him to Nineveh. See further Sanda II 242-96; Bonkamp 428-54. 37. Nesroch is inexplicable, unless it is a corruption of (mât) an-Assur-ki, (the land) of the god Assur; the consonants correspond, Bonkamp 457. Read probably 'Adramelech his son and Nabosarusur'; the latter was an officer of Sennacherib. The Assyrian and Babylonian accounts, AOT 359 f., then tally with the Bible.

XX 1-11 Illness and Miraculous Healing of Ezechias k
—1. It was 15 years before his death, 6, therefore 712. The prophecy was comminatory, not irrevocable; cf. 3 Kg 21:19 ff. 6. About this time, Ezechias was threatened by Sargon, AOT, 351. 7a. For the plaster, see Pliny, Hist. Nat. 23, 7; Jerome, PL 24, 396. 7b. Read, with LXX (B, Lucian), Syr., 'and lay it upon his boil and he shall live'. 8-10. Ezechias, naively enough, did not think that the acceleration of the sun's shadow, in its normal direction, was a sufficiently striking phenomenon. 11. The symbolism (cf. Ps 101:12) has been often remarked—the shadow of death turned back from Ezechias. For solar miracles, see §232. Is 38:8 speaks of the shadow going down; the 'dial' may therefore have been in the form of steps.

12-19 Embassy from Babylon—12. Merodach-Baladan I (Marduk-aplu-iddin 'Marduk gave an heir'), ruler of the Aramaeans of Bit-Yakin on the Persian Gulf, was master of Babylon from 720-710, till he was driven out by Sargon. A tenacious enemy of Assyria, he returned in 703, to be driven out finally by Sennacherib in 702. The embassy was a move against Assyria. 18. Ezechias' parade of his resources was both a promise of support and a boast of what he could do. 14-17. Isaiah, 7:4; 30:15, always insisted on neutrality; to rely on foreigners was to doubt Yahweh; cf. on 3 Kg 20:43. The prophecy was all the more striking since Babylon was then unimportant. 18. The time of its fulfilment was not determined; cf. 19:7. Sons could mean descendants in general. At the time, Ezechias had apparently no son; cf. 21:1. 19. A good example of 'Après moi, le déluge'; but the king knew that a prophecy could be revoked. See on 1.

20-21 Tunnel of Ezechias—20. From the time of Solomon, a canal had brought the waters of Gihon, Jerusalem's one source, on the western slope of the Cedron valley, to the gardens in the SE. of the city. Achaz had turned the canal westward, at its southern end, and collected the waters at the base of the rampart across the Tyropoean valley; cf. on 18:17. The canal remained within the reach of a besieging army. To remedy this Ezechias cut a tunnel, 560 yards long, under the ancient acropolis, which terminated in a great reservoir somewhat higher in the valley. In it the Siloah Inscription, §80g, was found. When this aqueduct was completed, the source was covered in, and the older canal blocked; cf. 2 Par 32:30; L.-H. Vincent, Jérusalem, DBV(S) 943-9; A.-G. Barrois, Manuel d'Archéologie Biblique, 228 ff. 21. For Ezechias' other achievements, see 2 Par 29-32.

XXI 1-9 Paganism under Manasses, 697-642—1-2. 280a
The perennial tendency towards Baalism (see on 12:8; 13:18-21; 14:17 ff.), curbed by Ezechias, was now given free rein. Micheas, 6:6-8, had complained that the reform was only superficial. 3-5. The predominance of the Assyrians explains the Jewish worship of their gods; see on 16:10 ff. 6. 'Pythons' ('ôp) were necromancers, 1 Kg 22:7 ff. Elsewhere in Vg (Deut 280a 18:11; Act 16:16) 'python' is used for the familiar spirit of a sorcerer. The name is derived from the Delphic oracle, whose original guardian was said to be a python; the priestess was called the Pythia.

b 10-16 Opposition of the Prophets—13. The measuring-line (cf. Lam 2:8) and the plummet (cf. Am 7:7) were builders' instruments. They refer here to demolition; cf. Is 34:11. Read: 'and I will wipe out Jerusalem, the way a dish is wiped, wiped and turned upside down'. 16. Reprisals followed protests. The later Jewish tradition (cf. Justin, Dial. c. Tryph., 120) was that Isaias was sawn in two under Manasses; cf. Heb. 11:37.

c 17-18 End of Manasses—Esarhaddon names Manasses among the 'kings of the sea-coast' who paid him tribute after the fall of Sidon, 677; Ashurbanipal names him among the vassals who supplied him with auxiliaries for his conquest of Egypt, 668 (Bonkamp, 462, 482). He fell foul of the Assyrians later; see 2 Par 33:11-19. His subsequent conversion to Yahweh did not change the general trend of religion. Hence the verdict here ignores it.

d 19-26 Amon, 641-640—19-22. He favoured the anti-Yahwistic party, re-introduced foreign cults into the temple, 23:6, 12, and thus undid the repentant efforts of Manasses; cf. 2 Par 33:15. 23-24. Still, the revolt was not the work of the Yahwistic party. But they seized the chance to stir up the people against the civil and military authorities and put their own candidate on the throne.

e XXII 1-2 Josias, 639-609—1. Read '18 years old'; cf. LXX. He was c 45 at his death (cf. 23:36), therefore at least 14 at his accession. 2. Some efforts at reform in the first part of his reign were not very successful, Jer 2:1 ff.; Soph 1:2 ff.

f 3-7 Repair of the Temple—3. Thorough-going reform began in the winter of 622, to culminate in the Pasch, 23:23. 4-7. The system was that of Joas, 12:10 ff.

g 8-11 Discovery of the Book of the Law—Its substantial identity with Deuteronomy is probable. (1) The title is found exclusively in Deut 28:61; 29:30; 30:10; 31:2, 6. The 'Book of the Covenant', 23:2, is found only in Ex 24:7, but the Covenant is mentioned frequently in Deut. (2) It held threats of exile against king and people, 11, 16, 20; see Deut 4:25 f.; 28:36 f., 63; 29:23-27; 30:3 ff. (3) The centralization of the cult, 23:8 f., corresponded to its prescriptions; see Deut 12 etc. This holds good even if the events of 23:4-14 (whose 'statistical' style indicates a new document) preceded the finding of the book; cf. 2 Par 33:4 ff. Deut is the only book which could initiate or ratify the centralization. It was an ancient possession, rescued from oblivion, not a recent fiction, composed to justify the reform. (1) The name was familiar. Note the articles, pointing to a definite authority, which Helcias, Saphan and the king acknowledged at once. (2) All recognized that its prescriptions had bound their forefathers, 13. Even if the author invented the words attributed to Josias, he expressed his conviction that the book was available before Josias; see further § 135d-e. (3) A recent invention would not have commanded universal acceptance, especially on the part of the country clergy, who suffered thereby; see on 23:8 f. (4) The threats of the book moved everybody deeply. But contemporary prophets left the people cold. The book was known under Ezechias, 18:22 and perhaps Josaphat, 2 Par 17:9. The reigns of Manasses and Amon account for its neglect. It was the custom to deposit sacred documents in shrines, Deut 31:26; 1 Kg 10:25.

h 12-20 Consultation of the Prophetess Huldah—12-13. The king feared that the end was near. The Scythians were then a menace, Herodotus 1:105; see Jer 1:13 etc. 14. Huldah was asked if and how disaster could be averted. From their previous threats, the answer of the prophets Jeremias and Sophonias could be guessed. The Second (City), Soph 1:14, was the extension W. of the temple, which Ezechias had enclosed by a new outer wall, 2 Par 32:5. 15-17. The fall of Jerusalem was only 35 years distant. 18-20. 280b The king died in peace (cf. 23:29) in the sense given in 20b.

XXIII 1-3 Renewal of the Alliance—1. Like David I praying for his doomed child, 2 Kg 12:14-23, Josias stormed heaven. Huldah's prophecy could be revoked; see on 21:1. 2. Jer 11:1 ff. probably refer to this assembly. 3. For the king's place by the pillar, see on 11:14. The people answered 'Amen'; cf. Jer 11:5.

4-14 Reform of the Cult—4. The work had been going on for years, 2 Par 34:3. This section seems to catalogue the results without regard to chronological sequence; hence it cannot be said that the whole reform was inspired by the newly-discovered book. 'Doorkeeper' was the honorary title of a high order of priests, 12:10; 25:18. The actual duties of doorkeepers were performed by Levites, 1 Par 9:17 etc.

5. 'He abolished the idolatrous priests' (K'mārim); possibly they were killed, according to Deut 17:2 ff. Assyria was in decline. Hence Josias could proceed against Shamash ('the sun'), Sin ('the moon'), the Mazzaloth (lit. stations [of the sun]; 'the twelve signs' of the Zodiac, or perhaps the planets; cf. Jer 7:8).

6. For 'grove' see on 3 Kg 14:23. The common cemetery was considered little better than a dung-heap, Jer 26:23. 7. See on 3 Kg 14:24. Read perhaps 'wove vestments [LXX] for Ashera'.

8a. These priests were orthodox, except that they functioned outside Jerusalem; contrast 5 and 20. 8b. Read 'the altars of the goat-gods'; cf. Lev 17:7, 2 Par 11:15. Gabaa, 3 Kg 15:22, and Beersheba indicate the northern and southern limits of Judah. 9. The priests transferred to Jerusalem were not admitted to the sacred ministry. It is not clear what provision was made for them.

9b can mean (1) they kept the Pasch, 21 ff., with their families (cf. Ex. 12:15, 18); (2) they lived on their portion of the sacrifices, like priests excluded from office by a legal blemish, Lev 21:21 ff. Eventually some at least were given minor functions; see however on Deut 18:6-9. 10. Topheth 'fire-place' lay S. of Jerusalem, at the junction of Ge-bene-Hinnom (the present Wady er-Rababi) and the Cedron valley. Gehenna, Mt 5:22 etc., corresponds to the short form Ge-Hinnom, Jos 15:8 etc. For child-sacrifice, see on 16:3; 17:31, Jer 7:31 f.; 19:4 ff.; 32:35. 11. 'Horses and chariots of the sun' were cult-objects of cosmic significance, lodged in a building or quarter called Pharurim. The name may be connected with E-Barbar (cf. 1 Par 28:18), the temple of the Sun-god in Babylonian Sippar.

12. Roof-altars were for sacrifices to the heavenly bodies, Jer 19:13; 32:29; Soph 1:5. 13. The pagan shrines, which had been restored each time after being suppressed by Josaphat, Ezechias etc., lay either on the southern shoulder of Mt Olivet, or on the Jebel batn el-Hawa, opposite the SE. hill of Jerusalem. As the common burial-place lay between the two, there were materials enough to defile the shrines; cf. Num 5:2 f.; 19:11.

15-20 In the North—15. With Assyria, hard pressed I by the Medes and Babylonians, losing her grip on the provinces, Josias could extend his zealous efforts beyond his own frontiers. Bethel was only a few hours to the N., but he reached even Nephthali, 2 Par 34:6; cf. 19. 16-18. The prophecy of 3 Kg 13:31 f. was fulfilled. 20. He followed the examples of Jehu, 10:18 ff. and Elias, 3 Kg 18:40; and see Deut 17:2 ff.; these priests were treated as idolators. Contrast 8.

21-23 The Pasch—In addition to the ancient ritual m prescriptions of Ex 12, the precept of Deut 16:1 ff. was enforced. Never before had the Pasch been celebrated only in Jerusalem, and therefore never with such solemnity, 2 Par 35:1-19. This was the 14th Nisan, within a fortnight of the events of 22:3 ff., if the year began on the 1st Nisan. Either the year began with Tishri (see on 3 Kg 6:1), or the account of the reforms is not chronological.

24-28 Verdict on Josias and Judah—24. Josias tried to stamp out even private superstitions. 'Figures of idols' stands for teraphim, household gods, Gen 31:19 etc. 25. His zeal for religion, like Ezechias' confidence in God, 18:5, was unrivalled. 26-28. But idolatry had gone too deep to be eradicated by human efforts, as the next reigns showed; cf. Jeremias, Ezechiel.

o 29-30 Death of Josias—Nineveh had fallen in 612, but the Assyrians fought on till 608 in the western province of Harran. See § 66d. Necho II 'went up to (aid) the king of Assyria', AOT 362, Jos., Ant. 10, 5, 1 (reading 'el 'to' for 'al 'against'; these Hebrew prepositions are constantly confused in MT). Megiddo commanded the passage from the coastal plain to the plain of Jezreel and the north. Josias was mortally wounded as soon as he gave battle (DV 'had seen him'; cf. 14:8, 11). His intervention in international conflicts was fatal, not only to himself, but to Judah.

p 31-35 Joachaz, 609—31-33. Necho's attitude shows that the popular movement, which placed Joachaz on the throne instead of his elder brother, was anti-Egyptian. Checked before Harran, Necho had returned to Riblah on the Orontes 'in the land of Hamath'. Joachaz, opposed by the upper classes at home, dared not disobey his summons. He must be the son of Josias, called Shallum, whose fate was more miserable than his father's, Jer 22:10-12. 34. The change of name presented his successor as the creature of Necho, and possibly Necho as the instrument of Yahweh: Y'hō-yāqīm 'Yahweh raises'; cf. 18:25. 35. Joakim apparently paid for his throne out of the pockets of his opponents, not out of the treasury.

q 36-XXIV 7 Joakim, 609-598—36-XXIV:1a. In 605, the 4th year of Joakim (see Jer 25:1; 46:2), Necho suffered a crushing defeat, Jer 46:11 ff., at the hands of Nabuchodonosor, who became king of Babylon on the death of his father shortly after. Necho retired for good behind his frontiers, 7, and Nabuchodonosor annexed Syria and Palestine. He entered Jerusalem and carried off booty and captives, Dan 1:1; Jos., Ant. 10, 11, 1 (citing the historian Berosus). 1b-2. Joakim kept up the friendly relations with Egypt, Jer 26:22 f., which were to be the ruin of Judah. As a result, he withheld tribute from Nabuchodonosor in 602, when some Syrian states revolted against their new master, Bonkamp 513. Nabuchodonosor marched against Syria, but sent only punitive expeditions, composed of troops of his loyal vassals, against Judah. Thus Joakim could hold out for five years. 3-5. He was an impious and tyrannical ruler, the circumstances of whose death are mysterious. The omission of the usual notice of burial seems deliberate; see Jer 22:13-19, 2 Par 36:6.

r 8-12 Joachin, 598—8. The new year occurred during his brief reign. Elnathan was a high official under Joakim, Jer 26:22; 36:12, 25. 9-10. The siege was the outcome of the state of war which had lasted since 602. 11. The arrival of Nabuchodonosor in person convinced Joachin that resistance was rash. 12. His voluntary surrender spared Jerusalem the worst. According to Jer 52:28, it was the 7th year of Nabuchodonosor. This was the Babylonian reckoning, which did not count the rēš šarrūti (after Nisan 605 to Nisan 604; see § 279a) whereas the author of Kg, using the Jewish system, counted the rēš šarrūti as Nabuchodonosor's first year. So too in 25:8, where the 19th year corresponds to the 18th of Jer 52:29.

s 13-16 Pillage and Deportation—13. 'All the treasures', and 'all Jerusalem', 14, are wide terms indicating a general calamity. They are to be understood in the light of the more precise details which follow. The temple was only partially despoiled, 25:15; Jer 27:18. The gold and silver utensils were very numerous, Esd 1:11. Some had been carried off in 605, Dan 1:2, more were taken in 598, the rest in 587. Nabuchodonosor had as yet no intention of eliminating the Jewish kingdom and its official cult. 14-16. The relation of the figures of 14 to those of 16 is not clear. The more general and acceptable view is that the total is given in 14, and some of the details in 16. The 10,000 was made up of 7,000 warriors (of the richer classes, 15:20), 1,000 skilled tradesmen, and 2,000 others ('princes', 14, 'judges', 15, 'ancients, priests and prophets', Jer 29:1 f.). Another view is that 14 gives the total of important persons, including the 7,000 warriors of 16, and that 1,000 skilled tradesmen must be added on, making 11,000 in all. 3,023 were deported from the countryside, Jer 52:28. Since wives and children went also, well over 30,000 persons must have been deported. Among them was the prophet Ezechiel, Ez 1:2. Joachin died in exile, Jer 22:20-30. Nabuchodonosor left the poorer classes to take over the property of the exiles, in the hope of creating a loyal population.

17-19 Sedecias, 598-587—17. Matthanias was a son of Josias, and brother of Joachaz, 23:31, and Joakim. For the change of name, see on 23:24. Šidqiyāhū 'justice of Yahweh' was to recall the 'just' punishment which Nabuchodonosor had inflicted on Jerusalem in 598; cf. Jer 40:2 f. Jeremias gave the name a different meaning, when he based on it the hope of a happier future, Jer 23:5 ff. 18. The parallel accounts in Jer 52 begin here. Amital is the lioness of Ez 19. 19. Idolatry in the temple is described vividly in Ez 8-11; and see Jer 23, 2 Par 36:14. Sedecias' guilt is compared with Joakim's (cf. 9), as Amon's with Manasses', 21:20. The fall of Jerusalem was, it is implied, due to the wickedness of her last kings, Josias excepted.

20 Last Revolt—Sedecias was a weak character and he destroyed his people by wavering in his allegiance to Yahweh. Disregarding the warnings of Jeremias, the inspired spokesman of the orthodox, he threw himself into the arms of the anti-Yahwistic party, whose pro-Egyptian policy brought on the conflict with Babylon, Jer 27:2 ff.; 37:2 ff.; 38:17. Only the general trend of events is known. Sedecias had sworn allegiance to Nabuchodonosor, and sent two missions to Babylon to affirm his loyalty, Jer 29:3; 51:59. At the same time he was intriguing with the enemies of Babylon, especially Tyre and Egypt, Ez 26; 29:17 f., Jer 27:2 ff., Josephus, C. Apion. 1, 21. Psammetich II of Egypt visited Palestine in 592 (*A. Alt, ZATW 30 [1910] 288 ff.), and it was probably then that Sedecias committed himself to revolt, which began in 590 with an appeal for Egyptian aid, Ez 17:15.

XXV 1-3 Siege of Jerusalem—1. It began on 25 Jan. 589. The Lachish Letters give an idea of the mounting pressure against Jerusalem, L.-H. Vincent, RB 48 (1939) 250 ff. Nabuchodonosor, who had to deal with the Phoenicians also, was not always present; cf. Jer 38:17. The blockade wall, dāyēq, DV 'works', is to be distinguished from the mounds, sōl'lāh. The former ran round the city at some distance from the walls (cf. Josephus, BJ 5, 12, 2), the latter, like the Roman agger, were built up against the walls where an assault could be launched. 2-3. The siege lasted till the 9th day of the fourth month (June-July) 587, 30 months in all. The number of the month, missing in MT, can be supplied from Jer 39:2; 52:6. The siege however was not continuous. Psammetich died before he could attempt to relieve Jerusalem. But some time before Jan. 588, Ez 29:1-7, his son Hophra advanced and the Chaldeans broke off the siege to meet him, Jer 37:4-10. He retired without effecting more and the siege was resumed. He attacked again in the course of 588 and 587, Ez 30:20 ff.; 31:1 ff.; 32:1 ff.; but was no match for the Chaldeans, Ez 17:7. Herodotus, 2:161, says that Apries (Hophra) sent an army against Sidon and a fleet against Tyre. They must in fact have operated against Nabuchodonosor, but they were too weak to impede him seriously, Ez 17:7. In Jerusalem, famine and pestilence, Jer 38:2, 9, weakened the defenders, and this time no 'angel of the Lord', 18:35, came to the rescue.

4 Fall of Jerusalem—The breach was made prob. in the N. wall (cf. 14:13) where the terrain was most suitable for attackers. Sedecias and the garrison escaped at the opposite end of the city. There an ancient wall enclosed the SE. hill, and the more recent wall of the SW. hill ran across the Tyropoean valley to join it. Jer 39:4 speaks of a gate and Is 22:11 of a pool 'between the two walls'. The latter would be e 5-7 Capture of Sedecias—5. Controlling the good routes, the Chaldaeans soon came up with the king and his bodyguard. The rest of the army had already scattered and escaped, 23. Nabuchodonosor was at his headquarters at Riblah (see on 23:33); Jer 39:3 therefore speaks only of his officers at the fall of Jerusalem. 7. According to Jer 52:10 f. Jewish princes were killed at the same time. These were probably the officers of the bodyguard. Sedecias was kept a captive till his death. The blinding of captives by a thrust of the lance is depicted on Assyrian monuments. Jer 34:3 prophesied that Sedecias would go to Babylon, Ez 12:13 that he would never see it.

f 8-10 Destruction of Jerusalem—8. For the dating, see on 24:12. The day of the month is given as the 7th in MT, the 9th in Syr., LXX (Lucian), the 10th in Jer 52:12—July 26th to 28th. The fate of the city was decided after the trial of Sedecias. Nabuchodonosor then determined to replace the Jewish state by a province with its capital at Mizpah, 23. 9-10. The walls were completely dismantled only in parts, Neh 4:1; hence they could be repaired in 52 days, Neh 6:15.

g 11-12 Deportations—Read 'the remnant of the artisans' (LXX, Jer 52:15). No doubt many of the poor, who had nothing to lose but their lives, fled after the fall of the city; cf. Jer 40:11 f. Still the number of the deported, 832, as given in Jer 52:29 is remarkably small. It refers probably only to the upper classes, most of whom had been already deported in 598. 12. Since the countryside was depopulated as well as the capital, the total must have been more like the 200,150 whom Sennacherib carried off in 701; see on 18:13 ff. Hence 'Judah went into exile', 21b.

h 13-17 Stripping of the Temple—13. 'bases': 'cauldrons'; cf. Syr. The stands had been removed by Achaz, 16:17. 14. See on 3 Kg 7:50. The bronze altar of holocausts, 3 Kg 8:64, had been replaced by a stone structure (see on 16:17 f.); hence it is not mentioned here. Massive pieces were broken up for transport. The utensils were carried off intact; cf. Jer 27:21 f. 16. 'bases': 'cauldrons', as in 13. 17. Jer 52:21-23 gives a more complete description of the pillars (cf. 3 Kg 7:15 ff.); the text here has suffered.

i 18-21 Execution of the Ringleaders—18. The Chaldaeans knew the inner history of the revolt, as their treatment of Jeremias shows, Jer 40. Seraias was grandson of Helcias, 22:4; his own son was not killed, but deported; cf. 1 Par 6:13 ff. Esdras was of this family, Esd 7:1. Sedecias had relied much on Sophonias, Jer 21:1; 37:3; 29:25, 29. The doorkeepers were ranked next to the high-priest and his vicegerent; see on 23:4. Some of Jeremias' bitterest enemies were among the priesthood, Jer 20. 19. 'Eunuch' here, as very often means simply 'officer'. 'Sopher' is not a proper name, but the secretary in charge of recruiting. The 72 were arrested in consequence of the enquiry held at Riblah, 6.

22-26 Fate of the Remainder—22. Jer 40-43 gives a fuller account of what followed. Nabuchodonosor tried to conciliate the remaining Jews by giving them a fellow-countryman as provisional governor; cf. Jer 40:10. Ahicam had been Josias' envoy to Huldah, 22:14, and the defender of Jeremias, Jer 26:24. The family was loyal to the policy of submission to Babylon which Jeremias had urged, Jer 27:6 ff. Godolias was entrusted with the command of a small detachment of Chaldaeans, 25; Jer 41:3. 23. For Mizpah, see on 3 Kg 15:22. The generals had returned after the departure of the Chaldaean army and seized some towns, Jer 40:10. On promise of amnesty, they submitted to Godolias, and the rest of the army and many refugees returned, Jer 40:9-12. 25. It was now autumn, for the fruits and grapes were being gathered, Jer 40:12. The king of Ammon planned the murder, Jer 40:14; it is not clear why. 26. See Jer 41:10 ff. Ishmael tried to lead the Jews to Ammon, but was put to flight by the other leaders as soon as they learned of Godolias' death. Jeremias and Baruch, protesting against the migration to Egypt, were forced to go with the refugees. Few, if any, foreign settlers were transplanted to Judah; the only opposition on the return of the exiles came from Samaria, Esd 4.

27-30 Hopeful Signs in Babylon—27. Amel-Marduk (562-560) was son and successor of Nabuchodonosor. Evil-Merodach, suggesting 'a fool is Merodach', is a tendentious alteration of a name meaning 'the man of Marduk'. Possibly he thought of making Judah a buffer-state against Egypt. The briefness of his reign prevented further developments. 28. Joachin was given precedence over other vassals detained in Babylon. Many of the exiles were now prosperous business men; no doubt their money had something to do with Joachin's honours. 29-30. Nobles ate occasionally at the king's table, Schrader, KIB II 140. Joachin did not dine every day with the king; but his needs were supplied by the court. The change of status was not unheard-of; Ashurbanipal had restored the captive Necho of Egypt to a greater power and dignity than he had before his revolt. To the Jews it must have seemed that the wrath of Yahweh was at last appeased. Joachin's good fortune lasted 'till the day of his death', Jer 52:34, which apparently took place before the end of Amel-Marduk's reign.

d Name—The work is known by the two names of Paralipomenon and Chronicles. The former, that chiefly in use among Catholics, was taken over by the Latins ('Paralipomenon liber', St Jerome, Ep. 53 ad Paulinum n. 8) from the Greeks (ἡ βίβλος τῶν παραλειπομένων, Theodoret, PG 80, 801). In origin, therefore, the name is the genitive plural of the Greek participle with the meaning 'the book of what was omitted'. As Theodoret explains, ibid., the author of the book put together 'whatever the compiler of Kg had passed over' (παράλειπον). The second title was given currency by St Jerome. After mentioning the Hebrew title Dibre hayyamim, lit. 'events of the days', he says 'quod significantius χρονικόν totius divinae historiae possumus appellare', Prol. Gpl., PL 28, 554. The former title is justified to the extent that the work does contain much that is not recorded in Kg, though supplements were not the main purpose of the author. Similarly the name 'Chronicles' is apt in so far as the book is historical, but it does not take account of its special aim. These ancient writers did not give titles and still less sub-titles to their works. Otherwise our author might have chosen to write at its head 'The History of the Davidic Dynasty, the Recipient of a Divine Promise'.

Contents and Purpose—The work begins with Adam and ends with the decree of Cyrus permitting the exiles to return from the Babylonian captivity. But the history is not treated in the same way throughout. The first nine chapters are given, for the most part, in the form of bare genealogical lists. The reader is supposed to be familiar with the story as set forth from the beginning of Genesis. Thus there is no word to explain who Adam was or why the book opens with his name. The chapters serve the purpose of briefly recalling to mind the whole early history of the Chosen Race and of the Providence of God which prepared for them through their ancestors from the very beginning. The author's predominant interest is shown from ch 2 where among the genealogies of the twelve sons of Jacob pride of place is given to that of Judah including the parentage of David, whose own posterity follows in ch 3. Then further information about the descendants of Judah is given in ch 4. Of the other tribes special prominence in point of length is given to that of Levi, chh 6 and 9. The death of Saul is narrated, ch 10, not for its own interest, but because the account of his rejection by the Lord was required to explain the divine choice of David to be the ruler of Israel. Here then in ch 11 the author enters on the real theme of his choice, the history of the divinely elected dynasty of David. This occupies the rest of the book, and is carried down to the conquest of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 when the temporal rule of the dynasty came to an end.

This restriction of the theme explains the silence about the history of the Northern Kingdom. This belongs to the history of Israel, but not to that of the dynasty of David and is consequently only recalled when it has bearings on the latter. Similarly, the reign of Athalia is hardly recognized because she was a usurper who was not of the line of David. The Davidic kings themselves, in whom interest centres, were heirs of the promise, not as individual persons, but in their official position as heirs of the Davidic throne. The Chronicler consequently omits incidents of their private lives. He omits the history of David's youth, of his exploits in the reign of Saul, the story of his adultery and its consequences. He thus omits both what was for the glory of his ideal of the theocratic king as well as what was for his shame. In any case there could be no question of the Chronicler's attempting to conceal the truth and falsify the picture. By the time his own history was written the books of Kings were well established in popular esteem and widely known, and he himself refers his readers for what he does not relate to accessible sources. The omission of direct reference to Solomon's idolatry is more striking, for this was punished by God by the rending of the kingdom and the removal of the greater part from the rule of Solomon's successors, 3 Kg 11:29-36. The manner in which the Chronicler refers to the fulfilment of the prediction of the prophet Ahias recorded in this passage of Kg shows that in his opinion it was so familiar to his readers as not to require explicit repetition. The reference at any rate shows that there was no attempt to suppress the truth.

g The Davidic dynasty being the Chronicler's central theme, the divine promise to 'build David a house', to grant him posterity, could not but be given prominence, ch 17. 'Thou hast spoken concerning the house of thy servant for the time to come'; 'O Lord, let the word which thou hast spoken to thy servant and concerning his house be established for ever, and do as thou hast said'; 'Let it be said: The Lord of hosts is God of Israel and the house of David his servant remaineth before him'; 'Thou hast been pleased to bless the house of thy servant that it may be always before thee; for seeing thou blessest it, O Lord, it shall be blessed for ever'. Now, when the Chronicler wrote, these great promises seemed to have been rendered void. The Holy City with its temple had been destroyed; the dynasty had been swept away; the people lay in poverty and weakness under the rule of a foreign power. The Chronicler sets out to give the people new heart. The divine promises are not forgotten and God is not powerless to fulfil them: 'the word of the Lord endureth for ever'. He therefore shows how God in the history of the kingdom blessed right-doing with prosperity and punished evil with calamity. This is a recurrent theme of his work, 2 Par 12:1-2; 13:4-16; 14:11-13; 16:9; 19:2; 20:37; 21:10; 22:4-9, etc. In particular the final disaster of the destruction of Jerusalem is traced to the divine sentence provoked by the iniquities of kings and people, 2 Par 36:5, 8, 9, 12-16: 'they mocked the messengers of God, and despised his words, and misused the prophets, until the wrath of the Lord arose against his people, and there was no remedy'. By such considerations the Chronicler attempted to move the people to a whole-hearted return to God. If that condition were fulfilled, they would again experience the happiness of the divine favour. The promise to David's dynasty might be in abeyance, might even seem to have lapsed, but the descendants of David through Zerobabel were still with them, 1 Par 3:19-24, and in God's good time the expected new David would arise among them.

i An essential part of loyalty to God and obedience to his law was the whole-hearted observance of the temple ritual and worship. Of this the post-exilic Jews were very negligent as is manifest from the reproaches of the prophets Aggeus and Malachy. The Chronicler, therefore, attempted to arouse their enthusiasm for this religious part of their national and individual responsibilities. Hence he wove into his story all that his sources recorded of the planning, building, inauguration, renovations, and general history of the temple, together with the arrangements prepared by David for the due and solemn celebration of the temple worship by the distribution of offices among the courses of priests and Levites, and the renewal of such arrangements by Joiada under Joas, by Ezechias, and by Josias. It was not merely the Chronicler's interest in these religious matters that prompted him to devote so large a part of his work to them, but his realization of their importance for the nation and of the need to arouse in the people a vivid sense of their obligations in this regard.

j Position in the Canon—In the printed editions of the Heb. Bible Par is placed last among the Hagiographa and so occupies the last place of all. And this position is sometimes said to have obtained in the time of Christ on the strength of Mt 23:35, 'from the blood of Abel even unto the blood of Zacharias'. As the murder of Zacharias by Joas took place as early as the 9th cent. and so was by no means the last in OT history, it is pointed out that, as the murder of Abel is recorded in the first book of the Bible, so that of Zacharias must have been recorded in the last. On this basis is raised an argument as to the date of composition of Par or at least of its reception into the Canon. The history of the question is, however, more complex. St Melito, Bishop of Sardis in the late 2nd cent., in the Jewish Canon as learnt by him in Palestine (see JE III 151a) places Par after 1-4 Kg, and ends the list with Esdras (= Esd-Neh). The passage is preserved by Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. IV 26. Origen in his list of the 22 books received by the Jews, PG 12, 1084, enumerates Par followed by 1-2 Esd after 1-4 Kg. Epiphanius, also in a list of the Heb. Canon, places Par before Kg and ends with 1-2 Esd and Esther, PG 43, 277. And St Jerome in his list of the same Canon in his Prologus Galeatus, PL 28, 554, gives the 7th place among the Hagiographa to Par, which is followed by 1-2 Esd, and ends the list with Esther. The Jewish evidence is also far from exhibiting unanimity. In the Babylonian Talmud, Baba Bathra 14b-15a, the list ends with Esd and Par. In the Heb. Bible contained in the St Petersburg codex dated A.D. 1009, Par appears first among the Kethubim or Hagiographa and Esd-Neh last. Moreover, the treatise Adath Deborah of A.D. 1207 pronounces this order, which was in accordance with western or Palestinian practice, to be correct as against the eastern or Babylonian custom of placing Par or Esther at the end. See C. D. Ginsburg, Intro. to the Massoretico-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible (London 1897) 1-8.

Relation to Esdras-Nehemias—The evidence for the common authorship of Par and Esd-Neh is summarized, with many references, by Cornely, 328-30, 357: the diction common to both books in regard of vocabulary, use of prepositions and other constructions; the formula for quoting the Mosaic Law; the functions of the Levites described with the same diffuse style and almost the same words; the same frequency of genealogies and public lists; both works centre on Jerusalem, the temple, and public worship; in both there is the same solicitude for the divine Law and the same diligence in setting down information about the priests and Levites. The literary atmosphere of Esd-Neh, however, is very different from that of Par. Still the large number of common features proves at least that both works come from the same circle, if not from the same pen.

Identity of authorship, even if proved, does not, it is plain, prove unity of composition. That Esd-Neh is the continuation of Par was affirmed by Alphonsus Tostatus, Bishop of Avila in the 15th cent., Opera XVI (Venetiis 1728) quaest. 5 ad fin., and by many is considered certain at the present day. In favour of the unity of the two works it is pointed out that Esd-Neh begins precisely at the point where it is left by Par, and that Par ends with part of the decree with which Esd opens. These are weighty considerations, though on the supposition of one originally continuous work the decree will probably have been duplicated in part at the end of Par, when the works were separated, in order to indicate where its continuation was to be found. On the other hand, the verses could have been added to Par to ensure that book ending on a consoling note. We may compare the additions to certain Psalms. Both works would have been useful by way of information and of exhortation to the author's contemporaries, whenever he lived, and to subsequent generations. On the negative side it may be urged that the hypothesis has no historical support and that there is no trace in Esd-Neh of the Messianic hope although it would have been so easy to introduce it from the writings of the post-exilic prophets. Moreover, the presupposition of the identity of authorship is itself not quite certain. The evidence for unity, therefore, though strong, hardly amounts to a demonstration.

Date—That the work was not written till after the return from the Babylonian captivity is indicated by the excerpt from the decree of Cyrus, 1 Par 36:22-23;

282a and even with the possibility of this being a later addition the same conclusion follows from the mention of the establishment of the kingdom of Persia in 2 Par 36:20. If, as is probable, the Persian daric is the coin named in 1 Par 29:7, the date would be sufficiently long after its introduction by Darius I, 521-486, for its use and name to have become familiar in Palestine. The evidence of the list of Davidic descendants in 1 Par 3:19-24 is inconclusive partly because of the possibility of additions having been made to the text and partly because of its state and the difficulty of interpretation. Zorobabel was the first governor of the Jews after the return from the exile in 538, Agg 1:1. Various emendations and interpretations have been offered, but MT seems to give 6 generations after Zorobabel and LXX + Vg 11. If Hananias, the son of Zorobabel was already an adult at the time of the return and with the allowance of 20 years to a generation, MT would point to a date some century later. On the reading of LXX + Vg Semeia, the son of Sechenias, was in the 7th generation after Zorobabel, and he was one of those who assisted Nehemias in the rebuilding of the wall of Jerusalem in 445, Neh 3:29. If this is correct, each generation must have married very early as Zorobabel could not have been much more than 40 in 538, as his grandfather Joachim was 18 in 598. The remaining generations of LXX + Vg would carry the date down to about the middle of the 4th cent. Finally, if Par + Esd-Neh originally formed one work the date of the latter must be taken into account. See §288f.

o Author—In the Babylonian Talmud, Baba Bathra 15a, Esdras is listed as the author of the book that bears his name (= Esd-Neh) and of the genealogies of Par. Nicolaus Lyranus extended this authorship to the whole of Par, and in this view found many adherents down into the 19th cent. But it is incompatible with the common authorship and the lower date of Esd-Neh advocated by many. The prevailing view is that no more can be said than that the interest manifest in the Levites including the singers and the doorkeepers suggests that the author was a Levite and probably one of the latter classes.

p Doctrine—The doctrine about God is mostly concerned with his relations with man, but has some important lessons about God as he is in himself. His universal presence is adumbrated in that 'heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain him', 2 Par 2:6. Nothing escapes his knowledge because 'the eyes of the Lord range through all the earth', 2 Par 16:9. In his hand is 'power and might', 1 Par 29:12, and 'no one can resist' him, 2 Par 20:6. 'All that is in heaven and on earth is' his, 1 Par 29:11, so that man can give to God only what he has received from the divine bounty, 1 Par 29:14.

q But God does not live in glorious isolation in heaven; he is the omnipotent ruler of the world. His rule is based on perfect knowledge, for 'the Lord searcheth all hearts and understandeth all the thoughts of minds', 1 Par 28:9, and it extends to 'all the kingdoms and nations', 2 Par 20:6. His will prevails 'for it belongeth to God both to help and to put to flight', 2 Par 25:8. Theologically the doctrine of God's providential government of the world is inchoate, since the problem of the harmonious working of God's rule and man's free will had not yet presented itself and no distinction is made between God's absolute and his permissive will. Thus it was the will of God that Roboam should not condescend to the people's petition, 2 Par 10:15. So too of Ochozias's visit to Joram that resulted in his death, 2 Par 22:7, and of Amasias's disastrous decision to make war on Joas of Israel, 2 Par 25:20. As the just ruler of the world and guardian of the moral order God must punish evil and reward good. But as the doctrine of retribution in the afterlife had not yet been revealed, this could be envisaged only in terms of prosperity and disaster in this world. In this Par merely reflects teaching that had been handed on from the Pentateuch, Jg, Kg, and various Psalms. The 282r doctrine has frequent application in our book, in the matter of punishment from the death of Saul for his iniquities, 1 Par 10:13-14, to the final destruction of Jerusalem and end of the kingdom, 2 Par 36:13-17, and in the matter of reward from the promise of David, 1 Par 12:13, to that of Ezechias, 2 Par 30:8 f. But, though God is just, 'his mercies are many', 1 Par 21:13, and in his mercy he is always ready to forgive, 2 Par 30:9. He hears and answers the prayers of men, 2 Par 7:12-16, even to the extent of granting a miracle, 2 Par 32:24. Even one like Manasses, whose iniquities had provoked God to anger, is heard and forgiven in answer to repentant prayer, 2 Par 33:6, 12 f. For though the service of God is light compared to the service of earthly princes, 2 Par 12:8, man is very frail and 'there is no man that sinneth not', 2 Par 6:36, and 'a perfect heart' to keep God's commandments can come only from him, 1 Par 29:19; 2 Par 30:12.

Though God rules the whole world, yet he deigned to establish an intimate divine relationship to Israel. He chose it out from all others and called it 'my people', 1 Par 11:2. 'The covenant which he made with Abraham' remained as 'an everlasting covenant' with Israel, 1 Par 16:16 f. It was he who chose David to be king, 1 Par 11:2-3; 14:2; 17:7; 28:4; 2 Par 6:6. He chose Solomon to be his successor, 1 Par 17:11-12; 22:9; 28:5-7; 2 Par 1:8; 6:10. More than that, God promised David a dynasty that should rule for ever, 1 Par 17:17, 23-27. Sometimes this promise is accompanied by the condition of fidelity, 2 Par 6:16; 7:17-22. Sometimes it is unconditional, 2 Par 13:5; 21:7. The former referred to the temporal rule that came to an end through prolonged infidelity, 2 Par 36:13-17. The latter referred to the spiritual rule of Christ, the second David, of whom the Angel Gabriel foretold 'he shall reign in the house of Jacob for ever', Lk 1:32. Herein lies the Messianic hope of our book.

Faithful to his promise, Deut 18:18-22, God raised up a long succession of prophets to guide, warn and rebuke his people: Nathan, 1 Par 17:1, and Gad, 1 Par 21:9 (David); Ahias, 2 Par 10:15 (Solomon); Semeias, 11:2; 12:5 (Roboam); Addo, 13:22 (Abia); Azarias, 15:1, and Hanani, 16:7 (Asa); Micheas, the son of Jemla, 18:7 ff. (Achab and Josaphat); Jehu, the son of Hanani, 19:2, Jahazael, 20:14, and Eliezer, 20:37 (Josaphat); Elias, 21:12 (Joram); unnamed prophets, 24:19, and Zacharias, the son of Joiada, 24:20 (Joas); an unnamed man of God, 25:7, and a prophet, 25:15 (Amasias); Oded in Samaria, 28:9 (Achaz); seers, 33:18 (Manasses); messengers of God and prophets, 36:15-16 (Sedecias).

Despite the vivid consciousness of Israel's privileged election our book betrays no narrow nationalism. The praise of God is put in the mouth of Hiram, king of Tyre, 2 Par 2:11-12, and of the queen of Sheba, 9:8. Appeal is made to the nations to come and adore God's presence symbolized by the ark, 1 Par 16:28-29. The renown of the temple is to spread to all nations, 1 Par 22:5. Solomon prays that the prayer of strangers who adore in the temple may be heard from heaven, 'that all the peoples of the earth may know' the name of God and serve him, 2 Par 6:32-33.

Sources—At the end of his account of most reigns the Chronicler names one or more works where further information may be obtained. The exceptions are the reigns of Joram, Ochozias, Amon, Joachaz, Joachin and Sedecias. For these Kg also omits to mention a source except for Joram and Amon, for the latter of whom the omission in Par may be explained by homocoteleuton. The sources with historical titles are the following: (1) 'Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah', 1 Par 9:1 (registration of the people); 2 Par 27:7 (Joatham); 35:27 (Josias); 36:8 (Joakim); (2) 'The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel', 2 Par 25:26 (Amasias); 28:26 (Achaz); 32:32 (Ezechias); (3) 'Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel', 2 Par 16:11 (Asa), the title differing from (2) in grammatical construction only; (4) 'Book of the 282v Kings of Israel', 2 Par 20:34 (Josaphat); (5) 'Acts of the Kings of Israel', 2 Par 33:18; (6) 'Study [Midrash] of the Book of Kings', 2 Par 24:27 (Joas). As books used not to have titles, a fixed and definite nomenclature is hardly to be expected, and there is no reason to doubt that (1), (2) and (3) represent the same work, and they are probably identical with (4) and (5). (6) appears to be a different work; on the word 'midrash' see on 2 Par 13:22.

w The sources named after prophets and seers are the following: (1) 'The Acts [or Words] of Samuel the Seer', 1 Par 29:29 (David); (2) 'The Acts of Nathan the Prophet', 1 Par 29:29 (David); 2 Par 9:29 (Solomon); (3) 'The Acts of Gad the Seer', 1 Par 29:29 (David); (4) 'The Prophecy of Ahias of Shilo', 2 Par 9:29 (Solomon); (5) 'The Vision of Addo the Seer concerning Jeroboam the Son of Nabat', 2 Par 9:29 (Solomon); 'The Acts of Addo the Seer', 12:15 (Roboam); 'The Study [Midrash; or, Investigation] of the Prophet Addo', 13:22 (Abia); (6) 'The Acts of Semeias the Prophet', 12:15 (Roboam); (7) 'The Acts of Jehu, the Son of Hanani', 20:34 (Josaphat); (8) The history of Ozias was written by Isaiahs the prophet, the son of Amos, 26:22; 'The Vision of Isaiahs the Prophet, the Son of Amos', 32:32 (Ezechias); (9) 'The Acts of Hozai' or 'The Acts of the Seers', 33:19 (Manasses). Opinions differ considerably about the number and independent existence of these writings. Of (7) 'The Acts of Jehu' the text says explicitly that they were incorporated into 'The Book of the Kings of Israel', which, however, supposes at least their original independent existence. In the case of (8) 'The Vision of Isaiahs' the textual evidence is not unanimous and many think that it is not named as a part of a historical work; see on 2 Par 32:32. The opinion that all these works were known to the Chronicler as parts of one large history seems to be definitely excluded by the separate mention in 2 Par 33:18-19 of both 'The Acts of the Kings of Israel' and of 'The Acts of Hozai' or 'of the Seers'.

x The genealogies in 1 Par 1:1-9:44 are taken from unnamed sources. 1:1-2:5 is from Gen and the subsequent information could in part be derived from Ex, Num, Jos, Ru and Kg, but other parts, as 2:14-15, are from non-canonical sources.

y The historical work called 'The Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah' etc. cannot be identified with our Kg as the former contained various facts not to be found in the latter: 1 Par 9:1, the genealogies; 2 Par 27:7, victories of Joatham; 33:18, the prayer of Manasses; 36:8, the abominations of Manasses. Whether Kg was itself a source is controverted. The affirmative has been asserted on the ground of the close verbal resemblances, the grouping of facts, and the order followed. But all this is equally well explained by the use on the part of both works of a common source. Kg was without doubt a well-known book, and facts it narrates are supposed to be familiar to readers of Par, e.g. 2 Par 10:15, the prophecy of Ahias (3 Kg 11:29-39), 32:24, the sign given to Ezechias (4 Kg 20:8-11), 32:25, 31, the embassy from Babylon (4 Kg 20:12-19). On the other hand, Par adds many details not recorded in Kg as may be seen from the commentary. And on occasion Par makes the narrative of Kg intelligible. Compare, for instance, 2 Par 22:11 with 4 Kg 11:2 and 2 Par 24:14 with 4 Kg 12:13. These and similar cases show that Kg was not the source. The similarities and differences are best explained by the use of a common source from which each author chose what best seemed to suit his purpose. So Rothstein-Hänel, Goettsberger, Rehm and others.

z Reference is also made to genealogical registers drawn up in the time of Joatham and Jeroboam, 1 Par 5:17, to 'The Annals of King David', 27:24, and to a collection of Lamentations, 2 Par 35:25, different from that still extant.

aa Historical Trustworthiness—The attack on the credibility of the Chronicler's narrative was launched by würdigkeit der Bücher der Chronik (= Beiträge zur Einleitung in d.A.T. II), Halle 1807. His arguments, though previously refuted by F. C. Movers, *K. F. Keil and others, were taken up by J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena to the History of Israel, Eng. trans., Edinburgh 1885. This Wellhausen was forced to do by his theories of the composition of the Pentateuch as the evidence of Par shows that the Levitical Law was in force at the time of David and Solomon and was not, as Wellhausen maintained, a product of post-exilic times. A detailed examination of his chief arguments may be read in Cornely, 330-48, and in Kugler, 234-89. Many are met by a due appreciation of the mode of historical writing adopted by the ancient Hebrews and by a correct understanding of the text. Thus Par is accused of falsifying history by recording that immediately after the death of Saul David was chosen to be king of all Israel. The charge would be justified if Par had said that the one event followed at once on the other, which, however, is not the case. And just as the sacred writers frequently narrate events without regard to their chronological order, so the mere fact that the narration of one event follows immediately on that of another did not imply in the mind of the writer or in that of the Hebrew reader that the two events followed in immediate chronological succession. In the present instance Par so far from attempting to conceal the existence of Saul's son and successor, the rival of David, mentions him twice, 1 Par 8:33 and 9:39, by his true name of Eshbaal (also called Ishbosheth, 'man of shame' out of hatred for the name Baal on account of its idolatrous associations). Here, as in other cases (see § 282y), Par supposes a knowledge of facts narrated in Kg. Had the Chronicler wished, he could not have hoped to suppress knowledge of the history recorded in that popular book. As his purpose was not to set down all that was known of the history of Judah as is evidenced by his many references to further sources of information, from the mass of material available he chose what he judged suitable to his theme.

bb As another illustration of principle may be mentioned the further objection that according to 1 Par 11:1 'all Israel' gathered at Hebron to make David king over the whole nation. Wellhausen seems to have overlooked the fact that the parallel passage in 2 Kg 5:1 has a phrase of the same import narrating that 'all the tribes of Israel' came to Hebron for the same purpose. No one could suppose that either expression was intended in a strictly literal sense, and biblical usage shows the meaning to be that representatives of all the nation assembled or that those present represented the dominant will of the nation as a whole. Whatever there is in Par that modern historical sense finds exaggerated, is paralleled in Kg. Thus in the time of Joachin Nabuchodonosor 'carried away all Jerusalem and all the princes', 4 Kg 24:14, yet in the reign of Sedecias Jeremiah has various references to 'the princes', 37:13-14; 38:4, 25, 27. St Augustine explained long ago that many apparent difficulties are solved if it is remembered that 'It is the custom of Scripture to speak of a part as if it were the whole', Epist. 149, ad Paulinum, PL 33, 638. On Wellhausen's treatment of the tribe of Levi reference may be made to C. Lattey, S.J., in CBQ 12 (1950) 277-91.

cc Wellhausen's whole-hearted condemnation of the historical veracity of the Chronicler was widely influential, and found many followers of the thesis that the Chronicler projected into the past the organization of the temple worship as existing in his own day and as set forth in the Priestly Code. He is said 'to have wished to draw the attention of his readers in the first place to the temple and its history and to bring out all that the pious kings of Israel-Judah had done for its glory and splendour' and 'to have sketched a picture of the past of his people with the colours of his time, to have idealized the past, so that, by and 282cc large, his book cannot be considered worthy of credit'; so A. Noordtziij writing in 1940 of then prevalent non-Catholic opinion, 160. He goes on to show that the interest of the book is primarily in the house of David and its Messianic hope, not in matters of cult. In the genealogical tables Moses receives only one incidental mention, 1 Par 6:3, and it is the tribe of Judah with the house of David, not that of Levi, which is given prominence. Neither does the high-priest stand in the foreground of the narrative. He is subordinated to the king, who, and not the high-priest, renews the covenant with Yahweh, 2 Par 29:10 and 34:31. It is the king who presides at the great religious ceremonies, 1 Par 13:5 ff., 2 Par 20:3 ff.; 29:20 ff.; 35:16 etc. It is the prophets and not the priests who play an important part in the religious history of the monarchy, §282f, and who develop the work of Moses, 2 Par 29:25.

dd On other matters, which, it is allowed, were not affected by the Chronicler's special point of view and purposes, historical value is recognized in his traditions. Thus *M. Noth, Überlieferungsgeschichtliche Studien I (Halle 1943) is of opinion that Par had pre-exilic sources for the history of the kings only for Ezechias's tunnel, 2 Par 32:30, for the last battle and death of Josias, 35:20-24, and for various reports about the defensive works of the kings of Judah and their wars. But, as pointed out by A. Bea, S.J., in Bi 27 (1946) 145-6, if these reports are from ancient and reliable sources, there is every likelihood that other reports are similarly derived, and that the contrary must not be assumed but requires proof, which is not forthcoming.

ee Recent Catholic writers follow their predecessors in defending the historical character of our work. Thus L. Marchal: 'The type of literature adopted by the Chronicler is certainly historical', 19; 'There is no serious reason to doubt the reality of the events vouched for by the author', 20. M. Rehm: 'The author's purpose is to offer the truth and to find it by going back to older traditions', 6. Similarly Goettsberger is at pains in his commentary to show how Par supplements and sometimes makes intelligible the narratives of Kg, and in general to defend it against charges of error. A. Clamer describes the book as 'a witness to the history of Israel, especially its religious history', 1993. He admits, however, 1992, that there may be modifications of detail, adaptations, or the like. So too Goettsberger, 12, and Marchal, 17, admit a certain idealization of the past; and the former, 13, says that where the Chronicler carries views of his own age back into the past, this is not very different from his giving his narrative in the speech and style of his own day.

ff The numbers given are sometimes incredibly high. Thus Abia had an army of 400,000 men and Jeroboam of 800,000, 2 Par 13:3. Taken alone this could mean the total number of men who could be called up. This would avoid the difficulty of such vast armies being engaged at one and the same time, but the difficulty would remain that the figures would suppose a total population larger than the small country of Palestine could support. Actually the explanation is ruled out by 13:17, which says that 500,000 of Jeroboam's army were victims of the battle. Another suggested explanation is that 'thousand' stands for a fighting unit of that nominal number, though in fact it might be much under strength. But Josaphat is credited with 1,160,000 fighting men, or on this explanation 1,160 regiments of nominally 1,000 men, 2 Par 17:14-18. Even on the supposition that no unit was at more than half strength, the figures still leave an army of over 500,000 men. The problem is not confined to Par. There are very high numbers in Gen and Num. It seems, therefore, to be a characteristic of Hebrew historiography, a literary convention, understood and admitted as such by these ancient writers and their readers. Divine inspiration is incompatible only with those types of literary expression which admit not only material but also formal error.

282gg The Chronicler as Author—A perusal of the work does not leave the impression that it is by a literary artist. Both the language, which tends to be crabbed, and the manner of composition forbid such a favourable judgement of the author. He leaves from his sources elements which have no meaning in the new context. Thus the remark that David remained at Jerusalem, 1 Par 20:1, is pointless as the story of David's crime against Urias has been omitted. In 2 Par 20:35 the phrase 'after these things' has no point of reference as the account of Josaphat's reign has been brought to a close. The ark is said to have been in the Holy of Holies 'unto this day', 2 Par 5:9, a phrase in the source no longer true after the exile. There are similar remarks about Solomon's forced labour, 8:8, and the revolt of the northern tribes, 10:19.

There are curious repetitions, such as are not absent from Kg. Thus, e.g. Saul's genealogy is given both in 1 Par 8:29 ff. and 9:35 ff., and 2 Par 27:8 is repeated from 27:1. An association suggested by a word may occasion a long digression. 1 Par 23:1-2 begins the account of the great assembly in which David presented Solomon as his successor. Among those summoned were priests and Levites. This leads to long lists about them and the story of the assembly is taken up again only in 28:1. The mention of the gold given to Solomon by the queen of Sheba, 2 Par 9:9, occasions a digression about gold from Ophir, and the narrative about the queen is resumed again in 9:12. This instance was taken over from the source, and it appears also in 3 Kg 10:11 ff. Evidently such procedure was congenial to the ancient Hebrew writers. Despite these minor defects in execution the Chronicler had a definite plan in mind and succeeded in imprinting it on his work.

THE FIRST BOOK OF PARALIPOMENON

I 1-IX 44 Genealogies.

I 1-II 2 From Adam to Jacob—1-4. The antediluvian patriarchs. Gen 5:1-31. 5-23. The Table of the Nations from Gen 10. 17. After 'and Aram' insert with one Heb. MS and LXX (A) 'and the sons of Aram', Gen 10:23. The form 'Mosoch', which may be due to a reminiscence of the name in 5, is replaced by Mash in some Heb. MSS and Syr in agreement with Gen 10:23. 24-27. The postdiluvian patriarchs from Gen 11:10-26. 25. 'Ragau' and 'Reu', Gen 11:18, are different transliterations of the Heb. Rā'ā. 27. For the change of Abram's name see Gen 17:5. 28-34. The descendants of Abraham. 28. For the birth of Isaac see Gen 21:1-4 and of Ishmael, the elder but named second as of less importance, Gen 16:15. The list of Ishmael's descendants, 29-31, is from Gen 25:13-15. 'Hadad' in 30 is the 'Hadar' of Gen. These two final letters are often confused in Heb. and the textual evidence varies in both places. The names of the sons of Cetur in 32-33 are taken from Gen 25:1-4. She was a secondary wife, not concubine, of Abraham's. In Gen 25:1 she is called his wife. 34. The sons of Isaac, unlike those of Abraham in 28, are given in the order of birth, Gen 25:25, and Jacob, Israel's original name, Gen 32:28, is not mentioned. 35-37. The sons of Esau, from Gen 36:10-13. 38-42. The sons of Seir, the aboriginal inhabitants of the land of Edom; Gen 36:20-28. 39. Homam is called Hemam in Gen, the divergence being due to the similarity of yod and waw in early Heb. script. The same remark applies in 40 to Alian and Sephi, who in Gen are Alvan and Sepho. Onam in some copies of DV is erroneously called Oman in Gen. Hamram, 41, is Hamdan in Gen, where MT has Jethran with n as here. 42. Jacan is named Acan in Gen. Aran is so spelt also in MT of Gen. 43-50. The kings of Edom, Gen 36:31-39. The Heb. text is the same in 48 as in Gen. 50. By a common confusion of consonants the name appears as Adad here and as Adar in Gen. 51-54. The 'dukes' of Edom, Gen 36:40-43. The mention of 283a the death of Adad II in 51, which is absent from Gen, indicates that the rule of these governors was subsequent to the extinction of the kingship. The names may be partly personal and partly territorial.

b II 3-VIII 40 The Twelve Tribes of Israel.

II 3-IV 23 The Tribe of Judah—3-4 come from Gen 38. 5. Gen 46:12. 6. Zamri's name appears as Zabdi in Jos 7:1, MT, Vg, but Zamri has there also the support of LXX. Ethan is mentioned among the wise men of 3 Kg 4:31 as an Ezrahite or descendant of Zera. After 'Ethan' the words 'the sons of Hamul', 5, have dropped out. In 3 Kg 4:31 Heman, Chalcol and Dorda appear as the sons of Mahol, which name, by inversion of letters, must disguise the name of Hamul. 'five in all' is thus a gloss added after the disturbance of the text. 7. As Charmi has not been mentioned previously the words 'and the son of Zamri: Charmi' have prob. dropped out; see Jos 7:1. For 'Achar' read 'Achan' with some MSS here and Jos 7:1, MT, Vg. 8. Azarias, only here. 9. Jerameel, only in this chapter. Ram (variant, Aram), Ru 4:19. Calubi appears in 18 as Caleb. 10-17. The sons of Ram. 10-12. Ru 4:19-22. Isai, the father of David, is called Jesse in Is 11:1. 13: 1 Kg 17:13. 14-15: except David only here. 16. Sarvia (Zeruiah) only here mentioned as sister of David; her sons, 2 Kg 2:18. Abigail is called the daughter of Naas in 2 Kg 17:25 and will have been David's step-sister. 17: 2 Kg 17:25, where read with LXX (A) 'the Ishmaelite', for 'of Jezrael'. 18-20. The sons of Caleb; cf. 9. This Caleb is a different person from the Caleb, son of Jephunneh, Num 13:7 (MT 6), one of those sent by Moses to 'spy out' the promised land. The other names are otherwise unknown except Hur and Uri, Ex 31:2, and Ephrata, the daughter of Machir, 21, 24. The interest of the list for the Chronicler centres in Bezeleel, the craftsman responsible for the tabernacle and its furniture. 21-24. Further on Hesron, 9. 21. 'Afterwards' refers to 9. The daughter of Machir was named Ephrata, 19, 24. Machir was a Manassite, Jos 17:1. This explains that Jair, who is here reckoned to Judah through Hesron, is also called a son of Manasses, Num 32:41, being connected with that tribe through his father Segub on the mother's side and living with the half-tribe of Manasses in Galaad. This Jair is prob. the Judge of Jg 10:3-5. The record of his exploits has been inserted in Num 32:41 and Deut 3:14 where note 'unto this present day'. The number 30 in Jg 10:4 is prob. a round one. 23. 'Geshur and Aram took the towns of Jair'. Geshur: a territory in N. Transjordan; Kenath (Canath) prob. the modern Qanawat west of the Hauran. 24. 'Ephrata, the wife of Hesron his father', a marriage forbidden by Lev 18:8. Ashhur = Hur, 19; 4:5. 25-41. The descendants of Jerameel, 9; cf. 1 Kg 27:10; 30:29. 25. Ram, 27. 26. Onam, 28. 31. As Sesan had no son, 34, Oholai will have been a daughter; cf. 11:41. 32. Jada, 28. 34-41 give the descendants of Sesan through a daughter. The Jerahmeelites lived in the Negeb and so in proximity to Egypt, 1 Kg 27:10. 36. Zabad, 11:41. 42-55. The sons of Caleb, 9, 18. 42. For 'Mesa' read with LXX Maresa (Maresha). Some of the descendants of Caleb are presented as the fathers or founders of towns in Judah. Ziph = modern Tell Zif, S. of Hebron. Some names seem to have fallen out after 'Maresa'. 43. Tappuah, a town, Jos 15:34. 45. Ma'on, Jos 15:55, today Tell Ma'in, S. of Hebron. Beth-sur, Jos 15:58, N. of Hebron. 47. Jahaddai's name, which occurs here for the first time, must have dropped out from the previous list. 49. Madmanna, Jos 15:31. A name has prob. fallen out before 'the father of Gabaa'. As only those women are included in genealogies who played some part in history, it is hard to resist the conclusion that this Achsa is the daughter of Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, Jos 15:16, Jg 1:12. Probably, therefore, the sentence is a misplaced interpolation here or 'daughter' must signify 'descendant'. This suggestion is not without difficulty as Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, is called a Qenizzite, Jos 14:6, 14, though closely connected with the tribe of Judah, Jg 1:10-12. 50. After 'Caleb' there should be a full stop, the sentence referring to 42-49. 'The sons of' Hur, 2:19, were Sobal, Salma and Hariph. Kiriath-jearim, a city of Judah, Jos 15:60. 51. Bethgader, perhaps Khirbet Jedur, NW. of Hebron. 52. Proper names have been translated: Re'aya (Raia, 4:2), the half of Manahath; see 54. 53. Of the clans of Kiriath-jearim the Jethrites (Ithrites) are mentioned 2 Kg 23:38. Sor'a, now Shar'a, near Beth-Shemesh; Esh-taol, Jos 15:33. The clans are the inhabitants of the neighbouring localities. 54. Again as in 52 proper names have been treated as common nouns: 'and the Netophathites, Atroth-beth-Joab, and half the Manahathites, the Sorites'. Netopha, SW. of Bethlehem. Manahath and Sor'a had mixed populations, 52, 53. 55. 'that dwell in Jabs, Tirathites, Shimathites, Sukathites. These are the Kenites who came in from Ham-math, the father of Beth-rekab'. Shema, Jos 15:26; Socoh, Jos 15:35. Kain was a town of Judah, Jos 15:57. The Kenites were a non-Israelite tribe that came to be closely associated with Judah. As 'the father of' in this ch is followed by a local name, a reference to the Rechabites, Jer 35:2, is doubtful.

David was introduced in 2:15. III 1-4. The sons of David born in Hebron, 2 Kg 3:2-5. The second son is called Daniel in Par, supported by LXX in Kg, and Cheleab in Kg supported by Syr in Par. Possibly he had two names. 5-8. David's sons born in Jerusalem, 2 Kg 5:14-16 and repeated in 1 Par 14:4-7. 5. Simmaa, differently vocalized in Kg and 14:4. Ammiel is called Eliam in 2 Kg 11:3, with inversion of the two elements of the name; cf. the inversion in Ahazias (Ochozias), 3:11, and Joachaz, 2 Par 21:17. 6. Elisama is the name of a brother, 8, and is here a scribal error for Elisua, the form given in the other lists. 7. Eliphalet appears here by dittography from 8 as in 14:5, but not in Kg. Noge also is given in 14:6, but not in Kg. Two of the letters are the same as in Nepheg, of which it is prob. a duplicate. 8. Eliada, which corresponds to Baaliada in 14:7, is an altered form with elimination of Baal which came to be associated with pagan worship. The number '9' which is additional to the '4' in 5, was added after the list had received accretions. 9: 2 Kg 5:13. Thamar: 2 Kg 13:11. 10-24. The descendants of David. 10 picks up the thread from 5. 15. Johanan does not occur in Kg and prob. died before or with his father. Sellum, Jer 22:11, was also called Joachaz, prob. as a throne-name. On the evidence of the ages and length of Joakim's reign given in 4 Kg 23:31, 36; 24:18, Sellum was born before Sedecias, and is mentioned last here perhaps as a sign of degradation, Jer 22:10:12, Ez 19:3 f. 16. Sedecias, otherwise unknown. 17. As Salathiel (Shealtiel) was born after the deportation of Jechonias to Babylon, Mt 1:12, 'Asir' is prob. a common noun: 'The sons of Jechonias the captive were. . .'. 19. Zorobabel is styled the son of Shealtiel, 17, in Esd 3:2 etc. Prob. Phadaia was his true father and Shealtiel only in the legal sense, Deut 25:5 f. 20. Either the number '5' has been wrongly copied or names have been erroneously added to the text. 21-23. Zorobabel returned from Babylon shortly after the decree of Cyrus, 538 B.C., and Semeia, the son of Sechenias, worked on the building of the wall of Jerusalem, Neh 3:29, with Nehemias, who returned from exile in 445 B.C. In this interval of time it is difficult to fit all the generations supposed by Vg + DV. However the text is uncertain and is understood by some in the sense that Hananias was the father of all named in 21. Semeia would thus be in the third generation from Zorobabel. Hattus seems to be called the son of Secenias, Esd 8:2 f. This and the statement that the sons were six, renders it prob. that the words 'whose sons were' should be omitted. 23. Elieonai returned with Esdras, Esd 8:4, where read 'the son 2831 Naaria. 24. According to the suggestions made on 21-22 it is not certain that this list allows more than six generations inclusive of Zorobabel. IV 1-23. Further Judahite genealogies—1. Charmi, 2:7. If this name is changed from Calubi = Caleb we have a list of descendants in the direct line, 2:4, 5, 9, 19, 50. 2. Raia: see on 2:52. 'families of the Saraites', as 2:53, where the Heb. is the same. 3-4. Etam, 2 Par 11:6, Jezreel, Jos 15:56, Gedor, Jos 15:58, are towns in Judah. Ephrata, 2:19. In 2:51 Salma, the son of Hur, is called father of Bethlehem. Such a metaphorical fatherhood could well be predicted of both father and son. 5-7. Ashhur; see on 2:24. 8-10. Jabes in 2:55 a local, is here a personal name. The prayer forms an incomplete sentence. Jabes must have been known in the time of the Chronicler. 11-12. The identification of this Caleb as the brother of Sua seems to distinguish him from Caleb the brother of Jerameel, 2:42. Pasceah, Esd 2:49. 13-14. Othoniel, Jg 1:13; 3:9. Ophra was a city of Benjamin, Jos 18:23, to which tribe belonged also the valley of artificers, Neh 11:35. 'For they were artificers', or 'craftsmen'. 15. This Caleb, son of Jephunneh, may be the same as the Caleb of 11. 17. Eshtemoah: a city of Judah, Jos 15:50. MT has 'she begot Mariam', suggesting that a mention of the Egyptian wife, 18, has fallen out. This explains also in 18 the distinction made: 'his Jewish wife'. Gedor; see on 4. There were two places named Socoh in Judah, Jos 15:35, 48, also two called Zanoah, Jos 15:34, 56. 18b seems to be a misplaced note referring to 17b. 19 opens with an uncertain text. Keilah, Jos 15:44; Maachah, a region SW. of Mt Hermon. 20. Another unconnected fragment. 'Rinna, Ben-Hanan', four sons in all. 21. Shelah (Sela), 2:3. Mareshah, Jos 15:44. 'fine linen in Beth-Ashbea', otherwise unknown. 22. Other sons of Shelah: 'and Yokim and the men of Cozeba and Joash and Saraph who became masters in Moab and returned to (Beth)lehem. These are events of old time', of which this is the only record. 23. 'These are the potters, who dwell in Neta'im and Gederah; they dwell there in the king's service'. Gederah: a city of Judah, Jos 15:36. The names have been lost from this fragment. On jars made in Hebron, Socoh and Ziph has been found the imprint 'For the King'; see D. Diringer, BA XII (1949) 70 ff.

h IV 24-48 The Tribe of Simeon—24: Gen 46:10 = Ex 6:15; Num 26:12 f. Namuel: in Gen + Ex 6:15. Jarib: Jachin in the other lists. Zerah, also in Num: in Gen + Ex 6:15. 25-33. The territory of Simeon, Jos 19:1-9. Bethberai in 31 is prob. corrupted from Bethlebaoth in Jos. On Siceleg in David's time see 1 Kg 27:5 f. Etam: in the territory of Judah as noted Jos 19:9. 34-38. Leading men of Simeon. The tribes were divided, 38, into clans and the clans into families. 39-43. Territorial conquests. 39. 'And they went to the confines of Gerara', LXX. As the former inhabitants were non-Israelite, they felt justified in seizing their lands, Deut 7:2. 41. 'and slew the Moabites that were found there'. Ma'on was the place SE. of Petra whence they had wandered. The time indicated, 'unto this day', is that of the Chronicler's source which cannot be fixed. So too in 43. 42-43. The mountainous country of Seir (Edom) extended S. of the Dead Sea. Saul's war against Amalec, 1 Kg 15:7 f., and David's, 2 Kg 8:12. The names of the captains occur only here and do not help to fix the date of this event.

i V 1-10 The Tribe of Ruben—1. Ruben's crime, Gen 35:22. 2. Joseph, reckoned as the firstborn, had the privilege of a double portion of the inheritance, Deut 21:17. Hence the double territory of Ephraim and Manasses, the two tribes descended from him. 3. Gen 46:9. 6. Tiglath-pileser's expedition against Galaad, 4 Kg 15:29, prob. 734 B.C. 8. Aroer, Jos 13:16, Nebo and Baalmeon, Num 32:38, fell to Ruben. 10. The Hagrites, called in the Assyrian inscriptions Hagaranu, lived in NE. Arabia. In Syriac the name came to be used as a designation of Arabs in general, 2831 Curtis 120.

11-17 The Tribe of Gad—11. The Gadites' territory ran north from that of Ruben. Bashan had been given originally to Manasses, Jos 13:30. 12-13. These are not the immediate descendants of Gad, Gen 46:16; Num 26:15-17, but leading men of a later time. 14. The sons of Abihail are missing. 15. 'their brethren' is a doubtful emendation. 16. 'in all the pasture-lands of Sharon', or, as Sharon E. of the Jordan is unknown, perhaps 'of all the upland pastures', reading mšr. 17. Jeroboam II 782/1-753 and Joatham 740/739-736/5; but the numbering will have been made while Joatham was acting as regent for his father Azarias. Shortly after this the history of the transjordanic tribes came to an end with the invasion and deportation carried out by Tiglath-pileser, 734 B.C.

19-22 War against the Hagrites and their Allies—k This is a fuller account of the war briefly noticed in 10 as waged in the time of Saul. 19-20. 'They went to war against the Hagrites and the Ituraeans and Naphish and Nodab, 20, and they were given help against them'. For the Hagrites see on 10. In Gen Jetur and Naphish are the eponyms of Arab tribes. Nodab: only here. It is explained that God helped them because of their prayer and trust. 21-22. 'of men a hundred thousand souls, for many fell down slain'. These men were not taken captive, and are loosely attached to the main verb. That this is the meaning is shown by the participle 'for'. The deportation of the Israelite tribes: see on 17.

23-24 The Half-Tribe of Manasses—23. Bashan was inhabited by Gad; see on 11. The Manassites had the land on its northern boundary. Baal-Hermon: perhaps modern Bancas. Senir was the Amorite name for Hermon, Deut 3:9, but in Heb. usage was distinguished as part of the range; so also Cant 4:8. 24. Nothing more is known of these men.

25-26 The Transjordanic Tribes are punished for Idolatry—Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria 745-727, effected the union of Babylonia with Assyria by setting himself on the throne of the former country under the name of Pulu. Both names occur separately in 4 Kg 15:19, 29. In the existing text here the two names occur as if of two different persons. The name of Pulu is not mentioned in Syr and is prob. a gloss. This is confirmed by the fact that the invasion here spoken of, 734 B.C., is that of 4 Kg 15:29 where the king of Assyria is named Tiglath-pileser. Read prob.: 'and brought them to Halah and Habor the river of Gozan and the mountains of Media'; see on 4 Kg 17:6.

VI 1-81 The Tribe of Levi (MT 5:27-6:66)—1. Ex 6:16. 2-15. The descendants of Caath, chiefly of Aaren. 2. Ex 6:18. 3a. Par adds Mary to the children of Amram, Ex 6:20. 3b. Ex 6:23. 4a. Ex 6:25. The genealogy of Esdras, Esd 7:1-5, is the same as far as Sadoc, 8, except that an Azarias is inserted between Maraioth and Amarias, 7. From Sadoc, 8, the Esdras list passes to the son of Sadoc, 12. Names were traditional in families and there is nothing surprising in various generations having the same name. 8. Sadoc, high-priest under Solomon, 3 Kg 2:35. Achimaas, 2 Kg 15:27. 9. Azarias, high-priest under Solomon, 3 Kg 4:2. 11. Amarias, high-priest under Josaphat, 2 Par 19:11. 13. Helcias, high-priest under Josias, 2 Par 34:9. 14. Saraias, high-priest at the fall of Jerusalem, 4 Kg 25:18. 15. Josedec, Agg 1:1, Esd 3:2.

The list is given as that of the descendants of Aaron, not as that of high-priests, though some in the list are known to have held that office. Others known to have done so are not mentioned, Joiada, 2 Par 22:11, Azarias under Ozias, 2 Par 26:20, and the number of generations given could not cover the interval of time between Aaron and the 6th cent. B.C. Josephus, Ant. 5, 11, 5, states that the line of Eleazar retained the high-priesthood till Ozi, 6:5, after whom it passed to Eli of the line of Ithamar to return to the line of Eleazar under Solomon. It is probable that the office

2830 did not always pass in the direct line of descent. It is remarkable that the Chronicler with his interest in the temple and public worship nowhere gives a list of high-priests as such.

- p The sons of Levi, 16-19, repeat 1 in 16 and 2 in 18. 17. Ex 6:17, Num 3:18. 19. Ex 6:19. 20-21. The sons of Gerson, 1, 17. 22-23. The sons of Caath (Kohath). 22-23. Aminadab is not mentioned above, and the father of Core, according to 37 f. and Num 16:1 is Isaar. This passage clarifies Ex 6:24 where Asir, Elcana and Abisaph might be taken for brothers. 24. Uriel, of David's time, 15:5. 15. Elcana, 23. 26-28. 'Elcana: the sons of Elcana'; there is no copula in MT. This list of Samuel's ancestors gives the same names as in 33-35 and 1 Kg 1:1, but in altered forms. The sons of Samuel were Joel and Abia, 1 Kg 8:2. The first name has fallen out here both in MT and LXX, and the Heb. expression for 'and the second' appears as a proper name 'Vasseni'. 29-30. The sons of Merari, 1, 19. There is nothing surprising in the names Lobni and Semei appearing in a different generation as those of sons of Gerson, 17.
- q 31-32. David's arrangement of liturgical singing. His removal of the ark, 2 Kg 6; his establishment of the three guilds of Levitical singers under Heman, Asaph and Ethan = Iduthun, 1 Par 25. 33-38. The genealogy of Heman. The list runs parallel to 22-28, but with omissions, scribal deformations (Johel, 36 = Saul, 24), and different names of the same person (Azarias, 36 = Ozias, 24). Samuel's Levitical origin, 28, 33, shows that the designation of Ephraimite given to his father, 1 Kg 1:1, has a local sense. He was a Levite dwelling in Ephraimite territory. 39-43. The genealogy of Asaph. Asaph was related to his 'brother' Heman through their common descent from Levi, being descended from Levi's sons Gerson and Caath respectively. The position of Asaph's choir was 'at the right hand' of Heman's in the temple services. From Zara, 41, the names begin to agree with those in 20-21, with discrepancies usual in these ancient and imperfectly copied lists. 44-47. The genealogy of Ethan. It is not stated that Ethan changed his name or had two, but after 15:19 he is called Idithun (Jeduthun), 16:42 etc. Other OT personages with two names are Abraham, Sara, Jacob, Joakim, Sedecias, and in the NT St Paul. Ethan's choir stood on the left of Heman's during service in the temple. 47 agrees with 19. 48-49. The duties of the other Levites and of the priests. In 48 omit 'who'. 49. 'to pray for': 'to atone for' by the sacrifices and purificatory rites of the Law. Not only sin- and trespass-offerings but also holocausts availed for expiation, Lev 1:4. 50-53. The list of Aaron's descendants is repeated as far as Achimaas, 3-8, as he was of the time of David, 2 Kg 15:27. 54-60. The cities allotted to the priests, Jos 21:1-4; 10-19. 54. 'their dwelling-places according to their districts'. 55. 'and the pasture-lands thereof'. 57. According to Jos 20, of these cities only Hebron was a city of refuge. 59. Ashan, mentioned as a city of Judah in 4:32, appears as Ain in Jos. Before 'Beth-shemesh' insert 'Jutta' with LXX, Syr. 60. Read 'Gibeon and Geba', the former having fallen out by haplography. 61-61. The cities of the Levites. 61-65. A summary, Jos 21:4-8. 61. Those descendants of Caath are meant who were not of the priestly order. Complete the sentence by the addition from Jos of Ephraim and Dan. Here the cisjordanic half of Manasses is meant. 65 mentions the three remaining tribes in whose territory cities were given to the Aaronites as recounted in 55-60. 66-70. The cities of the Caathites, Jos 21:20-26. 66. 'And the kindred of the sons of Caath had their cities by lot in the tribe of Ephraim'. 68. Jokmeam: in Jos Kibzaim. 69. Elteke and Gibbethon, Jos 21:23, have fallen out of Par. These were both in Dan, as were Aijalon and Gath-rimmon. 70. Taanach, Jos, and Ibleam. 71-76. The cities of the Gersonites, Jos 21:27-33. 71. Ashtaroth: altered in Jos to a Heb. form interpreted as 'Bosra'. 72. Kedesh:

prob. read Kishion, Jos. 73. 'Anem' has arisen out of En-gannim, Jos, today Jenin. 75. Hukok: Jos, Helkath. 76. Hammon: today el-Hammi, S. of Tiberias. 77-81. The Merarite cities, Jos 21:34-38. 77. Jokmeam and Kartah, Jos, must have fallen out as 63 reckons 12 cities to Merari. Thabor: in Jos, Nahalal. It is prob. that in some at least of these cases of divergency Par gives the actual practice as opposed to the original intention registered in Jos. 80. Mahanaim.

VII 1-5 The Tribe of Issachar—1. Gen 46:13 and Num 26:23 f. have Puwwah for Pu'ah; and in Gen read Tashub (Jasub) for 'Job'. 2. The numbering, 21:5. This number excludes the descendants of Ozi, 3 f. 5. Previous numbers: Num 1:29 = 54,400; 26:25 = 64,300.

6-12a The Tribe of Benjamin—Benjamin occurs again in ch 8 whereas there is no account of Zabulon, to which tribe it is therefore prob. that the following list should really belong. But it cannot be simply transferred to Zabulon as a comparison of 6 with Gen 46:14 and 21 indicates. See also the very different list in Num 26:38-41.

12b The Tribe of Dan—It is probable that this half-verse is a remnant of the lost Danite list. 12b is not linked with 12a and Husim is the one Danite name in Gen 36:23. It appears with inversion of consonants as Suham in Num 26:42.

13 The Tribe of Nephthali—Gen 46:24; Num 24:48 f. 14-19 The Tribe of Manasses—Num 26:29-34; Jos 17:1-3. The text has suffered considerably. 14. Ezriel (Asriel) was the son of Manasses' grandson Galaad, Num. 15. Maacha was the name of Machir's wife, 16. The true text is lost. Salphaad (Zelophahad) was the son of Hephher, Num. Par speaks of him as 'the second (son)' and therefore had an independent source. 16-17. The names of these descendants are not in Num. 18. 'Goodlyman': Jerome translated the proper name Ishhod as 'Virus-decorus', a practice he occasionally follows elsewhere.

20-27 The Tribe of Ephraim—Num 26:35-37, where the names as elsewhere do not exactly agree, does not make it plain that the names form a line of descent. 21. The names of ancestors were often given to children of the same family. As the Philistine city of Gath was not captured by Josue, Jos 11:22, the Hebrews would be likely to make a raid 'to take their cattle'. That the men of Gath are said to have been born in the land suggests that the Hebrew invaders had not. Ephraim was born in Egypt, Gen 41:52, and raiders from Egypt would not be said to 'come down' to Canaan. The difficulty of placing the raid in or after the time of Josue is its connexion with the genealogical table. But this is also a difficulty against putting it in the lifetime of Ephraim on account of various intervening generations. The difficulty is not removed by the suggestion that Ephraim in 22 is used figuratively as is Rachel in Jer 31:15. A fragment of history seems to have become connected with the genealogy, but out of its chronological setting. 24. Beth-horon: see on Jos 10:10. Uzzen-sheerah: today Beit Sira, W. of the Beth-horons.

28-29 The Territory of Ephraim and Manasses—The 'daughters' are the dependent villages. 28. Ephraim. Naaran: see Naaratha § 235b. Gazer and Shechem: both Levite cities, 6:67. 29. Jos 17:11. 30-40 The Tribe of Aser—30. Gen 46:17; Num 26:44. 31. Num 26:45. Birzaith: a place-name, today Birzeit, NW. of Beitin = Bethel. 32. Heber's genealogy is given only in Par. 33. Chamaam: Bimhal. 35. Helem; the name appears as Hotham in 32. 38. Jether is called Jethran in 37. 39. Olla is prob. the same person as Ara, 38. 40. Num 1:41 the total given is 41,500 and 26:47 53,400.

VIII 1-40 The Tribe of Benjamin—7:6-12a; Gen 46:21; Num 26:38-41. 1. In Gen 46:21 read 'Bela, his firstborn and Ashbel'. Gera and Naaman, sons of Bela, are there given as 'sons' of Benjamin in the sense of descendants. In Num 26:38-40 Ahara is 283aa called Ahiram, and Sephuphan is Supham. In 3 read 'Gera the father of Aod' (or, Ehud), Jg 3:15. The repetition of Gera, 3 and 5, must be a slip. 6. The names of the sons of Ahod (Aod, Ehud; see on 3) have fallen out, also the name of the enemies who took these Benjaminites captive to Manahath, a place of uncertain identification. In 7 the leader who deported them is not named. The words about deportation may be corruptions of proper names, though the deportation is supported by the otherwise unexplained sojourn in Moab, 8. 8. Saharim is mentioned abruptly without introduction. 11. 'Of Husim [his wife, 8] he begot Abitob'. 12. Ono: today Kefr 'Anā; Lod: today Ludd (Lydda) SE. of Jaffa. 16. Baria, 13. 17-18. The sons of Elphaal, 11 f. Here from another source. 19-21. The sons of Semei = Sama, 13. 22-25. The sons of Sesac, 11. 26-27. The sons of Jeroham = Jerimoth, 14. Zechri was a name popular in the family, belonging to sons of Semei, 19, Sesac, 23, and Jeroham, 27. 28. Jerusalem allotted to Benjamin, Jos 18:28, was a border city and was shared with Judah, Jos 15:63, Jg 1:21. 29-40. The family of Saul = 9:35-44. 29. 'At Gabaon [Jos 18:25, a city of Benjamin] dwelt Jehiel [9:35] the father of Gabaon', not its founder but principal citizen. Saul's own home was in Gibeath (Gabaa), 1 Kg 10:26. 30. bb After 'Baal' supply Ner from 9:36. 33. In Mt 1 the use of the word 'begot' does not exclude the omission of intervening generations and by analogy the ancestors of Cis (Kish) listed in 1 Kg 9:1 might here have been omitted between Ner and Cis. But this is excluded by 1 Kg 14:50 where Abner, the son of Ner, is called Saul's uncle (DV 'cousin german'), and therefore was brother or half-brother to Cis. Those named in 30 will not all have been sons of the first generation, and Cis' known ancestors will have been (among) the intervening links. Thus Ner's name should be supplied in Kg 9:1. Josephus's opinion, Ant. 6, 6, 5, that Ner and Cis were brothers and Ner Saul's uncle (the opinion followed by Vg + DV in 1 Kg 14:50) is against the present passage. See also 1 Kg 10:21 for another ancestor. All Saul's sons figure in his history. Esbaal = Ishbosheth 'man of shame', 2 Kg 2:8. The name of Baal was replaced by an opprobrious word to signify hatred of pagan cults. Par alone uses the form Esbaal, evidently reproducing an ancient source. The same holds, 84, of Meribbaal, elsewhere always called Mephibosheth, 2 Kg 4:4. Micha, 2 Kg 9:12. 35-40. Micha's posterity: only in Par. 40. The names of Ulam's sons are missing.

cc IX 1a Appendix—The author indicates his source for the preceding genealogies which was not the canonical books of Samuel and Kings, as much of the information given is not to be found there.

dd IX 1b-84 List of Dwellers in Jerusalem—The list gives laymen, 3-9, priests, 10-13, Levites, 14-34, among whom are porters, 17-27, and other officials, 28-34. The insertion of the list may have been suggested by 8:28 'the families who dwelt in Jerusalem'. The period to which the list belongs is controverted. Kugler, 289 ff., assigns it to 621-597; Goettsberger considers it to be post-exilic and substantially identical with that in Neh 11, which Kugler dates in the reign of Sedecias.

ee 2. The Israelites here are the laymen. The Nethinim were persons dedicated to the service of the Levites in the time of David, Esd 8:20. 5. Sela, the half-brother, 2:3 f., of Phares, 4, and Zara, 5, was the eponym of the Silonites. Read with Neh 'Asaia [Maasia], the son of Baruch, and his sons'. 6 is not in Neh. 10-13. The Priests. 10. These three stand here perhaps for the respective 'courses' of which they were the heads in the time of David, 24:7, 17. 11. Cf. 6:12 f. 'Ahitob, the prince of the house of God'. 12. Melchias was the head of the fifth course, 24:9. 14-16. Levites. 15. 'Bacbacar, Heresh, and Galal'. Mathania is mentioned among the singers, Neh 11:17. 16. These Levites dwelt 'in the Netophathite villages'; so Neh 12:28 and see on 2:54. 17-27. The door-keepers, a separate group of Levites. 17-18. Esd 2:42; Neh 7:46; 11:19; 12:25. 'Sellum was the chief, 18, and until now at the king's gate on the east. They are the porters of the Levites' quarters'. 19-20. They had this office under Phinees, Num 25:7, in the days of the wanderings. He succeeded his father, Eleazar, in the office, Num 3:32. 22. They lived in Jerusalem when on duty. Samuel's regulations are mentioned only here, David's in ch 26. 25. They 'came for seven days' when their turn came round. 26. The four are named in 17. 28-34. Other officials. 30. 'And some of the priests' sons compounded the mixture of the spices'; see Ex 30:34-38. 32. For the shew-bread see Lev 24:5-9. 33. The expected list of singers is not given, either here or Neh 11:22 f. 35-44. The family of Saul. See 8:29-38.

X 1-XXIX 80 The Reign of David.

X 1-14 Saul's Kingdom transferred to David—1 Kg 31:1-13. The account serves the purpose both of introducing David's succession to the throne and of illustrating the theme that neglect of God's service is punished by adversity. 1-5. = Kg 1-5. 6 compresses 'his armourbearer and all his men' to 'all his household'. This does not, however, include Ishbosheth who survived. He is mentioned in 8:33 with his three brothers, whose death with Saul is recorded in 2. 7. 'saw that they had fled and that Saul and his sons were dead'. 8-10. Kg is precise in recording that the weapons were laid up in the temple of Astarte, Par in recording that the skull was put in the temple of Dagon, 1 Kg 5:2. 12. They took the bodies from the wall of Beth-shan where the Philistines had exposed them, Kg 12 omits the burning of the bodies, which is mentioned in Kg, but supposes it by saying that they buried the bones. Kg says the spot was under an 'ēl = tamarisk, Par under an 'ēlāh, a tree of uncertain identification. In LXX and Vg it is called an oak and a terebinth, and according to Gesenius-Buhl it signifies any large tree. The similarity of the words may indicate a textual error. The bones were finally laid to rest in the sepulchre of Saul's father, 2 Kg 21:12-14. 13-14. These moral reflections repeat those of 1 Kg 28:17 f. For Saul's transgression, see 1 Kg 15:1-11; his consulting the witch 1 Kg 28.

XI 1-3 David is anointed King over all Israel—2 Kg 5:1-3. The immediate sequence in the narrative of David's accession to the throne of all Israel does not of itself indicate that it followed immediately in time. The methods of ancient oriental historians, even though inspired, must not be judged by modern western standards. The readers of Par were well acquainted with the long war between David and the house of Saul, and the fact that it was the murder of Ishbosheth which gave him control over all Israel, 2 Kg chh 3-4. Par supposes and does not disguise these facts, 3:4. Par adds in 3 'according to the word of the Lord'; see 1 Kg 16:1-13.

4-9 David makes Jerusalem the Capital—2 Kg 5:6-10. Hebron was too southerly to be suitable as capital city. Jebus, on the SE. hill of present Jerusalem, had also the advantage of being almost impregnable. 4. Kg: 'the king and all his followers went to Jerusalem'. 'all Israel' went in the same sense as 'all Israel', 1, had assembled at Hebron, viz. in the persons of their representatives. 6 adds the promise to Kg's account. Joab was David's nephew by his sister Sarvia, 2:16. Abner had been in command of David's forces, 1 Kg 26:5, but was treacherously slain by Joab to David's sorrow and indignation, 2 Kg 3:27-39. The king now found himself obliged by his promise to promote the murderer to the chief command. 8. Par adds that 'Joab repaired the rest of the city'. David's first thought was to strengthen the fortifications of his new capital.

10-46 David's Chief Supporters—2 Kg 23:8-39. d Exploits of 'the three' are recounted, 10-14, then those of three other heroes, 15-25. There follow two lists of valiant men, 26-41a and 41b-46. 10-14. The 284d Three. 10, not in Kg. 11 introduces the list of the heroes. Jesbaam (see also 27:2) killed three hundred at one time. 12-13a. Eleazar was the son of Dodo or Dodai; see 27:4. For the occasion of his exploit at Ephes-dammim, see 1 Kg 17:1 ff.; for the exploit itself, 2 Kg 23:10. It has been lost here by homoeoteleuton, the scribe's eye passing from one mention of the Philistines gathering for battle to another. Both mentions are preserved in 2 Kg 23:9 and 11. 13b-14. The same scribal error has caused the omission of the name of the third hero, given in 2 Kg 23:11 as Semma (Samma). He was the hero who defended a field of barley, Par, or lentils, Kg. The consonants of the two words are similar in Heb., and it is impossible to say which is original, š'ôrîm or š'âšîm. Read: 'but he stood . . . and defended it'. 15-19. An exploit of three vallant men, not those just mentioned. The text says merely 'three of the thirty'. Two are afterwards named, Abisai, 20, and Banaías, 22. That they are not mentioned in 15 is due to the author's habit of juxtaposing his excerpts from his sources without weaving them into a consecutive narrative. 15. 'At the beginning of harvest time three of the thirty went down to David at the cave of Adullam'—hâšûr 'the rock' is a corruption of qâšîr, the word in 2 Kg 23:13. The season explains David's unusual thirst. 18. 'but poured it out as an offering to the Lord'; for a similar libation of water, see 1 Kg 7:6. 19. 'These were the exploits of the three heroes', mentioned in 15. No doubt they had slipped away unknown to David to fulfil what he had uttered as an idle wish. 20-25. Abisai and Banaías, heroes of the exploit, 15-19. The name of the third is not preserved. 20. Abisai, 2:16. 'He was chief of the three'. 21. 'and more illustrious than the thirty and their captain'. 'Thirty' as in 25. In Heb. idiom this can mean 'than the rest of the thirty'. In Kg v 19, which corresponds to this verse, h'kî is certainly a corruption of hinno 'lo he' the word which occurs in the similarly worded 25. This shows that it is the original reading replaced by 'second'. 'First' is not in MT or LXX but correctly gives the sense. Jesbaam, Eleazar and Semma were 'the three' without further qualification, 11-14. Those of 15-19 were 'the three' engaged in that famous adventure. 22-25. Banaías, captain of the army and son of Joiada the priest, 27:5 f. 22. 'He slew the two sons of Ariel of Moab'; so with Kg (LXX). Ariel; otherwise unknown. 25. 'And David set him over his personal bodyguard'; 18:17. 26-41a. A list of vallant men = 2 Kg 23:24-39. Both lists have suffered textually. Many are mentioned as high officers of the army: Asahel, 26, Sammoth (?) and Helles, 27, Ira and Abiezer, 28, Sobbochai, 29, Marharai and Heled, 30, Banai, 31; see 27:7, 8, 10, 9, 12, 11, 13, 15, 14. 26. Elchanan was the son of Dodo. 27. Helles was a Paltite from Beth-pelet. 32. Hurai came from the ravines of Mt Gaash, Jos 24:30. Azmoth of Bahurim was David's treasurer, 27:25. 38. Nathan, evidently a well-known man, perhaps the prophet of that name. 2 Kg 23:39 gives the total as 37. The list in Par = 31 + 'the three' + Abisai and Banaías, 20, 22, + Elia the Harodite, 2 Kg 23:25, omitted in Par, = 37. 41b-46. A further list of vallant men. Not in Kg. If Zabad is the same person as in 2:36, he was a descendant of Oholi (Ahlai), for whom see 2:31. 44. Hotham was from Aroer, just N. of the Arnon.

1 XII 1-22 David's Supporters at Ziklag—Only in Par. 1-7. Men of Benjamin abandoned their fellow-tribesman, Saul, and espoused the cause of David. It was two of the tribe who even murdered Saul's son Ishbosheth, 2 Kg 4:2. The insertion of the passage here implies that many at least of these supporters later helped David to win the kingship over all Israel. 1. David's retirement at Ziklag, 1 Kg 27:6, a town presented to him by the Philistine king Achis. The Benjaminites were famous for ambidexterity, Jg 3:15; and 20:16 where their skill with the sling is also lauded. Their skill with the bow, 8:40; 2 Par 14:8; 1 Kg

20:20; 2 Kg 1:22. 3. Azmoth, 11:32, of Bahurim in Benjamin. 4. For 'the thirty', see 11:15. Of these Samaias was one of the bravest and he had under him a group of thirty warriors. Gedera was a city of Judah, Jos 16:36, where a Benjaminite might be living. However, some Judaïtes came to David with men of Benjamin, 16. 5. The Haruphite was a man of some unknown locality. 6. Perhaps members of the clan of Core (Korah) of 2:43. 7. Gedor, 4:4, a town in Judah. 8-15. Supporters from the tribe of Gad. 8. At this time David was at Adullam, 11:15; 1 Kg 22:1. 14. It is not said that they brought such large contingents of men with them; cf. 20. 15. They were not deterred by the fact that the Jordan 'had overflowed its banks'. This was caused by the melting of the snow on Hermon in March-April and by unusually heavy rains. They put to flight all Saul's adherents who sought to oppose them on their way through the valleys to join David. 16-18. An episode. 18. Had Amasai been the same person as Amasa, David's nephew, 2:17, the fact would prob. have been mentioned. The inspiration that came to him is not said to have been supernatural. Natural events are attributed to God as the Creator and Ruler of the universe. 19-20. Support from Manasses. 19. See 1 Kg 28:1-2; 29:1-11. The Philistine lords suspected that David would use treachery against them as a means of reconciliation with Saul, 1 Kg 29:4. 20. Omit the second mention of Ednas, not in MT or LXX, though two Jozabads are listed. 21-22. Conclusion. The raiders were Amalecites; see 1 Kg ch 30. 'They became a great camp, like a camp of God'. This is a superlative expression; cf. Ps 35:7; 79:11. 23-40 David's Supporters at Hebron—23. The numbers given are those of the total contingents from each tribe. That from Judah is surprisingly small and the figure for Zabulon seems to have fallen out. 27. Joiada, 11:22; 27:5. He was present as representative of his tribe. 28. Sadoc, 6:8; 18:16. 32. 'men with good judgement of the times to know what Israel should do'. 38. 'And of Aser forty thousand used to war and pitched battle'. 40. Among the provisions were fig-cakes (DV 'figs'). XIII 1-14 David's Attempt to bring the Ark to Slon—1-4. Consultation thereupon; not in Kg. 1. David was now dwelling in Jerusalem, 13. 2 introduces a general assembly after the private consultation with the leaders. 'and if the plan be from the Lord our God, let us send everywhere to the rest of our brethren in all the territories of Israel'. The priests and Levites especially are to be summoned who 'dwell in the cities by their pastures'. 3. 'for in the days of Saul we had no (due) regard for it'. 5-14. The abortive attempt, 2 Kg 6:1-11. The limits of Israel are indicated by the southern and northern boundaries, the Shihor or Nile standing loosely for the former and 'the approach to Hamath' in Syria for the latter. 6. 'David went up . . . to Baalah to Kiriath-jearim . . . to bring thence the Ark of God, Yahweh enthroned on the Cherubim, as his name is called'. How the ark came there, 1 Kg 7:1. Baalah, so called after a shrine of Baal, was the older name of the city, Jos 15:9. The appellation of Yahweh, 1 Kg 4:4, Is 37:16. 7. 'Oza and Ahio led the cart', which was newly made so that nothing profane had touched it. 8. 'before God', the ark being the symbol of his presence, 6. 9. 'to the threshing-floor . . . for the oxen stumbled'; the exact sense is uncertain. 10. The ark should by law have been carried on its bars, Ex 25:12-14; the right to touch it was allowed only to the priests, Num 4:5, and explicitly forbidden under pain of death to the Levites whose exclusive privilege it was to carry it, Num 4:15. During the troublous times of the Judges the Law was in general neglected, Jg 21:24, and so largely forgotten. David did not make the same mistake a second time, but insisted on the ark being carried by Levites, 15:2, which shows that Oza and Ahio were not Levites. Although Oza acted in good faith, the Israelites, so prone to idolatry through failure to understand the unique majesty of k XIV 1-17 David's Palace; his Sons; Trouble with the Philistines—The interval between chh 13 and 15 was three months, 13:14; and the events here narrated occurred partly earlier (the legation from Tyre and the building of a palace, 1, trouble with the Philistines, 8-16) and partly later (the birth of David's sons, 3-7). 1-2. 2 Kg 5:11-12. The ambassadors will have brought congratulations on David's elevation to the throne of all Israel. According to Kg the Tyrian craftsmen actually built the palace. 'and [that the Lord] had exalted his kingdom for the sake of his people Israel'. 3-7. David's sons; see on 3:5-8. 8-16. Encounters with the Philistines. 2 Kg 5:17-25. 13. David took the idols away, Kg, and burnt them, Par, in accordance with Deut 7:5, 25. 13. In the valley of Rephaim, Kg. 14. Perhaps balsam trees. 15. 'the sound of marching': suggestive of the aid from God approaching. 16. Gabaon: Geba, Kg. 17 is not in Kg. The fear of David's power extended to 'all nations' near which heard of his exploits—a case of relative universality. Here the divine name 'Yahweh' is used. In 8-16 it is used only in 10b = Kg, whereas in 10a, 11, 14, 15, 16 'Elohim' is used where Kg has 'Yahweh'.

284j God, had to be taught the reverence due to him and his Law. 11. 'the Lord had broken out on Oza . . . to this day', viz. when Par's source was written. 13-14. Obededom, a man of Gath, and not an Israelite, was blessed by God for his care of the ark. When David heard this, he took heart, 2 Kg 6:12, and brought the ark into his own city, 1 Par 15.

l XV 1-24 Introduction to the Procession with the Ark—1. David will have started this building soon after capturing the city from the Jebusites, 11:7 f.; 14:1. The place for the ark will have been prepared before the first procession to bring it to Jerusalem, ch 13. It is a question why a new tabernacle was constructed instead of bringing the Mosaic tabernacle from Gibeon, where it now was, 2 Par 1:3. Possibly the priests and population there opposed the removal. 2-24. The priests and Levites; not in Kg. 2. See on 13:10. David had now discovered his error. 5-7. Caath, Merari, Gerson, 6:1. Uriel, 6:24. Asaia, 6:30. 8. Elisaphan was also a Caathite, Ex 6:18, 22, but his clan had become independent. 9. Hebron, also a Caathite, Ex 6:18. 10. Oziel, another son of Caath, 6:2. Aminadab, 6:22. 11. Sadoc of the line of Eleazar, 6:8. Abiathar of the line of Ithamar, 6:3. The Levites are those of 5-10. 12. For various means of Levitical purification, see Ex 19:10, 15; 30:19; Lev 10:9. 13. 'Because on the first occasion [ch 13] you (did) not (carry the ark), the Lord broke out against us, because we did not show due reverence for it'. 15 is anticipatory; see 25. See on 13:10. 17. See 6:33, 39, 44. 18. 'and Ben': 'and son', inserted by error, as the name does not occur in the repetition, 20, and the word is never used as a proper name. Obededom is a different person from the Gathite of 13:13. Only he and Jehiel (= Jehias, 24) were porters or gate-keepers, but they were also singers, 21. 20-21 give names repeated from 18, where that of Ozaziu has prob. fallen out. 'sung mysteries upon psalteries': prob. 'with high-pitched psalteries'. 'sung a song', etc.: perhaps 'with deep-toned harps to lead (the music)'. 22. 'presided . . . tunes': uncertain. The reference to his skill makes the suggestion improbable that he was in charge of carrying the ark, as does also the context. Prob.: he 'was in charge of the singing (and) directed the singing'. 24. Trumpets were priestly instruments, Num 10:2, 8. Obededom and Jehias, 18.

m 25-XVI 3 The Procession with the Ark to the City of David—2 Kg 6:13-19 in substance. Par omits that David learnt that the anger of God had ceased by the divine blessing given to the house of Obededom, v 12 of Kg. He left readers to infer it from 13:14. 26. Even so after the sudden death of Oza the Levite carriers of the ark felt considerable anxiety. When they had safely traversed a short distance and felt assured of God's help, they offered a sacrifice of thanksgiving, the victims being of the traditionally sacred number, Gen 21:29. 27. 'Chonenias the director of the singing'. 29. Par omits the sequel given 2 Kg 6:20-23, which is surprising as the punishment which befell Michol would have illustrated his doctrine of retribution. XVI: 2. Blessing was not an exclusively priestly function any more than it is today. 3. 'a loaf of bread, a date-cake and a raisin-cake'; see L. Kochler TZ 4 (1948) 397 f.

XVI 4-6 Fresh Ordinances of Levitical Service—n Only in Par. 5. ' . . . and Obededom and Jehiel with instruments of psaltery'. 7-12 The Hymn of Praise—7. 'Then on that day at the beginning [of the new Levitical choral service] David appointed [the following hymn] wherewith Asaph and his brethren should praise the Lord'. 8-22. The hymn = Ps 104:1-15. 10. 'Glory in his holy name'. 13. Isaac: Ps, Abraham. 15. 'He has remembered'; so Ps correctly.

23-36 Later Additions to the Hymn—23-33 = Ps p 95:1-13, without 1a, 2a, 10c, 13c-d. 24. 'Declare . . . his wonders among all the peoples'. 29. 'Come ye into his sight': this represents the original wording. 8b of the Ps 'into his courts' dates from after the building of the temple. 'adore the Lord in holy attire'. It was becoming to wear festal garments in public worship. 34-36 = Ps 105:1 and 47. These, the first and last verses, seem to be set down as an indication that the whole Ps was to be sung. 36 is the doxology at the end of the 4th book of Psalms. As this Ps is post-exilic (see 35) and therefore a later liturgical addition to David's ordinance, it is prob. that 22-33 is a similar addition.

37-42 Arrangement for Divine Service with the Ark and the Tabernacle—Only in Par. 37-38. Service with the ark. Singers and porters are appointed; there is no mention of sacrifice. 'day . . . courses': 'according to the task of each day'. Obededom, 15:18. Hosa, 26:10 f., 16. 39-42. Service at the tabernacle at Gibeon; 6:32; 2 Par 1:3. 40. The morning and evening sacrifices, Ex 29:38-42.

43 Conclusion of the Transference of the Ark—2 Kg r 6:19b-20a. David returned to greet his household; see on Gen 47:7. The religious ceremony was no doubt followed by a domestic feast. This verse is the immediate continuation of 16:3, from which Par has separated it by the long insertion about David's cultic arrangements.

XVII 1-6 David's Desire to build a Temple is not accepted—2 Kg 7:1-7. 5. 'I brought up Israel' out of Egypt. 6. 'Wherever I went with all Israel, did I ever . . .'. 'Judges': Kg by scribal error 'tribes'.

7-15 Glorious Promises to David: his Throne to stand for ever—2 Kg 7:8-17. 8. 'and shall make . . .', 9, and I shall give . . ., 10, and shall humble'. 13 omits words of 14b-c in Kg. David's royal descendants will be punished if they commit iniquity, but David's line will never be wholly cast off. The prophecy received its full explanation from the Angel Gabriel in his words concerning Jesus Christ: 'He shall reign in the house of Jacob for ever and of his kingdom there shall be no end', Lk 1:32 f.

16-17 David's Prayer of Thanksgiving—2 Kg 7:18-29. u 16. David 'sat before the Lord': in the tabernacle in presence of the ark, which symbolized God's presence. 17. The last sentence represents a corrupt Heb. text. 18. 'seeing . . . servant': uncertain. 'known him': with favour, a pregnant sense as in Ps 1:6. 22. Yahweh was necessarily the God of Israel and of the world, but he had taken Israel under his especial protection.

XVIII 1-18 David's Successful Wars—2 Kg 8:1-14. v The reason for the insertion of this account at this point seems to have been that it illustrates the divine favour enjoyed by David and also explains the source of much of the wealth used in the preparation of the temple. 1. The 'daughters' of Gath are the villages dependent on it. Conquered kings were often left in office as vassals and Gath had a king in the time 284v of Solomon, 3 Kg 2:39; cf. 2 Par 9:26 = 3 Kg 4:21. 2. 'gifts': tribute. Par omits 2b-e of Kg. 3. Hadarezer is a late and incorrect form of Hadadezer 'Hadad [the supreme god of Syria] (gives) help'. David defeated him 'towards the land of Hamath' between which and Damascus lay the kingdom of Soba. 4. The figures here given are supported by LXX both of Par and Kg. David 'houghed all the chariot horses and reserved only a hundred for himself'; cf. Deut 17:16; Jos 11:9. 6. The kingdom of Syria, of which Damascus was capital, paid tribute. 7. 'quivers'; uncertain; perhaps shields. 8. The use made by Solomon of the bronze is recorded by LXX also in Kg. 9. The name of Thou's son, Hadoram, supported by LXX both here and in Kg, is prob. a corruption of Hadadram 'Hadad is exalted'. 12. Abishai, 2:17. As he won this victory for the king, it is in Kg attributed to David. The valley, today Wady el-Milh, runs SW. from the Dead Sea.

w 14-17 David's Officials—2 Kg 8:15-18; cf. 2 Kg 20:23-26. 16. 'Abiathar the son of Achimelech'; see 1 Kg 22:20; 23:6; 30:7, where Achimelech is father of Abiathar, who appears as the peer of Sadoc in the priesthood under David, 15:11 and 2 Kg 20:25, and up till the accession of Solomon, 3 Kg 1:7-8; 2:26, but 3 Kg 2:35 indicates his superiority. The name of Sisa, the Secretary of State, occurs in various forms: Sisa, 3 Kg 4:3 (in certain Heb. MSS these two forms would be indistinguishable); Siva, 2 Kg 20:25; in view of these the form Seraias, 2 Kg 8:17, must be a scribal error. 17. 'and the eldest sons of David were in the King's service'. Par's source may have had that they were kôhânim or 'ministers' (of the Crown) as in Kg. By the time of Par this word had only the sense of 'priests' and would be changed to a contemporary equivalent. The etymological meaning seems to be 'seer' and persons credited with the powers of such would tend to be used as counsellors in early times. It thus appears that the semantic development to 'minister' in the secular sense became obsolete, and that to 'priest' or minister in the religious sense became permanent.

x XIX 1-19 David's Defeat of the Ammonites and their Confederates—2 Kg 10:1-19. 3. 'his servants are come to thee to explore and to overthrow and to spy out the land'. The order in Kg is more logical. 4. Kg: 'he shaved off the one half of their beards'; Par, he 'shaved them', DV adding the incorrect explanation that he shaved their 'heads and beards'. The indecent cutting short of their garments suggests that the hair was shaved off one-half of their bodies. For a similar incident, see Herod. II 121. 6. 'the children of Ammon saw that they had made themselves most offensive to David'. Par adds 'a thousand talents of silver'. Mesopotamia: Aram Naharaim, prob. the land on both sides of the Euphrates where it flows nearest to the Orontes. Soba: see on 18:3. 7. Kg gives a total of 33,000 men in agreement with the 32,000 of Par + 1,000 from Maacha (numbered in Kg but not in Par). But in Par by a textual error the number has become attached to 'chariots', to which it cannot refer. Medaba: a city E. of the northern end of the Dead Sea. The city is not named in Kg leaving the geographical situation obscure. 16. The general in command was named either Sophach (Par) or Sobach (Kg)—a textual error. Hadadezer: see on 18:3. 18. Kg with more probability has 700 chariots. 19. 'they made peace with David'.

y XX 1-3 Capture of the Ammonite Capital—2 Kg 11:1; 12:30-31. 1. 'Joab . . . besieged Rabba, but David stayed at Jerusalem. And Joab smote Rabba and destroyed it'. It is strange that Par has kept the remark that David remained at Jerusalem. In his source, as in Kg, it introduced the story of David's adultery with Bethsabee. With this omitted it has no purpose; and David was present at the final capture of Rabba, today Amman, 2 Kg 12:27 ff., though the victory was really that of Joab, his commander-in-chief. 2. Milcom, the chief god of the Ammonites, was represented by a large image capable of bearing a golden crown weighing c 100 lb. The name of this divinity has been erroneously vocalized in MT as malkām 'their king'. From this crown 'a precious stone', and no doubt part of the gold were utilized to make a diadem for David. 8. David 'put them (to work) with saws and iron picks and axes'. This is widely recognized to be the true meaning here and in 2 Kg 12:31. The instruments named suggest task work, not torture; and had David been guilty of unmitigated cruelty Par would have omitted the passage as it omitted 2 Kg 8:2 and the account of David's deliberately procuring the death of Urias. For task-work, see Jos 9:21-22; 2 Par 2:17 f.

4-7 Exploits against the Philistines—2 Kg 21:18-22. 4. Kg has 'at Gob': otherwise unknown; a scribal error. 5. St Jerome has translated the names: 'Elhanan, the son of Jair, a Bethlehemite, slew the brother of Goliath'. For the death of Goliath at the hand of David, see 1 Kg 17:49; 19:5; 21:9; 22:10. Textual corruption has occurred in both Par and Kg. 'the Bethlehemite' of Kg (bēṭ-hallahmī) has become 'Lahmi' in Par (MT) (el-lahmī), thus providing a name for Goliath's brother. Vg + DV have kept the true text. And 'ahī (Par) 'the brother of' has become in Kg 'ēṭ (sign of the definite object) with the result that Elhanan has been credited in this text with killing Goliath. The name of Goliath's brother was either not known or not considered worth preserving, as was the case also with the Philistine of 6-7. He, like the other two, was of the ancient race of the Rephaim, famous for their stature.

XXI 1-XXII 1 The Census and its Punishment lead 285a to the Choice of a Site for the Temple—2 Kg 24:1-25. Par and Kg cover the same ground but the differences, especially in language, are marked; and the two accounts are prob. not from the same immediate source. Par may well depend on 'the book of Gad the seer', 29:29. Par omits of Kg's matter 4d-7 and adds 6, 16, 26b-22:1. Par normally omits what is not to the honour of David but has included this account of David's census, though displeasing to God, because its sequel was the choice of the site for the temple, the building and arrangements of which occupied so prominent a place in the Chronicler's interests. The purpose of the census is indicated in 5; those numbered were only the fighting men. The time must have been early in David's reign over the united kingdom as the numbers were assessed separately for Judah, the kingdom over which he ruled from Hebron, and Israel, the rest of the tribes which had been under the rule of Ishbosheth. The sinfulness of the census is indicated, 3, 7, but not the ground thereof. It was known to readers that according to the conscience of Israel to number the people was to trespass on the supreme rights of God; see Ex 30:12.

1 reflects the more developed theology of Par. In Kg it is God who stirs up David to number Israel in accordance with the broad concept that whatever happens in the world is attributable to the divine power that rules the universe. In this simple stage of theological development no explicit distinction was made between God's absolute and permissive will. The elements of the distinction were, however, already present, as God was known to be holy and to hate evil, of which he could not therefore be the true cause whether physical or moral. There is thus no contradiction but only clearer statement when Par represents David as yielding to the instigation of a created cause. Later 'Satan' came to designate an evil spirit, Mk 3:23, and often, and it may well already have that sense here. In itself it means 'an adversary'. See also § 320e and Jas 1:13 f. 4. The census took 9 months and 20 days, Kg. 5. The figures in Kg are 800,000 and 500,000. Either set of numbers give a surprisingly high total population of about 6,000,000, and neither is likely to be correct. The textual tradition may be at fault. 7b is said by anticipation; see 285b 10-14. 23. 'drays': 'threshing-sledges'. 25. Kg seems to say that the price of threshing-floor and oxen was 50 silver shekels, Par that of the site alone 600 gold shekels. The former seems unduly low, as Abraham paid 400 shekels of silver for a plot of ground with its trees and burial-place, Gen 23:16; the latter seems unduly high even for a royal and penitent purchaser. Barnes gives a good solution: 'The text of [2 Kg] is probably corrupt, and should perhaps run, bought the threshing-floor for money, even six hundred shekels, and the oxen for money, even fifty shekels'. This means that the words 'for money, even six hundred shekels' were accidentally omitted by an early copyist, and the word 'gold' would be an erroneous addition in Par. 28. David's sacrifice: see on 2 Kg 24:25. 29-30 form a parenthesis separating 28 and 22:1. The tabernacle at Gibeon; 16:39 f.; 2 Par 1:3-5.

• XXII 2-19 Preparations for building the Temple—

2-5. Material Preparations. 2. David first took a census, 2 Par 2:17, of the resident aliens, the survivors of the conquered inhabitants. 3. The word 'brass' was used in older English to signify copper, which was mined in the Sinaitic peninsula; and David obtained large supplies in his wars, 18:8. Bronze may be meant but brass was little known. 5. Solomon was 'young and inexperienced'. 6-16 David's charge to Solomon. 8. The shedding of blood as a ground for David's unsuitability to build the temple has not been previously mentioned in ch 17 or 2 Kg 7. It was not in harmony with the complete Levitical purity required in everything closely connected with the divine cult. 9. Peace in Solomon's days, 3 Kg 4:24; 5:4. 12. Solomon's gift of wisdom, 3 Kg 3:11 f. 14. 'Timber also and stones I have prepared, and thou shalt increase the amount'. No ancient reader would have thought of taking literally the amount of treasure here mentioned. The hyperbolic character of the statement is more obvious in the Heb.: a hundred thousand talents of gold and a thousand thousand talents of silver. It recalls the statement that silver was as plentiful as stones in Jerusalem, 3 Kg 10:27. 17-19. The princes are charged to assist Solomon in the work.

• XXIII 1-32 The Courses and Offices of the Levites—1-2 anticipate ch 28. The mention of the Levites is the only link with what follows. 3-5 The numbers and offices of the Levites. 3. From the age of 30 as in Num 4:3, 23. But this is perhaps a scribal error, as when more help was required this age limit had been reduced to 25, Num 8:24, and David reduced it still further to 20, 23:27. 38,000 equals the total of the numbers given in 4 f. 4. As three were 24 courses of priests, ch 24, and 24 of the musicians, ch 25, and 24,000 Levites are here allotted to the general work of the cult, it seems clear that they too were divided into 24 courses. As the names in 6-23 do not yield this number, we may suspect some defect in the text. The Levites as judges, 26:29 and 2 Par 19:8-10. 5. David's musical instruments, Am 6:5; 2 Par 29:26; Neh 12:35. 6-24 The distribution by courses. 7. Leedan will have been a descendant of Gerson; see 6:17, Ex 6:17. 8. Again 'sons' is used in a broad sense. Zethan and Joel were sons of Jahiel, 26:21 f. 9a, as the text stands, must be read after 9b. 12=6:2. 13. It was a priestly function 'to bless in his [God's] name', Num 6:23-27; but see on 16:2. 15. Moses' sons, Ex 18:3 f. 17. Rohobia, 26:25. 20. The sons of Oziel, but not of the first generation, Ex 6:22. 21. See 6:19, 47. 25-32. Further Levitical ordinances. 25. 'and he duells now in Jerusalem for ever'. So it would no longer fall to the Levites to transport the ark. 28. 'in the courts and in the chambers, and for the purification of whatever is holy'. 29. The Levites had charge also (omit 'the priests') of 'the fine flour for the meal-offering'. 31. Omit 'ceremonies'. 32. 'And let them attend to the tabernacle of the covenant and to the sanctuary and to the sons of Aaron'.

• XXIV 1-19 The Twenty-four Courses of the Priests—1-6. Preliminary explanations. 1. 6:3. 2. Lev 10:1 f.;

Num 3:4. 3. Ahimelech; see on 18:16. 6. See on 3. 285c The priestly families were chosen by lot, 'one family of the line of Eleazar and one of the line of Ithamar' alternately. 7-19. The heads of the twenty-four priestly courses. 7. Names were traditional in families; hence these names recur, 9:10. Josephus, Life 1, belonged to the first priestly course. 9. A descendant of Melchiah in 9:12. 10. The course of Abia, Lk 1:5. 14. Emmer, 9:12. 19. 'This is the order of their coming to the house of the Lord for their ministry (to be performed) according to the ordinance concerning them given through Aaron their father'.

20-31 The Heads of the Levitical Families—This list refers to a later time than that of 23:6-24. Some of the sons of Amram were the priestly descendants of Aaron, and these have already been dealt with, 1-19. The list begins with the Caathites; see 23:15 f.; 6:2 f., and proceeds with the Merarites, 26-30. The Gersonites have fallen out. 21. Rohobia, 23:17. 22. See 23:12, 18. 23. The text is here defective. These are the sons of Hebron; see 23:12, 19. 24. See 23:12, 20. 26. See 23:21. 28-29. See 23:21 f. 30. See 23:23.

XXV 1-31 The Twenty-four Courses of the Musicians—

1. The three families represented respectively, Asaph the Gersonites, 6:39-43, Heman the Caathites, 6:33, and Idithun (= Ethan), the Merarites, 6:44. That their function was to 'prophesy' to the sound of music is explained in 3 as singing the praises of God. The music and singing was in general loud and enthusiastic; see Ps 32:3 and §410c. 2. 'under the direction of Asaph who prophesied according to the ordinance of the king'. 3. Supply the missing name from 17. 4. The form and order of the last nine names suggest, with certain changes, a prayer which Curtis translates thus: 'Be gracious unto me, Oh Yah, be gracious unto me, Thou art my God whom I magnify and exalt. Oh my help [or: Thou art my help] when in trouble, I say, He giveth [or: Give] an abundance of visions'. 5. Heman had this numerous progeny 'according to the promise of God to raise up (his) horn'. His large family would win him great respect among the Israelites who would see in it a signal blessing of God; see Ps 127:3. 7. The number of those 'instructed in the songs of the Lord, each one an expert' was 24×12 , as enumerated 9-31. 8. The phrase 'the expert and the pupil' is not happily chosen in this connexion. It is an example of the Hebrew idiom by which a totality is expressed by the conjunction of opposites, and does not imply against 7 that any were not expert. 9-31 gives the order in which the names of 2-4 came out by lot. It illustrates the difficulty of the accurate literary transmission of names. Although both lists occur in the same chapter, 10 differ more or less in MT including 2 cases of scriptio plena et defectiva, 6 in Vg, and 7 in a modern edition of DV (partly in dependence on Vg). 9, 10, 12, 14 give the courses that fell to Asaph; 9, 11, 15, 17, 19, 21 those of Idithun, and the rest those of Heman. These highly trained singers and musicians were assisted by the 4,000 of 23:5.

XXVI 1-19 The Courses of the Porters—These were a special section of the Levites as were the musicians; and they will have taken their turn of office in the same way as the courses of priests. As with the other groups only the heads of families are named here. They were assisted by the 4,000 of 23:5. There were two main groups only among them, Caathites represented by the sons of Core, 6:22, and the Merarites, 10. The Gersonites had other functions, 26:21.

1. Selemia: the name occurs in various forms, 26:14; 9:21; 9:17, 19, 31. Asaph: 'Abiasaph'; see 9:19, and here LXX (B). 4. Obbededom: 15:18, 24; 16:38 (not 13:14). 10. Hosa: 16:38. Semri's eldest brother must have died childless 'for though he was not the firstborn, his father made him chief'. 12. 'These, the courses of the gate-keepers, under their chiefs, had their charges, as well as their brethren, in the ministry of the house of the Lord'. The other Levites had other functions. 15. 'to Obbededom that [the gate]

- 285] towards the south, and to his sons the storehouse'. 16. Omit 'Sephim' (dittography). 'To Hosa (the gate) towards the west together with the gate of Shalleketh [otherwise unknown] by the rising causeway'. This may reflect a time later than David's. The temple-hill was on a higher level than the ground to S. and W. The remains of two causeways have been discovered on the W. named Wilson's Arch and Robinson's Arch. 17. 'towards the east were six (guards) a day . . . and for the storehouse two and two': two for each entrance, unless it is meant that there were two storehouses. 18. 'For the Parbar on the west, four for the causeway, two for the Parbar'. The nature of the Parbar is uncertain, the name being derived from a Persian word denoting some structure admitting light, perhaps colonnade.
- k 20-32 Other Functions of the Levites—20-28. Guardianship of the treasures. 20. 'And the Levites, their brethren, were over the treasures of the house of God and the treasures of the sacred offerings'. They had charge both of the valuable properties required for divine worship, 9:26-29, and over what the faithful had dedicated to the sanctuary, 26:26-28. 21-22. 'The sons of Ledan, the Gersonites [6:1]: of Ledan were heads of families; of Ledan the Gersonite: Jehieli'. See 23:7 f. with note. 23. See 6:2. The text is incomplete. Those in 24-25 are Amramites; the Isaarites and Hebronites are mentioned 29-31, but the Ozielites are omitted. 24-25. See 23:14-17. Isaia = Jesias, 24:21. 28. There was a treasury attached to the tabernacle already in the time of Josue, Jos 6:24. 29-32. Secular functions. 29. These Isaarites were employed in the capacity of civil servants 'as officials and judges'. 31. Jeria: 23:19; 24:23. 'An enquiry was made' by David concerning these Hebronites with favourable results. Jazer: 6:81; Jos 21:37.
- l XXVII 1-15 The Captains of the Army—The list dates at least in part from an early period of David's reign; see on 7. Nearly all the commanders were heroes of David's early days, ch 11. 1. 'who came on duty and went off duty month by month, every month of the year, each company of 24,000'. 2. 11:11. 3. He owed his position in part to his descent from Judah through Phares, 2:4. 4. 'Eleazar, the son of Dodai'; see on 11-12. For 'after him . . . the army' read 'under him were'. 5-6. 11:22-25. See on 11:25 the explanation why his son was commander in his stead. 7. Asael, 11:26, was killed while David was still at Hebron, 2 Kg 2:18-23, and was succeeded by his son. 8. 11:27. 9. 11:28. 10. See on 11:27; also 2 Kg 23:26. 11. 11:29. 12. Abiezer was a Benjaminite from Anathoth. 13. 11:30. 14. 11:31. 15. Holdai, 11:30, was a descendant of Othniel, 4:13.
- m 16-22 The Chiefs of the Tribes—The text is incomplete, Gad and Asher being wanting. 18. David's eldest brother was Eliab, 2:13; 1 Kg 16:6; 17:13, 28. 21. Abner, prob. the celebrated commander of the army.
- n 23-24 A Fragment on the Census—This seems to take up the reference to a census in 1. 23. The census being a measure of preparation in case of war, according to Num 1:3 David did not number those under the conscript age of 20. The point of the reference to the prophecy of Gen 22:17 may have been clear in Par's source. It cannot give the reason for the omission to count the younger members of the community, as this is sufficiently explained by Num 1:3; and if it was a valid reason for the young, it would be equally so for all. In the original context it prob. gave a reason for the census as a whole, not to test but to illustrate the fulfilment of the divine promise. 24. Joab was opposed to the census from the beginning, 21:3. He reported the result to the king, 21:5, but when David realized his error, he forbade it to be entered in the official chronicle.
- o 25-31 The Stewards over David's Property—25. Azmoth was over the treasury in the capital, Jonathan over those in the countryside, in the other cities, villages and towers. These last, 2 Par 26:10, were for the use of those guarding the herds. 27. Semcias was from Rama, 3 Kg 15:17. 28. Baalhanan was over the oliveyards and sycamore-trees, which bear fruit and are allied to the fig. He was from Gedera, Jos 15:36. 31. For the Hagrites, see on 5:10.
- p 32-34 David's Ministers—The only officials in common with the earlier list in 18:15-17 are Joab and Abiathar. 32. David had also a nephew named Jonathan, 20:7. The uncle and Jahiel, son of Hachamoni, 11:11, were guardians of the king's numerous sons, 3:1-9. 33. 'The king's friend' seems to have been an official title. 34. Achitophel killed himself in Absalom's rebellion, 2 Kg 17:23. He was replaced by Joiada, the son of Banaia. Joiada named his own son Banaia after the boy's grandfather, 18:17. It is possible, however, that the names have been here accidentally inverted.
- q XXVIII 1-XXIX 20 David in Solemn Assembly proclaims Solomon King—The Chronicler's interest in the temple has led him to give such prominence to the plans for its construction as rather to obscure the main purpose of the assembly which was to proclaim Solomon as David's successor. The assembly has been already introduced, 23:1 f. The enumeration of those summoned led to the long digression, 23:3-27:34, with its lists of the important persons belonging to the various classes. 1 gives a further list of those summoned with the omission of the leading priests and Levites already mentioned in 23:2. 2-10. First part of David's speech. This is in substance a repetition of 22:7-16, a passage which belongs to this assembly. 2. For David's desire to build a temple and God's refusal, see ch 17. Omit 'all things'. 4. The choice of Judah, Gen 49:8-10; the choice of David's house, 1 Kg 16:1; of David, 1 Kg 16:13. 9. 'Know God' in the pregnant sense of knowing with veneration and love; cf. Ps 1:6. 11-19. A digression on plans for the temple. 11. The house for the mercy-seat is the Holy of Holies. 14. For gold objects the pattern was given by weight of gold, for silver objects by weight of silver. 16. 3 Kg 7:48 mentions only one table of shew-bread, but Solomon made 10, 2 Par 4:8, 19, though the others will have been used, e.g. as stands for lights. 17. 'censers': 'beakers'; cf. Num 4:7. 'little lions' (k'pîrê): 'basins' (k'pôrê). 18. God is poetically spoken of as riding on the cherubim, Ps 17:11; 98:1. 19. 'Everything he explained in writing, according to the guidance of the Lord, all the works of the pattern'. This does not mean that David received revelations about all the details, but that he worked them out under the guiding Providence of God. 20-XXIX: 5. Continuation of David's address. 20 r repeats the exhortation of 10, where the speech was interrupted. 20:1. Solomon was yet 'young and inexperienced' (repeated from 22:5). 2. 'onyx stones with (their) settings, carbuncles [?; reading nôpê] and stones of variegated colour . . . and alabaster in abundance'. 4. The mention here of gold of Ophir, prob. in southern Arabia, is not an anachronism. The expeditions which Solomon sent to obtain gold from there, 2 Par 8:18; 9:10, show that Ophir was already known as an important source of supply, and David will have obtained his gold from intermediaries. Three thousand talents of gold would exceed 300,000 lb. in weight. The walls of the temple are recorded to have been overlaid with gold, 2 Par 3:4 f., but overlaying with silver is mentioned only here. It may be that Solomon found his supply of gold to be ample and used only the more precious metal for the purpose. 6-9. Offerings for the Temple. 7. 'solids'; in MT ^a*darköntm*, by some identified with the Persian daric, a coin first struck by Darius I, 521-486, but a coin called the dariku occurs already in an inscription of Nabonidus, the last Babylonian king, 555-539 (W. Muss-Arnolt, A Concise Dict. of the Assyrian Language, s.v.). Others connect the word with the Greek drachma. Whatever its derivation, it is used here to denote the smaller offerings. Note that the numbers are all round; the precise figures were unknown. 8. The 285a precious stones were confided directly to Jehiel, who was in charge of the sacred treasury, 26:21 f. 10-19. David's beautiful prayer. 11. 'Thine is . . . glory and splendour'. 15. Men on earth are like strangers sojourning in a foreign land only for a short time. 17. God loves uprightness and David makes his offering in the uprightness of his heart. 20-22a. Sacrifices and a sacrificial banquet. In addition to holocausts they sacrificed also peace-offerings of which the offerers partook in a sacred meal, Lev 7:11-16. These were offered in such abundance as to suffice for all the Israelites present. 22b-25. The Inauguration of Solomon's reign. The turbulent background to this peaceful scene is given in 3 Kg 1. 22b. 'They made Solomon king', not 'the second time' (wanting in LXX [B]) as added by a glossator with an eye on the anticipatory statement of 23:1. It was Sadoc who anointed Solomon, 3 Kg 1:39, and when the new sovereign banished Abiathar, 3 Kg 2:27, Sadoc remained as high-priest, ib. 35. 28-30. The Death of David. 27 is less exact than 3:4, omitting the six odd months of David's reign in Hebron. 28 with its mention of Solomon's reign shows that this section and the preceding are from different sources. 29 offers another example of totality being expressed by the conjunction of opposites, 'the first and last acts of David' signifying all his history. On the three titles applied to the writers referred to see § 409f. The Chronicler did not wish to set down all he knew about David but he had no desire to conceal other facts, including the less honourable, and he tells his readers where they can find them. These writings are unfortunately lost. All three were personally acquainted with David, Samuel, 1 Kg 16:13, Nathan, 1 Par 17:2, Gad, 21:9.

THE SECOND BOOK OF PARALIPOMENON

286a I 1-IX 31 The Reign of Solomon—3 Kg 2:12-11:43. I 1-6 Solomon's Sacrifices at Gibeon—3 Kg 3:4. The ark of the covenant was now in the city of David, 1 Par ch 15, but the tabernacle, which had housed it from the time of Moses till its capture and return by the Philistines, 1 Kg 7:2, together with the altar of holocausts was at Gibeon. They had previously been at Nob till Saul massacred the priests there, 1 Kg 21:1 ff.; 22:19. David had appointed Sadoc and his brethren priests at Gibeon, 1 Par 16:39 f. Through their ministry Solomon offered his numerous holocausts in thanksgiving for his elevation to the throne. b 7-13 Solomon's Vision at Gibeon—3 Kg 3:5-15. Par omits the conditional promise of length of days, 3 Kg 3:14, perhaps because Solomon fell away and did not fulfil the condition, 3 Kg 11:4. 13. Read 'from before the tabernacle of the covenant' which was at Gibeon. c 14-17 Solomon's Military Power and Wealth—3 Kg 10:26-29. 15. Gold is not mentioned in Kg. 17. Omit 'of four horses'. 'And in this manner they were instrumental in exporting to all the kings of the Hittites and of Syria'. Solomon's wealth was greatly increased by this trade in horses and chariots. d II 1-18 Preparations for the Temple; Hiram's Promise of Help; Forced Labour—1. The completion of Solomon's own palace is mentioned in 7:11. 2 is repeated but more fully in 17 f. 3-16. Negotiations with Hiram. 3 Kg 5:1-14. 5. The exaltation of Yahweh above all gods would not be diplomatic in an appeal for help to a pagan king and suggests that the Chronicler did not have the actual wording of Solomon's missive; so also Rehm. 8. 'pine trees': algarum trees, in 1 Kg 10:11 called almug; by some thought to be sandal wood, which does not grow on Lebanon. The mercantile Phoenicians, however, may well have traded in it. T. K. Cheyne suggested a species of cypress, ET 9 (1897/98) 470-3. 10. Solomon offered pay for Hiram's workmen and it was at the latter's request that he sent supplies of food, 3 Kg 5:6, 9, 11. Par for brevity combines two of Solomon's letters into one. He offered 20,000 baths of wine and the same number of oil. For the cor and the bath, see § 82k. Kg mentions only 20 cors of fine oil according to MT and Vg, but the LXX gives the same measure as Par. 18. The craftsman's true name seems to have been Hiramabi or Huramabi. See 4:16 where it is deformed to 'Hiram his father'. 'my father' here is a translation of the second element of the name. It is not against this that his name is elsewhere abbreviated as in 4:11. 14. He was Hebrew on his mother's side. She was of the tribe of Dan, Par here, a widow of the tribe of Nephtali, 3 Kg 7:13 f. That is, born into the tribe of Dan, she married into that of Nephtali, and after her husband's death married a Tyrian. 17-18. The labour gangs. 3 Kg 5:15-16. 17. Solomon took a census of all the non-Hebrews resident in Israel, that is the remnants of the conquered inhabitants, whom his father had already numbered, 1 Par 22:2. As the total equals the sum of the separate gangs spoken of in 18, it is evidently that of the able-bodied only. Kg in MT + Vg, prob. through the accidental addition of one letter, has 3,300 overseers, but LXX(B) in agreement with Par has 3,600. If the 30,000 sent by Solomon to help on Lebanon are added to the 150,000 mentioned here, we have the proportion of 180,000 workmen to 3,600 overseers, that is 1 to every 50.

III 1-17 Measurements and Adornments of the Temple

—1. Mount Moriah was the scene of Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac; see on Gen 22:2. The threshing-floor of Ornan, 1 Par 21:15 ff. 2-4. Time and Measurements. 3 Kg 6:1-3. 2. On the relation of months to regnal years, see § 124h. 3. The length of the sanctuary (Holy Place and Holy of Holies) was 60 cubits by the ancient measure, cubits, that is, of 7 handbreadths; see § 83c. 4. The porch or vestibule was 10 cubits deep, Kg, and 20 cubits, the same as the Holy Place behind it, in width. This width is here called its 'length' as being its longer measure. 5-7. The Holy Place. 3 Kg 6:15-18. 5. The Holy Place is 'the greater house' as being 40 cubits long, whereas the Holy of Holies was 20. 6. The floor was made of planks of fir, overlaid with gold, 3 Kg 6:15, 30, and is not mentioned here. 'He ornamented the house with precious stones'. In many respects Par and Kg mutually supplement each other. 7. The gold was 'of the finest': 'of Parwayim', perhaps from Parwa in the Yemen. 8. The Holy of Holies. 3 Kg 6:19-20. Par adds the weight of gold used. 9. Prob. only the heads of the nails, 3 Kg 6:21, were covered with gold. 50 shekels = c 20 oz. The upper chambers, 3 Kg 6:10. 10-13. The cherubim. 3 Kg 6:23-28. 13. They faced towards the Holy Place. 14. The veil, not mentioned in Kg, will have been hung against the partition separating the Holy Place from the Holy of Holies, 3 Kg 6:16. The material was fine linen. 15-17. The two pillars. 3 Kg 7:15-22. Hiram made the pillars, Kg; here the work is attributed to Solomon who had commissioned it. They were 18 cubits high, Kg, Jer 52:21; and so Syr here also. 18. 'He made also garlands in a chain' surrounding each pillar (rābīd misread as d'bir).

IV 1-22 Other Appurtenances of the Temple

—1 supplies the dimensions of the bronze altar, mentioned 3 Kg 8:64. The height of the altar implies an approach to it by steps. This deviation from the prescription of Ex 20:26 may be explained by a change in the form of the dress worn. 2-5. The molten sea. 3 Kg 7:23-26. 3. The word 'oxen' here is a slip due to the oxen, 4, on which the sea rested. What are here described are knops or gourd-shaped ornaments under the brim, Kg, 'compassing it, ten to a cubit, surrounding the sea, the knops being in two rows, cast together with the sea'. 5. The divergence as to its capacity, here 3,000 baths, in Kg 2,000, is prob. to be explained by the accidental omission of 'three' in Kg, the Heb. consonants for 'thousands' and 'two thousand' being the same. 6. 3 Kg 7:38 f.

286h Par adds the purpose of the lavers ('to wash in them; what appertained to the holocaust they rinsed in them') and of the sea. 7. Ex 25:31-40 speaks of one 'candlestick' only. 3 Kg 7:49 has ten, as here. 9. 'a great hall': 'the great court' outside the court of the priests. 10. The position of the sea, 3 Kg 7:39, was at the NE. of the sanctuary. 11-22. 3 Kg 7:40-51. 11. 'flesh-hooks': 'shovels'; also in 16; where 'Hiram his father' = Hiramabi; see on 2:13. 'finest brass': 'polished bronze'. 17. 'in a clay ground': some emend to 'at the ford of Adamah'. Par puts the place between Succoth and Zereda, Kg between the former and Zeredah, the similarity showing that there is a clerical error. 19. 2 Par 13:11 and 29:18 speak of only one table of shew-bread. One of the ten, 8, therefore was for this purpose; the others perhaps supported the golden and silver, 1 Par 28:15, candlesticks. The parallel passage, 3 Kg 7:48, has one table of shew-bread only. 20. A light was to burn before the Holy of Holies according to the ordinance of Ex 27:20 f. 22. 'And the snuffers and the bowls and the censers and the fire-pans, of pure gold'.

V 1-14 Transference of the Ark to the Temple—1. 3 Kg 7:51. 'David . . . had dedicated'. 2-11a. 3 Kg 8:1-10a. 3. 'The solemn day' was the Feast of Tabernacles, §113j. 4. The priests, Kg, and the Levites, Par, both had their share in the work. It was the duty of the former to wrap up the ark and then for the latter to carry it, Num 4:5, 15; and see on 7. 5. They brought the ark 'together with the tabernacle and all its holy furniture; the priests and the Levites brought them up' from the lower-lying city of David. 7. The Levites could not enter the Holy of Holies, and therefore the priests carried the ark on this last stage of its journey. 11b-13g is not in Kg. 11. 'all the priests present had purified themselves; the courses were not observed' that day, as all the priests were expected to take part in the great ceremonial. 13h-14. Kg 10b-11. This is an anticipation of 7:1 f.

K VI 1-42 Solomon's Address and Prayer at the Dedication of the Temple—1-11. The address. 3 Kg 8:12-21. 5f-6b. Not in Kg but clearly part of the common source. 12-42. The prayer. 3 Kg 8:22-50a. 13. Solomon had had a 'bronze stand' made 'in the midst of the court'; not in Kg which, however, mentions that he prayed kneeling, 8:54. 20. 'where thou hast promised to set thy name', which practically means to manifest thy presence. 21. Solomon prayed turned 'towards it' (the sanctuary), that whosoever should pray 'towards this place' should be heard in heaven. So also in 26, 29, 32. This applied whether the suppliant was in the temple precincts or even in a distant country; see Ps 5:8; 137:2; Dan 6:10. 22. 'If any man sins against his neighbour, who takes an oath upon himself and gives occasion to (the offender) to do likewise and he does take an oath upon himself before thy altar in this house, 23, then do thou hear from heaven'. If an oath of accusation is met by an oath of denial, God Almighty is begged to judge between the two parties. 24. Omit 'and do penance'; also in 37. The case contemplates the defeat of Israel 'by reason of their sinning' against God. 40-42, which are not in Kg, closely resemble Ps 131:8-10 in 41-42. If, as seems to be the case, the psalm celebrates David's transference of the ark to Zion, the borrowing is on the part of Par. 40. 'Now, O my God, let thy eyes' etc. 42. To turn away the face of a suppliant is to reject his petition, 3 Kg 2:16. Solomon prays that God will remember the favours he showered on David and treat his posterity with the same love.

I VII 1-22 God's Sign of Acceptance of the Temple; Other Details; God's Assurance to Solomon—1-3. Fire from heaven and a cloud filling the temple. Not in Kg except 1a = 3 Kg 8:54a; but see on 5:13 f. 1. The same miracle occurred after Aaron's consecration and sacrifices, Lev 9:24. 2. Similarly at the dedication of the tabernacle, Ex 40:32 f. 3 quotes the words of the antiphon chanted by the people which occurs in Ps 135:1 and elsewhere. 4-7. The sacrifices.

3 Kg 8:62-64. Rawlinson points out on 3 Kg 8:63 that 'profusion was a usual feature of the sacrifices of antiquity. Three hundred oxen formed a common sacrifice at Athens. Five hundred kids were offered annually at the Marathonian. (Böckh's Athens I 283, E.T.) Sacrifices of a thousand oxen were not infrequent. According to an Arabian historian (Kotibeddyn) the Caliph Moktader sacrificed during his pilgrimage to Mecca in the year of the Hegira 350, 40,000 camels and cows, and 50,000 sheep. Tavernier speaks of 100,000 victims as offered by the King of Tonquin. (See Milman's 'Gibbon', IV 96, note). 6, not in Kg, repeats part of the antiphon from 3. Trumpets: see on 1 Par 15:24. 7. 'the sacrifices': 'the meal-offering'; see §183d. 8-11. The Feast of Tabernacles; conclusion. 3 Kg 8:65-66. 8. 'the solemnity': the Feast of Tabernacles was distinguished by being called simply 'the feast'. For 'the approach to Hamath', see on 1 Par 13:5. 9. On the solemn assembly following the feast, see §113j. 'Because' begins a new sentence. Because the dedication had lasted 7 days and the feast 7 days, followed by the solemn assembly on the 8th day, the people could be dismissed, 10, on the 23rd. The feast began on the 15th. 11. Solomon 'successfully accomplished all that he had designed' to do. 12-22. God's assurance to Solomon. 3 Kg 9:1-9. 13-15. Not in Kg. 14. To 'seek out God's presence' is to visit the temple. 17. 'my statutes and my ordinances'. 21. 'This house shall become a ruin; all that pass by shall be awestruck'; cf. Syr.

VIII 1-18 Various Activities of Solomon's—1-6. m Building operations. See 3 Kg 9:10-19. 1. The time indicated is 'at the end of the twenty years in which Solomon had built' the temple and his palace. 2. Hiram gave these cities back to Solomon. For the prehistory of this event, see 3 Kg 9:11-13. Hiram had been disappointed with the cities. 3. For Hamath and Soba, see on 1 Par 18:3. 4. In the region of Hamath he built store-cities. 7-10. Labour gangs. 3 Kg 9:20-23. 8. He 'raised a levy for forced labour'. 10. 'And these [the officers of g] were Solomon's chief overseers' of his labour gangs. The subordinate overseers were chosen from among the non-Israelites forced to work. In number they were 250, Par, 550, Kg. The discrepancy may be due to a copyist's error or to a difference in the basis of the computation. 11. Pharaoh's daughter. Cf. 3 Kg 9:24. It was not merely because she was a foreigner that she could not live in the royal palace: 'No wife of mine shall dwell. . . . Par presupposes the reader's knowledge of the marriage, 3 Kg 3:1; 7:8. 11b is not in Kg. 12-16. Solomon's care for the cult. 3 Kg 9:25. 13. On these feasts, see §113a-j. 14. He maintained David's arrangements: 'the courses of the priests', 1 Par 24; 'the Levites in their charges', 1 Par 25:1-6; 26:20-28; the porters, 1 Par 26:1-19. 16. 'Thus all Solomon's work was accomplished . . . he finished it. The house of the Lord was completed'. 17-18. Expedition to Ophir. n 3 Kg 9:26-28. Solomon went to Ezion-geber to supervise the construction of his ships there, Kg. In this work he was no doubt assisted by Hiram, who sent his experienced seafaring men with Solomon's in these ships, Kg. The text of Par has been understood by many, as in DV, to state that Hiram sent Solomon ships for the expedition, which could only be explained if the Phoenicians already had in the Persian gulf the trading stations mentioned by Strabo, 16, 3, 4 (ed. I. Casaubon, 1587, 527). But it is more likely that the text says that Hiram sent ships not 'to him' but 'for him': 'and Hiram assisted by sending ships [those built by Solomon at Ezion-geber] manned by his men, men familiar with seafaring'. Hiram's men were helped by Solomon's, who were only novices in the art of navigation. The amount of gold obtained was 450 talents, MT, 400, Syr, 420 Kg, MT, 120, Kg, LXX(B). The last figure is the most probable. IX 1-31 Solomon's Wisdom and Wealth; his Death o —1-9 and 12. The Visit of the Queen of Sheba.

2860 3 Kg 10:1-10 and 13. 4. Literally, she was 'out of breath' with astonishment. 5. There is no mention of Solomon's virtues: 'thy accomplishments and wisdom'. 9. Josephus, Ant. 8, 6, 6, states that she gave 20 talents of gold, which prob. preserves the true reading. 12. Solomon showed his munificence by giving her all that she asked 'without any regard to (the value of) what she had brought to him'.

p 10-11; 13-28 Solomon's Wealth and Glory—3 Kg 10:11-12; 14-26. 15. 'spears': 'bucklers', shields to cover the body, larger than those of 16, where omit 'the covering of'. They were put in 'the house of the forest of Lebanon'. 21. The destination of this expedition cannot have been Tarshish (Tartessus) in Spain both because of the products acquired and because in the similar passage, 20:36-37, the vessels were constructed at Ezion-geber at the head of the Gulf of Aqaba on the E. side of the Sinaitic peninsula. These were damaged (in a storm) and 'could not go to Tarshish'. Moreover, in the parallel passage in 3 Kg 22:49 these ships were destined for Ophir, prob. on the S. coast of Arabia or the E. coast of Africa. It therefore appears that the Phoenicians will have given the name Tarshish to some distant trading-place perhaps on the Persian Gulf. There Strabo (see on 8:17-18) reports the existence of such stations adding that the Phoenicians gave their familiar names to new localities. 25. 'Solomon had 4,000 stalls for horses and chariots'. So MT, which agrees in form with 3 Kg 4:26 (MT 5:6), where, however, the number is erroneously 40,000. LXX(B) here has '4,000 horses for chariots'. And see 2 Par 1:14. 26 = 3 Kg 4:21a. 27 repeats 2 Par 1:15. 28 repeats in part 2 Par 1:16. For the other countries, see 14, 23 f. 29-31. Conclusion on Solomon. 3 Kg 11:41-43, which as source names only Solomon's chronicles. Nathan, 1 Par 17:1; Ahias, 2 Par 10:15; Addo, 12:15, who wrote concerning Jeroboam.

X I-XII 16 Roboam 931-913.

X I-9 Secession of the Northern Tribes—3 Kg 12:1-20. 10. Omit 'in pleasure'. 15 supposes knowledge of the event described in 3 Kg 11:26-40. 16. The king is spoken of as a shepherd who 'feeds' or pastures his flock. 18. Adoniram (so LXX(B) and Syr; and see 3 Kg 4:6) was over the forced labour.

r XI 1-4 War against the Northern Tribes forbidden—3 Kg 12:21-24.

5-12 Fortifications—Not in Kg. Following close upon the threat of war with the newly established Northern Kingdom this account might suggest that the fortifications were a defence measure against that state. But the cities best situated for that purpose as those in the northerly lying Benjamin are not named. The position of the towns fortified in the south and west shows that they were directed against a threat from Egypt. The account thus prepares for the invasion of the Pharaoh in ch 12 and underlines the lesson that no human efforts can avert punishment designed by God, 12:5. 10. As no towns in Benjamin are listed, the expression 'Judah and Benjamin' designates the Southern Kingdom. 11. Roboam arranged for 'stores of provisions, oil and wine' against possible siege.

s 13-17 Refugees from the Northern Kingdom—13. Not in Kg. The Levites were living scattered throughout Israel in the cities assigned to them according to the law, Num 35:2-8; Jos ch 21. 14. They left their fashures and possessions. Jeroboam's high places and calf-worship, 3 Kg 12:26-31. 15. 'devils': lit. 'he-goats', a contemptuous appellation based on mythology. Jeroboam himself introduced an illegitimate cult of Yahweh under the image of calves, Ex 20:4, but under his 'sons', 14, or successors the cult became debased to idolatry.

t 18-23 Roboam's Family—Not in Kg. 18. Jeromoth: otherwise unknown, prob. the son of a secondary wife.

2861 Abihail, introduced without adequate connexion, was prob. the mother of Mahalath and daughter of Eliab, 1 Par 2:13, in the first generation. 19. 'she bore him sons', MT, LXX, namely Mahalath. 20. Maacha will have been the grand-daughter of Absalom, whose only daughter was Thamar, 2 Kg 14:27. 22. As Abia was not the eldest, who was prob. Jehus, this preference of him was against Deut 21:15-17. 23. 'He prudently dispersed some of his sons in all the territories of Judah . . . and he took wives for them'. His motives will have been further to guard against the threat of invasion and to diminish the possibility of the brothers taking action against the elevation of Abia.

XII 1-12 The Invasion of Sheshenk—3 Kg 14:25-28. u Sheshenk I, c 945-c 924, founded the XXII (Bubastite) dynasty. He has left a record of this Palestinian expedition on the walls of Karnak. 1. The name 'Israel' is used of the Southern Kingdom alone. The details of the idolatry are given 3 Kg 14:22-24. 3. Troglodites: so LXX; MT Sukkiyim, not mentioned elsewhere. 5. Semeias, 11:2. 6. The princes and the king humbled themselves. 7. 'I will soon grant them deliverance'. As the wrath of God was not poured out on Jerusalem, the city was not captured by storm; and, 8, the treasure carried away by the Pharaoh will have been voluntarily surrendered to save the city. Solomon's golden shields, 9:15 f.

13-16 Conclusion—3 Kg 14:21-22, 29-31. 13 repeats v from another source the strengthening of the king's position, 1, and does not refer to the time after Sheshenk's invasion. 15. 'and diligently recorded': perhaps 'concerning genealogies' was the title of the book taken from its opening phrase (Barnes).

XIII 1-XIV 1a Abia (Abiam) 913-911/910. w

XXX 1-2a Introductory—3 Kg 15:1 f. 1. This is the only case in which Par indicates a synchronism between the two kingdoms, prob. as leading up to the war with Jeroboam, 2b. That Roboam reigned 17 years and yet his son succeeded to the throne in the 18th year of Jeroboam, although the two kingdoms both began after the death of Solomon, is explained by the different systems of calculating regnal years followed in the two. Roboam's 1st regnal year began Tishri 930, his first post-accession year; Jeroboam's 1st year was reckoned from Nisan 931, which was his accession year. See § 124h-j. 2. For the explanation of the 3 years, see § 124g. Michaia is a deformation of Maacha, 11:20, whose father was Uriel and whose grandfather was Absalom, 11:20. Her mother will have been Thamar, 2 Kg 14:27, and she herself received the name of her great-grandmother, 2 Kg 3:3.

2b-20 War with Jeroboam—3 Kg 15:7c. 3. When x Abia began the war, he had a fighting force of 400,000 and Jeroboam of 800,000, the numbers being about those of David's census, 2 Kg 24:9. 4. It need not be supposed that Par had an exact record of Abia's speech. After the manner of ancient historians like Thucydides he will have set down the substance of what the occasion demanded. 5. Salt being incorruptible, 'a covenant of salt' is a perpetual covenant, Num 18:19. 7. To call the adherents of Jeroboam 'irresponsible and worthless men' is special pleading in view of the account in ch 10. Roboam was inexperienced, lit. 'a youth', much as we sometimes speak of a grown man as a child. He was 41 years old at his accession, 12:13. 9. See 11:13-15. 11. 'sweet-smelling incense'. 14. For the priests with their trumpets in war, see Num 10:8 f. 19. The 'daughters' are the dependencies of these towns. 20. The circumstances of Jeroboam's death are unknown.

21-XIV 1a Conclusion—3 Kg 15:7-8. 22. For y further information about Abia Par refers to 'the Midrash of Addo the prophet' (omit 'diligently'). A Midrash is an enquiry or study, and so a commentary. Centuries later the rabbinic commentaries treated their material with great freedom and the word took on a corresponding shade of meaning, but 286y there is no ground for reading that meaning back into earlier centuries. Par omits an animadversion on Abia's sins such as is given 3 Kg 15:3, but indications that 'his heart was not perfect with the Lord' are not wanting. His son Asa had to abolish the idolatrous altars, 14:2, and the false worship of Maacha is mentioned in 15:16. But Abia did not wholly abandon the worship of Yahweh. On the contrary, he made offerings to the temple, 3 Kg 15:15.

z XIV 1b-XVI 14 Asa 911/910-870/869.

XIV 1b-5 Religious Reform—3 Kg 15:11 f. 1b. The 10 years of peace are generally understood to be the opening years of the reign before the invasion of Zara. The war waged with Baasa all their days, 3 Kg 15:16, 32, must have been intermittent. 3. On the massebot and the 'asirim, see on Deut 7:5. 5. 'temples': perhaps sun-pillars erected in honour of Baal as the solar deity, or incense-stands.

aa 6-8 Military Preparations—3 Kg 15:23; Jer 41:9. 6. There were no wars in those years. 8. These are the numbers of fighting men who could be called on, not the numbers of a standing army.

bb 9-15 The Invasion of Zara—Not in Kg. Zara has been identified with Osorkon I of Egypt, but he is called a Kushite, which normally means an Ethiopian, and the XXII dynasty, to which Osorkon belonged, was Libyan (Champollion; accepted by H. R. Hall, The Ancient History of the Near East [1950¹¹] 439). Goettsberger thinks he was a general in command of auxiliary Egyptian troops. F. Hommel, ET 8 (1896/7) 378, considers Zara to be a Kushite of Central Arabia. The narrative suggests an invading horde of would-be settlers in the Fertile Crescent rather than an organized army. LXX(B) gives his host as 'thousands with 300 chariots', which may be correct. 10. Asa set his army in array 'in the vale to the north of Mareshah', LXX. No valley of Sephata is known. 13. Gerar: modern Umm Jerar, S. of Gaza. 14. Asa took advantage of the alarm aroused by his complete rout of Zara to attack the Philistines.

cc XV 1-7 Warning of the Prophet Azarias—Not in Kg. 1. Azarias is otherwise unknown. 2. The occasion was the return of Asa from the defeat of Zara. 3-6 should have past tenses, the reference being to the lawless period of the Judges; see Jg 2:10-20. It was a time of repeated cycles of idolatry, affliction, repentance and forgiveness. In 5-6 the reference is to the tribes and cities of Israel. The war against Benjamin, Jg chh 20 f.; the destruction of Shechem, Jg 9:45.

dd 8-18 Religious Reform—8. See 3 Kg 15:12. The reform in 14:2-5 is an anticipatory mention of that recorded here but from another source. Here too the statement that he removed the idols (lit. abominations) out of the cities of Ephraim he had taken (see 17:2) seems to be an anticipation as till now Asa seems to have had no war with the Northern Kingdom. He also renovated the altar before the vestibule of the sanctuary. 12. 'And they entered into a covenant to seek the Lord'. A similar renewal under Ezechias, 29:10, and Josias 34:31. 15. 'All Judah rejoiced at the oath'. 16-18. 3 Kg 15:13-15. 16. Maacha was Asa's grandmother, 11:20. Alternatively Maacha was also the name of Asa's mother. 'She had made a disgraceful thing in honour of Asherah', the Canaanite goddess. 17. These high places were not for idolatrous cults but for the illegitimate worship of Yahweh. 18. Abia had prob. made these offerings at such illegal high places. 19 Reward for Fidelity—This period of peace was a reward for the return to true religion, 15. As Baasa interrupted this peace, 16:1, and he died in the 26th year of Asa, 3 Kg 16:8, the number here and in 16:1 seems to be erroneous. Baasa came to the throne in the 3rd year of Asa, 3 Kg 15:33, and according to 3 Kg 15:16 'there was war between Asa and Baasa . . . all their days'. But this does not mean that there was war from the time of Baasa's accession but that from the time the war started it lasted as long as both were reigning together. With this agrees Hanani's prophecy of continual wars from this time, 16:9. That the report of the war in 16:1-5 is very incomplete is shown by the reference in 15:8 to the cities of Ephraim captured by Asa.

XVI 1-6 War with Israel—3 Kg 15:17-22. 4. 'all the store-cities' provided with war materials.

7-10 Reproof and Prophecy of the Seer Hanani—Not in Kg. 7. Hanani, 19:2. Had Asa put his trust in God, he could have defeated the combined forces of Baasa and Benhadad. 8. The Libyans were not mentioned in 14:9-13. 10. Asa treated cruelly many who had presumably sided with Hanani against him.

11-14 Asa's Death and Burial—3 Kg 15:23 f. 12. The 'very grievous disease in his feet' may have been mortification due to a defect in the circulation. 14. 'And an immense fire was burnt in his honour', prob. with odoriferous shrubs. This mark of respect was customary, 21:19; Jer 34:5.

Appendix on the Chronology of Asa's Reign—The problem of fitting the information given into a satisfactory pattern has not found a convincing solution. The fortifications are likely to have been undertaken early in the reign, and they were carried out in a time of peace, 14:6-7. The 10 years of quiet, 14:1, therefore seem to have initiated the reign. This would place Zara's invasion in Asa's 11th year. But the sacrifice of the spoils in the 15th year, 15:10-11, seems in the context to refer to that event. As the defeat of Zara can hardly have taken some 4 years, his invasion was prob. preceded by an unrecorded conflict. The defeat of Zara, therefore, prob. fell in the 14th year, and was followed by the religious reform, 14:2-5 and 15:8-16. This had as sequel and reward a period of peace broken eventually by war with Baasa, 16:1. The suggestion that this time of quiet lasted the 10 years of 14:1, would put the outbreak of war with Baasa in Asa's 24th year, but as Baasa died in Asa's 26th year, 3 Kg 16:8, this would not leave long enough to do justice to the statement of 3 Kg 15:16 that there was a war between the two monarchs all their days, as this implies a prolonged conflict.

XVII 1-XXI 1a Josaphat 870/869-848.

XVII 1-19 His Care for Religion; Success; Military Preparations—Not in Kg except 1a = 3 Kg 15:24b. 1b-2. Military preparations necessitated by the late war with Israel. 3-5. Religious spirit and consequent divine blessing. In 3 omit 'David' with Heb. MSS and LXX. 6-9. Religious reform and instruction of the people. 6. The people were so prone to idolatry that fresh measures were already necessary after the action of Asa, 14:3, which see for 'groves'. But like his father, 15:17, he did not remove the high places dedicated to the unlawful worship of Yahweh, 20:33. In 8 omit 'Thobadonias', a dittography compounded of the two previous names. In 9 note the book of Mosaic law. 10-11. Salutary respect of the neighbouring nations. 12-19. Military strength. 12. In Judah he built 'forts and store-cities'. 17. 'After him': 'From Benjamin' (min-Binyamin). The Benjaminites were celebrated for their skill with the bow; see on 1 Par 12:1 f. Each archer, whose two hands were required to shoot with the bow, was protected by a companion holding a shield; see illustrations in DBV I 905.

XVIII 1-34 War with Achab against Syria—1a II repeats verbally 17:5b. 1b. Josaphat's son Joram married Athalia the daughter of Achab, 21:6; 22:2. 2-34. Consultation and War. 3 Kg 22:2b-35. 25. Joas 'the king's son': only here. 27d is a marginal gloss from Mic 1:2. 30-31. 'cavalry': 'chariots'. 'to the Lord' is an explanatory addition. 'and the Lord helped him' etc. is not in Kg. 33. The arrow struck Achab 'between the breastplate and its appendages', prob. a leather protective covering hanging from the breastplate. 34. Achab 'remained propped up in his chariot'.

XIX 1-3 Jehu's Rebuke to Josaphat—Not in Kg. 11 2. Jehu: see 20:34; 3 Kg 16:1. It is not indicated kk 4-11 Religious and Legal Reform—Not in Kg. The legal reform was itself religious in that Israel was a theocratic state, and its law was enshrined with divine sanction in the sacred books. 5. Deut 16:18 ordered the appointment of judges in all the cities. David had already appointed judges, 1 Par 23:4, but the system required reorganizing and may have fallen partly into desuetude. 6. The law they had to administer was the law of God. And, therefore, 6d, 'he is with you in delivering judgement'. 10. This court at Jerusalem was to be a court of appeal to which cases would be sent from the provinces. It was to decide 'between blood and blood', i.e. in cases of homicide to adjudicate whether there was accident or guilt, Ex 21:12-23. And its functions were concerned with 'the law, the commandments, the statutes and the judgements', or legal decisions of the courts. Unwitting transgressions of the law had to be atoned for, Lev ch 4. 11. The court had two departments, the strictly religious and the civil, and the secular judges, 8, had the help of Levites as assessors, who would be experts in the law. The king ends with the prayer: 'May the Lord be with the good'.

ll XX 1-80 God grants Victory over Invaders—Not in Kg. 1. The Moabites and Ammonites were accompanied by Maonites, whose name seems to be preserved in El-Ma'an, SE. of Petra; see 10 and on 1 Par 4:41. 2. The Moabites were from E. of the Dead Sea and the Maonites from Edom (elsewhere also misread as Aram = Syria). Engaddi is the modern 'Ain Jidi on the W. coast of the Dead Sea. 3. Previous general fasts, Jg 20:26; 1 Kg 7:6. 5. As Josaphat stood in the midst of the people 'before the new court', the court in question would be that of the priests, 4:9, but unless some unrecorded renovation had taken place, it would hardly be called the new court. Some think that the Chronicler is using a term current in his own day. 7. God dispossessed the earlier inhabitants in favour of Israel. 9 recalls the answer given to Solomon's prayer, 6:24-35 and 7:12-16. 10. Deut 2:4, 9, 19. 11. 'Behold, they are requiting us by coming to cast us out'. 16. The gully would be dry in summer. Jeruel, only here, but part of the wilderness of Judah. 19. The sons of Core were also sons of Caath, 1 Par 6:22, but for some reason it was wished here to give them special prominence. They praised God 'with voices loud and strong'. 20. Tekoa: S. by E. of Bethlehem. 21. The singers were clad 'in holy attire', see on 1 Par 16:29. 22-23. No miracle is implied in the defeat of the invaders. They destroyed themselves. 'The Lord set an ambush against' the invaders, by inspiring Josaphat to do so. In the confusion that ensued in the early morning light the Moabites and Ammonites suspected the Edomites of treachery and the final result was mutual massacre. 24. 'When Judah came to a spot with a view towards the desert, they turned towards the host (of invaders) and saw their corpses lying on the ground without a survivor'. 25. 'they found cattle in abundance, baggage and garments'.

mm 31-XXI 1a Conclusion; Death of Josaphat—3 Kg 22:41-51a. 33. He did not abolish the high places where sacrifice was offered to God against the prescription of Deut 12 as he had those established for idolatrous worship, 17:6. The people were not fully loyal. 34. The chronicles of Jehu, 19:2, were incorporated into the book giving the history of the kings of Israel, the name standing for Judah as in 21:4, or for both the kingdoms together. The account in 35-37 of the proposed mercantile expedition to Ophir and Tarshish supplements and is supplemented by that in Kg. See on 9:21. The rebuke of the prophet Eliezer (otherwise unknown) explains Josaphat's refusal of further aid from Ochozias, Kg v. 50.

2-4 Slaughter of his brothers. Not in Kg. 3. Josaphat in putting his sons in command of fortified cities had followed the policy of Roboam, 11:23. In addition 287a to gold and silver he had given them rich presents of unspecified nature (DV 'pensions'). 4 suggests that so far from Joram's rule being accepted by all, his brothers aided by some of the leading men had conspired against him, and 13 indicates that their opposition was due to his idolatrous practices. 5-7. Summary of the reign=4 Kg 8:17-19. 8-10b Revolt of Edom and Libnah. 4 Kg 8:20-22. 9. The local name 'Seira' in Kg is a corruption of the phrase 'with his princes'. He took with him chariots. He was unable to crush the revolt, but though surrounded by the Edomites he managed to break through and escape. Kg adds that his men fled. 10c-20c. Not in Kg. 10c-11. His evil-doing. Idolatry was called fornication as Israel was considered to be the spouse of God. 12-15. Epistle from Elias. The order of the narrative in Kg might suggest that Elias had already been rapt into the skies, 4 Kg ch 2, but the Hebrew historians often do not follow the chronological sequence of events, and this passage shows that he was still working in the Northern Kingdom. Hence he communicates with Joram by letter. 16-17. Invasion of Judah. It is unlikely that the Ethiopians across the Red Sea would here be styled neighbours of the Arabs, and there were prob. Cushites in S. Arabia. His sons had promoted the worship of Baal, 24:7. Joachaz is another form of the name Ochozias, that of the next king, 22:1. 19. For the ceremonial fire, see on 16:14. 20a repeats 5. 20d. His burial. 4 Kg 8:24b. He was buried in the city of David, where his fathers were buried, Kg, but not in the royal sepulchres, Par.

XXII 1-9d Ochozias (Ahaziah) 841.

1-2 Introductory. 4 Kg 8:24b-26. The invasion in which his brothers were killed, 21:17. His father was 40 at the time of his death, 21:20, and Ochozias was twenty-two years old at his accession, Kg. Athalia was the daughter of Achab, 21:6, and the grand-daughter of Amri (Omri). 3-4. His wickedness. 4 Kg 8:27. 5-6. Expedition with Joram. 4 Kg 8:28 f. 7-9c. His death. 4 Kg 9:21-27. 7. He went out with Joram 'to meet Jehu'. 8. Ochozias may have had nephews old enough to be his pages, but perhaps LXX is right reading 'brothers', i.e. 'relatives of Ochozias'. 9. When Ochozias was brought to Jehu 'they [Jehu's men] killed him'. Par and Kg supplement each other, but the succinctness of the accounts does not permit certainty as to the course of events. Ochozias, seeing that Jehu had killed Joram, fled by way of Beth haggan (Jenin), pursued by Jehu, Kg. [Ochozias, however, succeeded in escaping], whereupon Jehu caused him to be searched for, and his men captured him in Samaria, where he was in hiding and brought him to Jehu, Par. (The verb may be conative. In this case, he never reached Samaria, as his attempt to take refuge there was frustrated.) Then Par's terse statement that they killed him is amplified in Kg. When Jehu saw him, he ordered his men to kill him in his chariot. They struck and wounded him at the ascent of Gur near Ibleam, but he managed to escape to Megiddo, where he died of his injuries. See also § 275i.

XXII 9e-XXIII 15 Athalia 841-835.

The memory of Athalia as a usurper who was not of Davidic descent was so hateful to the Chronicler that he contents himself with a bare mention of her six years' reign. Nothing is recorded of it except the bloody measure by which she secured the throne, 10, the means by which the future king was secured from her murderous purpose, 11-12, his eventual coronation, 23:1-11, and her ignominious death, 12-15.

9e-10 Athalia seizes the throne. 4 Kg 11:1. 'There was no one of the house of Ochozias strong enough to reign'. His brothers had been killed, 21:1; he himself died in his 23rd year (see on 21:2) and his offspring were children. In 10 omit 'for'. 11-12. Joas is saved.

287e 4 Kg 11:2 f. Par adds that Josabeth was married to the high-priest. This enabled the boy to be concealed in the priest's quarters in the temple; and the danger of discovery was the less that Athalia, as a worshipper of Baal, would not frequent the temple. 23:1-11. The conspiracy and coronation of Joas. 4 Kg 11:4-12. 2. The name 'Israel' is used of Judah as in 21:4. 3. God's promise to David, 2 Kg 7:16. 5. The priestly and Levitical courses, 1 Par chh 23-26, changed offices on the Sabbath. That day was suitable for the conspirators as larger numbers would not attract attention. The 1st division of Par corresponds to the 3rd of Kg, and the 2nd and 3rd to the 1st and 2nd of Kg. The 'foundation' gate is called 'the gate of Sur' in Kg, the similarity of the two names in Heb. being evidence of textual corruption. 11. The addition in Vg + DV 'and gave him the law to hold in his hand' is to explain that 'the testimony' is a name given to the law as God's witness of his holy will; so in Ps 18:8. 12-15. Death of Athalia. 4 Kg 11:13-16. 12. An attractive emendation of Goettsberger's reads: 'when Athalia heard the sound of the trumpets and the acclamations of the king'; see 13. 13. The king 'was standing by his pillar'; see on 4 Kg 11:14. 'at the entrance': 'as the manner was'; so in Kg. 14. Joiada 'gave orders to the captains in charge of the soldiery saying "Take her forth between the files and whoever follows her is to be slain with the sword"'. 15. 'they made way for her'; so LXX and Syr.

16-19. The covenant of Sinai renewed. 4 Kg 11:17-18. 20-21. Enthronement of Joas. 4 Kg 11:19 f. This will have taken place before the religious reforms of 16-19. The mention of Athalia's death is repeated from 15. XXIV 1-3 Introductory. 4 Kg 12:1-3. 3. Joadan, one of his wives, is mentioned in 25:1. 4-14. Repair of the temple. 4 Kg 12:4-16. The two accounts supplement each other on various points. 6. The contribution appointed by Moses, Ex 30:11-16 and 38:25. The negligence had been not merely in collecting the money but in applying it to the repairs. It had gone into the common temple treasury and been applied to the ordinary expenses, Kg 8 f. 8. The chest will have been placed on the outside of the gate leading into the inner court. The text in Kg, 9, which says the chest was placed 'by the altar' must be understood in a wide sense, since the people had no access to the court of the priests; but the words are prob. corrupt. 14. No money was spent on utensils for the temple while the work of repair was in progress, Kg 13, but when it was finished it was found that there was a considerable sum still in hand and this was used for the provision of precious vessels for use in divine worship. 15-16. Death of Joiada. Not in Kg. He lived to a very advanced age. If the figures are correctly transmitted, he must have been in his eighties when he married Josabeth, the daughter of Joram, 22:11, who died at the age of 40, 21:20; and consequently the marriage could not have taken place many years before. 'He had done good to Israel, for God and for his house', the temple. 17-22. Idolatry and consequent murder of Zacharias. Not in Kg. The religious reform after the death of Athalia had not been whole-hearted. 18. 'groves'; see on Deut 7:5. 21. If the Syrian invasion was already threatening, the king may have considered that the prophet's announcement that the people could not prosper after forsaking God, would discourage them. St Matthew, in possession of a more detailed tradition, knew that Zacharias was killed between the sanctuary and the altar, 23:35. As he calls him the son of Barachias, it may be that tradition had preserved his father's name and that Joiada, 20, was his grandfather. Par had, as Mt had not, every reason for mentioning his descent from Joiada, 22, and Joiada lived long enough to see several generations of descendants. 23-24. Invasion of Syrians. 4 Kg 12:17 f. They did not capture Jerusalem, as Joas bought them off with valuable treasure, Kg. Omit 'shameful'. 25-27. Death of Joas. 4 Kg 12:19-21. 25. The time-link with the invasion suggests that Joas' sickness was due to wounds. He was buried where his fathers were buried, Kg, in the city of David, Kg + Par, but not in the royal sepulchre, Par. 26. Zabab: Jozachar, Kg, perhaps rightly. 27. Further information was to be found 'written in the commentary of the book of the kings'. For the commentary or midrash see on 13:22.

1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 14:1-4. He did not abolish the high places, Kg, and later fell into idolatry, 14. 3-4. Punishment of his father's murderers. 4 Kg 14:5 f. They were his courtiers. 5-10. Preparations for war. Not in Kg. 7. A similar reprimand for partnership with idolatrous Israel, 20:35-37. 10. The anger of the hired Israelites will have been due in part to the loss of the expected booty. Their reprisals are related in 13. 11-12. War with Edom. 4 Kg 14:7. He cast his prisoners down from a mountain-peak in Sela, later named Petra 'the rose-red city half as old as time'. 13. Revenge of the Israelite mercenaries. Not in Kg. They took advantage of Amasias' absence during the Edomite campaign, and, starting from Samaria, made a raid against the cities of Judah as far as Bethhoron, a border town at this time belonging to Judah. 14-16. Amasias is reprimanded for idolatry. Not in Kg. 17-24. War with Israel. 4 Kg 14:8-14. 20. The mention of the gods of Edom refers to 14. 24. The house of Obadedom had retained the charge of the treasury since the time of David; see 1 Par 26:15 with note. Omit 'the sons of'. 25-28. Conclusion and death of Amasias. 4 Kg 14:17-20. 27. The remark that the conspiracy occurred after his idolatry (not in Kg) marks, not a temporal, but a moral connection between the two events.

XXVI 1-23 Ozias (Azarias) 768-740/739.

1-4 Introductory. 4 Kg 14:21-22; 15:2 f. 1. That the people made him king does not signify their choice of a younger in preference to an elder brother, but that the unpopularity incurred by his father on account of the foolish and ruinous war undertaken against Israel led to his deposition. Otherwise the remark in 2 that his reconquest of the Red Sea port of Ailath took place after his father's death would be meaningless. 4. He acted rightly as Amasias had done in the first part of his reign before he fell into idolatry. 5. His goodness not lasting. Not in Kg. Zacharias, who 'taught him the fear of God' or true religion, is otherwise unknown. 6-15. Military preparations and successful wars. Not in Kg. 6. Jabnia or Jabne was later called Jamnia, 1 Mac 4:15. 7. For the Maonites (Vg + DV 'Ammonites'), see on 1 Par 4:41. 7. Gurbaal is otherwise unknown. 9. The corner-gate, also 25:23, at the NW. of the city; the valley-gate, prob. at the SW. leading from the valley of Ge-hinnom. The third was by the angle, of uncertain location. Omit 'and the rest . . . wall'. 10. He had herds in the Shephelah, § 55a, and on the tableland, prob. that N. of the Arnon. He had also husbandmen and vine-dressers both in the mountains and in (more) fertile districts. 'Carmel' cannot here be the name of the mountain range which was in the territory of the Northern Kingdom; the word is also a common noun signifying land suitable for orchards and gardens; see David's possessions, 1 Par 27:26-31. 11. The census of the fighting men was in the hands of Jehiel and an official (the title occurs Jos 1:10 etc.) named Maasias, and the commanding officer was Hananias. 16-21. Usurpation of sacerdotal functions and chastisement. 4 Kg 15:5 records that God struck the king, but omits the reason. 16. He acted faithlessly towards God by disobeying his law, Num 16:1-40; 18:1-7; 1 Kg 2:28. 20. A leper was levitically unclean, Lev 13:11. 21. Lev 13:46 gives the law of isolation. 22-23. Conclusion. 4 Kg 15:6 f. Isaias'

k XXVII 1-9 Joatham 740/739-736/735.

1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 15:32-35b. The transgression of the people, Par, was prob. the frequenting of the illegitimate high places, Kg. 3-4. His buildings. 4 Kg 15:35c. Ophel: the southern projection of the hill on which stood the temple. 5-6. Successful war against the Ammonites; piety rewarded. Not in Kg. The Ammonites had paid tribute to Ozias, 26:8, but now again asserted their independence. The subjugation by Joatham was also temporary as tribute was paid for only three years. The Ammonites prob. took advantage of the Syro-Israelite invasion, 4 Kg 15:37. The measure or kor equalled about 11 bushels, HDB IV 912. 7-9. Conclusion. 4 Kg 15:36-38.

l XXVIII 1-27 Achaz 736/735-727.

1-4. Introductory; idolatry. 4 Kg 16:2-4. 1. Ezechias is said to have been 25 when he succeeded his father Achaz, 29:1. Either this number is corrupt, or Achaz must have been over 20 at his accession. According to the existing figures he died aged 36. 2. The Baalim (plur. of Baal) are the various divinities known as 'Lord' in their respective localities. 3. The valley of Bene-hinnom that is now called Wady er-Rababi S. and W. of Jerusalem. He 'burnt his sons according to the abominations of the nations whom the Lord dispossessed'. Elsewhere the consonants of the word 'burnt' are inverted, as here in Kg, to mean 'made to pass through' the fire. 5-7. Punishment by invasion. 4 Kg 16:5 f.; Is 7:1. 5. Rasin, king of Syria, took many captives. 8-15. Israel returns the captives. Not in Kg. 10. It was forbidden to make bondservants of fellow-Israelites, Lev 25:39-43. 15. Jericho belonged to the Northern Kingdom already in the time of Achab, 3 Kg 16:34. 16-21. Appeal to Tiglath-pileser for help. 4 Kg 16:7-9. 17. The Edomites, ruthless enemies of the Israelites, took many captives. 19. Achaz 'had acted wantonly in Judah and had acted faithlessly towards the Lord'. 21. Here again Par supposes knowledge of Kg. The statement that the appeal to the Assyrian availed him nothing is based on the long view that in the end Achaz was no better off for it. Kg records the immediate relief afforded by Tiglath-pileser's attack on Damascus in the years m 733-732. 22-25. Achaz gives himself entirely to idolatry. 4 Kg 16:10-18. The two accounts differ in their selection of material from the common source. 23. The gods of Damascus 'struck' Achaz. The sacred writer accommodates his words to the impious king's belief instead of saying 'whom he believed to strike him'. This resolve of the king's will have been formed before the conquest of Damascus by the Assyrian army. 24. The closing of the temple may have taken place some time after the innovations in worship recorded in Kg. The meaning, however, may be that the king prevented the access of the people to the temple lest they should insist on the worship of Yahweh, but carried on his own idolatrous worship within its precincts; see 29:3-5. 26-27. Conclusion. 4 Kg 16:19-20. Achaz was buried with his fathers in Jerusalem, Par, in the city of David, Kg, but not in the royal sepulchres, Par.

n XXIX 1-XXXII 33 Ezechias 727-698/697.

XXIX 1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 18:1-3. 3-19. The purification of the temple. Not in Kg. 3. Achaz had closed the temple, 28:24; it was reopened on 1st Nisan 726; see 17. Ezechias fastened plates of gold on the doors, 4 Kg 18:16. 4. The assembly was held in the open space on the east, no doubt within the temple. 5. The priests and Levites were to make sure that they were in a state of Levitical purity. Then they were to remove all the 'filth' of idolatry from the temple. 12. For the triple division of the Levites, see 1 Par 23:6. Mahath, 1 Par 6:35; Joel, 1 Par

6:36; Cis, 1 Par 6:44; Joah, 1 Par 6:20 f. 13-14. 237n Elisaphan; see on 1 Par 15:8. The triple division of the Levite musicians, 1 Par 25:1-6. 20-30. Inauguration of the renewed temple-worship. Not in Kg. 21. The he-goats were for sin-offerings, 23, the other victims for holocausts. They were offered for the royal house, for the ministers of the temple, and for the people. 22. For the sprinkling of the blood round about the altar, see Lev 1:5, 11. 23. Laying the hand on the victim, Lev 1:4; 4:4. 24. Again Israel stands for the Southern Kingdom, which Par considered the true Israel as ruled by the divinely appointed Davidic dynasty. 25. The regulation of David, 1 Par 23:5 f. Priests with trumpets; see on 1 Par 15:24. 27. The holocausts followed the sin-offerings, 23 f. 31-36. Further celebration of the reopening of the temple. Not in Kg. 31. The king said 'You have consecrated yourselves to the Lord'. After the long neglect of the temple the sacrifices offered had been equivalent to a re-consecration to God's services. To 'fill the hand' is a technical term for consecration. In holocausts, as in sin-offerings, no part of the victim was returned for the use of the offerer. So it was those of generous heart who offered holocausts. 33. The number of other victims was nearly ten times as large. On the sacrificial meal following peace-offerings, Lev 7:11-17. 34. The priests were inadequate in number, in part at least because comparatively few were in a state of Levitical cleanness 'for the Levites were more earnest in purifying themselves than the priests'. MT of Lev 1:6 with sing. verb assigns the task of flaying the victim to the offerer, but Sam., LXX (and Vg) to the priests. It would certainly expedite matters that the ceremonial act should be entrusted to men skilled by long practice. 35. Thus the temple services were re-established. 36. And all rejoiced 'that God had re-established it for the people, for it had been effected in a surprisingly short time'.

XXX 1-27 Solemn celebration of the Pasch. Not in p

Kg. 1 is an anticipatory statement explaining the theme of the chapter. 'Phase' (two syllables) is a name of the Passover derived from Heb. as 'Pasch' is from Aramaic. The date is in the 1st year of Ezechias' reign and the Northern Kingdom had not yet fallen to the Assyrians. That he was able to send his messengers north is explained by its weakness at this time. 2. The celebration of the Pasch in the 2nd month is an extension of the permission given Num 9:10 f. 6. Tiglath-pileser had carried many into captivity in 734, 4 Kg 15:29. 13. On the relation of the Pasch and the feast of unleavened bread, see § 113 f. 14. Jerusalem where the feast was to be celebrated was first purified by the destruction of idolatrous shrines; see 28:24. After the feast the good work was extended throughout the land, 31:1. 15. Priests and Levites were 'shamed' (DV 'at length') by the spontaneous zeal of the people into putting off their ceremonial uncleanness. 17. Normally it was the duty of the heads of families to kill the paschal victim, Ex 12:3-6. On this occasion the duty was undertaken by Levites 'for all who by reason of legal uncleanness could not make an offering to Yahweh'. 20. To such the Lord was merciful and did not punish, Lev 15:31; 26:14-16. 21. The Levites and the priests praised the Lord 'with all their strength'. 22. Thus 'they concluded [LXX] the seven days of the solemnity'. 25. The multitude comprised inhabitants of Judah, visitors from the northern tribes, and 'strangers of the land of Israel' who had settled in Judah, 15:9. 26. Since the division of the kingdom after Solomon no such festival attended by visitors from all Israel had been possible. 27. 'The priests the Levites' (so MT; all the priests were of the tribe of Levi) blessed the people. The liturgical blessing was a function reserved to the priesthood, Num 6:23-27. XXXI 1. Destruction of idolatrous shrines. 4 Kg 18:4. At the end of the Paschal festival by a spontaneous movement 'all the Israelites present went forth [from Jerusalem] to the cities of Judah', and destroyed the massêbôt and 287e 4 Kg 11:2 f. Par adds that Josabeth was married to the high-priest. This enabled the boy to be concealed in the priest's quarters in the temple; and the danger of discovery was the less that Athalia, as a worshipper of Baal, would not frequent the temple. 23:1-11. The conspiracy and coronation of Joas. 4 Kg 11:4-12. 2. The name 'Israel' is used of Judah as in 21:4. 3. God's promise to David, 2 Kg 7:16. 5. The priestly and Levitical courses, 1 Par chh 23-26, changed offices on the Sabbath. That day was suitable for the conspirators as larger numbers would not attract attention. The 1st division of Par corresponds to the 3rd of Kg, and the 2nd and 3rd to the 1st and 2nd of Kg. The 'foundation' gate is called 'the gate of Sur' in Kg, the similarity of the two names in Heb. being evidence of textual corruption. 11. The addition in Vg + DV 'and gave him the law to hold in his hand' is to explain that 'the testimony' is a name given to the law as God's witness of his holy will; so in Ps 18:8. 12-15. Death of Athalia. 4 Kg 11:13-16. 12. An attractive emendation of Goettsberger's reads: 'when Athalia heard the sound of the trumpets and the acclamations of the king'; see 13. 13. The king 'was standing by his pillar'; see on 4 Kg 11:14. 'at the entrance': 'as the manner was'; so in Kg. 14. Joiada 'gave orders to the captains in charge of the soldiery saying "Take her forth between the files and whoever follows her is to be slain with the sword"'. 15. 'they made way for her'; so LXX and Syr.

f XXIII. 16-XXIV 27 Joas 835-796.

16-19. The covenant of Sinai renewed. 4 Kg 11:17-18. 20-21. Enthronement of Joas. 4 Kg 11:19 f. This will have taken place before the religious reforms of 16-19. The mention of Athalia's death is repeated from 15. XXIV 1-3 Introductory. 4 Kg 12:1-3. 3. Joadan, one of his wives, is mentioned in 25:1. 4-14. Repair of the temple. 4 Kg 12:4-16. The two accounts supplement each other on various points. 6. The contribution appointed by Moses, Ex 30:11-16 and 38:25. The negligence had been not merely in collecting the money but in applying it to the repairs. It had gone into the common temple treasury and been applied to the ordinary expenses, Kg 8 f. 8. The chest will have been placed on the outside of the gate leading into the inner court. The text in Kg, 9, which says the chest was placed 'by the altar' must be understood in a wide sense, since the people had no access to the court of the priests; but the words are prob. corrupt. 14. No money was spent on utensils for the temple while the work of repair was in progress, Kg 13, but when it was finished it was found that there was a considerable sum still in hand and this was used for the provision of precious vessels for use in divine worship. 15-16. Death of Joiada. Not in Kg. He lived to a very advanced age. If the figures are correctly transmitted, he must have been in his eighties when he married Josabeth, the daughter of Joram, 22:11, who died at the age of 40, 21:20; and consequently the marriage could not have taken place many years before. 'He had done good to Israel, for God and for his house', the temple. 17-22. Idolatry and consequent murder of Zacharias. Not in Kg. The religious reform after the death of Athalia had not been whole-hearted. 18. 'groves'; see on Deut 7:5. 21. If the Syrian invasion was already threatening, the king may have considered that the prophet's announcement that the people could not prosper after forsaking God, would discourage them. St Matthew, in possession of a more detailed tradition, knew that Zacharias was killed between the sanctuary and the altar, 23:35. As he calls him the son of Barachias, it may be that tradition had preserved his father's name and that Joiada, 20, was his grandfather. Par had, as Mt had not, every reason for mentioning his descent from Joiada, 22, and Joiada lived long enough to see several generations of descendants. 23-24. Invasion of Syrians. 4 Kg 12:17 f. They did not capture Jerusalem, as Joas bought them off with valuable treasure, Kg. Omit 'shameful'. 25-27. 287g Death of Joas. 4 Kg 12:19-21. 25. The time-link with the invasion suggests that Joas' sickness was due to wounds. He was buried where his fathers were buried, Kg, in the city of David, Kg + Par, but not in the royal sepulchre, Par. 26. Zabab: Jozachar, Kg, perhaps rightly. 27. Further information was to be found 'written in the commentary of the book of the kings'. For the commentary or midrash see on 13:22.

1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 14:1-4. He did not abolish the high places, Kg, and later fell into idolatry, 14. 3-4. Punishment of his father's murderers. 4 Kg 14:5 f. They were his courtiers. 5-10. Preparations for war. Not in Kg. 7. A similar reprimand for partnership with idolatrous Israel, 20:35-37. 10. The anger of the hired Israelites will have been due in part to the loss of the expected booty. Their reprisals are related in 13. 11-12. War with Edom. 4 Kg 14:7. He cast his prisoners down from a mountain-peak in Sela, later named Petra 'the rose-red city half as old as time'. 13. Revenge of the Israelite mercenaries. Not in Kg. They took advantage of Amasias' absence during the Edomite campaign, and, starting from Samaria, made a raid against the cities of Judah as far as Bethhoron, a border town at this time belonging to Judah. 14-16. Amasias is reprimanded for idolatry. Not in Kg. 17-24. War with Israel. 4 Kg 14:8-14. 20. The mention of the gods of Edom refers to 14. 24. The house of Obbededom had retained the charge of the treasury since the time of David; see 1 Par 26:15 with note. Omit 'the sons of'. 25-28. Conclusion and death of Amasias. 4 Kg 14:17-20. 27. The remark that the conspiracy occurred after his idolatry (not in Kg) marks, not a temporal, but a moral connection between the two events.

1-4 Introductory. 4 Kg 14:21-22; 15:2 f. 1. That the people made him king does not signify their choice of a younger in preference to an elder brother, but that the unpopularity incurred by his father on account of the foolish and ruinous war undertaken against Israel led to his deposition. Otherwise the remark in 2 that his reconquest of the Red Sea port of Ailath took place after his father's death would be meaningless. 4. He acted rightly as Amasias had done in the first part of his reign before he fell into idolatry. 5. His goodness not lasting. Not in Kg. Zacharias, who 'taught him the fear of God' or true religion, is otherwise unknown. 6-15. Military preparations and successful wars. Not in Kg. 6. Jabnia or Jabne was later called Jamnia, 1 Mac 4:15. 7. For the Maonites (Vg + DV 'Ammonites'), see on 1 Par 4:41. 7. Gurbaal is otherwise unknown. 9. The corner-gate, also 25:23, at the NW. of the city; the valley-gate, prob. at the SW. leading from the valley of Ge-hinnom. The third was by the angle, of uncertain location. Omit 'and the rest . . . wall'. 10. He had herds in the Shephelah, § 55a, and on the tableland, prob. that N. of the Arnon. He had also husbandmen and vine-dressers both in the mountains and in (more) fertile districts. 'Carmel' cannot here be the name of the mountain range which was in the territory of the Northern Kingdom; the word is also a common noun signifying land suitable for orchards and gardens; see David's possessions, 1 Par 27:26-31. 11. The census of the fighting men was in the hands of Jehiel and an official (the title occurs Jos 1:10 etc.) named Maasias, and the commanding officer was Hananias. 16-21. Usurpation of sacerdotal functions and chastisement. 4 Kg 15:5 records that God struck the king, but omits the reason. 16. He acted faithlessly towards God by disobeying his law, Num 16:1-40; 18:1-7; 1 Kg 2:28. 20. A leper was levitically unclean, Lev 13:11. 21. Lev 13:46 gives the law of isolation. 22-23. Conclusion. 4 Kg 15:6 f. Isaias'

Ophel: the southern projection of the hill on which stood the temple. 5-6. Successful war against the Ammonites; piety rewarded. Not in Kg. The Ammonites had paid tribute to Ozias, 26:8, but now again asserted their independence. The subjugation by Joatham was also temporary as tribute was paid for only three years. The Ammonites prob. took advantage of the Syro-Israelite invasion, 4 Kg 15:37. The measure or kor equalled about 11 bushels, HDR IV 912. 7-9. Conclusion. 4 Kg 15:36-38.

1-4. Introductory; Idolatry. 4 Kg 16:2-4. 1. Ezechias is said to have been 25 when he succeeded his father Achaz, 29:1. Either this number is corrupt, or Achaz must have been over 20 at his accession. According to the existing figures he died aged 36. 2. Elsewhere the consonants of the word 'burnt' are inverted, as here in Kg, to mean 'made to pass through' the fire. 5-7. Punishment by invasion. 4 Kg 16:5 f.; Is 7:1. 5. Rasin, king of Syria, took many captives. 8-16. Israel returns the captives. Not in Kg. 10. It was forbidden to make bondservants of fellow-Israelites, Lev 25:39-43. 15. Jericho belonged to the Northern Kingdom already in the time of Achab, 3 Kg 16:34. 16-21. Appeal to Tiglath-pileser for help. 4 Kg 16:7-9. 17. The Edomites, ruthless enemies of the Israelites, took many captives. 19. Achaz 'had acted wantonly in Judah and had acted faithlessly towards the Lord'. 21. Here again Par supposes knowledge of Kg. The statement that the appeal to the Assyrian availed him nothing is based on the long view that in the end Achaz was no better off for it. Kg records the immediate relief afforded by Tiglath-pileser's attack on Damascus in the years 733-732. 22-25. Achaz gives himself entirely to idolatry. 4 Kg 16:10-18. The two accounts differ in their selection of material from the common source. 23. The gods of Damascus 'struck' Achaz. The sacred writer accommodates his words to the impious king's belief instead of saying 'whom he believed to strike him'. This resolve of the king's will have been formed before the conquest of Damascus by the Assyrian army. 24. The closing of the temple may have taken place some time after the innovations in worship recorded in Kg. The meaning, however, may be that the king prevented the access of the people to the temple lest they should insist on the worship of Yahweh, but carried on his own idolatrous worship within its precincts; see 29:3-5. 26-27. Conclusion. 4 Kg 16:19-20. Achaz was buried with his fathers in Jerusalem, Par, in the city of David, Kg, but not in the royal sepulchres, Par.

n XXIX 1-XXXII 33 Ezechias 727-698/697.

XXIX 1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 18:1-3. 3-19. The purification of the temple. Not in Kg. 3. Achaz had closed the temple, 28:24; it was reopened on 1st Nisan 726; see 17. Ezechias fastened plates of gold on the doors, 4 Kg 18:16. 4. The assembly was held in the open space on the east, no doubt within the temple. 5. The priests and Levites were to make sure that they were in a state of Levitical purity. Then they were to remove all the 'filth' of idolatry from the temple. 12. Inauguration of the renewed temple-worship. Not in Kg. 21. The he-goats were for sin-offerings, 23, the other victims for holocausts. They were offered for the royal house, for the ministers of the temple, and for the people. 22. For the sprinkling of the blood round about the altar, see Lev 1:5, 11. 23. Laying the hand on the victim, Lev 1:4; 4:4. 24. Again Israel stands for the Southern Kingdom, which Par considered the true Israel as ruled by the divinely appointed Davidic dynasty. 25. The regulation of David, 1 Par 23:5 f. Priests with trumpets; see on 1 Par 15:24. 27. The holocausts followed the sin-offerings, 23 f.

31-36. Further celebration of the reopening of the temple. Not in Kg. 31. The king said 'You have consecrated yourselves to the Lord'. After the long neglect of the temple the sacrifices offered had been equivalent to a re-consecration to God's services. To 'fill the hand' is a technical term for consecration. In holocausts, as in sin-offerings, no part of the victim was returned for the use of the offerer. So it was those of generous heart who offered holocausts. 33. The number of other victims was nearly ten times as large. On the sacrificial meal following peace-offerings, Lev 7:11-17. 34. The priests were inadequate in number, in part at least because comparatively few were in a state of Levitical cleanness 'for the Levites were more earnest in purifying themselves than the priests'. MT of Lev 1:6 with sing. verb assigns the task of flaying the victim to the offerer, but Sam., LXX (and Vg) to the priests. It would certainly expedite matters that the ceremonial act should be entrusted to men skilled by long practice. 35. Thus the temple services were re-established. 36. And all rejoiced 'that God had re-established it for the people, for it had been effected in a surprisingly short time'.

XXX 1-27 Solemn celebration of the Pasch. Not in Kg. 1 is an anticipatory statement explaining the theme of the chapter. 'Phase' (two syllables) is a name of the Passover derived from Heb. as 'Pasch' is from Aramaic. The date is in the 1st year of Ezechias' reign and the Northern Kingdom had not yet fallen to the Assyrians. That he was able to send his messengers north is explained by its weakness at this time. 2. The celebration of the Pasch in the 2nd month is an extension of the permission given Num 9:10 f. 6. Tiglath-pileser had carried many into captivity in 734, 4 Kg 15:29. 13. On the relation of the Pasch and the feast of unleavened bread, see § 113 f. 14. Jerusalem where the feast was to be celebrated was first purified by the destruction of idolatrous shrines; see 28:24. After the feast the good work was extended throughout the land, 31:1. 15. Priests and Levites were 'shamed' (DV 'at length') by the spontaneous zeal of the people into putting off their ceremonial uncleanness. 17. Normally it was the duty of the heads of families to kill the paschal victim, Ex 12:3-6. On this occasion the duty was undertaken by Levites 'for all who by reason of legal uncleanness could not make an offering to Yahweh'. 20. To such the Lord was merciful and did not punish, Lev 15:31; 26:14-16. 21. The Levites and the priests praised the Lord 'with all their strength'. 22. Thus 'they concluded [LXX] the seven days of the solemnity'. 25. The multitude comprised inhabitants of Judah, visitors from the northern tribes, and 'strangers of the land of Israel' who had settled in Judah, 15:9. 26. Since the division of the kingdom after Solomon no such festival attended by visitors from all Israel had been possible. 27. 'The priests the Levites' (so MT; all the priests were of the tribe of Levi) blessed the people. The liturgical blessing was a function reserved to the priesthood, Num 6:23-27. XXXI 1. Destruction of idolatrous shrines. 4 Kg 18:4. At the end of the Paschal festival by a spontaneous movement 'all the Israelites present went forth [from Jerusalem] to the cities of Judah', and destroyed the maṣṣēbôt and 287q the 'āšērim (DV 'idols', 'groves'); see § 213d. 2-3. The king's care for the temple worship. Not in Kg. The neglect of the days of Achaz will have rendered necessary a fresh assignment of duties to the members of the different courses. 4-19. Provision for the needs of priests and Levites. Not in Kg. 5. They offered 'the firstfruits of . . . honey and of all the products of the fields, and they brought the tithes of everything in abundance'. 7. The harvest began in the 3rd month and the fruits were gathered in the 7th. 10. 'firstfruits': 'offerings'. 14. It was Core's office to take charge of the free-will offerings 'and to distribute the offerings of the Lord and the most holy portions'. The title 'most holy' is used, e.g. of the priestly perquisites of sin-offerings and trespass-offerings, Lev 6:25; 7:1, 6. 16-19. The sequence of thought is not clear and seems to have been disturbed by the insertion of clauses regarding conditions for participating in the distributions. 16. 'provided they were registered among the males from three years old and upwards'. 17. 'This is the registration of the priests . . . and of the Levites'. 18. 'The registration comprised the whole family, their young ones, wives, sons, and daughters, because their office sanctified them to partake of the holy gifts'. 19. 'The priests, the sons of Aaron, in the pastures of their various cities had men appointed by name to distribute portions to all males among the priests and to all the Levites who were registered'. 20-21. Praise of Ezechias' religious zeal. Not in Kg.

s XXXII 1-22 Sennacherib invades Judah. 4 Kg 18:13-19:37; Is 36:1-37:38; Ecclus 48:19-24. 1. That the invasion occurred 'after these events and this manifestation of fidelity' to God prepares the reader for the providential deliverance. 2-8. Defensive measures. Not in Kg. 4. The brook that flowed in the open was fed by Gihon, now 'Ain Sitti Mariam, and ran originally down the Kidron valley. The immense labour of cutting the underground tunnel which later brought its waters within the city of David to the Pool of Siloam, 30, could not have been accomplished in the time allowed by war conditions. 5. Mello; see on 3 Kg 9:15. 6. The address was given in the open space near one of the city gates. 8. God's spiritual nature is vaguely indicated. 9-16. Sennacherib's officers call for surrender. 4 Kg 18:17-37. 12. The incidental and unexpected mention of Ezechias' efforts to put an end to sacrificial worship outside the temple shows conclusively that the law of the unity of the sanctuary, Deut 12, was not something new in the time of Josias. 17-20. The blasphemies of the Assyrian move Ezechias and Isaias to prayer. 4 Kg 18:28 ff.; 19:15-19. 17. The reception, but not the writing of this letter, is mentioned in 4 Kg 19:14. 21. Rout of the Assyrian army. 4 Kg 19:35-37. Peculiar to Par is the mention of the death of the officers. Unlike Kg, Par gives no estimate of the number of the slain. 22-23. Subsequent international fame of Ezechias. Not in Kg. 22. The Lord 'gave them rest on every side'. 24-31. Various supplementary information. 24. This very succinct account supposes in the reader a knowledge of 4 Kg 20:1-11, where 6 shows that, although Par mentions the king's sickness after the Assyrian invasion, in time it preceded it. 25-26 allude to the display of self-satisfaction and pride manifested 4 Kg 20:12-19, a passage which is rendered more intelligible by the mention of the king's humbling himself and the postponement of punishment. 27-29. The king's riches. Cf. 4 Kg 20:13. 28. He had 'stalls for many cattle and folds for flocks'. 29. 'And he acquired flocks' ('dārīm for 'ārīm 'cities'); but the word is prob. to be omitted as due to ditto-graphy. 30. See on 4 and 4 Kg 20:20. The king blocked up access to the spring from without the city, and from this higher level led the water underground to the Pool of Siloam. 31. 4 Kg 20:12-19; also 25-26 above. 32-33. Conclusion. 4 Kg 20:20 f. For the other acts and pious deeds of the king reference is first made to 'the vision of Isaias, the son of Amos', which without 'the prophet' is the title of the canonical book; see Is 36-39. MT and Syr by omitting the following 'and', which is found in LXX and Vg, imply that this section of Isaias as found embodied in a chronicle of the Israelite kings was used as source by Par, since without the copula only one source is named. But Par has information not to be found in Isaias. 33. Ezechias was buried 'in the ascent to' the royal sepulchres. He seems to have been honoured by a special sepulchre.

XXXIII 1-20 Manasses 698/697-643/642.

1-9. Introduction; Manasses' wickedness. 4 Kg 21:1-9. 3. Omit 'he turned and'. 'groves'; see on 19:3. 6. Par adds 'in the valley of Ben-hinnom'; see on 28:3. 7. 'The sculptured image he had made', which he set up in the temple, was of Ashera (Kg); see on 3 Kg 15:13. 10. Warning. 4 Kg 21:10-15. 11-18. Punishment and pardon. Not in Kg. 11. 'They seized Manasses in his hiding-place': the same word as in 1 Kg 13:6 (DV 'thickets'); see *L. Koehler TZ 5 (1949) 314. Omit 'chains and'. 12. In his tribulation 'he humbled himself exceedingly' before God. Manasses is known from the Assyrian inscriptions to have been a vassal of both Esarhaddon, 681-669, and of Ashurbanipal, 669-626; see Luckenbill II nos. 690, 876. His recorded tribute to the former was paid in 676/675, and the revolt prob. took place after this, followed by captivity at Babylon, of which city Shamash-shum-ukin, one of Esarhaddon's sons, was prince-regent. The return was prob. under Ashurbanipal, who is known to have restored conquered kings in the hope of securing their continued allegiance. 14-17. Fortifications; rejection of idols. Not in Kg. 14. The wall ran from the Fish Gate, prob. in the N. wall, along the W. slope of the Kidron valley down to the hill of Ophel at the SE. corner of the city. Gihon; see on 32:4. 15. 'the idol'; see on 7. 17. 'The people still sacrificed in the high places but only to the Lord'. The conversion of the king and people can have been neither deep-rooted nor long continued. Amon, 22, must have learnt his idolatry during his father's lifetime, and the final destruction of Jerusalem is attributed to the wickedness of Manasses' reign, 4 Kg 23:26, Jer 15:4. 18-20. Conclusion. 4 Kg 21:17-18. 18. The prayer of Manasses, which was recorded in the chronicles of the kings, has been lost. An apocryphal prayer is printed at the end of editions of Vg. 19. Hozai: perhaps not a proper name, but to be emended and read as 'his seers'. 'did penance': 'humbled himself'. 20. That Manasses was not buried with his fathers is thought by some to indicate his relapse into idolatry. On the other hand, that would not have displeased his idolatrous successor.

XXXIII 21-25 Amon 643/642-641/640.

21-25. Introduction; idolatry, conspiracy and death. 4 Kg 21:19-26, where mention is made further of the source for his reign and of his burial.

XXXIV 1-XXXV 27 Josias 641/640-609.

XXXIV 1-2. Introductory. 4 Kg 22:1 f. 3-7. Destruction of idolatrous shrines. Not in Kg, but with 4, 5 and 7 cf. respectively 4 Kg 23:6, 16, 19 f. Par is more exact chronologically in setting part of Josias' reforming activity before the finding of the book of the law in his 18th year of reign. The order of narrative in the Bible is frequently not the chronological order. 3. The beginning of the reform in Josias' 12th year may have been due to the influence of Jeremiah. The 13th year of Josias in which Jeremiah received his mission, Jer 1:2, reckoned by the pre-notation system would be the same as the 12th reckoned by the post-notation system; see § 124i. 'groves': see on 19:3. He destroyed 'the idols and molten images'. 4. He 'demolished the sun-pillars' set up as emblems of sun-worship. 6. These cities were nominally in the Assyrian province of Samaria, but the Assyrian empire was no longer able to exercise effective control so far 287x from the capital. In these northern cities too he y 'demolished all the sun-pillars', as in 4. 8-19. The finding of the book of the Law. 4 Kg 22:3-11. See also §§ 135*d*, 211*d*. 9. The 'Levite porters' gathered the money. 13. These scribes were those charged with the clerical work required by the extensive repairs. 18. He read passages before the king (lit.

 'read in it'). 20-28. God's answer through the prophetess. 4 Kg 22:12-20. 21. The king ordered the party to 'go and enquire of the Lord'. 22. They went to Olda (Huldah) who was living in the second quarter of Jerusalem; see on Soph 1:10. The mention of her being available on the spot perhaps indirectly explains by his absence why Jeremiah was not consulted. 24. Omit 'and'; the evils were those threatened in the curses. 28. The word 'now' is here consequential, not temporal. Josias died on the field of battle at Megiddo in 609, but the words of the prophetess had a restricted meaning. The king's peace was not to be disturbed by the final catastrophe of the destruction of Jerusalem. It is, however, a testimony to Par's fidelity to its sources that the passage has been reproduced without alteration to make it more obviously fit the king's end. 29-32.
 Renewal of the covenant. 4 Kg 23:1-3. 30. 'And the king read in their hearing all the words of the book of the covenant which had been found in the house of the Lord'. This was not the whole book of the Law that had been found. The king's purpose was to renew the covenant of Sinai, Ex 24:4-8. The suitable procedure was consequently to read 'the book of the covenant', which Moses had read when the people had first entered into the solemn pact with God, Ex 24:7. This suggests that the book found was the Pentateuch. The loss of the book was due to the idolatry that reigned even in the temple under kings like Amon, Manasses and Achaz. 33. Abolition of idolatry. 4 Kg 23:4-20, which in part belongs chronologically to the period before the finding of the book of the Law; see 2 Par 34:3-7. XXXV 1-19. Solemn celebration of the Pasch. 4 Kg 23:21-23. 1. Phase; see on 30:1. 3. He ordered 'the Levites, who instructed all Israel and were consecrated to the Lord' to 'put the holy ark in the temple'. The teaching office of the Levites, also 17:8*f*. The removal of the ark from the Holy of Holies has not been mentioned. Some think it was removed during the repairs to the temple fabric; others that the profanations of Josias' predecessors had not spared the most holy spot of all.
 Once the ark was restored to its proper place in the Debir, the Levites would not again have to carry it as they had done during the wanderings in the wilderness. 6. The Levites were ordered to kill the paschal victims; see on 30:17. 7. The lambs and kids, Ex 12:5, were to be killed as paschal victims (omit 'and of other small cattle'), the oxen as peace-offerings, Deut 16:2. 11. The sprinkling of the blood, also 30:16. 'The Levites flayed them'; see on 29:34.
 13. For this preparation of a sacrificial meal, see 1 Kg 2:13*f*. 15. The three leaders of the Levitical musicians (see 1 Par 25:1-6) are here called 'the king's seers'; see 29:30; 1 Par 25:5. 17. On the relation between the Pasch and the feast of unleavened bread, see § 113*f*. 18. See on 30:26. The Pasch of Josias was made the more solemn and memorable by the discovery of the book of the law. 20-24*e*. Death of Josias in battle. 4 Kg 23:29*f*. 20. In 609, the year of his accession, Necho marched to the Euphrates to fight against the Medes and Babylonians, Jos., Ant.
 10, 5, 1, who had practically destroyed the Assyrian empire, the capital having been lost in 612. Necho wished to secure at least Syria and Palestine for himself. Signs of the Egyptian occupation of Carchemish at this period have been discovered there. The Babylonians, however, under Nabuchodonosor put an end to the Asian dominion of Egypt in the expedition of 606-605. Josias, now free from the fear of Assyrian domination and misjudging the rising strength of Babylon, thought that the only danger to his independence lay with Egypt. 21. 'but to fight against another house': 'but to my war quarters'; see B. Alfrink, Bi 15 (1934) 173-9. Necho claimed to have received divine commands, probably from Ra, the sun-god and head of the Egyptian pantheon.

 22. The phrase 'the words of Necho from the mouth of God' do not imply that the Chronicler believed him actually to have received a divine revelation. In the nature of things, Josias could not be asked to take the word of a potential aggressor on such a question.
 God had promised to give his revelations to his own people by means of men of their own race, not through foreigners, Deut 18:18. Josias was under no obligation to believe the Pharaoh. Par does not blame him.
 He speaks here in the same spirit as in 28:23, where it is said that Achaz sacrificed to the gods of Damascus 'that struck him'. B. Alfrink, Bi 15 (1934) 180, suggests that just as the Egyptian Pharaoh was styled ilāni 'god' by vassal princes in the Amarna correspondence, so now Necho spoke of his Assyrian liegelord by the same title. Megiddo: in the great plain of Esdraelon, which Necho reached after following the coastal route from Egypt. 24. They moved him from his war-chariot into one more comfortable built for civilian use. 24*f*-25. Mourning for Josias. Not in Kg. These lamentations of Jeremiah for Josias have perished. It became a law or custom to sing these dirges every year on the anniversary of his death.
 'Behold, they are written in the Lamentations'. There used to be other collections besides that still extant.
26-27. Conclusion. 4 Kg 23:28. The source is indicated where might be found his other acts 'and good deeds'.

XXXVI 1-3 + 4*b* Joachaz 609.

The story is told rather more fully in 4 Kg 23:30*d*- 33 + 34*c-d*. Kg adds that he did evil before the Lord; misreads 'he deposed him', Par 3, as 'he bound him', Kg 33; adds that Joachaz died in Egypt. The deposition took place at Riblah on the Orontes, Kg 33. Par 3 reads lit. 'and the king of Egypt deposed him in Jerusalem' (paraphrased in Vg + DV), but a word has been omitted and the true text would be 'deposed him from reigning in Jerusalem'; see Kg 33.

XXXVI 4*a* + 5-8 Joakim 609-598.

Par adds to 4 Kg 23:34-24:5 the information of 6*b-7*. The text does not say that he was actually carried away to Babylon, but he 'bound him in chains to take him to Babylon'. In Kg this incident would come after 24:1*a*. Nabuchodonosor satisfied himself that he would be a loyal vassal if treated generously and reinstated him on the throne, but he again rebelled after three years. The Babylonian showed his magnanimity also in carrying away only part of the temple treasures. Further details are given in Dan 1:1-2.
 Jerusalem was besieged and Daniel with others was taken captive to Babylon. The date will have been not long before the 3rd year of Joakim ended with Tishri 606 in the 20th year of Nabopolassar. Nabuchodonosor was on his way to the invasion of Egypt from which he was recalled by the news of his father's death. See B. Alfrink, Bi 8 (1927) 395-408, who shows the fragile foundation on which rests the theory of a battle at Carchemish in 605.

XXXVI 9-10*b* Joachin 598.

Par is much more summary than 4 Kg 24:8-16.
 Joachin was eighteen when he began to reign, Kg, and was married, Kg 15. Par adds that his reign lasted 10 days over the 3 months. His deportation occurred at 'the return of the year', i.e. in the spring when kings went forth to war.

land should come when the people were scattered 287ee among the nations, Lev 26:33-35.

22-23 Decree of Cyrus permitting Return from Exile ff
—This passage is verbally the same as Esd 1:1-3b. A possible explanation of the double occurrence is that, when Esd-Neh was separated from Par, the passage was left at the end of Par as well as at the beginning of Esd to indicate that the books in fact belonged together. But see § 282m.

b Name and Place in the Canon—In the early Hebrew Bible Esd and Neh formed one book entitled 'The Book of Esdras' (cf. Jos. c. Ap., I, 8; Baba bathra, 15a; Melito Sard. in Euseb., Ecl. Hist. IV, 26; Origenes, ibid. VI, 25 and St Jerome, Ep. 53 ad Paulinum, n.7, PL 28, 1403). The Massoretcs considered the middle verse of 'The Book of Esdras' to be Neh 3:32. The division into two books is first found in a Heb. MS of 1448, and the modern Heb. Bibles refer to them as the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah. In LXX MSS they also formed one book with the title Esdras B and were placed immediately after the apocryphal book called Esd A. Origen, in the beginning of the 3rd cent., is the first to attest to a division in the LXX version; cf. Euseb., Ecl. Hist., 6, 25, PG 20, 581. In Vg they are known as 1 and 2 Esdras, though the title of the second book is 'L. Nehemiae, qui et Esdras secundus dicitur'. The second book we shall refer to as the book of Neh purely for the advantage of citations.

In HT the two books are found among the Kethubim or Hagiographa, immediately before 1 and 2 Par; in LXX and Vg they are placed among the historical writings after the books of Par.

c Contents and Division—Esd-Neh deal with the period from the return of the exiles after the Decree of Cyrus, 538 B.C., to the second mission of Neh in the 32nd year of Artaxerxes I, 433 B.C., but the history of this period is by no means complete. There are comparatively long periods of which nothing is related, 288c e.g. between 536 and 520; between 515 and 458, and between the first and second mission of Neh. The books actually deal with a few episodes, and may be divided into four parts:

Part I: The Return of the Jews under Sheshbazzar (Sassabasar: 538) and its immediate sequel (Esd 1: 1-6:22):

- The edict of Cyrus and return under Sheshbazzar with the sacred vessels belonging to the temple, 1:1-11.
- A list of the exiles who returned and of the cities they occupied, 2:1-70.
- The building of the altar of holocausts, 3:1-7.
- The laying of the foundations of the temple, 3:8-13.
- Opposition from the Samaritans until 520 B.C., 4:1-24.
- The completion of the temple under Zorobabel and Josue, 5:1-6:15.
- The dedication of the temple and the celebration of the Passover, 6:16-22.

Part II. The Return under Esdras (Esd 7:1-10:44):

- The return of the exiles, 7:1-8:36.
- The dissolution of mixed marriages, 9:1-10:44.

Part III. The Rebuilding of the Walls by Nehemias (Neh 1:1-7:73):

- In the 20th year of Artaxerxes I (445) Neh. asks permission to return to Jerusalem, 1:1-2:8.
- Neh. returns and inspects the walls by night, 2:9-20.
- The rebuilding of the walls under difficult conditions, 3:1-6:19.
- The appointment of watchmen, 7:1-3, and a census of the people, 7:4-73.

Part IV. Religious Reforms and Political Organization (8:1-13:31):

- The Renewal of the Covenant, 8:1-10:39.
- The population of Jerusalem is augmented; various lists, 11:1-12:26.
- The dedication of the walls, 12:27-42.
- Provision for the support of priests and Levites, 12:43-46.
- Neh. returns to Jerusalem a second time and corrects various abuses, 13:1-31.

Purpose—It is clear from the fragmentary character of the books that the aim of the writer was not to give a complete history of the period, but rather to describe the religious and political reorganization of the community after the Return. At the same time the author intends to show forth God's providence and faithfulness in the fulfilment of all that he had promised through his prophets (Esd 1:1).

Origin of the Books: their Literary Character, Date and Author—That the author made use of a variety of sources is evident. Some parts are in Hebrew, some in Aramaic; some parts use the first person, some the third; the style changes abruptly from one passage to another. The number of sources is uncertain, but the following can be detected without difficulty: (1) the Memoirs of Esdras, Esd 7:27-9:15; (2) the Memoirs of Nehemias, Neh 1:1-7:73; 12:27-13:31; (a) Aramaic documents, Esd 4:7 (8)-6:18 and 7:12-26. The 288e first contains the protest of Rehum to Artaxerxes I against the rebuilding of the walls, 4:7(8)-16; the king's reply, 4:18-22; the letter of Thathanai to Darius concerning the reconstruction of the temple, 5:7-17, and Darius' answer, 6:1-12; the dedication of the temple, 6:13-18. The second has the edict of Artaxerxes to Esdras, Esd 7:12-26; (4) Hebrew documents from the state archives: the decree of Cyrus, 1:2-4; the lists of those who first returned, Esd 2:1-70 = Neh 7:6-72; who returned with Esdras, Esd 8:1-14; who contracted mixed marriages, Esd 10:18-44; who helped in the building of the walls, Neh 3; who signed the covenant, Neh 10; who inhabited Jerusalem, etc., Neh 11:3-35, and who as priests or Levites returned with Zerobabel, 12:1-26. These are first-class sources that give to the books a character of historical credibility.

f Although the documents which compose the books of Esd and Neh are, in part, the work of these persons, our canonical books are later than both. The date of their compilation was probably during the period of Greek domination, i.e. in the latter part of the 4th cent. B.C.; for the list of high-priests (Neh 12:11) stops with Jeddoah, a contemporary of Darius (12:22), who was, according to Jos. (Ant. 11, 7, 2 and 8, 2 ff.) Darius III Codomannus (336-331). Other indications reinforce this conclusion. Esdras and Nehemias are spoken of as persons who have long since disappeared from the historical scene, Neh 12:26, 46. The frequent use of the expression 'the King of the Persians', Esd 1:1, 2, 8; 3:7; 4:3, 5, 7, 24; 7:1, insinuates that the Persians were no longer masters of Palestine. There are many Aramaisms as in the books of Par.

g It is very likely that the same person was the author or compiler of Esd, Neh and 1 and 2 Par. Many authorities maintain that these four books originally formed one work; for the last 3 vv of 2 Par are identical with the first 3 of Esd; there is the same predilection for statistical and genealogical lists; a common sympathy for liturgical matters, and a common use of the same Aramaic and late Hebrew languages.

h Text and Versions—Apart from the two Aramaic fragments, the books were written in Hebrew, but the language is shot through with Aramaisms. One also finds expressions of Persian origin. The Aramaic is that spoken in the 5th cent. B.C., as is evident from comparison with the Elephantine papyri written in the same language. The HT on the whole is in a poor state, especially in the genealogical lists the transcription of which is always subject to errors.

i In LXX there are two Greek Versions. These are the two texts, Esdras A and B. Esd B corresponds to the canonical Esd-Neh, while Esd A is the apocryphal 3 Esd to be found in the Vg Appendix. Consisting of 9 chh it is another version of the last 2 chh of 2 Par, of all of Esd (with the transposition of Esd 4:7-24 to the end of ch 2) and of Neh 8:1-12. It has proper to itself a long account of a literary contest between three pages of the court of Darius I, the third of whom, Zerobabel, was victorious and obtained from the king permission and help to bring back to Jerusalem his co-nationalists, the Jews, 3:1-5:6.

j According to some modern writers (Torrey, Howarth) 3 Esd is a fragment of the LXX version of the original Semitic text, while Esd B (i.e. the Greek version of our canonical books) is the version of Theodotion. Most scholars are, however, against this view. The book is rather due to a compiler who wished to describe the history of the temple and divine worship from the Passover of Josias to the full restoration at the time of Esdras, Neh 8; since, however, in this work Zerobabel played an important part, his story was adorned with the fable of the three youths (probably from an Aramaic original). 3 Esd seems to have been compiled before the LXX version, Esd B, was made. It was used by Josephus and was cited by not a few Fathers as inspired, but from the 5th cent. it was considered by all as apocryphal.

For the Syriac version cf. Walton, Biblia Polyglotta, Ldn. IV 1-29 and C. A. Howley, A critical examination of the Peshitto version of the book of Ezra, N.Y., 1922.

The Vg in general renders the HT faithfully enough. Historical Background—1. Israel in exile. The exiles, whose number is estimated at 60,000-80,000, were settled in various districts near Babylon, e.g. Tell Abib, Ez 3:15, Tell Charsa, Tell Melach, Esd 2:59, and Casiphia, Esd 8:17. In their new home they came to enjoy considerable freedom. Many continued to lead an agricultural life, others followed commercial pursuits and gradually acquired wealth, Esd 2; Zach 6:10 ff. Excavations at Nippur have unearthed ledgers of the Jewish banking family of 'Murashu and Sons', 450-400 B.C. The ancient position of the elders of the people seems to have been recognized by the Babylonians, Ez 8:1; 14:1; 20:1. They resisted religious apostasy, Ez 14:1-11, despite the temptation in the popular mind to feel that Yahweh was presumably showing himself less powerful than the Babylonian Marduk.

2. Israel in Judah. Of the life of those who remained in Judah (30,000-40,000) little is known. As a Babylonian province the land must have been placed under the charge of a governor. It is difficult to determine the boundaries, but the province was a small one from Bethel to Bethzur. Lam describes the distress of those left behind, and Jer 44, Ez 33:23-26 show that religious syncretism, idolatry and immorality increased, furthered, no doubt, by infiltration into the empty land from Moab, Ammon, and particularly from Edom.

3. The Return. The Jews owed their liberation to one of those recurring surprises which make the course of history, humanly speaking, unpredictable. Cyrus the Great (559-529), son of Cambyses of the Achaemenid family, was a member of a Persian tribe—the Pasagardae. The little kingdom of the Achaemenids, in the district of Susa, placed itself at the head of a coalition of Persian tribes. By 549 Ecbatana, the capital of the Median overlords, had fallen and Cyrus declared himself 'king of Persia'. The attention of the world was now focussed on this extraordinary individual in whom the prophets had already seen an anointed of the Lord who 'shall give the nations before him (Cyrus) and he shall rule over kings', Is 41:2; 44:28; 45:1. With the collapse of its Median partner, Babylonia took fright and its king Nabonidus (556-539) made league with Lydia and with Egypt. By 546 Sardis, the capital of Lydia, had fallen to Cyrus. He was then ready to strike at Babylonia, and in 539 he defeated the Chaldaean army and entered Babylon without opposition. In 525 Egypt was added to the Persian Empire by Cyrus' son Cambyses. Later repeated attempts were made to conquer Greece. One expedition sent by Darius I was defeated at Marathon, 490 B.C.; another, in 480, was led by Xerxes I who was defeated in the naval battle of Salamis. Unable to subdue Greece, the Persians nevertheless kept a firm hold over the interior of Asia for about two centuries.

Cyrus the Persian had none of the ruthlessness of Semitic conquerors. His faith (Zoroastrianism) and his political foresight made him broadminded, and he came to exiled Judah as a liberator rather than a conqueror. Within a short time of his occupation of Babylon, Cyrus issued the edict, Esd 1:2-4, which was to restore the fortunes of Israel.

The first group of returning exiles was led by Sheshbazzar who immediately laid the foundations for a new temple on the site of the one destroyed, Esd 5:16, but the Jews were unable to complete it because of opposition from hostile neighbours and it was not until 515 B.C. that Zerobabel as governor of the province with the help of the high-priest Josue and the encouragement of the prophets Aggeus and Zacharias finally finished the building.

During the reign of Artaxerxes I (465-424) two other groups of exiles returned. The first was led by Esdras 289f (458 B.C.) who brought with him a letter from the king authorizing him to take the leadership in the reform of the religious life of the community. In 445 B.C. another group returned under the leadership of Nehemias who had been made governor with permission to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem, Neh 1-6. The nation of Israel, dedicated to the Law, isolated from foreign influence, and localized about Jerusalem, is henceforth the people of Judah, or the 'Jews'.

For a list of the Persian kings, see § 125e.

Historical Value—Non-Catholic higher criticism in general acknowledges as historical the 'Memoirs' of Esdras and Nehemias, but does not place much faith in the other parts of the books. Some critics accuse the chronicler of having falsified the documents and even of having invented them with a tendentious motive. The more moderate reproach him with an ignorance of Persian history. The answer to these charges is given in the text; meanwhile, it may be noted: (1) that while the sacred writer wrote religious history, religious history is not to be equated with tendentious history; (2) archaeological discoveries confirm the picture of Cyrus drawn by the chronicler. They show him as a monarch very tolerant in religious matters, who allowed all deported people to return to their native lands, and who showed respect for their local sanctuaries, restoring, e.g., the temple of Marduk in Babylon; (3) the Elephantine papyri, discovered at the beginning of this century, confirm the historical framework of the books. From them we learn, e.g., that Samaria was the governor's seat, that his name was Sanballat who was in all likelihood the bitter enemy of Nehemias, Neh 2, etc.; that there was in Judah a twofold authority, civil and religious; that the high-priest of 408-407 was Johanan, Neh 12:11; (4) the activity of the returned exiles is confirmed by the prophetic books of Aggeus and Zacharias.

Critical Problems—1. The identity of, or distinction between, Sheshbazzar and Zorobabel: cf. § 290d. 2. The authenticity and original place in the narrative of the list of returned exiles, Esd 2 and Neh 7: cf. § 290f. 3. The laying of the foundations of the temple in the second year of the return, Esd 3:8, appears to conflict with the statements in the Aramaic document, Esd 5:2, and in Agg 2:1, which seem to imply that work on the temple was not begun until the second year of Darius, 520: cf. § 291d. 4. The passage Esd 4:6-23 appears to be misplaced. It deals with the reign of Xerxes I, Artaxerxes I and the rebuilding of the walls, while the context deals with the reign of Cyrus, Darius and the rebuilding of the temple: cf. § 291f-h. 5. The story of the reading of the Law in Neh 8-10 is considered by many to belong to the Esdras narrative. It interrupts the account of the peopling of the city and fills a gap in the story of Esdras: cf. §§ 294a, 297a-d.

Chronology—Who came first to Jerusalem, Esdras or Nehemias? Some scholars believe that the Artaxerxes of Esd is not Art. I (465-424), but Art. II (404-358); therefore the date of Esdras' arrival 'in the 7th year of Artaxerxes', Esd 7:7, is held to be 398 instead of 458, while Nehemias' arrival 'in the 20th year of Artaxerxes', Neh 2:1, is still dated at 445. The majority of those who defend this opinion also make Neh 8-10 a part of the Esdras narrative and consider that the mention of Nehemias in Neh 8:9 and 10:1 is a gloss added after those chapters were transposed to their present place in the Nehemias story. Van Hoonacker, however, believing that Neh 8-10 is in its proper place, holds that Esdras first came as a young man with Nehemias in 445, then returned 47 years later as head of the caravan described in Esd 7 ff.; cf. § 297a-d.

In the first place it is certain that Nehemias came to Jerusalem c. 445, for he is found there together with Eliashib, the high-priest, Neh 3:1, and Joiada his son, Neh 13:28; moreover his Samaritan contemporary was Sanballat, Neh 2:19, etc. Now from the Elephantine papyri (Sachau I) we know that the sons of Sanballat and Johanan, the son and successor of Joiada in the office of high-priest, were living in 408-407 B.C. This fixes decisively the activity of Nehemias during the reign of Art. I (465-424).

Objections to the view that Esdras came in 458, i.e. 13 years before Nehemias are:

(1) The condition of Jerusalem at the time of Nehemias' arrival cannot be reconciled with an earlier activity of Esdras; for (a) 'the people were few therein', Neh 7:4, whereas Esdras found 'a very great congregation' gathered together, Esd 10:1; (b) the walls were broken down, Neh 1:3; (c) influential Jews lived on intimate terms with non-Jews and mixed marriages were rife, Neh 6:17-19, a condition of things which precludes their previous dissolution by Esdras, Esd 9 ff.; (d) in Neh 1-6 there is no mention of any previous activity on the part of Esdras.

In reply it may be observed: (a) the question of population is relative; moreover, the congregation attracted by Esdras was not confined to Jerusalem, but came 'out of Israel', Esd 10:1; (b) the attack on Jerusalem recorded 'in the days of Art. I', Esd 4:7-23, was probably due to an attempt by Esdras to rebuild the walls and was the event which prompted Nehemias to go to Jerusalem in 445 (cf. Neh 1:3); (c) our knowledge of the result of Esdras' reformation is meagre; the book ends abruptly and it appears that his mission met with failure. No doubt every difficulty was put in his way over the question of mixed marriages and, while his drastic measures in this matter did not succeed, they would account for the opposition that Nehemias encountered from the very beginning (cf. infra, n); (d) the argument from silence in the OT is precarious; e.g. neither Aggeus nor Zacharias speak of each other although they were contemporaries; the same is true of Isaiah and Micheas, etc.; moreover, the work of Esdras was essentially religious, while that of Nehemias was chiefly political.

(2) On his arrival Esdras found the city walls rebuilt, Esd 9:9. But the word here translated 'wall' (gāḏēr) does not occur again in the whole of Esd-Neh though the wall is one of its chief topics. In fact the word means a 'low wall', e.g. the fence of vineyard, and is here, as in Ps 79:13, Is 5:5, used figuratively in the sense of 'protection'. Moreover it is 'a wall in Judah and Jerusalem' where the wall in the case of Judah must be figurative; hence Batten, 334, is forced to delete 'Judah' from the text, or read 'around' instead of 'and'.

(3) Esdras' reforms were more radical than those of Nehemias, for while Esdras dissolved all marriages with foreign wives, Nehemias merely required parents to take an oath not to allow their children to contract such unions. The work of Nehemias has, therefore, the appearance of being tentative and introductory to that of Esdras. Briefly it may be replied that the drastic reforms attempted by Esdras broke down and in their place Nehemias put a more reasonable scheme that aimed at prevention more than cure. 'Politica est ars possibilium'.

(4) At the time when Nehemias rebuilt the walls, Eliashib was high-priest, Neh 3:1; 13:4, but according to Esd 10:6, Esdras 'went into the chamber of Johanan' who was the son, Esd 10:6, i.e. the grandson, Neh 12:11, of Eliashib. Now we know from the Elephantine papyri that Johanan was high-priest in 407. Hence Esdras must have come to Jerusalem in 398, not 458. The objection may be met in several ways: (a) the Johanan of Esd 10:6 is not the same person as Johanan the high-priest of Neh 12:11; the former was a son, the latter a grandson of Eliashib; (b) Eliashib, Esd 10:6, is not Eliashib the high-priest of Neh 3:1, for whenever Eliashib the high-priest comes into this story the sacred writer is careful to mention that he is the high-priest, Neh 3:1, 20; 13:28. Perhaps Johanan was the son of the priest Eliashib who 288e first contains the protest of Rehum to Artaxerxes I against the rebuilding of the walls, 4:7(8)-16; the king's reply, 4:18-22; the letter of Thathanai to Darius concerning the reconstruction of the temple, 5:7-17, and Darius' answer, 6:1-12; the dedication of the temple, 6:13-18. The second has the edict of Artaxerxes to Esdras, Esd 7:12-26; (4) Hebrew documents from the state archives: the decree of Cyrus, 1:2-4; the lists of those who first returned, Esd 2:1-70 = Neh 7:6-72; who returned with Esdras, Esd 8:1-14; who contracted mixed marriages, Esd 10:18-44; who helped in the building of the walls, Neh 3; who signed the covenant, Neh 10; who inhabited Jerusalem, etc., Neh 11:3-35, and who as priests or Levites returned with Zerobabel, 12:1-26. These are first-class sources that give to the books a character of historical credibility.

f Although the documents which compose the books of Esd and Neh are, in part, the work of these persons, our canonical books are later than both. The date of their compilation was probably during the period of Greek domination, i.e. in the latter part of the 4th cent. B.C.; for the list of high-priests (Neh 12:11) stops with Jeddoah, a contemporary of Darius (12:22), who was, according to Jos. (Ant. 11, 7, 2 and 8, 2 ff.) Darius III Codomannus (336-331). Other indications reinforce this conclusion. Esdras and Nehemias are spoken of as persons who have long since disappeared from the historical scene, Neh 12:26, 46. The frequent use of the expression 'the King of the Persians', Esd 1:1, 2, 8; 3:7; 4:3, 5, 7, 24; 7:1, insinuates that the Persians were no longer masters of Palestine. There are many Aramaisms as in the books of Par.

g It is very likely that the same person was the author or compiler of Esd, Neh and 1 and 2 Par. Many authorities maintain that these four books originally formed one work; for the last 3 vv of 2 Par are identical with the first 3 of Esd; there is the same predilection for statistical and genealogical lists; a common sympathy for liturgical matters, and a common use of the same Aramaic and late Hebrew languages.

h Text and Versions—Apart from the two Aramaic fragments, the books were written in Hebrew, but the language is shot through with Aramaisms. One also finds expressions of Persian origin. The Aramaic is that spoken in the 5th cent. B.C., as is evident from comparison with the Elephantine papyri written in the same language. The HT on the whole is in a poor state, especially in the genealogical lists the transcription of which is always subject to errors.

i In LXX there are two Greek Versions. These are the two texts, Esdras A and B. Esd B corresponds to the canonical Esd-Neh, while Esd A is the apocryphal 3 Esd to be found in the Vg Appendix. Consisting of 9 chh it is another version of the last 2 chh of 2 Par, of all of Esd (with the transposition of Esd 4:7-24 to the end of ch 2) and of Neh 8:1-12. It has proper to itself a long account of a literary contest between three pages of the court of Darius I, the third of whom, Zerobabel, was victorious and obtained from the king permission and help to bring back to Jerusalem his co-nationalists, the Jews, 3:1-5:6.

j According to some modern writers (Torrey, Howarth) 3 Esd is a fragment of the LXX version of the original Semitic text, while Esd B (i.e. the Greek version of our canonical books) is the version of Theodotion. Most scholars are, however, against this view. The book is rather due to a compiler who wished to describe the history of the temple and divine worship from the Passover of Josias to the full restoration at the time of Esdras, Neh 8; since, however, in this work Zerobabel played an important part, his story was adorned with the fable of the three youths (probably from an Aramaic original). 3 Esd seems to have been compiled before the LXX version, Esd B, was made. It was used by Josephus and was cited by not a few Fathers as inspired, but from the 5th cent. it was considered by all as apocryphal.

For the Syriac version cf. Walton, Biblia Polyglotta, Ldn. IV 1-29 and C. A. Howley, A critical examination of the Peshitto version of the book of Ezra, N.Y., 1922.

The Vg in general renders the HT faithfully enough.

Historical Background—1. Israel in exile. The exiles, whose number is estimated at 60,000-80,000, were settled in various districts near Babylon, e.g. Tell Abib, Ez 3:15, Tell Charsa, Tell Melach, Esd 2:59, and Casiphia, Esd 8:17. In their new home they came to enjoy considerable freedom. Many continued to lead an agricultural life, others followed commercial pursuits and gradually acquired wealth, Esd 2; Zach 6:10 ff. Excavations at Nippur have unearthed ledgers of the Jewish banking family of 'Murashu and Sons', 450-400 B.C. The ancient position of the elders of the people seems to have been recognized by the Babylonians, Ez 8:1; 14:1; 20:1. h Critical Problems—1. The identity of, or distinction between, Sheshbazzar and Zorobabel: cf. § 290d. 2. The authenticity and original place in the narrative of the list of returned exiles, Esd 2 and Neh 7: cf. § 290f. 3. The laying of the foundations of the temple in the second year of the return, Esd 3:8, appears to conflict with the statements in the Aramaic document, Esd 5:2, and in Agg 2:1, which seem to imply that work on the temple was not begun until the second year of Darius, 520: cf. § 291d. 4. It interrupts the account of the peopling of the city and fills a gap in the story of Esdras: cf. §§ 294a, 297a-d.

i Chronology—Who came first to Jerusalem, Esdras or Nehemias? Some scholars believe that the Artaxerxes of Esd is not Art. I (465-424), but Art. II (404-358); therefore the date of Esdras' arrival 'in the 7th year of Artaxerxes', Esd 7:7, is held to be 398 instead of 458, while Nehemias' arrival 'in the 20th year of Artaxerxes', Neh 2:1, is still dated at 445. The majority of those who defend this opinion also make Neh 8-10 a part of the Esdras narrative and consider that the mention of Nehemias in Neh 8:9 and 10:1 is a gloss added after those chapters were transposed to their present place in the Nehemias story. j In the first place it is certain that Nehemias came to Jerusalem c 445, for he is found there together with Eliasib, the high-priest, Neh 3:1, and Joiada his son, Neh 13:28; moreover his Samaritan contemporary was Sanballat, Neh 2:19, etc. Now from the Elephantine papyri (Sachau I) we know that the sons of Sanballat and Johanan, the son and successor of Joiada in the office of high-priest, were living in 408-407 B.C. This fixes decisively the activity of Nehemias during the reign of Art. I (465-424).

Objections to the view that Esdras came in 458, i.e. 13 years before Nehemias are:

(1) The condition of Jerusalem at the time of Nehemias' arrival cannot be reconciled with an earlier activity of Esdras; for (a) 'the people were few therein', Neh 7:4, whereas Esdras found 'a very great congregation' gathered together, Esd 10:1; (b) the walls were broken down, Neh 1:3; (c) influential Jews lived on intimate terms with non-Jews and mixed marriages were rife, Neh 6:17-19, a condition of things which precludes their previous dissolution by Esdras, Esd 9 ff.; (d) in Neh 1-6 there is no mention of any previous activity on the part of Esdras.

In reply it may be observed: (a) the question of population is relative; moreover, the congregation attracted by Esdras was not confined to Jerusalem, but came 'out of Israel', Esd 10:1; (b) the attack on Jerusalem recorded 'in the days of Art. I', Esd 4:7-23, was probably due to an attempt by Esdras to rebuild the walls and was the event which prompted Nehemias to go to Jerusalem in 445 (cf. Neh 1:3); (c) our knowledge of the result of Esdras' reformation is meagre; the book ends abruptly and it appears that his mission met with failure. No doubt every difficulty was put in his way over the question of mixed marriages and, while his drastic measures in this matter did not succeed, they would account for the opposition that Nehemias encountered from the very beginning (cf. infra, n); (d) the argument from silence in the OT is precarious; e.g. neither Aggeus nor Zacharias speak of each other although they were contemporaries; the same is true of Isaias and Micheas, etc.; moreover, the work of Esdras was essentially religious, while that of Nehemias was chiefly political.

(2) On his arrival Esdras found the city walls rebuilt, Esd 9:9. But the word here translated 'wall' (gāḏīr) does not occur again in the whole of Esd-Neh though the wall is one of its chief topics. In fact the word means a 'low wall', e.g. the fence of vineyard, and is here, as in Ps 79:13, Is 5:5, used figuratively in the sense of 'protection'. Moreover it is 'a wall in Judah and Jerusalem' where the wall in the case of Judah must be figurative; hence Batten, 334, is forced to delete 'Judah' from the text, or read 'around' instead of 'and'.

(4) At the time when Nehemias rebuilt the walls, Eliasib was high-priest, Neh 3:1; 13:4, but according to Esd 10:6, Esdras 'went into the chamber of Johanan' who was the son, Esd 10:6, i.e. the grandson, Neh 12:11, of Eliasib. Now we know from the Elephantine papyri that Johanan was high-priest in 407. Hence Esdras must have come to Jerusalem in 398, not 458. The objection may be met in several ways: (a) the Johanan of Esd 10:6 is not the same person as Johanan the high-priest of Neh 12:11; the former was a son, the latter a grandson of Eliasib; (b) Eliasib, Esd 10:6, is not Eliasib the high-priest of Neh 3:1, for whenever Eliasib the high-priest comes into this story the sacred writer is careful to mention that he is the high-priest, Neh 3:1, 20; 13:28. Perhaps Johanan was the son of the priest Eliasib who 2890 was prefect of the treasury, Neh 13:4; (c) the words 'the chamber of Johanan son of Eliasib' refer to the high-priest's son, but are used proleptically, i.e. the writer gives to the room the name by which it was known in his own day. The last solution is the most likely one.

p According to Van Hoonacker confusion arose owing to the fact that there were two kings with the name of Artaxerxes. Nehemias came in the 20th year of Art. I, while Esdras came in the 7th year of Art. II. A reader, assuming that the references were to the same Art., and considering that an event which took place in the 7th year should precede one which happened in the 20th year, made the transposition which we find in our present text. But it is unlikely that any reader would deal so drastically with the text, and, if he did, it is very unlikely that it would have been accepted by others without question.

q There is then no valid reason for abandoning the traditional chronology, and today there is a marked reaction in its favour; cf. ET 58 (1947) 263. In any event, to hold that the sacred writer erroneously believed that Esdras preceded Nehemias is incompatible with the fundamental principles of inspiration.

r The Significance of Esd-Neh—With the return from exile there began a new phase in the history of Israel. It was no more an independent nation, but a Persian province. From the political standpoint all was lost. One thing alone remained, its religious patrimony. Israel was still the Chosen People. The repatriates were still that 'remnant' out of which would rise the new and glorious Israel. The old Israel had been destroyed because it had forsaken Yahweh; the new Israel must therefore rededicate itself to him. At the same time the purity and exclusiveness of its religion would preserve its national life. Hence the Jews were to be separated from the pagan influences about them. This was effected by Esdras and Nehemias. Esdras belonged to the class of 'scribes' (sopherim) which had worked so assiduously on the literary legacy of Israel, the only consolation of the faithful in exile. This was the inspired Torah (Law) or Pentateuch, Neh 8:1, 2, 18; 9:3, 13-14, 29, 34, which Esdras brought with him to Jerusalem, Esd 7, where it was publicly read and proclaimed as the charter of post-exilic Israel. The wall which Nehemias built around the city was a symbol of his work for the racial and, therefore, religious purity of his people. Both fought unceasingly against marriage with non-Israelites.

s From this time on, the influence of the priesthood so grew that when, for a period under the Maccabees, the Jews won their political liberty, both spiritual and temporal power were in its hands. The Mosaic institutions, too, received several additions: (1) the 'scribes', many of them laymen, devoted to the study and explanation of the Law; (2) the Sanhedrin or council of elders, which during the Greek domination was the chief administrative authority in matters both spiritual and temporal; (3) the synagogue. Thus arose Judaism with its advantages and defects, which, in the fullness of time, its mission completed, was to give place to the universalism of Christ.

t Canonlicity—The books of Esd-Neh are not quoted either in the OT or the NT. The passage about Nehemias in 2 Mac 1:18-2:13 is drawn from another source. But Jewish tradition has always inscribed them among the canonical writings and, apart from some hesitation on the part of the Antiochian school, Christian tradition sanctioned this verdict. The Council of Trent has defined them as canonical.

ESDRAS

290a Section I: Esd I-VI: The Return of the Jewish Exiles to Jerusalem: the Re-establishment of Worship and Rebuilding of the Temple.

1 The Edict of Cyrus—The book begins with the last words of 2 Par, vv 1, 2, 3a occurring in 2 Par 36:22, 23. Very likely 1 and 2 Par, Esd and Neh originally constituted one work, but subsequently the arrangement in MT was altered to Esd, Neh, 1 and 2 Par in order to complete the history narrated in 4 Kg by an account of the Return from Captivity. The opening verses of Esd were then made to serve as the conclusion of 2 Par. 'first year': i.e. of Cyrus' reign over the conquered Babylonian empire (538 B.C.). As king of Persia (Anshan) he had ruled since 559; cf. 5:13 and §289c. 'Cyrus': Accadian, Kurush; in MT Kōreš. 'the word of the Lord': cf. Jer 25:12; 29:10 where the period of captivity was predicted as 70 years. Its actual duration from the Fall of Jerusalem in 586 was about 50 years but the first deportation seems to have taken place in 606, the third year of the reign of Joakim, king of Judah (608-596); cf. Dan 1:1; 4 Kg 24:1; 2 Par 36:6; Jos. Ant. 10, 11; c. Ap. 1:19. This would give almost 70 years; cf. Bi 8 (1927) 408. The sacred writer makes clear that the religious purpose of the book is to demonstrate the fulfilment of prophecy; cf. Jer 29:10-14; Is 44:28; 45:1-4, 'the Lord stirred up . . . Cyrus'; cf. Is 45:1 where Cyrus is styled 'Yahweh's anointed'. He was the instrument chosen for the fulfilment of the divine plan. 'proclamation': the Cyrus cylinder in the Brit. Museum shows that Cyrus gave similar permission to all subject and deported peoples. The announcement would be in a special form (and language) for promulgation to each separate group. The writer gives the particular form in which it was announced to the Jewish people. This was not the decree cited 6:2 ff. but the 'proclamation' by which heralds made that decree known. 'in writing'; cf. 6:2 ff.

2-4 The Proclamation—2. 'the Lord God of Heaven hath given me': 'the Lord' represents, as always, the divine name 'Yahweh'. Although not a monotheist, Cyrus had great regard for the religious beliefs of his subjects, and claimed the patronage of each local divinity; e.g. his capture of Babylon is ascribed to the favour of Marduk. So here his success is attributed to Yahweh. 3. If the permission to rebuild the temple was an act of political insight, it was also a fulfilment of the divine plan for the restoration of Israel. 'Whosoever there is among you of all his people, his God [i.e. Yahweh] be with him'. The words are a common form of greeting. 'among you': all the subjects of the Persian empire. 'of all his people': the proclamation has in view the Jews of the Southern Kingdom who had been deported by Nabuchodonosor. It is not likely that Cyrus would have known of the deportation of the Northern Kingdom to Assyria in 721 B.C. 'All the rest', etc.: 'whosoever is left'; in any place where the survivors of the Jewish captivity are to be found, let the people of that place, apparently non-Israelites (6) as well as those Jews who would not wish to return themselves, render him all assistance. 4. 'besides . . . freely': gifts of money, etc., towards the expenses of rebuilding the temple.

5-11 The Return of the Jews—5. The Effect. 'chief of the fathers': elliptical for 'the heads of the families or clans'. 'and every one': 'even all', etc., implying that many did not avail themselves of the opportunity of returning. The lot of many of the exiles was not unhappy. 6. 'all they that were round about': their pagan neighbours and those Jews who preferred to remain. 'helped their hands': furnished them with whatever was necessary for their return and settlement in the fatherland. 'furniture': 'precious things'. 'besides . . . accord': the free-will offerings for the temple (cf. 4). The other gifts were personal to the travellers.

7-8. Cyrus restores the vessels taken from the Temple. 7. 'vessels': Cyrus was sending back to the various cities of Babylon the deities, i.e. statues of idols, carried off by his predecessor Nabonidus to Babylon, and rebuilding temples for them where necessary. The God of the Jews had no image that could be returned, but his temple could be rebuilt and some of its furniture restored. 'Nabuchodonosor had taken'; cf. 4 Kg 24:13; 25:13-17. 8. 'Mitledath'—'dedicated to 290d Mithra' the Persian god. 'the son of Gazabar': 'the treasurer', Persian 'gangewar'. 'Sassabasar': Sheshbazzar (Shamash-abu-urur 'Shamash, protect the father' [?]). His identity is puzzling, as he is named only here and in 5:14, 15, whereas throughout the rest of this section Zorobabel appears as the leader. Some scholars think that Sheshbazzar and Zorobabel are two names for the same individual. In favour of this view are the facts that (a) the foundation of the temple is ascribed to both, 3:8; 5:16; (b) Sheshbazzar is a 'prince (nāš)' of Judah, and Zorobabel is of the Davidic line, 1 Par 3:18; (c) the title of governor (pehāh) is given to both, 5:11 and Agg 1:1. Yet (a) it is strange to find the same person, a Jew, called by two Babylonian names; (b) in Esd 5:14 f., the Persian Satrap quotes the statement of the Jewish leaders, Zorobabel and Josue, who seem to refer to Sheshbazzar as a different individual. More probably then, Sheshbazzar was the predecessor of Zorobabel. Some identify him with Shenassar, the uncle of Zorobabel, 1 Par 3:18, but the evidence is not convincing. It is more likely that he was a Persian official.

9-11. The number of the vessels. 9. 'knives': probably 'censers' or 'liturgical knives' (Zorell); Torrey suggests 'snuffers'. 10. 'second sort': of inferior quality or for inferior purposes; the Heb. word, however, seems to be a corruption of the numeral 'two thousand'; read with 3 Esd 2:13, 'Silver cups 2410'. 11. 'five thousand and four hundred': the vessels enumerated make up only 2,499. 3 Esd has '1000 bowls of gold' and '2410 silver cups', giving a total of 5,469. Either MT is corrupt or only the larger vessels are enumerated and the full number was made up of smaller utensils.

II 1-70 The Register of the Jews who returned—The list is repeated in Neh 7:6-73 and 3 Esd 5:7-45 with some differences in names and numbers due to the mistakes of copyists. Its original place is disputed. It certainly existed in the Memoirs of Neh, but whether the author of Esd took it over from this source or from the archives of Jerusalem, is difficult to decide. In any event, it is not, as some critics contend, a list of inhabitants at the time of Esd and Neh (after 458 B.C.). The Tirshatha (governor) in 63 is Sheshbazzar. The title (1), the mention of Babylonian localities from which certain families came (59), the need of establishing one's genealogy (62 f.), the numbering of the singing men and women (65) and the mention of transport animals only (66 f.), are all undesigned confirmations that the document was composed shortly after the Return.

1-2a Introduction. 1. 'children of the province': the Jews inhabiting the Persian subprovince of Judaea, the district of which Jerusalem was the centre and of which Zorobabel was governor after Sheshbazzar. 'returned': the return was chiefly a migration to the land of their fathers by Jews born in Babylonia. The majority of Nabuchodonosor's deportees would have died during the intervening years. 'every man to his city': to the city to which his clan belonged, in so far as this was practicable. The Persian province of Judaea was smaller in area than the kingdom of 50 years before. Zorobabel: the name means 'seed of Babel'. The descendant of Jehonias (Jehoiachin), he was of royal blood; cf. 1:8 and 3:2. Josue (MT Yēšua') was the high-priest of the Return, Agg 1:1-12; Zach 3:1, the son of Josedec and grandson of the high-priest Seraias whom Nabuchodonosor put to death at Riblah (Reblatha) after the destruction of Jerusalem; cf. 1 Par 6:1-15; 4 Kg 25:18-21. 'Nehemia': not to be confused with Nehemias, the son of Helchias, Neh 1:1. The names number 11, but the list in Neh 7:7 has 12, naming also, after Raheleia, a certain Nahamani, omitted here by an error in transcription. They are probably intended to be symbolic of the 12 tribes of Israel.

2b-19. A list of 'the men of Israel', the laity as distinct from the priests and Levites. The names are those of families or clans. 3. Pharos (Parosh) is a strange proper name meaning a 'flea'. Though a 'new' family it is placed first in all the lists. 6. 'Phathiath Moab': 'governor of Moab'. Probably the founder of this family had exercised rule over some portion of Moab; cf. 1 Par 4:22. 'Josua: Joab': Jeshua (and) Joab were special branches of the main family, otherwise unknown. 14. Beguai (Biguai): this family seems to have adopted a Persian name. 16. 'of Ather who were of Ezechias': the descendants of Ather through the branch of Ezechias.

20-35. Another list according to localities (except 1 30-32) which are all within a radius of 25 m. from Jerusalem. MT has 'sons of' (Bethlehem, etc.), but in Heb. 'son' has a much wider sense than in English. The numbers are much smaller than those of the families in 3-19. 20. Gebbar: Neh 7:25 has 'Gabaon, a well-known city (cf. Jos 9; 3 Kg 3:4, etc.)'. 22. Netupha: probably Beit Netuf, 20 m. W. of Bethlehem, a Levitical city, 1 Par 9:16. 23. Anathoth: the home of Jeremias, Jer 1:1. 24. Azmaveth, elsewhere called Beth-Azmot (LXX and Neh 7:28), is thought to be the modern el-Hizma, 5 m. N. of Jerusalem, 2 m. from Anathoth. 29. Nebo: identified by some with Nob in Judaea (Is 10:32); by others with the modern Nuba near Qeila, S. of Jerusalem. 30-32. Megbis (Magbish) does not occur in the parallel lists; 'the other Elam' (in contrast to 7) and Harim are names of peoples, not of towns. 35. Senaa was, from the number of its inhabitants, an important city. It was identified by Eusebius and Jerome with Magdalsenna ('tower of Senna'), about 5 m. N. of Jericho. Today there remain only a few ruins.

36-39. Of the four priestly houses mentioned here, one, Peshur (Pashur) is not among the 24 enumerated in 1 Par 24:7-18; it was probably a branch of the house of Melchiah (cf. 1 Par 9:12; 24:9; Neh 10:3).

40-42. The families of the Levites. These include the Levites proper, 1 Par 24:20-31, the singers, 1 Par 25:1-7, 9-31, and the doorkeepers, 1 Par 26:1-19. The number of Levites (74) is surprisingly small. 40. 'the sons of Josue, of Kadmiel, of Binnui, of Hodaviah', reading binnui for b'ne with Neh 12:8 and 3 Esd.

43-54. 'The Nathinites': Nethinim. The name means 'given' to the temple service; cf. 1 Par 9:2. They formed a distinct class and assisted the Levites in the discharge of the more menial tasks, and were originally captives of war, Jos 9:23; on the return from exile they were reckoned as members of the Israelite community, Neh 10:29. 50. Munim (Me'unim), inhabitants of Maon, were an Arab people subjugated by Ozias, king of Judah, 2 Par 26:7. Nephusim (Nephisim): an Ishmaelite tribe, Gen 25:15; hence also Arab (cf. 1 Par 5:18-22).

59-63. Israelites and priests of uncertain origin.

59. Thelmela, etc.: localities in Babylonia. 61. Barzillai, the Galaadite, benefactor and then favourite of David, 2 Kg 17:27. His estates were inherited by his daughters, one of whom was married to a priest who thereupon received the family name; hence, probably, the difficulty about his genealogy. 62 bears witness to the care taken of family registers and to the importance attached to the genealogical lists in the sacred writings. 63. Athersatha: Tirshatha, Persian tarshata, 'he who is feared', is here applied to Sheshbazzar. It is roughly equivalent to 'His Excellency'. 'holy of holies': 'holy things', the priest's portion of the sacrificial meat, Lev 7:31-34. 'learned and perfect': 'with Urim and Thummim'; cf. Ex 28:30. Probably at the time of Esdras the stones (?) were lost together with the high-priest's apparel.

64-67 A Summary—The total of the returned exiles (42,360) agrees with that given in Neh 7:66 and 3 Esd 5:41. The items, however, in all three lists fail to produce the sum, Esd 29, 818; Neh 31,089; 280n 3 Esd 30,143). Perhaps the 12,000 persons unaccounted for were the women (only the more wealthy would be accompanied by their wives), or Israelite elements of the old kingdom of Samaria who, during the exile, came into contact with the deportees from Judaea. It is not necessary to conclude that there were 42,360 in the first caravan. The list, probably compiled about 520 B.C., includes all those who returned at various times up to that date, considering them as parts of one migration. Neh 7:5 testifies to the authenticity of the list.

o 65. 'singing men . . . women': not the temple singers of 41, but those employed to sing at feasts and funerals, etc., 2 Sam 19:35; Eccl 2:7. Evidently there were several wealthy Jews in the caravan. Some commentators liken the singers to camp-followers (cf. Ex 12:30; Num 11:4).

66-67. The animals enumerated are beasts of burden, an argument for the contemporaneity of the list with the migration. The horses and mules would be ridden by the wealthier, the asses by the poorer classes. The camels and asses would carry the baggage.

p 68-69. The gifts for the construction of the temple. 68. 'chief of the fathers'; cf. 1:5. 69. 'solids': dark'mōntim, probably not the Persian daric (cf. 8:27, darkōntim), but the drachma, itself of foreign origin (BDB, 204). If we accept the drachma instead of the daric, the total sum given is about $300,000; or taking the daric, about $450,000; cf. §83d-f. The daric was worth about 5 dollars; a 'pound' (maneh) of silver about 30 dollars. Neh 7:10 ff. breaks these totals down into contributions from 'His Excellency', from the chiefs of the clans, and from the people.

70. The verse sums up the whole list. 'So the priests, the Levites, the singers, the porters and, of the laymen, the Nethinim were dwelling in their cities and (so) all Israel in their cities.' Cf. Neh 7, 73 and 3 Esd 5, 46.

291a III 1-13 The Renewal of Worship and the Beginning of the New Temple.

1-3 The Building of the Altar—1. 'the seventh month' of the religious year (Tishri, presumably Sept.-Oct. 537 B.C.), the first of the civil. 2. Jesua; cf. 2:2. Zorobabel's 'brethren' are the heads of the families (2:2). 'son of Salathiel': in 1 Par 3:19 Zorobabel is called the son of Phadaia (Pedaiah), the brother of Salathiel (Shealtiel). The discrepancy may be explained by the suppositions (a) that he was the real son of Pedaiah and the legal son of Shealtiel (Pedaiah having married Shealtiel's childless widow, according to the law of Deut 25:5 f.), or (b) (following some MSS), the son of Pedaiah and the grandson of Shealtiel. 'built the altar': the chief purpose of the return was to restore to Yahweh his due cult in Sion 'which he had chosen'. Both love and duty to God required the exiles to make the venture. Ps 125 (126) pictures the desolation of Israel in its inability to perform the temple liturgy. Ezechiel and other prophets had, during the Exile, filled them with long-lingering enthusiasm for the day of Yahweh, associated often with the Messianic coming, when a purified remnant of God's people should rebuild the temple more glorious than before; and though in face of innumerable obstacles their fervour slackened (as Aggeus trenchantly reminded them) we see here the first enthusiasm of the Return, when they were able to renew the sacrifice on Mt Sion, the symbol of a reunited people, and make plans for the re-erection of the temple. 8. 'upon its bases': i.e. of the former altar or, by a slight emendation 'in its place', where it had formerly stood. An effort seems to have been made to continue the worship on the site of the temple after its destruction, Jer 41:5, but the present situation demanded a new altar. 'put them in fear': 'in fear upon them from the people of the lands', but the phrase is awkward and the text corrupt. A slight change (from b'ēmāh 'in fear' to bāmāh) gives 'upon its bases, for there was a high place upon them (made by) the people of the land'. For 'high place' cf. §252b. As it stands, the text alludes to the opposition mentioned in 4:1-5 and may be a note that has fallen out of its proper place.

4-6 The Feast of Tabernacles; cf. Num 29:12-39 and §113j. 5. 'and afterwards': after the celebration of this feast, the use of the prescribed daily sacrifice (a lamb every morning and evening) as well as the offerings of the first of the month (new-moon) and of all the set feasts, were resumed, together with the sacrifices dictated by private devotion; cf. Num 28:11-15; Lev 23:1-44.

7-13 The Laying of the Temple Foundation—7. 'to the sea, to Joppe'. The operation, as in the case of the first temple, 3 Kg 5:6-11, involved hauling timber from Lebanon down to the coast, then floating it in rafts to Joppe, whence the Jews undertook its further transport to Jerusalem. 'orders': 'permi'. 8. 'the second month': Apr.-May, 536 B.C. 8b. 'began. And they appointed': 'made a beginning by appointing'. 'hasten forward': 'direct'. 9. Josue: not the Josue of 8 (who was high-priest), but a Levite, 2:40. 'Cedmiel, and his sons, and the children of Judah': read with Esd 2:40; Neh 12:8, 'Kadmiel, Binnui and Hodaviah', i.e. the heads of the Levites. 'Henadad-Levites' seems to be a marginal gloss for Hodaviah which crept into the text. 10. 'by the hands of': i.e. according to the norms outlined by David, 1 Par 16, or 'chanting Psalms composed and ordered by David'. 11. 'together': antiphonally. The words of praise which follow are the refrain of Ps 135 (136). 'foundations': this was a promising beginning but the work was shortly abandoned to be resumed again only after 16 years. Aggeus blames their inertness and lack of zeal; the present book speaks only of vague 'hindrance', 4:4-5, but it is easy to fill in the details. The population already inhabiting Judaea, consisting partly of the descendants of the Jews who were never deported, but mostly of neighbouring peoples, their traditional enemies who had drifted in to occupy the abandoned countryside, would naturally resent the sudden irruption of an organized and active band of settlers, fiercely exclusive in their Law and religion, claiming rightful ownership of the territory and bent on rebuilding Jerusalem into a powerful and prosperous state. Hence the struggle, a life-and-death matter for the Jewish community, to make good their claim to practise their own way of life in the midst of the nations—a struggle not finally won until the completion of Nehemias' work, a hundred years later.

Some critics have questioned whether the foundations of the temple were really laid in the 2nd year of the Return on the ground that Agg 2:1 and Zach 8:9 seem to imply that it was not begun until the 2nd year of Darius Hystaspes (520 B.C.). But the statements of the prophets are sufficiently explained if it is assumed that a commencement was made in 536, that the progress of the work was suspended because of opposition, and that the renewal of it in 520 was practically a fresh start, as indeed the book of Esdras itself declares it to have been, 5:2. 'wept': there is no suggestion here (as there is in Agg 2:3) of a contrast between the appearance of the old temple and the new—which did not exist. The old people were simply overcome with emotion at what must have been, for them, a deeply moving ceremony. 13. 'one with another': omit.

IV 1-24 The Record of Opposition—(1) from the reign of Cyrus to the reign of Darius, 4:1-5; (2) during the reign of Xerxes, 4:6; (3) during the reign of Artaxerxes I, 4:7-23. 1. 'the enemies': the descendants of the immigrants, who, to replace the Israelite population that had been deported after the fall of Samaria (721 B.C.), had been introduced, first of all by Sargon from Babylon and the East, 4 Kg 17:24, then by Esarhaddon (2) and Ashurbanipal (10). 2. 'we seek your God': the claim to co-operate in the work of building the temple is based upon common worship. An Israelite priest had been brought back from captivity to teach them the worship of Yahweh, 4 Kg 17:28. Esarhaddon (681-668), the successor 291e of Sennacherib. 3. 'nothing to do with us': the Samaritans had made of their own pagan religion and of the Israelite worship a hybrid syncretism which was the principal reason for their repulse by the Jews; the official reason offered was the fact that the Exiles were not authorized to extend to others the privileges conferred upon them by Cyrus. 4. 'Then': 'and'. 'the people of the land': the non-Israelites (not only Samaritans) who had settled in Palestine as well as the Jews who had never been in exile. 'weakened' the hands: disheartened. The Heb. construction gives the idea of a continuous policy of hindering, terrifying and bribing. 5. 'hired': 'were bribing' the local Persian officials. The effect of this opposition was the interruption of the building of the temple up to the 2nd year of Darius Hystaspes, from 536 to 520.

f 6-23 deal with much later history. Having mentioned that the opposition of hostile neighbours prevented the Jews from speedily building the temple, the sacred writer apparently collects from his sources three later instances of similar opposition in which recourse was had to the Persian court. 6. Of the first, to Xerxes (Assuerus) in 485, we know neither the authors nor the object. 7. Of the second, to Artaxerxes I, the authors are named but not the object, perhaps because the accusation was without effect. 'the rest of their associates'. 'written in the Syrian character and set forth in the Syrian tongue': i.e. in Aramaic, the language of Syria and N. Palestine at this time, and soon to be adopted by the Jews themselves. It was the lingua franca of the Fertile Crescent and regularly used in Persian administrative documents dealing with lands west of the Euphrates. This verse, like the preceding, is apparently a citation from a larger context.

g 8-23. The third recourse (also to Artaxerxes I) is reported extensively (11-16) and is followed by the reply of the king (17-22). The writer probably drew from an Aramaic source, since the text continues in Aramaic till 6:19 where Hebrew is abruptly resumed. Since both Xerxes and Artaxerxes lived after Darius to whom 24 refers and to whose reign the events of ch 5 belong, the section, 4:6-23, departs from chronological order, because the writer wished to give a comprehensive summary of the several occasions when opposition was offered to the Jews by their enemies. The charge made in this section is not the building of the temple (the subject of which is resumed in 24 and ch 5), but the fortification of Jerusalem (12), very probably by the group which returned with Esdras (458 B.C.); cf. ch 7.

h Some modern commentators think that the Aramaic document 4:8-6:18 was a Memorandum written by the Jews to Artaxerxes I in which was first quoted the denunciation by Rehum and the reply of Art. forbidding the construction of the walls, then the very different conduct of Darius I on the occasion of the building of the temple. They contend that 7 is also Aramaic and to be read: 'And in the days of Art., in harmony with [bi' lôm: cf. 3 Esd] Mithridates [a Persian governor], Tabe'el [a Jew] wrote', etc. In this solution, 4:24 is either a gloss due to a misunderstanding of the context, or the conclusion of a summary of events from the time of Cyrus to that of Art., of which the author cites only the concluding lines. 6 (Xerxes) is also held to be a gloss, so that there is only one accusation (Rehum's); cf. Schaefer, Iran. Beitr. I 212 ff.

i 8. Beeltem is not a proper name, but a title, 'chief officer', i.e. governor of the province. 'scribe': the governor's secretary. The greater part of 9-11 is a parenthesis to explain who the colleagues were that associated themselves to Rehum in the accusation. The names of the nationalities to which the Samaritans belonged, show their non-Jewish origin; the identification of most of them is uncertain. The Apharsites were Persian, the Erchuities, natives of Erech, and the Susanechites, colonists from Susa, the Elamite capital. Perhaps Apharsathacites and Apharsites are different transcriptions of the same name. 10a. Asenaphar: 291i Ashurbanipal (668-626), successor of Esarhaddon. Following the Assyrian practice of transferring captured populations, he used central Palestine as a convenient dumping-ground for the peoples mentioned—who were from widely different localities. It is curious that the petitioners should qualify an Assyrian king as 'great and glorious' when writing to a Persian monarch. 'this side of the river': the regions west of the Euphrates which formed the Syrian satrapy of Abarnahara ('beyond the river'). 'In peace': 'and now'. As in 11 and 17, it is an epistolary form, marking a transition.

11-16 The Letter—11. 'send greeting': 'And now', be it known, etc. 12. The reference is probably to the caravan led by Esdras (458); cf. § 289f. 'which . . . walls': 'which they are rebuilding and are finishing [y'sak' lûn] the walls and repairing the foundations'. The text is obscure. 13. 'repaired': 'finished'. 13b. 'and this loss', etc.: 'and in the end it will damage the kings': affect the revenue injuriously. 4. 'But because we eat the salt of the palace': because we are in the king's pay; cf. salarium, money given to provide salt. 'and because it is not right for us to witness the king's dishonour'. 15. 'histories': records kept by Artaxerxes' predecessors. 16. 'repaired': 'finished'. 16b. The Syrian province will be lost to Persia.

17-22 Artaxerxes' Reply—17b. 'sending', etc.: k 'Peace to you. And now'. 18. 'plainly': the allusions, etc., of the letter had been faithfully explained. 20. 'powerful kings': as David, Solomon, Menahem, etc. 21. 'Now give command that these men cease and that this city be not built until a decree [further permission to build] is issued from me'. 22b. 'lest damage should increase to the kings' hurt'. 23. 'with an army and troops': i.e. an armed force. 24. 'the second year of Darius': 520 B.C. The narrative of Neh shows how utterly the attempt to restore Jerusalem had failed. We may infer that the enemy destroyed what work had been accomplished; for it seems to have been on this occasion that 'its walls were broken down, and its gates burned with fire', Neh 1:4. With 24 the writer returns to the history of the previous century, repeating 5b. 'Then': 'thus', i.e. by this sort of thing.

V 1-17 The Building of the Temple recommended—292a

1-2. The narrative of 4:5 is resumed. There is silence regarding the period 536-520 B.C. The hostility of their neighbours had so discouraged the Jews that they said: 'The time is not come for Yahweh's house to be built', Agg 1:2. Out of this despondency they were roused by two prophets, Aggeus and Zacharias; cf. §§ 543b, 545b. 1. 'in the name of the God of Israel which was upon them': i.e. inspired them; cf. Deut 28:10; Jer 7:10, etc. 2. 'began to build': i.e. recommenced; cf. 3:18f. The earlier attempt had failed so completely that the resumption of the work could be considered a new undertaking.

3-5 The Complaint against the Jews—3. Thathanai: b he is named in a Babylonian document of 502 as governor 'beyond the river', i.e. satrap of Abarnahara; cf. JNES 3 (1944) 46. In this document Ta-at-'tan-ni' is clearly distinguished from Ushtani his superior with whom previous commentators have identified him. Stharbazanai: Shethar is the name, Boznai perhaps an official title of unknown meaning. 'counsellors': 'associates'. 'counsel': 'a permit'. We may assume that complaints from the Samaritans led the satrap to inquire what authority the Jews had received to undertake the work. That authorization was required to rebuild a temple under Persian rule is evidenced by the Elephantine papyri; cf. § 289g. 'wall': the sense of the Aram. word is uncertain; probably the plinth of the old temple on which they planned to construct the new. Joüon, Bi 22 (1941) 38 reads 'wainscoting'. 4. The text is corrupt. Read with a correction from 3 Esd 6:4: 'Then we spoke to them as follows: What are the names of the men 392b who are building this house? 3 and 4 contain two separate questions asked by the satrap. The Jews' replies are given at length in the following letter. 5. The eye (favour) of God is shown in the fact that Thathanai allowed the work to go on until he had learned the decision of Darius. 5b, 'so that they did not hinder them until a report should be sent to Darius and a written reply returned about this affair'.

6-17 The Letter of Thathanai to Darius—Thathanai could not venture to arrest a work which was alleged to have the sanction of Cyrus (13), but cautiously decided to refer the whole matter to Darius. The tone and contents of his report are studiously fair and dispassionate. 6. 'his counsellors', etc.: 'his Persian associates'. 8. 'we went': the satrap's residence was in Samaria. 'house': 'temple'. 'unpolished': 'massive', lit. 'stones of rolling', so large that they had to be moved on rollers. 9. 'repair these walls': 'finish this sanctuary' (?). 10b, 'and that we might write'. 'chief among them': those who would be held responsible. 11. 'a great king': Solomon, 'the great king', 3 Kg 6:8. 12 gives the reason why the temple had been destroyed. 13. 'Cyrus the king of Babylon': the king of Persia was also master of the great Chaldaean capital. 14. 'governor': of the district of Judaea, under the authority of the satrap of 'Beyond-the-River'. 15. 'the temple that is in Jerusalem': this phrase is frequently used, even of the time when the temple lay in ruins. 16. 'since that time': from 536 to 520 B.C. 17. 'let search be made'. 'library': 'house of treasures', which was apparently the repository of important documents as well as of treasure.

d VI 1-22 The Persian King approves the Rebuilding of the Temple: its Completion and Dedication.

1-5 The Finding of the Decree of Cyrus—1. 'library', etc.: 'in the house of the archives where the treasures were stored in Babylon' (cf. 5:17). 'Babylon': as in 5:17 the word is used loosely by the Jewish writer as meaning not the city alone, but the kingdom of Babylonia, including Persia. 2. 'Ecbatana': the capital of Media and the summer residence of the Persian kings. It is the modern Hamadan in Iran. Cyrus had remained in Babylon, after its capture, from Dec. 539 to March 538. In the summer of 538 he was in Ecbatana, and a decree of his 'first year' would naturally be dated there and preserved there. (This detail is interesting evidence of the reliability of the writer's sources: Ecbatana was deserted after Alexander's conquests, and a Jewish writer of the Greek period would never think of locating Cyrus' archives there.) 2. 'in the castle [i.e. royal palace] that is in the province of Media'. 'a book': 'roll' of leather or parchment. The use of these materials, rather than clay tablets, was favoured by the adoption of the Aramaic script in the Persian chancellery. Cuneiform could not well be written on parchment. 'in which this record,' etc.: 'and in it was thus written: Memorandum. In the first year' etc. It refers to the 'minute' of an oral decision taken by Cyrus. There is no need to suppose that this and 1:2-4 are different versions of a single document. The 'proclamation' was public; the 'record' here given is a memorandum notifying the royal pleasure to the officials whose duty it was to put it into force. Its curt and business-like style is natural to such a document. 3. The 'Memorandum' of Cyrus is now quoted. 'and that they lay the foundations that may support'. The text is corrupt, perhaps (with 3 Esd): 'and where they offer sacrifices by fire'. 'Its height', etc. The length of the temple is not given, and the other dimensions are twice those of Solomon's temple; cf. 3 Kg 6:2. The figures seem wrong, for the new temple was inferior to the old one; cf. Agg 2:4. 4. 'Three rows of massive stones and a row of new timber': the meaning is not clear: perhaps (a) three storeys of stone surmounted by one of wood; (b) each three layers of stone was followed by one of wood (cf. 3 Kg 6:36). The 'charges' (expenses) were to be defrayed from the royal revenue. 5. 'which also were placed': 'and place them'. For the fulfilment of this decree, cf. 1:7-11.

6-12 The Decree of Darius to Thathanai—6. 'Now therefore': an abrupt transition to the decree of Darius to which there is no introduction. Probably the sacred writer had before him the complete text of Darius' reply to Thathanai in which the rediscovered edict of Cyrus was quoted. The first part of the reply he merely summarized (1, 2); the Cyrus Memorandum he quoted in full (3-5); then he continued copying in full the last part of Darius' letter. 'depart from them': do not interfere with the work. 8. 'I also', etc.: 'From me comes the order what he shall do for the elders . . . that expenses be diligently given to these men, and that without delay'. The abrupt closing clause stresses the urgency of the royal rescript. 9. 'And whatever is necessary, young bullocks, rams and lambs'. 'that there be no complaint in anything': MT more trenchantly 'without fail'. 10. 'oblations': 'sacrifices of sweet odour'; cf. Jer 29:7 and Bar 1:10-12, where the Jews are bidden to pray for the welfare of their Neo-Babylonian rulers. There is no indication, however, that the Persian kings had a special reverence for the God of the Jews. Similar directions for prayers and sacrifices for the king were issued to the Babylonian and Egyptian polytheists. 11. 'and set up', etc.: 'let him be lifted up, and fastened upon it' by impalement or crucifixion. 'confiscated': 'made a dunghill'. 12. 'resist': 'alter' (the decree).

In view of the detailed knowledge of the requirements for Jewish ritual (9), it has been questioned whether this is a copy of a Persian decree, and not rather a digest of it by the Jewish writer in his own words. It seems likely that the decree was drafted by a Jewish secretary, for we know from the narratives of Neh and Dan that Jews did occupy posts of importance at the Persian court. And if such friendly intervention was possible, it would be highly desirable for Zorobabel and his companions to get as detailed a commission as possible, which would leave little scope for restrictive interpretations of the king's will by local officials.

13-18 The Completion and Dedication of the Temple

—14. 'according to': 'thanks to' the prophetic ministry, i.e. strengthened by the inspired words of Agg. and Zach. 14. Artaxerxes: the temple was really completed in the reign of Darius (cf. 15). The name is mentioned either in anticipation of his contributions (cf. 7:1) or is a gloss added through misunderstanding of the documents in 4:7-23. 15. 'the third of Adar' which fell between Feb. and March. 'the sixth year': 515 B.C. The work, resumed in the 2nd year of Darius, 5:2, had taken more than four years to finish. 17. The modest number of the sacrificial beasts speaks eloquently of the poverty of the community, at least in livestock. Contrast the numbers given in 3 Kg 8:5-63. 'all Israel': the 'remnant' that returned is conscious of representing the whole people of God. Hence the sin-offering for the twelve tribes, although ten had been swallowed up in the Assyrian empire. 19. Here the narrative is resumed in Hebrew and a new section begins.

19-22 The Celebration of the Pasch—19. 'phase':

'Pasch'. 20. 'as one man': i.e. 'together'. 'all were clean': 'purified themselves'. Originally the paschal lamb was immolated by the head of each household, Ex 12:3-7; here, as in the days of Josias, 2 Par 35:14, by the Levites. 21. 'all that had separated themselves': Israelites left in the country when the rest were deported, who having mixed with the surrounding pagans, now threw in their lot with the new community. 22. 'the king of Assyria': the Persian empire included the former one of Assyria.

Section II The Work of Esdras, VII-X.

VII 1-10 Introduction—1a. 'Now after': there is an interval of about 57 years. Artaxerxes is Artaxerxes I whose 7th year (7) corresponds to 458 B.C. If it were Artaxerxes II, as some modern scholars contend, 293a Esdras would have gone to Jerusalem in 398 B.C., some 50 years after Nehemias (445 B.C.); cf. § 289i. In the early years of Artaxerxes I an effort was made to surround Jerusalem with a wall (4:12), though with no success. Probably to the same period should be assigned the ministry of the prophet Malachias; cf. § 555c. 1b-5. For the genealogy of Esdras, cf. 1 Par 6:4-14. In 1-5 it is schematic; only 16 generations are given for a period of 800 years. Possibly it is arranged to give prominence to the three leading figures, Aaron, Azarias (Solomon's high-priest), and Esdras, with seven generations between each pair. 6. 'a ready scribe': in later Judaism and in NT 'scribe' has the technical sense of an official interpreter of the Law. Before the Exile it meant a writer or copyist, and in particular a royal secretary, 2 Kg 8:17; 3 Kg 4:3, etc. The change in meaning dates from this application of the term to Esdras. We cannot tell whether he began as a scribe for the Persian government (which is likely, in view of his favour with the king), or as a copyist (of the sacred Books) for the Jewish community. In any event he devoted himself to the study of the Law, and his authority is based largely on his intimate acquaintance with its prescriptions. 'his request': i.e. as contained in the letter in 12-26. 8. 'fifth month': Ab July-Aug. 458 B.C. 9. 'first month': Nisan (Mar.-Apr.), 'he began to go up': i.e. 'he fixed the departure' for the first day. Because of difficulties, the actual journey was not begun till the twelfth day, 8:31. The journey occupied nearly four months and the distance travelled was about 900 miles. 10. Though Esdras led a body of settlers his mission appears to have had purely religious ends in view; he was sent to inquire into the religious condition of Jerusalem, to correct abuses, and to enforce the observance of the Law (14, 26). His purpose 'to search for' truth, to live by it, and to teach it to his countrymen is an epitome of the ideal scribe's career; cf. Ac 1:1. 11. 'of the edict': omit. 'ceremonies': 'precepts'. c 12-26 The Letter of Artaxerxes—It is written in Aramaic. On account of the acquaintance with the Jewish ritual and the temple personnel which it displays, some commentators have thought that it is not the original document, but a version composed by the sacred writer, giving its substance in Jewish terms. Against this view are, (a) the explicit introduction, 'this is a copy of the letter'; (b) other Persian documents show equal familiarity with the cults of subject peoples; e.g. among the Elephantine papyri is a letter from a Jewish official in the Persian service, relaying explicit instructions from Darius II about the celebration of the Pasch (419 B.C.). It is likely then that Artaxerxes' letter either was drafted by a Jewish secretary, or is in response to a petition by Esdras, in which these details would naturally occur. 12. 'king of kings' and 'god of heaven' are authentic Persian phrases. 'greeting': thus LXX and Vg interpret the Aram. g'mlr ('perfect', 'accomplished'). Many scholars consider it as the equivalent of our 'etc.', replacing the long titular and greeting of the ceremonial East. 14. 'seven counsellors': cf. Est 1:14. 'visit': 'investigate' (with authority to correct abuses). The norm of the investigation is to be 'the law of thy God with the interpretation of which you are charged' (lit. 'is in thy hand'). 15. 'tabernacle': 'dwelling'. 16. 'all the silver and gold': Esdras has a roving commission to raise money. In 15-16 three kinds of offerings are mentioned: (1) from the king and his counsellors; (2) from the people of Babylonia (cf. 1:4, 6); (3) from priests and people—free-will offerings. 17. 'Take freely and buy': 'Therefore thou shalt solicitously buy'. 'with the sacrifices and oblations': 'and their meal-offerings and libations' that accompanied the animal sacrifices; cf. Lev 2. 19. 'in the sight of': 'before'. 20. 'and by me': these words should go with the following v. 'And by me, Artaxerxes the king, a decree is made to all the treasurers'. 22. 'talents . . . cores . . . bates':

this weight of silver would be equal in modern values to £200,000. In 701 B.C., the Assyrians claim to have received 800 talents as only part of the ransom paid by Ezechias. For the cor and bath, see § 82k. 23. 'why should there be wrath against the realm?' Some have thought that the Persians identified the Jewish 'god of heaven' with Ahura-Mazda whom they worshipped without temple or priesthood. But this passage tells strongly against this theory, at least for the time of Artaxerxes, and also against the monotheism which the Zoroastrians theoretically held. We have here rather the familiar oriental conception of a local divinity who will be offended if his rites are not duly performed in a given place; and who, if offended, is capable of punishing the offenders in that same place. Palestine, which guarded the route to Egypt, was of great importance for the Persian control of that country; and by these measures Artaxerxes meant to win the goodwill of the local divinity as well as of the inhabitants. 24. All persons connected with the service of the temple are to be exempt from taxation. 25. 'the ignorant': this phrase like the preceding 'them who know' is restricted to those of Jewish origin. 'law of thy God and the law of the king': the Mosaic law, as interpreted by the scribes, is made the law of the Jews of 'Beyond the river' and is supported by royal sanction; cf. Darius I's codification of Egyptian law in AJSJL 51 (1935) 247.

27. Here begins in Hebrew a verbatim extract from the personal Memoirs of Esdras, extending to the end of ch 9. 'Blessed be the Lord': Esdras appreciates perfectly well the interested motives of the Persian, but he understands that God is using Artaxerxes, as he had used Cyrus earlier, to further his plans for Israel. Nor should we underestimate the providential character of the Return. The stubborn resistance of the Jews to assimilation during the Captivity, their mass remigration to their ancestral land against every worldly advantage, and the astonishing co-operation given them by the Persians, are without parallel in the history of the East.

VIII 1-36 The Journey to Jerusalem—1-14. A List of those who accompanied Esdras. 1. 'The "heads" of the families': i.e. of the clans. The number given, of men only, is 1,496. With women, children and a small number of slaves, the caravan comprised about 6,000-8,000 persons. 2. Gersom and Daniel represent respectively the senior and cadet lines of the Aaronic priesthood; Hattus, the line of David. These have the place of honour. 2-3. 'Of the descendants of David, Hattus, son of Sechenias. Of the descendants of Pharois, Zacharias'. 5. 'Of the descendants of Zattu, Sechenias, son of Jahaziel', 1 Par 3:22. 10. 'Of the descendants of Bani, Selomith'. Most of these families appear (with some variations) in Esd 2 as having contributed members to the first group of immigrants under Cyrus. 15-20 The Rendezvous at Ahava—15. Ahava is the name of a canal (cf. 21, 31). Esdras ordered the clans to gather near its confluence with another 'canal'. 'And I inspected the people and the priests and found none there of the sons of Levi.' 'sons of Levi': only 74 Levites had accompanied the first expedition, 2:40. They were indispensable for the revival of the temple worship. 16. There seems to be some duplication of names, and perhaps the last part should read 'Meshullam, leaders of discretion' (cf. 3 Esd). 17. Casiphia: unidentified, but presumably near Babylon. There appears to have been a colony of Levites and Nethinim there. 18. 'by the good hand of God upon us': by Divine Providence. 'and Sarabias': 'namely' Sarabias who seems to have been the 'learned man'; cf. Neh 8:7; 9:4, etc. 20. 'called by their names': i.e. their genealogies were verified, or it may simply mean that a list was made.

21-23 The Fast at Ahava—21. 'a right way': 'a prosperous journey'. Apart from the ordinary difficulties of organization, there was real danger of attack from brigands or Bedouin. A large caravan, including women and children, and bringing treasure, would be 203h a tempting prey without the protection of a military escort. 22. To seek protection by human means seemed to Esdras a sign of little faith in the power and goodness of God; cf. Ps 117 (118) 8-9; 146:2-6.

24-30 The Offerings—24. Esdras appoints 12 priests and 12 Levites to take charge of the treasure. 25. 'that were found': all Israel 'there present'. 26. '650 silver talents': about £1,250,000; 100 gold talents: about $2,800,000. The surprisingly large amount suggests textual corruption or exaggeration by copyists. 'solids': 'darics'; cf. 2:69. 27. 'two': 3 Esd '12'; LXX with a change of vowels, 'diverse', which is a better reading. 28. 'You are holy [i.e. consecrated] unto Yahweh'. 29. 'into the treasure': 'in the rooms' adjacent to the temple where the objects and treasures needed for worship were kept.

31-36 The Arrival in Jerusalem—31. 'twelfth day': they had set out from Babylon on the 1st day and assembled at Ahava on the 9th. 32. The journey lasted about 110 days. 'stayed': 'rested'. 33. The vessels were counted and the bullion weighed. 'into the hand of' the two priests charged with receiving gifts made to the temple. 34. 'at that time' should be joined with 35. 36. 'And they delivered the king's edicts to the king's satraps'. The satrap ruled a province; the governor administered a small district. 'they': the last two vv summarize this part of Esdras' 'Memoirs'.

204a IX 1-15 The Question of 'Mixed Marriages'—According to Torrey, Neh 7:70-73; 8:1-18 joins immediately on to Esd 8. He holds that Neh 7:70-73 does not belong to the list of those who returned under Cyrus, but deals with money and vestments brought by Esdras' caravan; hence this section (together with Neh 8:1-18) originally followed Esd 8. Because, however, of its similarity to the end of the list in Esd 2:68 ff., a copyist thought that in it he had found the end of the list in Neh 7; so he transferred 7:70-8:18 from Esd to its present place in Neh. The original order would then be: (1) the arrival in Jerusalem, Esd 7:31-36; (2) the donation to the treasury, Neh 7:70-73; (3) the public reading of the Law, Neh 8:1-12; (4) the feast of Tabernacles, Neh 8:13-18; (5) Esdras' crusade against mixed marriages, Esd 9-10, (plus Neh 9-10). Against this view it is sufficient to state that (1) Neh 7:70-73 does not deal with the period of Esdras; (2) this arrangement does violence to the literary unity of Neh 8-10; (3) Esd 9 logically follows Esd 8. The bewilderment of Esdras when he discovered the scandal of mixed marriages, Esd 9:1-12, is hardly compatible with a previous solemn convocation of the people and public reading of the Law, Neh 8:1-18; for after these events his ignorance of the existence of the evil would be inexplicable. Cf. Neh 8.

b 1-5 The Sin of the People—Reason and experience had shown that marriages with idolatrous people were a grave danger for the religion of Israel, because the pagan consort, especially the woman who is more inclined to be tenacious in the practice of religion, could draw the Israelite partner to pagan superstitions ('abominations'); hence the rigorous measures adopted: cf. Ex 34:15; Deut 7:1 ff.; 3 Kg 11:7-13. 1. 'princes': heads of the clans. 'people of the lands': non-Jews, not only the communities bordering on Jewish territory. At this time a proportion of the inhabitants of Judaea itself must have been Gentiles. The list combines names familiar in the older writings, with those of countries which were the chief source of more recent corruption (Ammon, Moab, Egypt). 2. 'holy seed': a people set apart and consecrated to God; cf. Is 6:13. 3. Oriental demonstrations of great sorrow; cf. Lev 10:6; Jos 7:6; Job 2:13 ff. 'mantle and coat': 'tunic and mantle'. The former was the undergarment, worn close to the body, the latter was the flowing cloak that covered it. 'I sat down bewildered'. 4. 'feared': 'dreaded the words of the God of Israel', i.e. the divine punishments threatened in the Law. 5. Esdras stood before the people assembled in the temple at the time of the evening oblation (cf. 10:1) and united them with him in his confession. 204b

6-15 Esdras' Prayer—6. 'sins': 'guilt'; also in 7, 13. 7. 'From the days of our fathers we have been greatly guilty unto this day'. 8. 'And now for a little moment [from the time of the edict of Cyrus, about 80 years] there hath been grace from Yahweh our God'. 'remnant': thus were called the returning exiles, the survivors of the nation's shipwreck; cf. Ez 14:22. 'pin': 'a nail' driven into the wall or a 'tent-peg' which holds up or supports. Perhaps the English equivalent would be 'foothold'. 'enlighten our eyes': grant well-being; cf. 1 Kg 14:29.

9. 'are bondmen': subjects of the Persian king. 'king': 'kings'. 'fence': Heb. gāḏēr. If meant literally it would refer to the city wall, and so the mission of Esdras would have followed that of Nehemias; but it should be interpreted figuratively in the sense of 'divine protection' (cf. Ps 79 [80] 13) or as referring to the royal edict forbidding interference with the Jews in Jerusalem; cf. § 28gm. 11. 'prophets': principally Moses in the Pentateuch; Deut 7:1-3 and Lev 18:24 ff. are cited according to sense. 'according to', etc.: 'with the filthiness of the people of the lands'. 'mouth to mouth': i.e. end to end; cf. 4 Kg 10:21; 21:16. 12. 'nor seek their peace'; cf. Deut 23:6; Ex 23:32. 12b. 'and leave it for an inheritance to your children forever'. 13. 'seeing that': 'truly our God has reckoned our sins downwards [chastised us less than we deserved] and has given us such deliverance as this' (the return of the 'remnant'). 14. 'Shall we again turn and break'. 15. 'for we are left (but) a remnant today'. 'no standing before thee': their guilt is inexcusable. With this humble confession, full of trust in the goodness of God, Esdras ends and crowns his prayer.

X 1-44 The Expulsion of the Foreign Wives—1-5. The People's Confession and Pledge. The narrative is resumed in the third person; from now on the sacred writer presents the 'Memoirs' of Esdras in a summary form. 1. 'thus': omit. 'beseeching': 'making confession'. 'lying': prostrating himself. 'assembly': presumably the same group as in 9:4, but increased in numbers. 2. 'Sechenias': his own father, Jehiel, had married a foreign wife; cf. 26 (if it is the same Jehiel). 2b. 'But now there is (still) hope for Israel in this matter'. Stern measures may appease the divine wrath. 3. 'the will of the Lord': 'the counsel of my lord' (i.e. Esdras). This is the first time we have heard of Esdras' 'counsel' to expel the foreign wives; 2-4 appear to summarize a debate in which various speakers, including Esdras, had taken part. Sechenias' argument would have particular effect if his own family (step-mother?) were affected. 'according to the law': either (a) the general law forbidding such marriages is now to be enforced; or (b) the 'putting away' is to be performed in accordance with the regulations for divorce contained in the law, Deut 24:1-2. 4. 'on thee is the affair'; Esdras has, by his commission from the king, both power and responsibility to enforce the law. 'we are with thee': an assurance of support against anticipated opposition.

6-8 The Proclamation—6. 'chamber': one of the rooms adjacent to the temple. 'Johanan': if the Eliasib meant is the high-priest who was contemporary with Nehemias, Neh 13:4, 7, and Johanan was really his grandson (not his son, cf. Neh 12:23), then Johanan must have lived a long time after Esdras, and consequently the writer is giving to the room the name by which it was known in his own day. But it is possible that another Johanan was intended; cf. § 28go. 'entered in thither': 'spent the night there', reading with 3 Esd wayyālen. 7. The men alone were summoned; cf. 9. 8. 'taken away': 'devoted', i.e. put under a religious ban. Property so 'devoted' was to be destroyed or confiscated to sacred uses; cf. § 23og. 'cast out': excommunicated.

9-14 The Assembly—9. 'the ninth month' of the g

294g religious year began towards the end of Nov. and hence fell in the rainy season. 'sat in the street': waited in the 'open space' or square. 'because of this matter and from (the discomfort of) the rain'. The first half of the phrase may be a gloss. 11. 'make confession': 'give glory'. It was used as an invitation to a culprit to speak the truth and acknowledge his fault; cf. Jos 7:19 and Jn 9:24. 12. 'so be it done': 'so it behoveth us to do'. 18. Time was needed to straighten out the involved question of mixed marriages; meanwhile the people who had come in from a distance could not, in the rainy weather, live and sleep in the open air. 14a. 'Let our leaders represent all the people'; let a committee of the leading men handle the matter. 'in all our cities' should follow 'wives'. The 'divorce court' sat in Jerusalem. The elders and judges would be required to give evidence concerning the marriages and afterwards to see that the decision was carried out.

h 15-17 The Commission—15 should stand in parentheses since it breaks the connection between 14 and 16. 'However, Jonathan . . . and Jaasia opposed this; and Mesollam and Sebethai the Levite helped them'. They were opponents of Esdras' admittedly drastic measures. 16. Read with 3 Esd and some LXX MSS: 'And Esdras the priest chose [wayyabdl lš] heads of families, according to their fathers' houses, and all of them by name; and they began their sittings on the first day'. 'tenth month': Tebeth (Dec.-Jan.). This first sitting was held 13 days after the announcement of 9:1 and the hearings were terminated within 90 days, i.e. by the first day of Nisan (Mar.-Apr.). The harsh measures here described were adopted by Esdras in order to keep the worship of God from being contaminated by, and finally lost in, the surrounding paganism. A small and feeble community was peculiarly exposed to external influences, and Esdras might well fear the results, if marriage alliances were permitted with the neighbouring peoples, whose women were 'the daughters of a strange god', Mal 2:11.

i 18-44 The List of the Offenders—It falls into five groups of 17 priests, 6 Levites, 1 singer, 3 porters and 86 laymen—113 in all. The Nethinim alone are not named, probably because, as slaves of alien origin, they were not at that time looked on as part of the Jewish community. 19. 'gave their hands': swore. 25. 'of Israel': as distinct from the preceding, who were dedicated to the temple service. The list that follows goes by the names of the heads of families mentioned in 2:3-20, but in a different order. The text, especially towards the end, is badly copied and uncertain. 44. 'there were among them', etc.: the clause in MT is beset with difficulties. 3 Esd 9:36 reads 'and they put them away along with their children' which may represent the original text.

j With the list of 18-43 the activity of Esdras comes abruptly to an end, to be resumed in an unexpected fashion in Neh 8:1 ff., where he appears as a co-worker with Nehemias, who, however, is only mentioned casually in two places; hence several commentators believe that Neh 8-10 should follow immediately Esd 10 and that Nehemias' name occurring in Neh 8:9; 10, 22 is a later gloss. Cf. § 297a-d.

NEHEMIAS

296a I-VI The Governorship of Nehemias and the Rebuilding of the Walls.

I 1a. Introduction: 'The words': as originally compiled, the 'Memoirs' of Nehemias followed Esdras without a break; this introduction was inserted by the sacred writer to indicate that now another source (the 'Memoirs' of Neh.) is being quoted. The abruptness of the second sentence shows that the extract does not start with the beginning of Nehemias' story.

b 1b-4a Evil Tidings from Jerusalem—1b. 'Casleu': the ninth month, Nov.-Dec. 'twentieth year': of the reign of Artaxerxes I, 445 B.C. This phrase is probably a later insertion taken from 2:1, but really contradicting it, for the 20th year of Artaxerxes began, 2:1; with Nisan (Mar.-Apr.), 445 B.C., and Casleu was the 9th month of that year. Yet the events of ch 1 obviously preceded the interview with the king in ch 2. Susa was the winter residence of the Persian kings; Ecbatana, the summer; cf. Esd 6:2. 2. 'brethren': 'kinsmen'. Hanani introduced to Nehemias some new arrivals from Jerusalem, with their sad story, very likely in the hope that Nehemias would use his influence with the king; in fact, this may have been the purpose of the Judaeans' long journey. 'that remained', etc.: 'the survivors who were left'; so too in 3. The reference is to those descendants of the exiles who had migrated to Palestine. 3. 'the wall . . . the gates': very likely this destruction occurred on the receipt of Artaxerxes' letter (cf. Esd 4:7-23), which had not ordered the destruction of the work done, but that would almost inevitably follow. Some authors suppose the allusion to be to the destruction of the walls by Nabuchodonosor in 586, some 140 years before, but that would hardly be news.

5-11 Nehemias' Prayer—It consists of a confession of sin (5-7), an appeal to God's promise (8-9), and an entreaty for help in the undertaking he contemplated (10-11). The stereotyped form, the striking resemblance to other OT prayers, Esd 9:5-18; Dan 9:4-19, and the liberal use of Deuteronomic passages, have led many scholars to conclude that the prayer is the composition of the sacred writer, not of Nehemias. These characteristics, however, may be explained on the assumption that it is a compendium of the many prayers that Nehemias uttered during the four months that intervened before his approach to the king, and that, in composing it for his 'Memoirs' he followed the norms of literary composition that prevailed in OT prayers.

5. 'covenant': promises made to Israel. 7. 'We have been seduced by vanity': 'we have acted very corruptly'. 'ceremonies': 'commandments'. 8-9. Cf. Lev 26:27-45; Deut 4:25-31; 30:1-5. 11. 'Now I was the king's cupbearer': this is added to show that the words 'of this man' refer to Artaxerxes, and that this prayer was in the heart of Nehemias while serving the king, 2:4. 'a cupbearer': therefore, not the only one nor the chief one. The cupbearers of the Persian court were generally non-Persian eunuchs. It was their duty to pour out and taste some of the wine as a precaution against an attempt to poison the king.

II 1-20 Nehemias' Appointment as Governor and Arrival in Jerusalem.

1-8 The Commission of Nehemias—1. Nisan (Mar.-Apr.), 445 B.C. 'before him': LXX has 'wine before me', implying that it was Nehemias' turn to act as cupbearer. 'languishing': HT is uncertain—perhaps, 'I had not been out of favour with him', i.e. Nehemias regarded himself, with some reason, as the king's favourite, and hoped, therefore, that his petition would be granted. 2. MT is shorter and simpler: 'Why is thy countenance sad? Thou art not ill, (therefore) this can only be sadness of heart. And I was sore afraid'. Since sadness was a breach of court etiquette (cf. Est 4:2) and Nehemias' petition would be for the exact opposite of the king's recent decision (cf. Esd 4:7-23), he had reason enough to be apprehensive. 3. 'of the place': omit 'of'. Nehemias makes his appeal on the ground of filial piety, saying nothing of building fortifications which would have an ominous sound to an eastern ruler, only too accustomed to periodical revolts in outlying provinces. 4. 'I prayed': in my heart, secretly. 5. This is the crucial request, and the double introduction conveys the intense earnestness with which Nehemias made it. 'sepulchres of my fathers'. 'build it': the request implied authority over the people, independence of local Persian officials, a certain financial control—in short, the office of governor. 6. 'the queen': the Heb. implies 'a favourite member of the harem.'

295d 'I fixed him a time': Nehemias was governor for 12 years, 5:14. 7. 'governors': besides the satrap who governed all the province of 'Beyond-the-River', there were Persian governors of its various districts. It was such an appointment that Nehemias now received in Jerusalem. 8. 'forest': the Persian word is pardes from which is derived the English 'paradise'. 'The royal park' is the nearest equivalent. It is identified by some with Etham, 4 m. S. of Bethlehem, 2 Par 11:6, where (according to Jos. Ant. 8, 7, 3) Solomon built pleasant gardens. 8. 'that I may cover', etc.: 'place beams for the gates of the citadel of the house'. The citadel (cf. 7:2 in HT) seems to have been intended as a defence for the temple ('the house'). 'the house that I shall enter': the governor's palace.

9-10 The Journey to Jerusalem—9. 'captains of soldiers': Nehemias as Tirshatha or governor, 8:9; 10:1, was invested with civil and not, like Esdras, ecclesiastical authority; and consequently was attended by a bodyguard; contrast Esd 8:22. 'the letters': of safe-conduct (7). 10. 'Sanballat': an Assyrian name meaning 'Sin [the lunar god] gives life.' He is named the Horonite either because he was from Beth-Horon or, more probably, from Horonaim in Moab (cf. Is 15:5). He was governor of Samaria. In a document among the papyri fragments of Elephantine, dated the 17th year of Darius II (407 B.C.) we read that the sons of 'Sanballat governor of Samaria' have great authority; hence the proof that the Artaxerxes of Nehemias is the first of that name, not the second; cf. § 289g. 'Tobias the Ammonite' was in all likelihood of the lineage (perhaps the head) of the family of the Tobiads, which as we know from Josephus (Ant. 12, 5, 1) and from recently discovered papyri was famous about 300 B.C. for its wealth and power in the region of Ammon. 'the servant': the word means 'slave', Ex 21:1-7, but it is also an honorary title, 1 Kg 22:3; 4 Kg 22:12. Here Tobias certainly has a part in the government of the province. 'heard it': of his arrival, not of his purpose. It was a sufficiently disturbing idea that a strict and zealous Jew, backed by the king's authority, should be governor in Jerusalem.

11-16 The Inspection of the City Walls by Night—13. 'in the night': to avoid rousing the suspicion of his foes and the intemperate enthusiasm of the people. 'no beast': a cavalcade would have attracted notice. 13-14. The topography of ancient Jerusalem is too obscure to admit of the various parts of its walls being identified with certainty, but Nehemias began his tour from the SW. and pursued his course, first along the S. wall, then along the E. wall up the side of the 'torrent', i.e. the Kidron'. The first gate was probably named from the valley of Hinnom; some scholars, believing that the western hill was not then occupied, think it was the Tyropoeon valley which ran between the eastern and western hills. 'before the dragon fountain': 'in the direction of'. This fountain, not mentioned elsewhere, is perhaps to be identified with the well of Rogel which was near the 'serpent's stone', 3 Kg 1:9. 'the dung gate', out of which the town refuse was carried, stood where the Tyropoeon valley met the valley of Hinnom. 14. 'the gate of the fountain' (of Siloe) was at the SE. corner of the city. 'the king's aqueduct': 'the royal pool', perhaps the lower pool of Siloe (mentioned in 3:15 as near the royal gardens), the overflow of which irrigated the lower part of the Kidron valley where the kings of Judaea had gardens, 4 Kg 25:4; or perhaps the (now) lost pool of Solomon farther up the Kidron valley. 'no place to pass': the ground was so encumbered by fallen masonry that Nehemias could not follow the line of the wall closely; so he descended into the valley and followed the Kidron 'torrent'. 15. 'and turned back': retraced his steps. Others think that he turned back along the N. wall, thus completing the circuit of the city.

h 17-20 Nehemias' Appeal: the Derision of his Enemies

—Nehemias, having satisfied himself as to the practicability of his plan, called an assembly. The sacred writer is utilizing, not transcribing, Nehemias' Memoirs. 17. 'a reproach': an object of derision, by reason of our inability to defend ourselves. 18. 'the hand of God': the divine blessing which had so far favoured him. 'strengthened for the good (work)'. 19. To the two adversaries already mentioned is added Geshem the Arab, also coming from Transjordan. 'will you rebel?': the same construction had been put upon the undertaking of Esd 4:7-23. 20b. 'You have no portion, nor right, nor memorial [i.e. nothing by which to remember you] in Jerusalem'. These words resemble the declaration in Esd 4:3 and imply a claim on the part of the Samaritans to share in the fortunes of Jerusalem.

III 1-31 A List of the Builders of the Wall—This chapter was taken from some official record of the repairing of the wall and inserted in Nehemias' narrative. The workers were organized according to families, localities, or professions, into 42 groups, each headed by one or two men. Those dwelling in nearby villages—Jericho, Tekoa (Thecua), etc.—were also summoned. Each group was assigned a certain gateway or section of wall—the lengths of the latter varying considerably, according as the need of repair was greater or less. The Heb. text is in a poor state and many of the plentiful topographical details are quite obscure. It is clear, however, that the description starts at the east end of the north wall and proceeds counter-clockwise. See Map C, page 1311.

1. 'Eliashib': cf. Esd 3:2; Neh 12:10 and 13:4, where his close connexion with Tobias shows that he did not sympathize with the policy of Nehemias. 'built': 'repaired'. 'the sheep gate': in the NE. section of the wall. Through it the sacrificial animals were led to the temple; cf. Jn 5:2. 'sanctified it': qidd'ûhû has been substituted out of respect for the priesthood for qêrûhû 'laid its beams' of the other gate-building accounts (cf. 3, 6). 'the tower of Hammeah' (i.e. 'The Hundred'): the origin of the name is unknown. 'sanctified': 'repaired' the wall. Hananel: cf. Jer 31:38; Zach 14:10. 3. 'the fish gate': about the middle of the northern wall. 'covered it': 'laid its beams'. 'built': 'repaired' is to be read throughout, except in 13, 14, 15. The work consisted in repairing the wall and filling in the breaches. 5. 'necks': the metaphor is taken from the ox ploughing with its neck in the yoke. 'their lord': i.e. Nehemias; the chiefs of Tekoa refused to join in the work.

6. 'old gate': probably so called either because it gave access to the old part of the city or because it belonged to a part of the wall older than the repaired wall of Ezechias, 2 Par 32:5. It was probably on the northern side of the city to the west of the fish gate. 7. 'for the governor': HT is obscure; perhaps it denotes the limit of the restoration undertaken by the men of Gabaon and Mizpah: i.e. 'up to' the place where the satrap of 'Beyond-the-River' held court on his visits to Jerusalem. 8. 'left': 'girded' is a probable rare sense of the Heb. word; cf. 4:2. Some authors read y'azzû ('strengthened') for y'azbû. 'unto the broad wall': the portion between the gate of Ephraim, 12:38, and the tower of the furnaces, 11, on the western (?) side of the city. 9. 'lord of the street': 'prefect of half the district'; the province, ruled by a governor was divided into districts, and these often into two parts, each of which was ruled by a 'prefect'. So also in 12, 14, 15, 16, 17. 11. 'built half the street': 'repaired a second portion', either 'a further portion' of the same section or, more probably, 'undertook another piece of restoration work'. Some, more zealous than others, repaired two sections: compare 3:21, 27 with 3:3, 5; 18 with 24. 'the tower of the furnaces': between the gate of Ephraim and the valley gate. 12. Sellum: Shallum shared with Rephaia (9) the prefecture 'of the district of Jerusalem'. 'he and his daughters': perhaps 'it [the half district]

295k and its villages'; cf. 11:25, 27 Heb. 13. 'the valley gate': cf. 2:13. This was the main entrance on the western side. 'a thousand cubits' (about 500 yards) is a doubtful reading; the distance seems to be too great. 'the dung gate': cf. 2:13. The wall, having passed due east from the valley gate to the dung gate, then turned in a northerly direction.

1 15. 'guard': 'garden'; cf. 2:14. 'the steps': at the southern extremity of the eastern hill. A similar flight of steps was unearthed in 1895 near the pool of Siloe and another in 1913-14 at the southern point of Ophel. 'the city of David': the Jerusalem that David captured from the Jebusites. It embraced the eastern hill, known as Ophel. 16. 'the sepulchres': according to this text they should be on the SE. slope of Ophel, 2 Par 32:3, where, in fact they were found (1913-14). 'pool': 'the artificial pool and the house of the warriors'. The 'pool': distinct from the lower pool of Siloe is probably the pool of Solomon mentioned above under 2:14; cf. Is 22:11. 'the house of the warriors': probably barracks for the royal bodyguard. 17. 'street': 'district'.

m 19-24. 'another measure': a second piece of the wall; cf. 11. The places here indicated cannot be exactly identified, but we find ourselves on the eastern wall, approaching the temple and so we meet the houses of the 'priests' (21 ft.). 22. HT reads simply 'the men of the Oval', the technical name given to the oval plain of the Jordan valley near Jericho; cf. Gen 13:10. 26. The verse is a parenthesis, probably a later addition to be read after 27. The Nathinities' quarters adjoined the temple on the south. 'temple': 'Ophel' 'protuberance': the southern section of the temple hill. 'the water gate': leading to the spring of Gihon in the ravine of the Kidron (?). 28. 'the horse gate': cf. Jer 31:40; 4 Kg 11:16. 30b. 'opposite the reviewing gate and up to the upper chamber of the corner'. 'the reviewing gate': perhaps where the army was mustered. 'upper chamber': apparently a well known solarium above the NE. angle of the wall. 32. With the sheep gate the circuit is complete.

296a IV 1-23 Opposition—This ch in the HT does not begin until v 7.

1-6 The Samaritans ridicule the Work—1. Here Nehemias' Memoirs are resumed; 1-3 narrate an incident similar to that of 2:19-20. Sanballat: his irritation at Nehemias' arrival, 2:10, increased after work on the wall was begun. 'moved': 'vexed'. 2. 'silly': 'feeble'. 'Will the Gentiles [i.e. Persian authorities] let them alone?': read probably, 'Will they build an encirclement for themselves?' Cf. however 3:8. By changing lāhem ('for themselves') to l'lohm we may read: 'Will they leave (the matter) to God?' The rest of the passage is obscure and Vg offers perhaps as good a version as any. 'sacrifice', etc.: do they think that they have only to sacrifice to their God and the work will be done? 3. 'Even what they are building—if a jackal go up, he shall break down their wall of stones'; it will crumble under a jackal's weight. 'their wall of stones' is a phrase of contempt; the building of a wall, adequate for defence, is a laborious task. 4-5. This is the first of the parenthetical prayers, which characterize Nehemias' writings; cf. 5:19; 6:9; 13:14, 22. 4. 'to be despised': HT, 'up to spoiling', i.e. may they experience the fate of Judah. The consonants of both words are the same in Heb. 5. 'they have mocked the builders'. 6. As the different parties worked simultaneously on the wall, it was quickly restored up to one half of its height, and this success was a stimulus to greater effort.

b 7-12 Threats—7. An early inspection had satisfied the foe that nothing effective would be accomplished by the Jews; now they hear that an essential part has been done. 'Azotians': the people of Ashdod, one of the principal Philistine cities. 'made up': 'went forward'. 8. 'to prepare ambushes': 'to make confusion therein'. 10. A rhythmic song; similar popular refrains are not uncommon in the historical books; cf. 1 Kg 18:7; 2 Kg 20:1; 3 Kg 12:16; 2 Par 18:16. Besides the hostility of the Samaritans, the Jews themselves were becoming overwhelmed by fatigue. 12. Read with LXX 'And when the Jews that dwelt beside them came (to Jerusalem) they told us: They are coming up against us from all places (where they live [Syr])'. Jews living in Samaritan cities heard of the plot and came to warn Nehemias.

13-23 Measures for Defence—13-15. The text is very difficult. 13. Vg compresses 13a and b (Heb.) into a single sentence. Read with a correction (from good LXX codices and Syr) of the first Heb. verb: 'And they have taken their stand at the lowest part of the space behind [i.e. outside] the wall in the open. Then I set the people', etc. The sense is now clear. The enemy had prepared an assault in strength (13a), but Nehemias took countermeasures (13b), and the Samaritans lost courage when they saw themselves discovered. 15. 'counsel': 'plot'. 16. 'From that day half of my young men [his personal bodyguard] did the work, and half of them held the spears and the shields and the bows and the coats of mail; and the chiefs stood behind (to direct) each house [clan group] of Judah (17) that was building the wall. They that carried burdens were armed; each worked with one hand, and with the other held a missile' (javelin?). 18. 'And the builders had each one his sword girded upon his loins while he built. Now the trumpeter was by my side'. 19-20. Because of the great extent of the wall, the defenders were scattered; hence the need of collecting all available forces quickly to any threatened point. 21. 'So we wrought in the work; and one half of them held the spears', etc. Perhaps 'and one half . . . spears' is a copyist's repetition from 10 and to be omitted. 22. The Jews dwelling in the suburbs used to return home for the night. Because they were needed for defence, Nehemias made them lodge in the city. 'And let us take', etc.: 'and they shall be a guard for us by night and a working force by day'. 13. 'watchmen': 'men of the guard'. 'only every man', etc. HT is hopeless; Vg is at least clear.

V 1-19 Difficulties within the City: Nehemias' Governorship—This ch can hardly be in its right place; there was neither occasion nor leisure for such complaints and proceedings during the 52 days of feverish activity that marked the rebuilding of the wall. Moreover the date in 5:14 shows that we are at the end of Nehemias' rule. The ch appears to belong to a later period and describes later acts of Nehemias' administration.

1-13 Social Abuses—1. 'against their (own) Jewish brethren': i.e. the rich and the nobles (7). The story of the oppression of the poor by the rich is a familiar one with the prophets. It is distressing to see how quickly in a poor and struggling community avaricious 'capitalism' had revived. 2. 'Some were saying: "We are giving in pledge our sons and daughters, in order to get corn to eat and live"'. 3. Others were saying: "We are giving in pledge our fields and our vineyards and our houses that we may get corn in the famine"'. 4. And others were saying: "We have borrowed money for the king's tax (with our fields and vineyards as security)". The parenthesis is a repetition from 3. This social-economic crisis was due to a bad harvest and consequent famine. The poor had no resource but to borrow from wealthy money-lenders, and, as security, to give either their property, when they had any, or their children. Deprived of the profits from their holdings and the labour of their children, there was little hope of ever paying off the debt; hence their children would remain slaves and their vineyards be seized. 'the king's tax': the royal tax was one that Nehemias dared not fail to collect, although he did his best to lighten the burden (14). The last part of this verse is probably a gloss. 5. 'our flesh', etc.: we and our children are Jews just as they are; such oppression should have no place among brethren of the same blood. The selling of children into bondage to defray a debt was recognized in the Law,

f 7. 'You exact usury every one of his brethren': loans at interest to fellow-Israelites were prohibited, Ex 22:25; Deut 13:19; Lev 26:35-37, but the prohibition seems to have been interpreted as applying only to charitable loans. Usury as a financial transaction between Jews was apparently recognized (cf. Lk 6:35). 8. Nehemias and other pious men had, out of their purses, redeemed Jews who had been enslaved for debt by their pagan creditors. 9. 'reproaches': such cruel treatment of fellow-Jews makes the nation and its religion a byword to the pagans. 10. 'lent': the Heb. word always means 'lend at interest'; but in view of Nehemias' generosity in other respects we cannot suppose that he treated his debtors as the nobles treated theirs. His proposal is probably an appeal to his hearers to follow the example he has already been setting. 'Let us . . . to us': the Heb. reads simply: 'Let us relinquish this interest'. 11. 'the hundredth part': read maššā 'the interest on' for m'af. 'give it rather for them': omit. 12. 'The priests' were called not to take the oath but to administer it. 13. 'lap': 'the fold of my garment': the action was symbolic.

g 14-19 Nehemias' Governorship—This is Nehemias' apologia for his administration, particularly on the financial side. In the East high political office has been fatally accompanied by corruption, oppression, and self-enrichment; from all these evils Nehemias refrained 'for love of God'. More than that, out of pity for his people's poverty, he waived his own salary as governor and bore the expenses of the office out of his own pocket. Evidently he was rich enough to afford it; but such generosity is no less remarkable in the rich than in the poor. 14. His governorship lasted from 445-433 B.C. It is to be assumed that his leave of absence, 2:6, was extended by the king. 'yearly allowance . . . governors': lit. 'the bread of the governor'. A proportion of the taxes was allotted to the governor and his establishment for their maintenance. This allowance Nehemias forewent. 15. 'forty shekels': about $30—with much greater purchasing power. 16. 'Moreover I was occupied in the work of this wall, although I (had) acquired no land'. Only those who possessed land had the strict duty of co-operating in the work; at the same time there is an allusion to 10; Nehemias had refrained from enriching himself by buying up the land of the poor. 17. He regularly entertained 150 officials and welcomed Jews from the Dispersion to his table. 18. 'I gave store', etc.: 'every ten days all wine in abundance'. 'for the people', etc.: 'for the bondage [tribute exacted by the Persian government] was heavy upon the people'.

h VI 1-19 The Wall completed—The narrative about the rebuilding of the walls, which was broken by ch 5, is here resumed.

1-9 Opposition from without—2. The wall proper was now finished, therefore the opportunity for attack had gone by; so Sanballat and his confederates seek to allure Nehemias to a conference in order to get him into their power. Ono: now Kefr Ana, some 7 m. E. by S.E. of Jaffa. Perhaps under the Heb. word for 'the villages' is concealed the proper name 'Kefira'. At all events, the article indicates a definite place. 3b. 'lest', etc.: 'Why should the work cease, while I leave it and go down to you?' Nehemias refuses to go on the ground that he is too busy with the work on hand. 5. 'according to the former word': in like manner. 'an open letter': that its content might reach and intimidate others. 6-7. In the letter Sanballat pretends to give friendly information of the dangerous gossip which is so widespread that the Persian king is sure to hear of it, and suggests a conference that they may find a way of extricating Nehemias from his perilous situation. 8. 'For which end': join with 7. 9. 'thinking', etc.: 'saying': "Their hands will cease from the work and it will not be done". And now strengthen my hand' (an ejaculatory prayer).

10-14 A Further Attempt to entrap Nehemias—This section is very compressed and the text corrupt. The general sense is that Sanballat had hired a false prophet to persuade Nehemias that his life was in danger and to induce him to seek safety in the inner sanctuary of the temple, where no layman was permitted to enter. Such an impious act would have gravely discredited him in the eyes of the people. 10. Samai'a: not otherwise known. 'privately': MT āšār 'and he was shut up': obscure. Vaccari reads 'and it [the house] was shut up', i.e. bolted, and for 'and he said': "Let us consult" (niwroā' šd) he suggests 'And said Noadiah (nō'adyāh): "Go into"': cf. 14. 'in the midst of the temple': in the Holy Place, which corresponded to our modern nave. 11. 'to save his life': 'and live'. It was forbidden to a layman to enter the inner sanctuary under pain of death; cf. Num 18:7. 12. 'Then I understood, and lo, God had not sent him; but he had spoken the (pretended) prophecy about me, because Tobias and Sanballat had hired him'. 13. 'He was bribed in order that I should be afraid and do so [as he advised] and sin; so that I might be to them for an evil name that they might discredit me'. Vg gives the general sense. 14. 'Remember, O my God, Tobias', etc. 'Noadiah the prophet': the name is not found elsewhere. HT reads 'the prophetess'; LXX agrees with Vg.

15-16 Completion of the Work—15. 'Elul': the sixth month, Aug.-Sept. of 444. For another instance of the rapid erection of walls under patriotic impulse, cf. the action of Themistocles and the Athenians.

17-19 Enemies within—During the whole of this period a treasonable correspondence was carried on between Tobias and the disaffected Jewish nobles. 18. 'were sworn to him', etc.: Tobias' connexion by marriage ensured him the support of many leading Jews. He was the son-in-law of Sechenias (probably distinct, as a noble of the house of Arah, Esd 2:5, from the Sechenias of 3:29, and the father-in-law of the daughter of Mosollam, 3:4. Tobias was also related by marriage to the high-priest Eliasib, 13:4.

VII 1-73 Arrangements for the Protection of the City: A List of the Returned Exiles.

1-4 Nehemias' Precautions—1. 'numbered': 'appointed'. 2. 'ruler of the house': 'captain of the fortress' (probably connected with the temple and doubtless the military headquarters as well as the seat of government). 'the rest': 'many'. 3. City gates were usually opened at sunrise and closed at sunset. 'yet standing': i.e. before they went to bed. Every precaution was taken lest the citizens be surprised by an assault at a time when they could not promptly defend themselves. 4. 'the houses were not built' could also mean that the offspring of the returned exiles was not yet numerous; cf. Ex 1:21.

5. As a preliminary step to increasing the population of Jerusalem, Nehemias proposed to take a census of all persons of Jewish descent. 'found a book': the genealogical record 'of them who came up at first', during the reign of Cyrus. This record must have been found in the archives of Jerusalem. It is identical with the list in Esd 2:3-58, but with variants in the names and sometimes in the numbers.

6-73 The List—15. Bannui: in Esd 2:10 Bani with 642 descendants. In both places read Bennui. 21. 'of Hezechias': i.e. of the subdivision which took its name from Hezechias, probably not the king of that name. 61-73. This section is found almost identically in Esd 2:59-70. 68 is omitted in some of the oldest Hebrew MSS, probably through an oversight, but found in Esd 2:66. 70. '530 garments': read with LXX 30 and cf. Esd 2:69.

VIII-X Religious Reform—Some modern scholars, Catholics and non-Catholics, believe that this section originally belonged to the Esdras narrative, although they vary in assigning its proper place in that book. Some place it after Esd 8 or 10. Batten, 352, leaves 297a only Neh 8 as part of the Esdras story, finds it impossible to trace the origin of ch 9, and places Neh 10 after Neh 13. Torrey proposes the order Esd 7, Neh 7:70-8:18; Esd 9-10; Neh 9-10.

The arguments of Batten and Torrey against the literary unity of Neh 8-10 are ill-founded. Neh 10 does not follow Neh 13 but is presupposed by it (cf. e.g. 13:10 and 10:38). Torrey's view that Neh 7:70-73 does not belong to the list of those who first returned, but refers to money, etc., brought to Jerusalem by Esdras' caravan, is unjustifiable.

b The literary unity of Neh 8-10 being granted, the reasons offered for transferring it to the book of Esd are: (1) chh 8-10 interrupt the story of Nehemias' plan to find inhabitants for Jerusalem, Neh 7:4, which is resumed only in 11:1; (2) the unexpected re-appearance of Esdras in this section; (3) Esdras came to Jerusalem to teach and establish the Law, Esd 7:5-26, but it is only thirteen years after his arrival that he first presents it to the people, Neh 8-10; (4) the change in the narrative of Neh 8-10 from the first to the third person.

c By inserting Neh 8-10 after Esd 8 we have a natural sequence of events: the arrival of Esdras on the 1st day of the 5th month, 458 B.C., Esd 7:9; the reading of the Law on the 1st day of the 7th month, Neh 8:2; the signing of the covenant on the 24th day of the 7th month, Neh 9:1-28; the question of mixed marriages raised in the 9th month, Esd 10:9; the end of the commission on the 1st day of the 1st month (457 B.C.). A serious objection, however, to this arrangement is that it does not explain Esdras' ignorance about mixed marriages, Esd 9:13, after the assembly of the people in which the scandalous state of things is indicated, Neh 10:30. To defend this view (as well as that which places Neh 8-10 after Esd 10) it is also necessary to strike out, as a gloss, the mention of Nehemias in 8:10 and 10:1.

d Those who hold that Neh 8-10 is in its proper place explain the change from the first to the third person and the impression of an interpolation, by affirming that Nehemias wrote in his Memoirs the facts contained in Neh 8-10, but in a brief fashion, since they dealt solely with religious matters; hence the sacred writer, leaving for a time the text of Nehemias' Memoirs, describes these events in greater detail, relying both on the Memoirs and other sources. Thus the whole section appears out of place.

The present writer is inclined to the view that Neh 8-10 originally followed Esd 10. This arrangement fills out a gap in the Esdras narrative, and removes the difficulty caused in the present text by the presence of Neh 8-10 between 7:4 and 11:1. Perhaps the transfer was due to the fact that the opening lines of Neh 8 are identical with the lines following the register in Esd 2, and so the entire section was placed after the register in Neh 7. Perhaps, however, it is only enriching Esdras at the expense of Nehemias.

● VIII 1-18 The Reading of the Law and the Feast of Tabernacles.

1-12 The Reading of the Law by Esdras—1. 'the seventh month': Tishri. That the events described in ch 8 followed immediately upon the completion of the wall seems to be suggested by the sacred writer, for the mention of the 25th of the 6th month, 6:15, is followed by the mention of the 1st of the 7th month, 8:1, 2. The opening words of ch 8 are very similar to those in Esd 3:1 after the list of names. Apparently the close of the list and the mention of the 7th month in Esd contained suitable words with which to resume the narrative here; but cf. § 297d. 'street': 'the broad place'; so also in 3, 16. 'watergate': SE. of the temple area; cf. 3:26. 2. This is the first time that Esdras is mentioned in Nehemias; if Neh 8-10 belongs to the book of Neh then Esdras either returned to Babylon after effecting the reforms described in Esd 9 and 10, and only revisited Jerusalem after Nehemias' arrival there, or the failure of his efforts to fortify Jerusalem, Esd 4:6-23, and the opposition of unpatriotic Jews may have led him to go into retirement until the coming of Nehemias. He is not mentioned among those who helped to build the walls (ch 3), but even if he were present, there would be little to distinguish his co-operation from that of the other priests, 3:1. 'the first day of the 7th month' of Tishri: the Feast of Trumpets; cf. § 113e. 4. 'step': 'tower', a raised wooden platform. 6. 'lifting up their hands': in token of approval and solidarity. 7. 'made silence': the Levites, scattered through the throng, kept the people quiet and attentive. 8. 'and plainly', etc.: 'and with attention to the sense and they [the people] understood the reading'. This is the simplest version. 9. 'Atharsatha: i.e. governor. Omit 'Nehemias' with 3 Esd. LXX omits the word for 'governor'. The same title was borne by Sheshbazzar (cf. Esd 2:63). 'who interpreted': 'kept the attention' of the people (cf. 7, 11). 'wept': when they saw how they had broken the Law. 10. 'Eat the fat and drink the sweet', a proverbial expression; remorse should not impede the holy joy proper to a festival day. 12. 'the words that he had taught them': 'that had been made known to them'.

13-18 The Feast of Tabernacles—13. 'the second day': of the 7th month, Tishri (Sept.-Oct.). 'that he should interpret': 'to give (further) attention to'. 14. 'written in the Law': on the feast cf. § 113j. 15. 'mount': 'hill country'. 'of beautiful wood': probably 'of oleaster'. 16. 'street': 'open space'. 'gate of Ephraim': cf. 12:39. 17. 'since the days of Josue the son of Nun' they had not celebrated the feast with such joy and festal pomp; for previous celebrations, however, cf. Os 12:9 and Esd 3:4. The emphasis is on 'so', i.e. in such a manner. Some exegetes think that the reference is to the high-priest Josue (Esd 3:1) and that 'the son of Nun' is an interpolation. 18. 'the 8th day'; cf. Num 29:35, Lev 23:36 and § 113j. 'manner': i.e. the regulations prescribed by the Law.

IX 1-38 The Renewal of the Covenant—1-5 A Day of Fasting and Sackcloth—1. 'four and twentieth day': the second day after the solemn closing of the feast of tabernacles. 2. 'confessed their sins': as a nation in the manner described in 6-37. 3. 'rose up in their place'. 'they read': the Levites, while the people listened. 'four times': 'a fourth part of the day', i.e. 3 hours. 4. 'step': 'platform'; cf. 8:4.

6. At the invitation of the Levites: 'Bless the Lord', etc., the people (though it is not expressly stated) responded, joining in the divine praise and in the confession which followed.

6-37 The National Confession—After an act of faith in one God, the creator of heaven and earth, it first recalls God's early mercies to Israel, the nation's unworthy return, the divine forbearance, the people's renewed disobedience, and their consequent punishment; it then acknowledges the justice of their chastisement and concludes abruptly with a picture of Israel's present plight, which is, in itself, an appeal. It was recited by the Levites with whom the people associated themselves. There are no compelling reasons for asserting that it is a later insertion. Its 'vagueness' can well be explained by its liturgical character common to so many OT prayers.

6. 'Thou art Yahweh, even thou alone.' 'host': the stars; cf. Gen 2:1. 'host of heaven': probably the angels; cf. Ps 102 (103) 21. 7. 'Abram . . . Abraham': cf. Gen 17:5. 'fire': 'Ur'. 8. Cf. Gen 15:18-21. 'just': therefore faithful to thy promises. 9. Cf. Ex 3:7; 14:10. 10. 'against them': the Israelites. 'name': reputation; cf. Ex 9:16. 11. Cf. Ex 14:21; 15:4, 5, 19. 12. Cf. Ex 13:21. 'that they might see': 'to give them light in'. 13. 'ceremonies': 'statutes'. 15. Cf. Ex 16:4 ff.; 17:6. 'lifted up thy hand': the gesture accompanying an oath. 16. 'dealt proudly': acted presumptuously. 17. 'gave the head . . . contention': 'set the head 297h to return to their bondage in Egypt'; cf. Num 14:4. 'in Egypt': thus some MSS and LXX. 18. Cf. Ex 32:1-4. 'blasphemies': words and acts contemptuous of God. 20. 'thy good spirit': 'thy favourable breath', i.e. thy help; perhaps the figure contains an allusion to the sending of quails carried by the wind (Num 11:31). 'to teach them': 'to make them prosper'. 21. 'worn': 'blistered'; cf. Deut. 8:4; 29:5. 22. 'divided lots': 'allot as a surplus'. The kingdoms of Transjordan were not included, in the strict sense, in the land promised to their fathers, Gen 12:7; Num 32:7; Deut 2:30-3:20. 25. 'made by others': 'hewn out'. 27. The period of the Judges. 'saviours': this title is given to the 'judges'; cf. Jg 2:16, etc. 29a. 'And thou didst testify against them to bring them back to thy law'; cf. 4 Kg 17:13. b. 'which if a man do', etc., is parenthetical; cf. Lk 10:28. 'This do and thou shalt live.' 'withdrew the shoulder': like an ox that refuses the yoke. 30. Cf. Zach 7:12. 'spirit': divine revelation made to the prophets. 'people of the lands': cf. 3:2. 32b. 'turn not . . . labour': 'let not all the hardship seem little before thee'. Assur: the domination by Assyria had been succeeded by that of Babylon and Persia. 33b. 'done truth': i.e. fulfilled thy word in sending both weal and woe. 34b. 'testified against them'. 35. 'kingdoms' should be singular. 36b. 'behold we this day are bondmen': subjects of Persia. 37. The taxes were excessive. 38. 'because of all this': i.e. in view of a sure covenant. The covenant is the conclusion of the whole religious reform initiated by Esdras and Nehemias. It is connected with the previous confession in general subject-matter, though it was probably not signed on the same day. It is a promise, signed and sealed, to observe the divine Law in the future. Its substance is outlined in 10:30-39 and the signatories given in 10:1-28. 38b. 'and sign it . . . and our princes . . . (are enrolled) upon the sealed deed'. The signatures were written on the outside; cf. Jer 32:14. This verse is 10:1 in MT.

j X 1-29 The List of Signatories—1. 'the subscribers': 'enrolled upon the sealed acts': the plural is used to show that several copies were made. The names include priests, Levites and the families whose heads signed on behalf of their houses. Those who hold that chh 8-10 belong to the book of Esdras consider 'Nehemias' to be a late insertion as in 8:9.

k 30-39 The Obligations of the Covenant—30. No intermarriage with non-Israelites: cf. Ex 34:16; Deut 7:3. 31. No trading on the Sabbath day, Ex 31:12-14; 23-12; Deut 5:12; Lev 19:3; and the observance of the sabbatical year by allowing the land to lie fallow, Ex 23:10 f.; Lev 25:2-7, and by not exacting the payment of debts, Deut 15:1-6. 'exaction of every hand' is literal. 32-33. Payment of the temple tax. This is a modification of the half shekel prescribed in Ex 30:11-16 (cf. Mt 17:24). Perhaps the change was due to the straitened circumstances of the community. 33. 'loaves of proposition': 'bread of the setting forth'; cf. §§ 177d, 194b. 34. Provision of wood for the altar. 'cast lots': to determine the time and order in which each family was to supply wood. 'as it is written' refers to the burning, not the fetching of the wood; cf. Lev 6:12. 35-37. The offering of first-fruits, Ex 23:19; Deut 26:2-10, first-born, Ex 13:13; Num 18:16-19, and of tithes, Lev 27:30; Num 18:21-32; Deut 14:22-29. 37. 'meats': 'coarse meal' in the form of a paste, Num 15:21. 'libations': 'offerings', lit. 'something separated', i.e. the portion of first-fruits and of sacrifices set apart for the priests; cf. Lev 7:14, 32, 34. 'receive', etc.: 'receive tithes out of all the cities of our tillage'. 38. A priest was present when the tithes were collected. The Levites received a tenth from the people and gave to the priests a tenth of all they received; cf. Num 18:25-28. This was placed in the storerooms that stood around the temple. ~39. 'for-sake': 'neglect'; cf. however, 13:10-13, where they failed to keep this promise.

298a XI 1-XII 26 The City peopled—This section takes up the thread that had been dropped at 7:4. The inhabitants of Jerusalem were few in proportion to the area of the city, 7:4. Chiefly the official classes dwelt in Jerusalem; the mass of the people lived in the surrounding villages, 11:1. Nehemias decided to select by lot one man in ten to reside in the city. For this purpose a census was required, and Nehemias was about to undertake this task when he discovered a list of the returned exiles already drawn up, 7:5-73. His 'Memoirs' were then interrupted by a description of the feast of tabernacles and the covenant (chh 8-10). The text now returns to the subject of repopulating Jerusalem and briefly describes the method adopted. 2. Some apparently, over and above the tenth selected by lot, volunteered to dwell in Jerusalem. 11:3-12:26 contains lists taken from the state archives with abridgements and necessary adaptations.

3-24 The List of the Residents of Jerusalem—The same list is found in 1 Par 9:2-19 with variations. 3-9. The chief laymen. 3b. Read: 'But in the cities of Judah everyone dwelt in his possession', etc. The whole sentence is parenthetical. Nathanites: cf. 7:47. 'children of the servants of Solomon': cf. 7:57. 8. The text seems corrupt. A suggested emendation is u'ehā(yu) gibbōrē hayil, 'And his kinsmen were mighty warriors'. 9. 'their ruler': of the Benjamites. 'second over the city': second in charge.

10-14 The List of the Priests—14b. 'the son of the mighty': 'of the great ones'. The better Gk codices omit the phrase. We should expect a proper name. 15-18. The Levites. 19. The Porters. 20 interrupts the account of the residents of Jerusalem; it would be more appropriate before 25. 22-24. Notes about various officers and the singers. 23. 'an order', etc.: 'a fixed provision for the singers'. The king is Artaxerxes; cf. 24. 24. 'Phathalia' seems to have been an official representative of Jewish interests at the Persian court. 25-36. The towns and villages occupied by the Jews. 25-30. The Judæan towns. 25. 'And as to the villages with their fields [the unwall towns], some of the sons of Judah dwelt', etc. 30. The 'valley of Gehinnom' ran along the SW. wall of Jerusalem. 31-36. The Benjamite towns.

XII 1-26 A List of Priests and Levites arranged by periods; it carries us down to the times of the sacred writer. 1-9. A list of priests and Levites who came with Zerobabel and Josue, the high-priest. The names in 1-7 also appear with some variations in 10:3-8; 12:12-21; see also Esd 2:36-39. 'everyone in his office': 'were opposite them for the functions', for antiphonal singing. 10-11. The succession of high-priests is carried down from Josue (c 538) to Jeddoā, who was contemporary with Alexander the Great (c 333). Eliasib was high-priest at the time of Nehemias. 12-21. The list in 1-7 was of the contemporaries of Zerobabel; this list gives the heads of those same families 'in the days of Joacim', the successor of Josue as high-priest. 17. Miamin: the name of the representative of this family has fallen out. 22-26. Further Lists. 22. 'Darius the Persian': Darius III (Codomannus), defeated by Alexander. In his day Jeddoā was high-priest; cf. 11. 23. 'the book of Chronicles': not the Chronicles (Par) of the OT. 24. 'Josue, Binnui, Cadmiel': cf. 8; 10:9. 'by their courses': 'opposite them' in the choir. 'to wait equally in order': lit. 'watch over against watch' for antiphonal chant.

27-43 The Dedication of the Walls—One would naturally expect this event to follow closely upon their completion on the 25th of Elul (cf. 6:15). This section, therefore, may be out of place; on the other hand, the dedication may have been delayed because of the approaching feast of tabernacles (chh 8-9). The description is taken in the main from the 'Memoirs' of Nehemias (cf. the use of the first person), but for 33-36 and 40-43 the sacred writer probably had recourse to a temple or a priestly document. The dedication was a symbolic handing over of the walls f 27-30 The Preparation—27. 'out of all their places': the cities in which they dwelt. 'psalteries': Heb. 'nebel', a kind of harp. 28. 'sons of the singing men': merely 'singers'. 'the plain country': 'the circle', here the environs of Jerusalem. Nethuphati: 'of the Netophathites'. Netophah was about 15 m. S. of Jerusalem. 29. 'the house of Gilgal': 'Beth-Gilgal'. 30. 'were purified': 'purified themselves' for the solemnity by ceremonial purification; cf. Esd 6:20.

g 31-39 The Procession—It was marshalled in two great choirs; starting from the western side of the city, one choir went round the southern half of the wall, and the other round the northern half. They joined in the open space before the temple. 31. 'two great choirs to give praise. And they went': the Heb. 'two great thanksgivings and processions' is doubtful. For u'fat^h-lukôl, 'processions', read u'fâ'ahat. 'And one went'. One group went 'on the right hand'; i.e. of one facing eastwards towards the temple. The choir on the right moved along the southern wall, that on the left along the northern. 32-33. Behind the singers and musicians came one half of the chiefs of Judaea with Osias, otherwise unknown, at their head. 34-35. They were followed by seven heads of the priestly families with clarions, and eight of the Levitical with accompanying instruments, while Esdras walked at the head of the priests. 34. 'sons of the priests' = priests; cf. 28. The critics who place the activity of Esdras in 398 after Nehemias (445) believe his presence here to be an interpolation of the Chronicler; on the other hand, his presence supposed, we have a perfect correspondence in the arrangement of the two columns: (a) Oasis, seven priests, eight Levites, Esdras, 32-35; (b) Nehemias, seven priests, eight Levites, Jezraia, 39-41. Esdras is not the leader of the first column, but he is at the head of the sacred ministers. Catholic scholars who follow the same late dating for Esdras but admit his presence as a young man on this occasion (as well as in chh 8-10), are embarrassed by his eminent place at the head of the priests. Those who hold that chh 8-10 are a part of Esd consider that the mention of Esdras here is a later insertion.

h The Route of the Procession—From the Gate of the Valley the two columns moved in opposite directions. Along the southern route of the first column were the Dung Gate, the Fountain Gate, the Stairs of David and the Water Gate at the east of the temple; along the northern course of the second column, the tower of the Furnaces, the Broad Wall, the Gate of Ephraim, the Gate of Jeshanah (Old Gate?), the Fish Gate, the tower of Hananeel, the tower of Meah, the Sheep Gate, and the Prison Gate (the Gate Miphkad of 3:31 [?]). 35b-36. 'And Esdras the scribe was before them. And at the gate of the fountain, going straight on, they went up by the stairs of the city of David [i.e. Ophel] where the wall climbed from the house [tomb (?)] of David'. If the Gate of the Valley be either the Gate of the Essenes or that found in the Tyropoeon Valley, the distance travelled by each column was about the same (c 1600 and c 1300 yards). 42. The two columns met in the open space before the temple and songs of rejoicing were sung and sacrifices of thanksgiving offered. See Map C, page 1311.

i 43-46. Officers are appointed to supervise the collection of the revenues for the temple and its ministers. 43. 'in that day': at that time. The particular time intended is uncertain. 'libations': cf. 10:37. 'that the rulers . . . thanksgiving': 'to gather into them [the storehouses] out of the fields of the cities the legal portions for the priests', etc. 44. HT is obscure. 'and they kept the charge of their God and the observance of purification as did the singers and the porters, according to the command of David and of Solomon his son'. The priests, Levites, singers and porters discharged the duties of their office. 46. 'sanctified': 'Thus they set apart for': the people 'set apart' a tenth portion for the Levites (who were the singers and porters) who in turn gave a part to the priests according to Num 18:25-32.

XIII 1-31 Nehemias' Second Mission—Nehemias remained in Jerusalem for twelve years (445-433 B.C.) and then returned to Susa. He followed anxiously the life of the people of Jerusalem, and when informed of alarming symptoms in their spiritual state, once more obtained permission to visit the city. The date of this second mission is uncertain; probably shortly before the death of Artaxerxes (424 B.C.). It concerns abuses that had arisen in Judaea during Nehemias' absence. 1-3 Excommunication of Foreigners—1. 'on that day'; 'at that time'. The particular time intended is uncertain, but the event seems to have been introduced here to prepare the reader for the expulsion of Tobias from the temple precincts, 4-9, and belongs, therefore, to Nehemias' second mission (7). 'was found written': the rest of this verse and 2 is an almost integral citation of Deut 23:3-5. 'church': 'assembly'. 3. 'stranger': all those not of purely Israelite blood were expelled from the religious body of Israel.

4-9 The Expulsion of Tobias from the Sacred Precincts e —4. 'And over this': 'Now before this', before the excommunication of the non-Israelites and before Nehemias' return. Eliasib: the high-priest of 3:1. 'treasury': 'rooms'. 'Tobias': one of Nehemias' chief enemies, 2:10, and a relative of Eliasib. He persuaded the high-priest to give him a room inside the temple precincts, doubtless offering Eliasib some percentage. This room became a branch office of the Bank of Tobias whose head office was in Ammon. 5. 'before him': 'formerly'. In the rooms about the temple courtyard were stored whatever was needed for divine worship and for the maintenance of the sacred ministers; cf. 12:46. 6. 'because in the 32nd year of Artaxerxes I returned to the king'. Neh. returned to Babylon at the end of the period for which he had asked leave of the king, 2:6. 6b-7. 'And after certain days, I asked (leave of) the king, and I came (a second time) to Jerusalem', after an interval perhaps of some years. Tobias was an Ammonite, 2:10; 4:3, and, as such, his presence in the temple precincts, apart from his business, was an affront to the holiness of the place. 8. 'vessels of the house': 'household furniture'.

10-14. Nehemias, finding that the contribution for the support of the Levites had been neglected with the result that they had to seek a livelihood in the country to the detriment of the temple service, brought them back to Jerusalem, insisted on the payment of tithes, and appointed a commission of two priests and two Levites to supervise the distribution. 14. One of the parenthetic prayers of Nehemias; he prays that he may be remembered for his zeal on behalf of the temple.

15-22 The Observance of the Sabbath—15. He found e men treading grapes, harvesting, bringing produce into the city and (according to Vg) selling it on the Sabbath day. MT reads 15b: 'And I protested on the day they sold provisions' as if they were sold during the week. The difficulty is solved by placing this section after 16. The Vg reading is an attempt to clarify the difficulty in the HT. 16. The Tyrians, sailors and fishermen, as pagans were not interested in the Mosaic Law. 17-19. Nehemias rebuked the leading citizens and ordered the gates to be shut on the eve of the Sabbath and the law of rest to be observed. 19. 'when the gates of Jerusalem grew dark before the Sabbath, I commanded that the gates be shut'. The Sabbath began at sunset. 20. The merchants, for a week or two, set up a market outside the walls. 21. Nehemias promptly used his authority as governor to put down this evasion of his regulations.

23-29 Measures against Mixed Marriages—The old i question of mixed marriages was again giving trouble.

NEHEMIAS XIII

2991 Nehemias found Judaeans married to Philistines, Ammonites and Moabites, and their children unable to speak Hebrew. The guilty were punished and an oath exacted against the repetition of the offence. Even the high-priest's family was involved in guilt. 23. Cf. Esd 9:1-3. 24. 'half of their children spoke Ashdodite'. 25. 'shaved': 'plucked out'. 26. Cf. 3 Kg 11:3. 28. One violation of the law gave particular offence; a grandson of the high-priest had married the daughter of Sanballat (cf. 2:10). The offender was banished and, according to Jewish legend, he set 2991 up a schismatic priesthood in Samaria, and later had a temple built on Mt Gerizim. 29. 'defiled the priesthood': the family of the high-priest was contaminated by the incident of 29. 30-31 A Brief Recapitulation—31. 'the offering of wood'; cf. 10:34. The book ends with the words: 'Remember me, O my God, for good. Amen.' We do not know when Nehemias died. He is lauded in Ecclus 49:15.

b The Text—It is generally acknowledged that the primitive text has not been preserved. It is important, then to bear this well in mind in any discussion of the Book of Tobias, for many of the difficulties encountered therein are fundamentally textual difficulties. At the present stage of our knowledge it is impossible to determine with certainty the language of the original form of our book. Eminent authorities have proposed in turn that it was Hebrew, Aramaic or Greek. It seems probable at least that the original language was Semitic, whether Hebrew or Aramaic cannot at present be decided.

c The book has been transmitted to us in several noticeably divergent forms. The Greek form of the text is represented by: (a) the Codex Sinaiticus; (b) Codices B and A; and (c) the minuscules 44, 106, 107. The Hebrew, which is certainly not primitive in its present form, is found in the edition of *S. Munster (1542), which may represent a 5th cent. text; in that of *P. Fagius, which offers perhaps a text of the 12th cent.; and in the London Hebrew MS (Brit. Mus. Add. 11639) and the Hebrew of *M. Gaster. The date of the London and Gaster Hebrew is uncertain. An Aramaic form (possibly 7th cent.) of the text was discovered at Oxford in the Bodleian Library and has been edited (1878) by *A. Neubauer. The Old Latin Version, preserved in three forms, follows quite closely the Greek recension exhibited in the Codex Sinaiticus. Most of the Greek minuscules follow the B A form of the text, as do also the Armenian and Ethiopic Versions, and the Syriac in part. Vg is the work of St Jerome who tells us that, 'Since the Chaldean speech is allied to the Hebrew, I found someone who spoke both languages readily, and, taking a day's work, what he said to me in Hebrew that I rendered into Latin to a notary whom I had engaged' (Praef. in librum Tobiae, PL 29, 25 f.). The Aramaic text used by Jerome has not come down to us. The Neubauer Aramaic referred to above, although it manifests some affinity with Vg, is not its source. Jerome's work, produced in his early days as a translator, shows that he rendered his original with considerable freedom. Frequently it is clear that he has translated the sense of a passage rather than its exact literal meaning. In general, it can be said that Tobias is less carefully done than most of his other work.

d Although it is true that the various forms of the book just mentioned differ noticeably one from the other, still substantially the book is the same in all forms. They all show the same simple story throughout, the same characters, the same events in the same order.

The differences, though striking at times, are mainly in unimportant details, proper names, discourses, and the like. Nevertheless, the work of the text-critic who seeks to restore the original form of the book is not easy. He will sense at once that the present Hebrew and Aramaic forms, although worthy of consideration, cannot be looked upon as primitive. Approaching the Greek, he will notice that B and its affiliates present a shorter text of Hellenistic character, while Sinaiticus is Hebraistic and longer. He will remark the striking similarity between the Old Latin and Sinaiticus, and will not overlook the influence of the Old Latin on Vg. What then should be his choice of method? Various replies would undoubtedly be given to this question. Without being dogmatic we would suggest cautiously that the primitive text could best be restored by taking Sinaiticus, rigorously compared with the Old Latin, as a groundwork, and collating this basic text with the other known forms of the book. In this task a careful workman will not overlook the ancient Vg, for even though it was done in a day by St Jerome, it does not follow, as suggested in some circles, that it is altogether devoid of critical value. In the commentary to follow, the Bible-text to be used is the current DV; however the preferences just indicated will exercise some influence, especially in passages where the difficulty is mainly textual.

Title and Author of the Book—In Vg and DV both father and son are called Tobias (1:9). However, in the other forms of the book the father's name is Tobit and his son's Tobias. This latter designation is the correct one. However, both names are of Hebrew derivation and are closely related. They have the meaning, 'Yahweh is my good', or 'my good is Yahweh'. The ancient forms of the book bear a variety of titles. It is probable that the most ancient title was simply, 'The Words of Tobit'. If the words 'publish (other texts, "write") all his wonderful works' (12:20) are authentic, the title would indicate that Tobit and Tobias were the authors of the book. It is quite possible that these main characters were the first to put the narrative in form and that the original story stems from them. It could easily have been handed down orally or in a very simple written form, until at a much later date it was composed under inspiration by the actual author who would have used the earlier written or oral sources. Nothing, however, has come down to us concerning the actual author of the book.

Date of the Book—From several indications in the book itself, as well as from a comparison of the various forms in which it appears at present, it seems fairly certain that the narrative went through several stages over a fairly long period of time. There is a marked personal tone throughout, and so, it is quite possible that the story was first related in a simple form by the principal characters, Tobias and his son, and was then handed down orally in the family. Later this simple outline would have been transferred to writing, and at some still later date it would have received substantially the common form in which we read it today. At best, however, this viewpoint is conjectural, since, as already stated, the original text of the work has not been preserved. At any rate it is beyond question that one or all of the unnamed authors of the g In view of the uncertainty surrounding the history of the text of Tobias it is not strange that we find wide disagreement among authorities as to the actual time of composition of the written work. Some non-Catholic authors (v.g. *Schürer, *Lohr) assign the book to the 2nd cent. and Simpson to a date nearer 170 than 350 B.C.; while others put it as late as the 2nd cent. A.D. Several Catholic scholars (v.g. Vetter), influenced by the fact that certain customs are alluded to in some forms of the book (the threefold tithes, the levirate duty, etc.) have argued that this definitely assigns the book to a period roughly from 250 B.C. to 150 B.C. Although these reasons are not altogether convincing, it seems clear, on the one hand, that the book was composed after Assyrian times. Otherwise it is difficult to see why it was not accepted into the Palestinian Canon. Furthermore, intrinsic reasons point to an author who held views on the future life prevalent in the post-exilic period. Much of the doctrine and counsel of Tobias would sound well on the lips of a contemporary of the author of Ecclesiastes. On the other hand, the author gives no sign that he knows of the great national upheavals of Maccabean times nor is he aware of the penetrating influence of Pharisaism. Convincing arguments have not yet been advanced to date the written composition of Tobias.

h Uncertainty also surrounds the question as to the country of composition. Several have been suggested with some probability—Palestine, Egypt, Babylonia and Persia. Palestine has been excluded since, it is alleged, it is difficult to see why the book was not added to the Palestinian Canon if composed in that country. However, this reasoning is not convincing. The work is thoroughly Palestinian in its whole conception, and its origin in Palestine is a possibility. Some scholars favour Egypt, but if the book originated in the Jewish colony there, we should expect to find traces of Hellenistic influence. Further, it is unlikely that an author writing in Egypt would relegate the demon to his own country (8:3). Both Babylonia and Persia are attractive suggestions, but there is no conclusive evidence that the author of the written work resided in those countries. It is prudent to withhold judgement until more convincing evidence has been adduced.

301a Literary Character of the Book—The delicate and vexatious problem here treated is concerned with the question: What type of literature are we dealing with in this book? Is the story of Tobias to be viewed as strict history or not? For, although the work is in every sense a fully inspired and canonical book, this is not the same thing as saying that it relates strict history, since any type of literature is compatible with biblical Inspiration so long as it is not by its very nature unworthy of God. St Thomas Aquinas pointed out centuries ago that, 'In Scripture divine things are presented to us in the manner which is in common use amongst men'. The determination of the type of literature, however, is not a mere literary problem for it must greatly influence the subsequent interpretation of the book. Hence this whole question must be handled with prudence and caution. Moreover, the ultimate decision must necessarily rest with the Church since she alone is the infallible interpreter of all inspired Scripture. Thus far the Church has not expressed her mind in this matter specifically. She has given general directions, but no decision. Quite recently, new impetus has been given to the study of the problem by the clear and precise directives of the Encyclical Divino Afflante Spiritu, which has an extremely valuable section on the importance of the 'mode of writing' or 'literary forms' in Sacred Scripture. These directives of Pius XII, as well as those of his Predecessors and the Fathers and Doctors of the Church, must be borne in mind by the investigator who seeks to attain the true sense of any inspired literature.

301b A brief glance at the history of interpretation of our book suffices to show that a definite judgement on its literary character is not easily formed. The Fathers and ancient writers have scattered references to the Book of Tobias in their works, but they have left us no full commentary. Ambrose on Tobias is really a treatise against usury. Bede's work can scarcely be called a strict commentary, being but a brief allegorical outline. Strabo is merely a repetition of Bede. None of the ancients has left us a definite treatment of the literary character of Tobias or questioned its historicity. In a sense, then, it may be said that they presumed that the book is strictly historical since no other consideration had arisen for them. *M. Luther was one of the first to deny its historical character. For him it was a devout drama, a legend with a didactic purpose. Non-Catholic authors, for the most part, deny altogether the historicity of Tobias, viewing it as a poetic fiction, a pure fable or a fantastic fairy-tale. A few Catholic writers expressed much the same views, v.g. J. Jahn and C. Movers. Most Catholic scholars, however, consider the book historical, at least to some extent; although A. Scholz proposed the peculiar subjective theory that Tobias is an allegorical prophecy describing Israel's return to the Church at the end of time. Among Catholic scholars who have treated the problem expressly, Gutberlet, Reusch, Vigouroux, Cornely-Merk, Galdos and others defend a strictly historical conception of the book in all its details; others, as Hummelauer, N. Peters, P. Vetter and A. Miller prefer to view the book as historical in a broader sense: there is a definite historical foundation or nucleus, but the author's principal purpose is didactic. Vetter was one of the earliest to propose this opinion with considered argumentation; Miller has recently attracted attention by presenting the theory in a new way. Thus it can be seen that even amongst Catholic scholars there has not been uniformity of viewpoint regarding the literary form of the Book of Tobias.

It is apparent at once that there are two radically opposed views in this matter. (1) There is the opinion of those who hold that the book is strictly historical in every detail. Their reasons: the tradition of the Church; the fact that the book has every appearance of intending to relate history and nothing else—it gives us an account of real persons, in real geographical and historical circumstances. (2) Those who assert that the story of Tobias is pure fiction, and who defend their position with the following reasons: there are historical and geographical errors in the book sufficient to destroy its historicity; a good part of the narrative presumes the intervention of supernatural forces or is clearly intended to imply the working of miracles; there are several references in the book to the fables of the Grateful Dead and to the legend of Achikar.

If a solution can be given in the present state of our knowledge, it probably lies somewhere between these two extreme positions. It is quite true that an unbiased reading of the book leads one to conclude that the author's obvious intention was to relate historical happenings, at least in a general way. This point of evidence is capital and must enter into any solution of the problem. Whether an appeal to tradition yields the conclusion that the book must be considered strict history in every detail, is questionable. As has been already pointed out, the ancients did not pose our specific problem. The fact that the Councils of Trent and the Vatican list Tobias among historical books scarcely proves that our book must be viewed in the strictest historical sense. Nor is an appeal to the Decree of Gelasius (EB 19) conclusive. True, this document lists Tobias under the heading, Item ordo historiarum; but it also includes the Book of Job in the same list, and yet scarcely anyone would consider Job an historical work in all its details. A decree of the Consistorial Congregation (29 June, 1912) excluded a work of C. Holzhey from use in Seminaries for its very audacious opinions. That concerning Tobias, which 301e holds it to be pure, poetic fiction, is mentioned among others. Still, it does not follow from this decree that Tobias must be viewed as a work strictly historical in the sense, say, of St Luke's Gospel. It would follow, though, that to consider Tobias as altogether unhistorical and as pure fiction would be presumptuous. This is the tendency of writers of the other extreme; and their arguments are even less probative. Thus, for example, to assert that there are geographical and historical errors in Tobias and that therefore its historicity is destroyed, is to misread the evidence badly. There are historical and geographical difficulties in the current forms of the book, but these can be solved adequately as purely textual problems. Hence they need not be imputed to the original author and do not affect the literary character of the book one way or the other. Nor does the fact of supernatural intervention, or of the miraculous, in the narrative destroy its historicity. This is a purely rationalistic conception. If the fact of a miracle is firmly established exegetically it must be accepted; to reject it solely because miraculous is to proceed unscientifically. The bearing of the Achikar legend on the Book of Tobias will be discussed § 301h-i.

f By way of summary, the following points can be made. The Church has not yet given a definite decision concerning the literary form of the Book of Tobias. However, since traditionally the book has always been considered historical in some way, and since the author's obvious intention is to give a real, historical setting to his story, the exegete should consider that at least the substantial framework is historical. Since, on the other hand, the story is related with perceptible artistry and to inculcate a moral, its didactic purpose must be considered the principal intention of the author. This didactic purpose does not destroy the historical foundation of the book. The decree of the Biblical Commission (June 23, 1905) concerning those books of Holy Scripture which are regarded as historical, either wholly or in part, should be recalled here; cf. § 52j. If such books are to be considered to give at times only the appearance of history, then this viewpoint must be proven by solid arguments and subject to the ultimate decision of the Church. The view, then, that the story of Tobias relates real historical facts is in possession, and the opposite must be proved in each case. On account of the doubtful state of the text of this book it is next to impossible at the present time to be more determinate or to say with certainty that this or that section of the narrative is, or is not, strict history.

g The connexion of several widely-known legends or fables with the Tobias story is a question of some importance since it has a bearing on the literary character of our book. Some of these, such as the legend of the Grateful Dead and the Egyptian Khonsu legend, can be dismissed almost at once. The Grateful Dead story has a rather grotesque similarity to Tobias, but since it does not pre-date Christian times there can be no question of literary relationship to our book unless, perhaps, it is a pure distortion of Tobias. The Khonsu fable (cf. *J. H. Breasted, Ancient Records of Egypt, 3 (1906) 188 ff.) was composed earlier, but its only similarity to Tobias is in the account of the king's daughter who was tormented by a spirit or demon—a very narrow basis on which to establish any sort of dependence.

h The story of Achikar deserves more attention. This tale, widely read in antiquity, was certainly known to the Jews and apparently treasured by them even though its setting was pagan. It has come down to us in a great variety of forms in many languages; cf. *F. C. Conybeare, Harris, Lewis, The Story of Ahikar (1913¹). In brief, it relates the story of Achikar, the grand chancellor of king Sennacherib of Assyria, and his wicked nephew, Nadan. Achikar had brought up the nephew as his own son, and yet the ungrateful youth, who had not absorbed the piety and wisdom of the uncle, managed successfully, by very devious methods, to have the aged Achikar accused before the king of treason and condemned to prison. Later the evil was discovered and Nadan paid for his treachery with his life. The tale is embellished with a host of proverbs or maxims of Achikar, but the most surprising thing about it all is that the story of Achikar is quoted in the present form of the Book of Tobias. For some this fact alone has been sufficient proof that Tobias is not intended as history in any sense. It clearly shows, they claim, that the story of Tobias is a legend or fable similar to that of Achikar, and that the author of Tobias simply incorporated parts of the Achikar legend in his own fictitious narrative. The whole question is involved and is beset with many uncertainties.

Vg and DV have only one citation (11:20) from 1 Achikar; in this passage Achikar and Nadan are found rejoicing with Tobias and his son over their good fortune. The other forms of the Book of Tobias give also at least three further citations from Achikar; 1:21, 22; 2:10; 14:10. These places are so well attested by textual evidence that (except perhaps for the citation in 14:10) they must be considered as probably part of the text of Tobias. Furthermore, on account of recent findings in connexion with the Achikar story, it is now generally admitted that the story of Achikar was in existence before the composition of the Book of Tobias. This is not enough in itself, however, to establish a certain literary dependence of Tobias on Achikar. The two narratives are quite dissimilar and independent, although both have an obvious didactic purpose. Moreover, the brief sections cited in Tobias are so very loosely bound in with the Tobias story that they can be omitted without affecting it in the least. The Achikar text like that of Tobias has been only imperfectly transmitted, and we are no more certain of the original form and language of the Achikar legend than we are of the Tobias story. Some evidence has been produced to show that Achikar was a real, historical personage, and that at least the outline of his story is historical, but it is not altogether conclusive. At any rate, before making definite judgements on the relation of Achikar, and his story and sayings, to Tobias, we need much more evidence than we now possess. It would seem best to conclude at the present time that even if the Achikar citations in Tobias are certainly authentic, and this can still be questioned, we can deduce nothing from this to prove or reject the historicity of the Book of Tobias.

Theme and Analysis of the Book—With spontaneous 302a artistry and naturalness the author of this book gives us the very beautiful and highly edifying life-stories of the pious Israelite Tobias and of his son, also called Tobias. It pictures a family living in captivity amongst a pagan people, far from its homeland, yet fully observant of the Law of Moses and trusting in God amidst many trials and difficulties. The theme of the book, then, is the inculcation of the truth that the most important thing in this life is to put full confidence in God, seeing in all things his benevolent Providence, and accepting from his hand with trusting resignation both prosperity and misfortune.

The story opens with Tobias, the elder, a captive of b the Assyrians in the city of Nineveh. With a quick, retrospective glance, 1:4-10, the author then shows us that even as a boy Tobias walked always in the way of the Lord. Among those in captivity his conduct was most exemplary, for, fearing God rather than men, he was careful to give alms and to bury the bodies of the dead, even though this incurred the anger of the king. When afflicted with blindness he did not blame God for this misfortune but bore it patiently even in the face of the upbraidings of his own wife, 1:11-3:6. While these events were taking place, the scene changes with gentle, dramatic effect to Sara a young maiden of Ecbatana, who would one day be the wife of Tobias' son. We find her pouring out a touching prayer to God for help in her great misery, 3:7-23. The story then returns to Tobias, who had prayed to 302b be allowed to die if God so willed. Expecting that God might take him from this world, Tobias admonishes his son to lead a virtuous life, 4:1-20, and tells him to seek out Gabelus, a fellow-tribesman living in Rages, to whom he had given a sum of money, 4:21-23. The young Tobias is fearful of setting out on so long a journey into unknown country, but he is unexpectedly assisted by the Angel Raphael in the guise of a young man who offers to guide him to Gabelus, 5:1-28. This offer is accepted and the two set out on their journey. After an exciting adventure with a large fish, 6:1-9, they seek lodging at the home of a kinsman who is Raguel, the father of Sara, the maiden already mentioned. The Angel counsels Tobias to seek the hand of Sara in marriage, but he is reluctant as he had heard that Sara had already had seven husbands who were killed by a devil. The Angel reassures the young man and instructs him how to overcome the power of the demon, 6:10-22. So they go to Raguel and are received with joy. When Tobias asks for the hand of Sara, her parents express great fear lest if they consent Tobias, too, will be killed. However, Raguel finally yields to the young man's entreaties, and Tobias is betrothed to Sara, 7:1-20. Things turn out well as the Angel had predicted, for on the marriage night Sara and Tobias pray together, the power of the demon is broken, and no harm ensues 8:1-24. Tobias then remains with Raguel while the Angel journeys on to meet Gabelus and redeem Tobias' note, 9:1-12. Meanwhile, at home the elder Tobias and his wife, Anna, become solicitous for their son since he has not returned at the appointed time; the mother, especially, is disconsolate, 10:1-7. However, Tobias as a good son takes leave of Raguel, despite his pressing invitation to remain, and begins the homeward journey with his bride, 10:8-13. The homecoming is a joyful one indeed, and it is further gladdened when Tobias at the Angel's bidding anoints his father's eyes with the gall of the fish and the old man's blindness leaves him, 11:1-21. When Tobias seeks to repay the Angel for all he had done, not knowing, of course, that this kind stranger was really an Angel of God, Raphael makes himself known. He tells Tobias and his son that their afflictions were permitted by God to try them; and as they are thunderstruck at this revelation, the Angel disappears from their sight, 12:1-22. The final chapters, in the form of a sort of epilogue, contain the blessing of Tobias the elder, prophecies of the future of the Holy City, ch 13, and an account of the later happy life and holy death of Tobias, father and son, ch 14.

d Doctrinal Content—The book is a veritable treasure-house of doctrine, both speculative and practical. It teaches by both word and example: the history of Tobias and his family inculcates particularly the moral virtues and the happy result, in general, of remaining faithful to God and his commandments. The various prayers and admonitions and counsels contain admirable expositions of doctrine.

e The existence of a personal God is both presumed and mentioned directly; his perfections are referred to frequently. Especially in the prayers and admonitions the God addressed, or referred to, is the one God of Israel, the Creator of all things. The book is thoroughly monotheistic: Yahweh is God; he is omnipotent, eternal, no one can escape his hand, 13:1-4. His benign Providence watches over all things and guides the destinies of all men: events are arranged according to his will, 3:19; 7:14. He certainly sends us trials and permits temptations to prove us, 3:21; 12:13; but just as surely, if we are faithful, he will deliver us from the trials and reward our fidelity, 13:2; 3:22. This God, though eminently just, 3:2, is yet filled with mercy and fatherly solicitude for his children, 3:21 f.; 'he hath chastised us for our iniquities: and he will save us for his own mercy', 13:5. In a word, the God of the Book of Tobias is the one, true God, who rules all things wisely; the God of Israel, who is omnipotent, just and merciful, who

f The teaching on the angels and demons is almost all found in the explanations of the Angel Raphael himself. Raphael is an angel (mal'āk) sent by God, 12:14, 20. He is incorporeal, 12:19; 'one of the seven, who stand before the Lord', 12:15. His duties are to carry out the commands of God who sent him, and to intercede for men before the face of God, 12:12. Angels guard and protect men, 5:21, 27; 10:11. They also have power from God over the demons, 8:3; 12:14. The book tells us a number of things about these demons, although it is by no means a treatise on demonology, and much less is it to be considered a reflection of the beliefs of the Persians or Babylonians on this subject. Here, one devil, Asmodeus, plays the chief role. He has killed the husbands of Sara, 3:10; he torments her household, 8:18; but he remains subject to God's power and to the Angel sent by God, 8:3; 12:14. Nor has he power over all men but only over those who leave themselves open to his machinations, 6:16, 17.

g Man is a creature of God and therefore should not live like the heathens 'that know not God', 6:17; 8:5, 8. He has a higher destiny, 4:11, 23; 12:9, and should by his good works make himself worthy of it. Whether the author of the book had a clear concept of the future life can be questioned. Several allusions would lead us to think that at least he knew that man would live after death and would then receive the reward for his good deeds which he could not expect in this life. We cannot anticipate, of course, at this period, the clarity of NT teaching on the future life.

h Tobias has always been a favourite source of instruction on the sanctity of marriage. In it the state of matrimony is very clearly regarded as a holy union, 8:5. It is to be entered upon with a clean and upright conscience, 4:13; 3:16, 18; its use is to be held sacred, 6:17, 22, and approached with prayer, 6:18. Its main purpose is not sensual gratification, but the procreation of children, 'for the love of posterity, in which thy name (O Lord) may be blessed for ever and ever', 8:9; 6:21 f. Those who profane this sacred state deserve punishment and lay themselves open to the power of the demons, 'they who in such manner receive matrimony, as to shut out God from themselves, and from their mind, and to give themselves to their lust, as the horse and mule, which have not understanding: over them the devil hath power', 6:17. Cf. the Commentary on 3:8 and 6:16 ff. The spouses should be a mutual support to each other; they should be faithful, 4:13; the husband should respect his wife, and the wife should love her husband, 10:13.

i Good works are counselled on almost every page of the book. Since the author's chief aim is to inculcate the advantages of an upright, moral life, this is not surprising. He teaches this lesson mainly by the example of the true Israelite, Tobias, and by that of his family. Tobias, even as a boy, observes the Law strictly, 1:4, 8. Later he performs many good deeds, 1:11 f.; 19:20; and he admonishes his son to do likewise, 4:2-20. He had no human respect in all this, for he feared God more than the king, and more than his mocking relatives, 2:9, 18. Nor did he work and hope in vain, for his fidelity to God was rewarded, 12:12 ff.

j Four types of good works are especially practised and inculcated: prayer, the burial of the dead, fasting and alms-giving. All the principal characters of the book practise prayer with confidence: Tobias, 3:1 ff.; Sara, 3:10 ff.; Raguel and Anna, 8:6, 16; Tobias, the son, and Sara, 8:4, 6. They pray frequently, 2:14; they pray publicly, 1:6, and privately. They pray alone and with others. They also pray with great fervor, 3:1, 11; 8:6; 12:22. Moreover, their prayers were heard by God, thus testifying to the efficacy of trustful prayer, 12:8, 12.

302k There is frequent mention of Tobias' zeal in burying the dead. With great danger to himself and heroic sacrifice, he hid the bodies of those slain by the king and buried them carefully by night, 1:20 ff.; 2:4, 9 ff.; 12:12.

1 Fasting and alms-giving are both commended and practised: Tobias, according to the Law, kept himself from the defilement of pagan foods, 1:12. Sara fasted to make her prayer more worthy, 3:10; and the Angel Raphael gave the valuable counsel: 'Prayer is good with fasting and alms: more than to lay up treasures of gold'. It is often related of Tobias that he helped the needy with his alms, 1:17, 19; 2:16; and he also counsels his son to give generously, 4:9 ff. Besides these good works, others are mentioned, e.g. feeding the hungry and clothing the naked, 1:20. All these good deeds please God and merit a reward, 4:10; 12:8 ff.

303a I 1 The Prologue—In most forms of the book the story opens with a brief genealogical preface. This has been abbreviated in Vg, either because St Jerome did not find it in his Aramaic text or because he deliberately shortened it to essentials, perhaps because of his distaste for extended genealogies; cf. PL 26, 594 f. A tendency to abbreviate or summarize on the part of Jerome is noticeable throughout the Vg of Tobias, and particularly in this first chapter. It is difficult to determine just how much of the various forms of the genealogy here should be considered primitive. The same holds for the succeeding geographical designation. It is probable that the following elements are original: 'Tobias, of the seed of Asiel, of the tribe of Nephtali, of a certain city of that tribe which was situated in upper Galilee, being on the south of Qadesh [of Nephtali] and to the north of Safed, and with Aser [Hazor] to the West, was made captive . . .'

b 2-10 Early Piety of Tobias—The general historical setting is given in this first chapter. The scene is laid 'in the days of Salmanasar king of the Assyrians'. In view of 1:18, especially, it is quite clear that this cannot have been Shalmaneser V (727-722), but must have been Sargon II (721-705). This is sometimes urged as a clinching proof of the historical inaccuracy of the book. However, the difficulty is not serious. 'Salmanasar' is either a pure textual error, or a scribal correction influenced by the name, Enemessar, found in the various Greek forms of the book. Enemessar is an unknown name, but it may be explained as the result of an inversion of the compound Assyrian form (Sarru-uktn) of the name 'Sargon'. Hence the correct reading here is Enemessar, i.e. Sargon. We are, then, in the days of Isaías the Prophet, in the 8th cent. B.C., when the kingdoms of Judah and Israel were divided, and Assyria the predominant world-power. The principal character in the story is Tobias, a pious inhabitant of the Northern Kingdom, who was carried into captivity by the Assyrian invaders. Such deportations were the common method of keeping the conquered peoples in subjugation. There is no difficulty in admitting that Tobias of Nephtali was carried off in the deportation of Sargon in 721, just after the capture of Samaria. For although there was an earlier deportation of Nephtali, certainly not all the citizens were carried off at that time, and Sargon can easily be presumed to have deported some of the inhabitants of the other cities of Israel on his return from the capture of Samaria. Although the exiles were usually treated well by the conquerors, there was always danger of a lapse in their religious observance due to the pagan influences to which they were necessarily exposed. Tobias, however, is pictured as a faithful observer of the law.

c 4. 'And when he (I) was still quite young all the tribe of Nephtali fell away from the house of David . . .'. 5. Nephtali had followed the idolatrous practices of the other tribes of the Northern Kingdom, instituted back in the early days of the division of the people of God under Jeroboam, 3 Kg 12:19 ff. Tobias (one need not take alone too strictly; not everyone in Israel apostatized) remained faithful to God. 6. The journey to the Temple at Jerusalem was prescribed three times a year, Ex 23:17, for the Feasts of the Pasch, Pentecost, and Tabernacles. Tobias made the journeys required by the Law and moreover offered the prescribed first-fruits and tithes. The argument advanced by some for the late composition of the book from the fact that the Greek mentions three classes of tithes is not wholly convincing. 9. Tobias took a wife of his own nation, Ex 34:11 ff., and perhaps also of his own tribe and family. Tobit, the father, called his son Tobias, a name similar to his own, cf. § 300e.

—11. From the available evidence, it is very difficult to establish a complete chronology for the Book of Tobias. Vg would suggest here that Tobias was married and had a son at the time of his deportation. However, the greater number of important textual witnesses do not suggest this, and permit the conclusion that Tobias was married and begot his son during the captivity. This latter seems much the better view and fits in quite well with the whole narrative. Tobias was carried to Nineveh, which was the most flourishing city of the Assyrian Empire and became the capital city soon afterwards, under Sennacherib (705-681). 14. The other forms of the text indicate that Sargon, the king, was impressed by the attractive appearance of Tobias and appointed him his steward, or purchasing-agent, cf. Gen 41:40 ff.; Dan 1:1 ff. The great liberty accorded to Tobias by the king is not to be considered as altogether unusual, for the Assyrians allowed the exiles a fair measure of freedom in the hope that they would forget the homeland. 16. The pious youth made good use of his favour with the king, and, while keeping the prescriptions of the Law of Moses, managed to be of great service to his fellow-captives. One example of his charity and generosity is given here which will later have an important bearing on the story. Rages (Rhey or Rai, ruins near Teheran?) was a city of the Medes, far distant from Nineveh, but it can be supposed that Tobias was on one of his purchasing trips for the king. 17. His loan to Gabelus was a very large one, probably amounting to more than three thousand pounds.

18-25 Corporal Works of Mercy—18. Since Sennacherib was the son, not of Shalmaneser but of Sargon, the name 'Salmanasar' must be emended here, as in 2 and 13, to Enemessar, i.e. 'Sargon'. In Scripture mediate as well as immediate successors are often called 'sons', but that does not appear to be the solution of the difficulty here. It is more likely to be a question of a faulty text. The facts related in this and the following verses correspond with the data found in the Assyrian records of the time of Sennacherib as well as with the historical references of the Bible; cf. 4 Kg 18:17 ff.; Is 36 f. 21-25. In almost all forms of the text except Vg this section is more detailed: Tobias' good deeds are recounted in much the same form, but Vg omits entirely any reference to Achikar, cf. § 301h-i. In the other forms of the text Achikar is described as the administrator, or overseer, of the Assyrian king. He is called the cousin german of Tobias, and by his intercession with the king Tobias was permitted to return to Nineveh. It is clear that the time interval mentioned in 24 must refer to Tobias' flight (23) and should, therefore, be understood of the period just preceding the assassination of Sennacherib; hence it has no connexion with Sennacherib's retreat from Jerusalem (21) which took place some twenty years earlier.

II 1-18 The Blindness of Tobias—1. Notwithstanding his many charitable works and his strict observance of the Law, the pious Israelite, Tobias, was soon to be afflicted with grave personal sufferings. Even in the ancient dispensation, God permitted his saints to be overwhelmed with afflictions that they might be more and more purified in the fire of suffering. In the Greek, the circumstances of the 'festival' are 804a more detailed: Esarhaddon (681-669) is the Assyrian king, and the festival is the Feast of Pentecost. Such details fill out the narrative, but at least some of them are surely later additions. 4. Tobias acted with great caution lest he should again attract the unfavourable attention of the public authorities. 6. Amos, who prophesied some twenty-five years before the time of Tobias, is here cited freely. More literally the prophecy (Am 8:10) reads: 'And I will turn your feasts into mourning and all your songs into lamentation'. 10-11. The Greek indicates that Tobias was blinded on the very night of the Feast; it also mentions sparrows rather than swallows, a very unimportant detail.

b 12-18. Of greater importance and interest is the fact that this brief passage is found only in Vg. The Greek has details of its own, for example, it relates Tobias' unsuccessful visits to the physicians, and a further mention of Achikar, who 'nourished me two years until he went to Elymais' (cf. § 301h-i). It is extremely difficult to determine the exact form of the original text for this section. The differences in the Greek form are shared substantially by the other forms of the text now extant, and there is no exact agreement. As for the longer form of Vg, it is hard to believe that St Jerome simply added his own spiritual reflexions to the text he was translating. He must have had some basis for his rendering, even though it must be admitted that he translated freely. The Vg fragment, at any rate, offers a precious spiritual lesson: the sufferings of Tobias were permitted by God, and this fact was clearly appreciated by the pious Israelite who looked towards a heavenly reward for his fidelity.

c 19-23 Tobias upbraided by his Wife—The Greek makes it clearer why Tobias was worried: the kid was given to Anna by her employer over and above her wages. Hence Tobias, knowing that such a thing was not her ordinary wage, and realizing that it was beyond her simple means to purchase, feared that it had been stolen. 22. The domestic altercation that followed is delightful in its realism: the husband reasonably suspicious; the wife in perfectly good faith, and in no mood for argument after a hard day's work; both quite blameless; and the wife very angry.

d III 1-8 Tobias trusts in God—This passage contains one of the five strikingly beautiful prayers quoted in the book: 3:1-6; 3:13-23; 8:7-9; 8:17-19; 13:1-23. These prayers are noticeably similar in form, and they contain several common elements: (1) praise of God; (2) confession; (3) petition; (4) doxology. The doxology is omitted in the first and fourth prayers, and the petitions vary in circumstance, but otherwise the similarity is remarkable. This similarity could easily be due to the fact that the Hebrews of the time used a uniform general formula in their prayers, as well as to the personal touch of a redactor. It is quite probable that the substantial elements of the prayers are due to the original characters themselves, although it is not necessary to attribute to them the exact verbal form. Perhaps the most striking doctrinal note in this first prayer is Tobias' full submission to the will of God. 4. Just as God had so often promised: If Israel would not remain faithful she would certainly be punished, see 2 Kg 7:14, and passim in the Prophets.

e 7-10a Sara is rebuked by a Maidservant—Previous to this section, in most forms of the book, Tobias has related the story in the first person: 'I Tobias. . .'. Henceforward, as in Vg, the narrative is in the third person. 7. At the same time that Tobias was being upbraided by his wife, Sara was reproached by one of her father's maidservants. The city of Sara and Raguel is Ecbatana, not Rages of Vg and DV. 8. This is the first mention of an episode (cf. 6:14; 7:11; 8:12) which appears altogether incredible to many authors; some even viewing it as absolutely conclusive evidence that the whole book is a fantastic fairy-tale, with certain borrowings from pagan demonology. A more exhaustive study of the question, however, shows that the evidence for such views is far from conclusive. 804a It should be noted in regard to the derivation of the name Asmodeus, that this is quite adequately explained by the Hebrew root šmād, hence 'the Destroyer'. Recourse to Persian derivation, v.g. aśma daeva, should be had only when the word cannot be explained through Semitic etymology. It should also be noted that the references to Asmodeus in Tobias are quite different from those on the same subject found in later Jewish extrabiblical literature. These fabulous accounts cannot be used in explanation of our book. Moreover, even if a Persian derivation of the name be granted, a dependence of Tobias on Iranian demonology would not be proved. Asmodeus could have been a name commonly in use in Semitic circles for the devil, somewhat as Beelzebub at the time of Christ, and without any doctrinal implications.

Nor is there sufficient reason to believe that Sara was a subject of diabolic possession, cf. 6:15. It has been urged, nevertheless, that it is quite incredible that Sara should have had seven successive husbands, and that all these men should have been killed by Asmodeus at the time of their first marital relations with her. Regarding the number seven, it is recognized Hebrew usage (cf. Gen 4:15; Lev 26:28; Deut 28:7; Prov 6:31; Eccles 35:13; Lk 17:4; etc.) that this number often means 'several', 'a number', or that it stands for the perfect number, or fullness, without specific designation. So, Sara could easily have had several husbands, not necessarily seven. But were they all killed at the time of their first relations with her? The text does not indicate this with certainty, either here or elsewhere in the book. True, Vg implies it, but the better textual witnesses have simply: 'before they had been with her as it is appointed for women', hence before marital congress. So, Sara's husbands were killed by the devil, with God's permission, before they had intercourse with her, and due to some guilt on their part. Though extraordinary, such an account is not incredible. Some have seen in this text an argument against the sin of Birth Prevention. The argument, based mainly on the assumption that the husbands were killed 'at their first going in unto her', is not well-founded in the light of the better reading of the text. If the reasons given for the death of the husbands of Sara in Vg are authentic (see 6:17; 7:12, 14), one might argue thus, a fortiori, against the crime of Birth Prevention: since the husbands were punished by God on account of their lustful approach to matrimony, then the abuse of marriage by the direct interference of contraception would deserve even greater punishment. 9. The rejoinder of the servant is bitter and calumnious, for Sara had no guilt in the matter. The accusation, 'thou murderer of thy husbands', is either a gossip report or a purely mischievous invention of the maid.

10b-23 Sara's Confidence in God—10b. The bitterness of the accusation, coupled, no doubt, with the memory of the facts, caused Sara to become greatly upset. Her emotions were in turmoil, she wished to be alone, she would neither eat nor drink. It is even likely that the Greek is correct here in its addition, 'and (she) desired to hang herself', for such a temptation could easily arise under great emotional stress. Sara, however, turned to God for help, and the prayer which follows is a model for those in great affliction. It is more extensive, more reasoned, in Vg than in the Greek. The latter seems more primitive. 16. She never desired a husband lustfully. 17. 'Play', in the sense of sensual levity. 19. See 7:12, 14. The Greek indicates that Sara was the only heir of Raguel.

III 24-IV 23 Tobias instructs his Son—24-25. 805a At about the same time the prayers of Tobias and Sara were heard by God, who sent the Angel Raphael to help them. These two verses act as a sort of summary introduction to the second part of the book, which deals chiefly with the intervention of the Archangel Raphael. IV:1. Tobias senior felt that his prayer (3:6) had been heard and that he would soon die. As 305a a true Israelite (cf. Gen 49:1; Deut 33:1; 1 Mac 2:49, etc.) he called his son to give him a father's parting counsel. His words of paternal advice are exemplary in every way. Vg, again, is freer than the Greek; and this is probably due to St Jerome. 6. Splendid counsel for a young man. 7-12. The truly religious man cannot turn away his face from the poor, and God in turn will look kindly on him. All should help the needy in so far as they can. 13. Tobias junior is instructed to keep from all impurity, and further (Greek) 'to take first a wife of the seed of thy fathers, take not a strange wife, who is not of the tribe of thy father'. 14. The different codices show a variety of readings with regard to the evils of pride. Vg and DV give a sufficiently adequate summary of the sense of the passage. 16. This verse states negatively what our Lord later prescribed in positive form as the teaching of the Law and the Prophets, cf. Mt 7:12. It is also the equivalent of the Saviour's command: 'Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself', Mt 22:39, from Lev 19:18.

b 18. The unusual character of this verse, which in the Greek reads: 'Pour out thy bread and wine on the tomb of the just . . .', has given rise to much speculation. Some have at once jumped to the conclusion that this is a reference to sacrifice to the dead, or ancestor worship, or to pagan funeral rites. There is absolutely no evidence for this view. In fact it is incredible and incompatible with the context, that a pious Hebrew parent who thought he was about to die should recommend such practices to his son. Practices and rites of this nature were common amongst the gentiles, but were forbidden by the Law and altogether abhorrent to the fervent Israelite. The same holds for the rather common pagan practice of burying food with the dead or leaving it in their tombs, presumably for their needs in the after-life. On account of the difficulties involved, some authors recommend an emendation of the text: as if some scribe had written in Hebrew 'tomb' or 'burial' for 'in the midst of'; or 'bread' in place of 'mercy'. These textual corrections do solve the difficulties fairly well, but they are not sufficiently supported by the evidence to be admitted. Many older commentators suggested that the reference was to the practice of bringing food to the cemeteries as a sort of alms on behalf of the dead, the food being distributed to the surviving relatives or to the poor. It cannot be proven, however, that this practice was in use in OT times.

c A much better proposal is the one which considers this verse as a recommendation to take part, according to custom, in the so-called 'death banquets' or funeral feasts, held as a means of dispensing consolation to the mourners at the funeral, somewhat after the fashion of the modern wake. The further recommendation of Tobias 'do not eat and drink thereof with sinners', fits in well with this explanation. Then the youth, Tobias, would be instructed not to fraternize with the gentiles in their funeral feasts. There is good evidence that such customs did exist among the Hebrews, see Jer 16:7; Ez 24:17; also Josephus, Bell. Jud. 2, 1, 1. As for the alleged connexion between this verse and the Achikar story (cf. § 301*b*-d) the evidence is very tenuous. It should be noted, too, that any evidence there is depends on a general similarity between our verse and a passage found in the later, but not in the earlier, forms of the Achikar story. 21-23. This piece follows easily on the preceding section. The father, after having given several spiritual counsels, now thinks of the temporal care of his son and widow, cf. 1:16. He concludes his recommendations with a fitting exhortation to serve God faithfully above all things.

d V 1-9 Tobias meets the Archangel Raphael—1-2. Tobias junior is quite ready to obey, but he foresees two difficulties: he is unknown to Gabelus, and he is ignorant of the way leading to Rages of Media. Tobias senior gives a satisfactory answer to both objections. 5. The Angel had taken human form in order to carry out the mission given to him by God. The description of the Angel here is found only in Vg. 305d

10-22. They set out on their Journey—16. The prudent father wishes to know something more of the stranger before committing his son to his care. 18. Some have wondered that the Angel should apparently tell a lie. In reality there is no question of a lie. The heavenly messenger had every right to conceal the truth of his identity, which he does by playing on the Hebrew names 'Azarias' (Heb. 'The Lord has given aid') and 'Ananias' (Heb. 'The Lord is clement'), which truthfully describe his particular mission. Admittedly, there is always something mysterious from our viewpoint about the appearances in human form of the Angels, as they are described in Sacred Scripture. Such phenomena have no analogy in the natural order, and so, human terminology is usually inadequate to describe them. In this case it could well be that the Angel is expressing, by approximation, a twofold reality: his angelic nature and his appearance in human form. Thus when he says that he is 'of the children of Israel' (5:7), and that he is a 'kinsman' of Tobias senior (5:14, Gk) he means: 'I, though an angel of God, have taken, at God's command, the human form of the individual Israelite Azarias'. The language is vague and involved, but it is not false. That Tobias senior was deceived does not enter into the question of the veracity of the Angel's statement. He had no obligation to make known his full identity. 19. At this stage Vg is briefer than the other forms of the text, which add various details: Tobias senior remarks that he knew 'Ananias and Nathan, the two sons of Semelias the great'; he offers the Angel 'a drachma a day as wages', etc. 21. A typically Israelitic farewell. 'His angel accompany you', is particularly apt in the circumstances, although the father did not realize the full implication of his words. 23-28 A Mother's Tears—23. Anna, the mother, as mothers do, wept at the departure of her son on a long journey to a far country. 24. She was much more ready to give up the money than to lose her son. The Greek is more pointed: 'let the money perish, rather than our son'. 26-27. The father, more confident, offers a good reason for his assurance. His words, once again, were more filled with meaning than he knew.

VI 1-9 Tobias' Adventure with the Fish—1. The reference to the dog adds a note of simple authenticity to the narrative. The author of our book has been accused of being ignorant of his geography: Nineveh, the city of Tobias, was situated on the river Tigris, and now, after a full day's journey they reach this river. However, the text does not say that, but only 'they lodged by the river Tigris the first night'. In other words, Tobias and the Angel, after a day's walking along the river valley, rested the first night by the river. 2-4. It is possible to view this passage as altogether miraculous and to explain all the details as so many different miracles. Still, miracles are not to be multiplied without necessity, and the text does not demand a miracle in every detail. First of all, the extant forms of the text, although in agreement about the substance of the event, vary considerably regarding the details. In some, the fish is not qualified by any adjective such as 'monstrous' as in Vg and DV. In one form, at least, the fish attacks the youth's foot; in another, the fish tries to devour the youth's bread. It is a question of what exactly in these accounts should be retained as primitive. It would seem quite probable that the integrity of the text is adequately preserved as follows: 'and the youth went down to wash himself ('his feet'?) and a fish leaped out of the river seeking to devour the youth'. There is no need to presume that the fish was capable of swallowing the youth; it is sufficient to see here the snapping attack of some large river fish (some think a species of pike) which would easily frighten the youth by its suddenness and ferocity. Most forms of the text then have the Angel simply telling the youth to seize the fish, which he does, hauling it up on land.

805h 5. The internal organs of certain species of fish are still considered valuable medicaments. 6. 'The youth did as the Angel told him, and having roasted the fish they ate it. And they journeyed both of them together until they came to Ecbatana'. 8. It is clear that burning parts of the fish could have no direct physical effect on incorporeal demons. The effect actually produced on Asmodeus, 8:3, is due to the power of God and his Angel. However, there is nothing against viewing this effect as produced in connexion with some religious symbolism attached to the action. The effect would then be attained indirectly through the material object, much as the effect of sacramentals approved by the Church—holy water, the sign of the cross, etc. In Vg the heart of the fish is mentioned in this verse, and the liver in 6:19 and 8:2. Other forms of the text mention both the heart and the liver in all three passages. The omission of one or the other word in Vg derives, perhaps, from the custom of classing heart and liver together; so, if one only is mentioned the other is to be presumed.

9. Many older Catholic commentators considered the cure of Tobias' blindness, through the application of the gall of the fish, a natural process. The gall of various species of fish was considered in antiquity to have valuable curative powers in diseases and irritations of the eyes. Ointments made of this substance were highly prized for their stimulating and cleansing properties. Hence, the effect of the application of the gall (11:13 ff.) may have been a purely natural one, produced by a natural agent. However, the author of the book in his whole context seems to attribute the effect to God's intervention on behalf of Tobias, cf. 12:14, even though he does not say precisely whether the healing was miraculous or natural. It would be well to bear in mind that it is an angel who prescribes a remedy apparently unknown to Tobias, and that the particular material used is an instrument for the operation of the power of God. This incident recalls the cure of the blind man by our Lord, Jn 9:6.

10-22 The Angel counsels Marriage with Sara—10-18. Sara, the sole heir to the property and wealth of her parents, was obliged to marry one of her own tribe, Num 36:6 ff. Since Tobias, as it appears, was the only one who fulfilled this requirement, he alone was a suitable husband for Sara. The purpose of the Law was to keep tribal and family possessions from passing to strangers. For this reason, then, the Angel recommends marriage with Sara. 14. See above, 3:7. Note that Tobias' objection is based on hearsay evidence and is not a statement of the author of the book. 15. The Vatican Codex and the Old Latin and Syriac Versions are the principal witnesses to an odd addition to this verse: they give as the reason why the devil killed the seven husbands, 'because a devil loves (or 'is fond of') her'. Even with these witnesses the authenticity of the addition may be questioned. If the statement is genuine, it should not be attributed to the sacred author, since it forms part of the hearsay popular opinion quoted by Tobias. Nor, on the same presumption, would it follow that the devil sought Sara with a carnal love, for at least in the Greek the verb used ordinarily indicates 'to like' or 'to cherish'.

17. Although the doctrine in this verse, so beautifully as well as realistically expressed, is both beyond question and in agreement with Jewish ideas on the sanctity of marriage, it can hardly be proved that the verse as it stands is authentic. Since it is found only in Vg it is probably due to the influence of St Jerome or some previous redactor. Part of it is undoubtedly a borrowing from Ps 31:9. 18-22. Similar recommendations are ascribed to the Angel in all forms of the text. They recommend prayer as a preparation for the marital union, although the three-day period of continence is not found in all. In 22 Vg alone has the counsel, 'moved rather for love of children than for lust'. This is quite in line with the general context, but the actual expressions used are probably the result of Jerome's free translation. 805k

VII 1-10 The Welcome of Raguel—This section is clear, and substantially the same in all forms. There is some variation in the details: Raguel's wife in Vg and Old Latin is 'Anna', while the Greek reads 'Edna'; the questions of Raguel in 3 and 5 are asked by his wife in most forms of the text; while the response of the Angel (Vg 6) is attributed to Tobias himself by all but Vg. The Latin rendering is simpler and more connected. The sincere and ready hospitality extended to the visitors, especially as they were both considered kinsmen, is typically Semitic. Tobias loses no time in requesting the hand of Sara. 806a

11-20 Marriage Negotiations—11. The thoughtful suspense of Raguel in Vg and DV is put into words by the Greek, for Raguel there replies at length. 14. Gentile marriages were not altogether forbidden by Law to the Hebrews, although they were commanded not to intermarry with certain Canaanite tribes, Ex 34:11 ff.; Deut 7:1 ff.; cf. also Num 36:1-10. Since, however, marriages with pagans always carried with them a danger to the faith, they were never fully approved; hence, the chaste Sara would be much more appropriately betrothed to the God-fearing youth, Tobias, than to her previous pagan consorts. 15. Describes the actual betrothal ceremony of Tobias and Sara. The giving of the right hand as a sign or pledge of faith was used in antiquity much as it is today, although this is the only scriptural example of its use in a betrothal ceremony. The signing of a marriage document is not described elsewhere in Scripture, but scarcely anywhere else do we find so detailed and intimate an account of a marriage ceremony. 19. The Greek suggests that both mother and daughter wept; nor is this unlikely on so solemn an occasion.

VIII 1-10 A Chaste Marriage—The delicate artistry of the author is much in evidence throughout this chapter. 1. The simple dinner of welcome had turned into a happy marriage-banquet. 2. See 6:8. It is clearer here that the chief efficacy of the burning heart and liver of the fish is due to the power of God and his Angel over the demon. 3. There is no question of the demon being bound in chains, or otherwise made captive materially; it is a moral restraint, exercised by one spirit on another. The 'desert of Upper Egypt', a place far distant from Nineveh and Ecbatana, is used figuratively of the complete removal of Asmodeus' harmful influence over Sara. The desert was popularly considered the normal abode of demons, cf. Mt 12:43. 4-6. While Vg continues the idea of the three nights, cf. 6:18, the Greek implies that the events take place during one night. All forms narrate the prayers of Tobias and Sara for God's help. 7-10. The third prayer; cf. 3:1. The main doctrinal elements are: the recognition of God as creator of all things, 7; and the confession of sincerity in 9, which shows the upright purpose with which Tobias entered matrimony.

11-20 Thanksgiving for the Safety of Tobias and Sara d —11. Apparently Raguel was not fully reassured by the Angel; he hoped, but he wondered; and he feared lest the fate of the former husbands of Sara should also befall Tobias. The time indicated, 'about the cock-crowing', is a Vg reading; the other forms of the text have the equivalent of 'by night' or 'during the night'. 14. The Greek assigns the reason for Raguel's stealth: 'and if he is dead that we may bury him, so that no one know it'. 17-19. The theme of this, the fourth prayer, cf. 3:1, is clearly thanksgiving to God for the favour received.

21-24 A Joyful Feast—21. Only Vg suggests that the preparations are for a journey. It is more likely that Raguel gave orders to prepare the nuptial banquet, which now could be fully celebrated; this would be the banquet described in the following verse. The preparation for a journey would not fit well with Raguel's invitation, 23, to remain. 24. This is f IX 1-12 The Angel Raphael visits Gabelus—2 is a Vg reading. 3. In the Greek, Tobias tells Raphael to take four servants and two camels, cf. Vg 6. 6. Raphael made the journey, as requested, from Ecbatana to Rages, and redeemed the money deposited with Gabelus, see 1:17; 4:21. 8. Owing to the Semitic colouring of the passage it would seem that Raphael is still the subject, whereas it is really Gabelus, as Vg indicates, who enters, weeps and blesses. 11. A truly Hebrew blessing, both polite and religious.

g X 1-7 Anxiety of the Parents of Tobias—1-2. While these events were taking place in Ecbatana and Rages, Tobias, the father, was counting the days in Nineveh. No doubt he had often made this journey himself and knew exactly how long it should take. Since his son did not return on schedule he became anxious, and, as a father would, began to consider the possibility of misfortune. 3. In the Greek, although Tobias begins to grieve, there is more than a suggestion that he hides his sorrow in attempting to console his wife. The domestic scene is both beautifully related and very touching. 4-7. The mother is not so easily comforted: 'And she said to him (Tobias): Hold thy peace and do not deceive me; my child has perished'.

h 8-13 Tobias sets out for Home—8-10. Raguel invites Tobias junior to stay on with him, possibly to continue the wedding festivities; but Tobias, knowing that his parents will be anxious for his return, feels bound to refuse. Raguel then hands over half of his possessions, as he had promised to do, cf. 8:24. 11. Raguel speaks more truly than he knows when he mentions the Angel of the Lord; however, in the other forms of the text, the blessing is invoked in the name of 'the Lord of heaven'. 13. The admonitions in Vg are most likely a summarization and adaptation of St Jerome's. In the Greek, Raguel tells Sara to go to her father-in-law and to look upon him and his wife as her own parents; then he bids her farewell, saying: 'May I hear a good report of thee as long as I shall live!' Then Anna (Edna), the wife, addresses Tobias: 'Beloved child and brother, may the Lord bring thee back, and may I see children of thee while I live, and of Sara my daughter before I die. I commit my daughter to thee in trust before the Lord. Grieve her not all the days of thy life'.

i XI 1-12 The Home-coming—1. The place-name seems to have been Akram or Charam, but its exact location cannot be determined. It is certainly not Haran, Abraham's city, of Gen 11:31. The further determinations, 'midway to Nineveh, the eleventh day', are found only in Vg. 2-3. The caravan was moving too slowly, whereas Raphael and Tobias, travelling alone, could quickly reach Nineveh. 4. The Greek suggests that the fish-gall, through its astringent qualities, will scale off the films from the eyes of the elder Tobias. However, here (cf. 6:9) there is also a hint that the effect is due to some higher power. The Angel is more certain of the effect being produced than the use of an ordinary medicine would warrant, see 8; 12:14. 9. The reference to the celebrated dog of Tobias is surely an authentic part of the narrative here as in 6:1; although most of the dog's antics are related only in Vg, and are likely to be an addition. 10. The picture of the blind old father stumbling out to meet his son is very affecting; it is also surely authentic.

j 13-17 Tobias recovers his Sight—13-15. All the textual witnesses report the healing of Tobias' blindness in substantially the same way. The variants to be found are mostly verbal: Vg alone has the time interval, 'about half an hour', as also the description, 'like the skin of an egg'. Other forms indicate a peeling of 'white films' or 'white scales'. 16. 'All that knew him', is more detailed in the Greek, which pictures the men of Nineveh marvelling that Tobias was cured and able to walk without anyone to lead him. 17. The Scriptures frequently relate similar praises or blessings, see Deut 32:39; 1 Kg 2:6; 306f Wis 16:13.

18-21. The Arrival of Sara—18-19. Once again Vg k and the London Hebrew alone have the time interval, 'after seven days'; also the mention of the family and the cattle and the abundance of money is proper to these two texts which are curiously interrelated throughout the whole story. 20. This is the only reference in Vg to the Achikar story, see § 301h-i. Although the names are slightly different here, it is clear that the same persons are intended; 'Achior' is simply a Latin transcription of Achikar, and 'Nabath' the equivalent of the nephew's name, i.e. Nadan.

XII 1-5 Raphael is offered a Reward—There is a remarkable agreement among the textual witnesses, including Vg, in this little section. Except for the Aramaic, which goes its own strange way, all forms of the story which have come down to us are very similar in content and order. 3. 'Devoured by the fish', is probably an addition. 4-5. If the Greek, 5:19, was correct in recording that the proffered wages amounted to 'a drachma a day', the father and son are now exceedingly more generous.

6-22 Raphael reveals his Identity—6. The Angel b probably took them aside into an inner room of the house to reveal his secret. The first point of his revelation was the mercy of God; in fact, this is the core of Raphael's whole message. 7. What the king deigns to reveal to his subjects should be treated confidentially; still, in the case of God, whose works are always eminently just and good, there is no need of secrecy. 8. Raphael proceeds somewhat obliquely: first, he shows the value of good works, works which Tobias and his son had done; then he will explain why, despite these good deeds, they had to suffer. It is here, particularly, that the Angel stresses the value of almsgiving. Some forms read: 'Prayer is good with truth'. 9. Clearly states the value of good works. 10. As good deeds lead to eternal life, wicked deeds lead to death. 'Enemies of their own life', i.e. those who do evil, kill themselves. Some argue that since this is not necessarily true of mortal life, the reference must be to eternal life and death.

11-13. The revelation of the secret proper. The whole c life of Tobias was mysterious, enigmatic: although from his youth he had been faithful to God, he seemed to gain no reward but rather more and greater afflictions. Now all is made clear: God permitted Tobias to suffer in order to try him. While he was suffering, Raphael was interceding for him before the throne of God. 15. Previously the Angel had opened out to Tobias the secret of the forces at work in the life of the pious Israelite, now Raphael reveals the secret of his own person. He is an Angel, and amongst these heavenly spirits one of a special order who assist at the throne of God, i.e. who constantly see God face to face and receive from him special revelations. He is 'one of the seven': the number 'seven' probably refers to a special group holding a particularly important office, rather than to an exact number. It is not unlikely that the term 'seven' is an allusion to Median court terminology, because at that time among the Medes the celebrated 'seven counsellors' were familiar to everyone, cf. Esd 7:14. There is no evidence, however, to support the view of some scholars who profess to see here a reference to the Zoroastrian teaching on the spirits who stand about the throne of Ahura-Mazda. There is nothing but a very superficial similarity between the spirits of Parsecism and the Angels of the Bible; the basic doctrines of each are poles apart.

16-17. There was a belief among the Hebrews that d whoever looked upon an angel would die at once, see Jg 6:22; 13:21 f. Hence Tobias and his son were greatly frightened when Raphael revealed his identity. This circumstance as well as the consoling words of the Angel recall other similar angelic appearances in Scripture, v.g. Dan 10:12; Lk 1:13, 30. 18. There is no need of fear, because the Angel has been with them

307d at God's command. Angels are sent to men by the will of God. 19. The second part of this verse, in most forms of the text, declares, 'and I did neither eat nor drink'. St Jerome probably attempted to clarify this by showing that the Angel was sustained otherwise than by natural food. 20. Raphael's special mission from God was now finished. Many forms have 'write down all these things . . .', cf. § 300e. 21-22. Only Vg extends their prayer, 'for three hours'.

g XIII 1-10 The Canticle of Tobias: First Part—This section contains the fifth prayer of the book. Although longer, in general form it is similar to the others already mentioned, cf. 3:1. These two final chapters form a sort of epilogue. 2. See above, 11:17. By the 'hand of God' is usually meant his Power, or his Providence guiding all things. 5. The children of Israel had brought chastisement on themselves by their own sins; they will be saved solely through God's mercy. 7. What he recommends to others, Tobias will do himself. The poetic parallelism noticeable throughout this passage is more striking here if the Old Latin form is followed: 'I confess him in the land of my captivity, and I show forth his power and majesty before a sinful nation'.

f 11-23 Canticle: Second Part—Whereas the first part of Tobias' prayer, or canticle, was almost wholly taken up with praise of God, this second part is principally prophetic. The entire canticle is poetical in form, and for the most part in synonymous parallelism. Vg in some instances seems to have connected the verses poorly, and several are apparently out of their proper order. On the whole, the various forms of the text are in fair agreement.

g 12. Vg seems to intimate that Jerusalem and the temple have been already destroyed, whereas these calamities did not come to pass until after the death of Tobias. It is possible that Tobias, in a prophetic vision, saw both the destruction and restoration of the Holy City. However, the reference to the temple is not textually certain, for the text could read: 'let new homes be built'; and so, the destruction of the city would not necessarily be implied. Besides, Jerusalem often stood as a symbol of the lot of the People of Israel. Thus, when Jerusalem was said to flourish, Israel's lot was a happy one; when Jerusalem suffered, the nation was in peril, cf. Is 60. Hence Tobias may have been praying for, or even predicting, the return of the captives to their homeland and the future happier lot of the Children of Israel. If such a general interpretation be decided upon, the particular verses in Vg and DV hardly require comment. 21-22. In the Greek, the towers are built with gold, and the streets are paved with carbuncles and stones from Ophir. These precious minerals and gems are used figuratively to signify the prosperity of the New Jerusalem. According to some interpreters, all the references to Jerusalem have, besides their literal meaning, a typical sense. Then, the earthly Jerusalem would be a type of the heavenly Jerusalem, much as in the strikingly similar passage of Apoc 21:2, 18 ff.

XIV 1-17 The Last Days of Tobias and his Son—1-4. h

The chronological data of this final chapter seem to have suffered greatly at the hands of copyists or redactors. It is next to impossible, in view of the great variation among textual witnesses, to reconstruct any satisfactory chronology of the history of Tobias. Nor is it surprising that the figures should vary so greatly in the different recensions and versions. As all who have worked with ancient documents know, numbers easily suffer corruption as they are transcribed. This fact is observable in many books of the OT which have been transmitted to us in a far better state than the Book of Tobias. It would be beyond the scope of this commentary to attempt to estimate the value of the divergent chronological tables found in the different forms of the book. Suffice it to say that Vg and DV, as they stand, must be revised; and that no single form of the book as we have it today is certainly accurate in this connexion. 5-9. Tobias, the elder, foretells the destruction of Nineveh (612 B.C.) and Jerusalem (587), as well as the restoration of Israel. 10-13. The Greek, Syriac and Old Latin contain a rather lengthy reference to the story of Achikar (cf. § 301h-i). This is less likely to be an authentic part of the narrative than were the previous allusions to the Achikar story. 14-17. After the death of Tobias senior his son leaves Nineveh as he had been counselled to do, and with his family goes to live with Raguel and Anna in Ecbatana. There he had the happiness of seeing many descendants before dying in the Lord.

By M. LEAHY

Soubigou in La Sainte Bible, Tome IV.

b Text and Versions—Owing to the fact that the Greek text which we possess contains so many Hebraisms, modern critics generally maintain that the original text of Judith, of which no manuscripts survive, was written in Hebrew. The Greek is preserved in three recensions, viz. (i) that contained in codices S, B, A, and in the majority of the cursive MSS, (ii) the form found in codex 58 from which are derived the Syr. and one of the two recensions of the Old Latin; and (iii) the form found in codices 19 and 108. Vg was made by Jerome from an Aramaic text. In the preface to the translation he tells us that he did the work in haste, devoting to it but 'una lucubratiuncula', not attempting word-for-word exactness so long as he gave the sense, not considering the variant readings of the Greek and Latin manuscripts and giving only those particulars of the story for which he was able to find clear warrant in his Aramaic text. He had before him a copy of the Old Latin because we find that on occasions he reproduces the identical phraseology of this older version. Vg, while agreeing substantially with the Greek, differs from it not a little in accidentals, viz. in the form of proper names, in figures, in the omission of various incidents and geographical place names, and in the insertion of homiletic remarks. In addition to the above-mentioned versions there are also extant some late Hebrew recensions mostly of a midrashic character.

c Contents—Nabuchodonosor, king of the Assyrians, defeated Arphaxad, king of the Medes, and then demanded the submission of the western nations. They, however, refused to submit and he dispatched his general Holofernes to wreak vengeance upon them. He overran much territory and so terrified many lands that they hastened to submit to him. Even these latter he treated as enemies and destroyed their sanctuaries and their gods. The Israelites feared for Jerusalem and the temple, and at the instigation of the high priest Eliachim prepared to resist the invader. They fortified certain mountain towns (among them Bethulia), which commanded the passes leading through the mountains of Ephraim, and then they suppliantly committed their cause to God. Holofernes, who had seemingly never heard of this nation, learned its wonderful history from Achior, the leader of the Ammonites, who urged him not to attack them unless he were assured that they had offended against their God. Holofernes and his chief officers were so enraged at Achior's words that they handed him over to the Jews that he might die with them when Bethulia fell to the Assyrian hosts. Instead of making a direct assault on the town of Bethulia, Holofernes cut off its external water supply and soon reduced the inhabitants to such a plight that the governor decided under pressure to surrender the town unless relieved within five days.

Judith, a noble, chaste and beautiful widow, heard of the governor's decision and upbraided those in authority for their want of trust in God. She exhorted them to pray and sought to inspire confidence by reminding them of what God had done for his people in the past. Finally she declared that God would advise her hand liberate Bethulia. Fortified by prayer and beautifully attired she left the town by night and with her maid went towards the Assyrian camp; admiring sentries conducted her to the tent of their chief. Holofernes was beguiled by her beauty and she deceived him by pretending to be a deserter and by predicting the speedy destruction of her people because she saw that they would offend God by partaking of forbidden food; she herself would advise Holofernes when the Hebrews having offended against their God might be subdued. Judith was permitted to live according to the regulations of the Jewish law; she partook only of the food which she had taken with her and used to go outside the camp every night to perform the customary ablutions before prayer (cf. Ex 30:17 ff) and to communicate with God. On the fourth day she consented to attend a banquet at which Holofernes, goaded by lust, drank to excess. As he lay on his bed in a drunken stupor Judith cut off his head, and going out as usual under the pretence of devotion escaped with the head to Bethulia. At Bethulia she was enthusiastically received by the admiring citizens. Achior, having seen what the God of Israel had done, believed in him as the only true God. The besieged acting on Judith's advice feigned an attack on the camp of the Assyrians who, terrified at discovering that their leader was dead, became panic-stricken and fled. Joachim (Eliachim) and the ancients came from Jerusalem to honour Judith and Judith returned thanks to God for the victory. The book ends with a brief account of the remainder of Judith's life.

Historical Inaccuracies—(i) Nabuchodonosor bears the title 'king of the Assyrians' and is said to reign in Nineveh. But the historical Nabuchodonosor was king of the Neo-babylonian empire from 604 to 562 B.C. The Assyrian empire had then ceased to exist and so also had Nineveh which was destroyed in 612 B.C. (ii) The Assyrian monarchy is assumed to be still in existence, yet the following passages seem to assign the events narrated to the period following the Babylonian captivity—4:3 (LXX) reads, 'For they were lately come up from the captivity . . . and the vessels, the altar and the house were sanctified after their profanation'; 5:18 f. (LXX) reads, 'They were led captive into a land that was not theirs, and the temple of their God was cast to the ground (ἐγενήθη εἰς ἔδαφος) . . . and now they are returned to their God, and are come up from the dispersion where they were dispersed, and have possessed Jerusalem where their sanctuary is'; 5:22 f. (Vg) reads, 'many of them were led away captive into a strange land. But of late returning . . . they are come together . . . and possess Jerusalem again, where their sanctuary is'. Moreover other passages (e.g. 4:5) imply that there was no king reigning, for the supreme authority, even over the Northern Kingdom, was vested in the high-priest assisted by the Sanhedrin (ἡ γερουσία cf. LXX 4:8; 15:8). (iii) None of the known Median kings f Literary Form—The opinions of modern critics with regard to the literary form of the book may be reduced to three, viz. (i) a fictitious narrative, (ii) an historical nucleus surrounded with unhistorical additions, (iii) a purely historical narrative.

The first opinion, held principally by non-Catholics, is that the story is not a sober chronicle of past events but was concocted, perhaps during the Maccabean fight for religious and political freedom, to encourage the Jews to resist and to remain faithful to the law of Moses; the purpose of the book is to show that as long as God's people do not offend against him, no matter in what danger they may temporarily be placed, he will not permit their enemies to triumph over them. In proof of the theory that the book is a fictitious narrative with a didactic purpose, the following arguments are advanced: (a) the above-mentioned historical inaccuracies show that the author did not intend to write history; (b) the author is ever pointing out that Judith was punctilious in the observance of one or other regulation of the law; (c) Judith in her main discourse quotes from Israel's past history examples where God's all-powerful help was never wanting to those who kept his law (cf. 8:22 f.); (d) the setting seems arranged for Achior, a non-Jew, to deliver before other non-Jews a discourse which emphasizes the fact that Israel from the time of Abraham was unconquerable as long as it remained faithful to God (cf. ch. 5). All this gives the impression of a certain artificiality and points to the conclusion that the author had no intention of recording actual events. We gather from a Reply of the Biblical Commission on parts of Scripture historical in appearance only (cf. § 52f) that Catholics might hold this theory provided it could be proved by solid arguments that the sacred author was not intending to write history.

g The second opinion which has found some advocates (e.g. a recent Catholic commentator, Miller) is that the author made an historical event the basis of his story, but that he embellished the record of that event. He thus meant his work to be read as a free description of the past.

h The vast majority of Catholic critics regard the book as a record of fact and they endeavour to answer the difficulties urged in the name of history against its accuracy. The arguments which they advance are the following: (a) Jewish and Christian tradition and all commentators prior to the sixteenth century regarded the book as historical; (b) the minute historical, geographical, chronological and genealogical details indicate a straightforward narrative of real events; (c) the author speaks of descendants of Achior being alive in his time (14:6), and of a festival celebrated annually up to his day in commemoration of Judith's victory (16:31). Those who uphold the historicity (or, at least, a historical nucleus) of the narration take the view that 'Nabuchodonosor' and 'Arphaxad' are pseudonyms disguising historical persons whose identity cannot be ascertained with certainty. There are many different opinions as to the identity of the king covered by the name 'Nabuchodonosor', the most widely-held opinion being that according to which the name stands for the Persian king Artaxerxes III Ochus (359-336). We know from extra-biblical sources that Artaxerxes campaigned against Asia Minor, Phoenicia and Egypt. According to Diodorus Siculus (Hist. 31, 19, 2-3) one of his generals was named Holofernes, the brother of a Cappadocian king, and the same authority informs us (Hist. 16, 47, 4) that another of his generals was called Bagoas (Vagao of Vg 14:13). Moreover Eusebius (Chron. 1, 11) states that Artaxerxes deported some Jews to Hyrcania near the Caspian Sea. Furthermore, Nabuchodonosor's demand of 'earth and water' in token of submission (cf. Gk 2:7) is reminiscent of a Persian custom (cf. Herodotus 6, 48 f.). Again the 308b mention of Persians in 16:12 seems to show that the author was really thinking of the campaign of a Persian king. We should also note that Persian kings were sometimes called kings of Assyria (cf. 1 Esd 6:22). The war against the Medes led by the unknown 'Arphaxad' may well have been waged to crush an attempted revolt by them against their over-lords, the Persians. Finally the word συνουσία does not here mean the actual Sanhedrin, an institution which is not earlier than the Maccabean age; the Greek translator of the original used a word common in his day to designate the council of the ancients of the people.

Another opinion which still finds some supporters holds that Nabuchodonosor is the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (669-626) and that Arphaxad is either the Median king Deioces or his son Phraortes. The high-priest was in charge of political affairs because the victorious advance of Holofernes (who was probably a tributary king) coincided with the period when Manasses of Judah was held captive in Babylon (cf. 2 Par 33:11 ff.). The return from captivity refers not to the whole people but rather to some isolated group, and the casting down of the temple refers to its profanation in the days of Manasses (4 Kg 21:7; 2 Par 33:7).

The chief argument against the historical character of the book of Judith is admittedly to be found in the many historical difficulties contained therein. Many Catholic scholars believe that all the difficulties have met with plausible answers (cf. § 308h, i above). The present commentator thinks that the opinion mentioned in § 308g above is the most probable. In narrating the adventures of Judith whom God used as his instrument to save his people from an imminent disaster the author's aim seems to be to encourage his contemporaries who are faced with some similar calamity to have absolute confidence in that same God. This aim would not be served so effectively by an episode which was purely imaginary. We cannot say with any certainty when Judith performed her heroic deed, but it was probably in the reign of Artaxerxes III.

Author and Date of Composition—The intimate knowledge of the topography of Canaan and the fact that the book was probably written in Hebrew point to a Palestinian Jew as the author. As regards the date of writing it was certainly much later than the date of the events recorded because there is mention of the death of Judith and the descendants of Achior (14:6; 16:30). Nothing further can be deduced with any certainty.

Canonicity—Although the book did not form part of the Hebrew Canon, the Church considered it from the beginning as divinely inspired, having received it together with the other sacred books contained in the LXX. It was quoted with approbation by Clement of Rome (1 Cor 55) and cited on an equality with other Scripture by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. 2, 7), Origen (De Orat. 13, 29; Hom. 9 on Jg; Hom. 19 on Jer.) and Ambrose (De Off. Min. 3, 13). The Councils of Hippo (A.D. 393) and Carthage (A.D. 397 and 419) enumerated it among the canonical books. St Augustine (De Doctrina Christiana 2, 8) had it on his list of sacred books.

The Moral Conduct of Judith—She lied to the sentries and to Holofernes; her personal attractions to which she gave such attention excited his base passions; she acted imprudently by remaining alone in the tent of one who was inordinately attracted towards her; her killing of Holofernes was an act of treachery. Yet notwithstanding all this Judith is praised by the Sacred Writer (and later by the Fathers of the Church). The following remarks will help to solve the difficulty. (i) The mention by the inspired writer of Judith's actions does not necessarily imply approval. (ii) If one is praised because of one or many noble deeds one is not thereby declared immune from every fault or lauded for all one's deeds; the heroism of Judith n Doctrine—God is the Creator and Lord of the visible universe (9:17; 13:24; 16:17). He is a merciful and a just God for he chastises the enemies of his people (13:18, 21; 16:4, 6, 20f.). He never fails in the hour of danger to help those who remain faithful to the law of Moses (chh 5, 8). The efficacy of prayer and mortification is specially emphasized.

309a I Nabuchodonosor's Victory over Arphaxad and his Demand for the Submission of the Western States—1. The word 'built' corresponds to the Heb. bānāh, which may also have the meaning of repairing with the added notion of enlarging, cf. Jos 19:50; Jg 21:23, etc. Ecbatana (cf. 1 Esd 6:2; Tob 3:7) was the capital of Media Magna; it was founded about 700 B.C. by the Median King Deioces (cf. Herod 1, 98) and was located near where today is Hamadan. 2 f. The walls, according to the true reading of Vg, were 70 cubits high and 30 broad. The square towers were broader by 40 feet, for they jutted out 20 feet from each side of the wall. Arphaxad made the gates proportionate to the height of the towers. 5 ff. Vg says that Nabuchodonosor overcame Arphaxad in the plain of Ragau about the Euphrates, etc. (6), and then sought the submission of the western states. But the corresponding verses in LXX state that the two kings made war in the plain of Ragau and that there came unto him (i.e. Arphaxad the Mede, very probably, and not Nabuchodonosor) they who dwell in the hill country, and about the Euphrates, and the Tigris, and the Hydaspes, and the plain of Arioch, king of the Elymeans, and that there came together many nations to the array of the sons of Cheleoud. The Gk goes on to say that Nabuchodonosor sent unto all that dwell in Persia, and in Cilicia, etc. demanding, it seems, military help in his war against Arphaxad, but that his ambassadors found them unwilling and, therefore, Nabuchodonosor threatened vengeance. The latter then, according to the Gk, defeated Arphaxad and prepared to carry out his threat. Vg incorrectly puts the plain of Ragau near the Euphrates, for Ragau is the Rages of the Book of Tobias, and its ruins (called Rai) are not far to the SE. of Teheran, the Persian capital.

The Jadason may be the Dijala which joins the Tigris six miles below Baghdad (cf. Stummer); Syr. has Ulai (cf. Dan 8:2) which is the Eulaeus of Pliny (Hist. Nat. 6, 31) and flowed near Susa. The Elymeans (Vg Elicians) are the inhabitants of Elymais, meaning here Elam (cf. Syr.), north of the Persian Gulf. The identity of Arioch (Vg Erioch) has not been established but the name occurs in Gen 14 where the one referred to is probably Arriwuk, the son of Zimri-Lim king of Mari (Tell-Hariri) in Northern Mesopotamia (cf. F. M. Th. Böhl in Bibliotheca Orientalis, 11/4, 1945, 66). Cheleoud of Gk may be Chilmad (the hill-country of Iran) above Baghdad (cf. Ball); the sons of Cheleoud are Medes, not followers of Nabuchodonosor.

b 8. Cedar was a tribe descended from Ismael (cf. Gen

25:13); its territory lay in the Syro-Arabian desert, to the NW. of Teima. The Gk has 'Galaad'. 9. The land of Jesse (Gk Gesem) is the Egyptian district of Goshen in the Delta. In addition to the places mentioned in Vg the Gk has Persia, Antilibanus, the sea coast, Betane (Beth 'Enun, N. of Hebron), Chelous (El-Chalassa in Idumaea), Kades (cf. Gen 14:7), the River of Egypt (Wady el-'Arish), Taphnas (Tell ed-Dafenne in the Delta, Ramesse (cf. Ex 1:11), Tanis and Memphis (both in Egypt).

II-III The March of Holofernes—12 f. Ange may be either the Argaeus in Cappadocia mentioned in the classics, or a spur of the Taurus. The mountains lay north (lit. on the left) of (upper, so Gk) Cilicia. Melothus is probably Melitene, the present-day Malatia in eastern Cappadocia. The Gk has Bektileth and the Syr. Bēth-qilath which means 'House of slaughter'. For 'Tharsis' we should read with Gk 'Rassis', i.e. Arsūs on the Gulf of Issus. The children of Ishmael (cf. Gen 25:13, 18) were nomad peoples and those against whom Holofernes marched were S. of the land of Cellon (Gk Chellians), i.e. Cholle (el-Challe) between the Euphrates and Palmyra (cf. Ball). 14. Mambre (Gk Abrona, i.e. Chaboras of the ancients, the present-day Chabur flowing into the Euphrates) is to be located where stood the later Mambri, 'a fortress built by Diocletian five Roman m. S. of Zenobia, which may have stood on a watercourse of the same name' (so Wolff quoted by Ball). The sea is perhaps the Persian Gulf. 15. The Gk reads 'And he took the borders (i.e. territories) of Cilicia', etc. This reading is to be accepted. Japheth is 'Ephah' (cf. Is 60:6) according to Stummer. 16 f. In the previous verse the author gave the two extreme limits of this particular campaign of Holofernes and he now goes on to mention the country in between. The tribe of Madian (cf. Gen 25:2) first established itself E. of the Gulf of Aqaba and later inhabited the country E. of Moab and Ammon. 18. Vg here omits the proper names found in Gk, viz. Sidon, Tyre, Sur (which is the Hebrew name of Tyre, here accidentally repeated), Ocina ('Acco'), Jemnaan (Jamnia), Azotus and Ascalon.

III 1.—Mesopotamian Syria (Heb 'Aram Naharaim') was in north-west Mesopotamia; DV 'Syria, Mesopotamia' is incorrect. Syria of Sōbāh lay between Hamath and Damascus in the region of Baalbek. Libya points to Egypt (i.e. its western border; cf. 1:9, where Ethiopia is referred to as the southern border). 12b. The ancient Semites erected near their altars a sacred pole to represent the goddess 'Ashērāh. In MT the one word 'ashērāh is either the sacred pole (the 'grove' of LXX and Vg) or is an epithet of the goddess Ashtoreth (Astarte). 14. Apamea was a district NW. of Hamath. The march through the land E. of Jordan to the Idumaeans is not mentioned in the corresponding passage in Gk, but it is implied in other passages (cf. Gk 5:2, 5; 6:2, 5; 7:8). On the other hand the Gk reading here is implied by Vg (cf. 4:5). The Gk has 'And he (Holofernes) came over against Esdraelon (= Jezreel = Zerin) near unto Dوتاia (i.e. Dothan; Vg 4:5 Dothain) which is opposite the great serrated mountain of Judaea; and he pitched between Gaibai (probably Jelāmet el-Mansurah, NW. of Tell Qaimūn) and Scythopolis (Beisan)'. It seems, therefore, that the original text contained more than either Vg or Gk has preserved. Jerome's abridged account incorrectly puts the Idumaeans in Gabaa (Gk Gaibai); it has confused and joined together two distinct operations, one against the Idumaeans and the other which brought the army of Holofernes between Gaibai (Vg Gabaa) and Scythopolis.

IV The Determination of the Israelites to resist—3 f. 6. The Israelites of Judah sent word to the towns of Samaria to occupy the mountain-tops and to fortify the towns, etc. 5. Eliachim (Gk Joachim) is the same person as the Joachim of 15:9; it is a name not uncommon in the OT. 12. For the defeat of Amalec cf. Ex 17:8 ff. 15. Hair-cloth (i.e. sackcloth), the garment of humiliation and mourning, was made

- from goat's or camel's hair. The Gk mentions three classes of sacrifices, the daily (morning and evening) holocaust, the vow-offering and the voluntary offering.
- f V 1-25 The History of the Israelites as given by Achlor—4. The other versions read 'west' instead of 'east'. 6f. Abraham, the father of the Hebrew nation, was born at Ur of the Chaldees (Gen 11:28); ancient Chaldaea lay in the lower basin of the Tigris and the Euphrates, and extended to the Persian Gulf. 9. Instead of 'Charan' (Haran) we should read with Gk and Syr. 'Canaan', because Gen 12:10 relates that the famine raged in Canaan. Abraham did sojourn in Haran, a city due E. of Carchemish and SSE. of Edessa, but that was when in Mesopotamia (cf. 5:7). Ex 12:40 gives the number of years as 430; 400 is a round number. 20. The peoples mentioned were the pre-Israelite inhabitants of cisjordanic and transjordanic Palestine. Heshbon lay ENE. of the Jordan mouth. 22. The principal nations were the Egyptians, the Philistines, the Syrians, the Assyrians and the Neo-babylonians. 23. Of the exiles who returned from Babylonia, not all came back during the reign of Cyrus. A group, for example, returned with Esdras.
- g V 26-VI 21 The Fate of Achlor—7. This is the first mention of Bethulia in Vg. The Gk, however, mentions it earlier, for it states that Joachim charged the citizens of Bethulia and Betomesthaim (i.e. Misiya SE. of Dothan according to Abel in Géographie de la Palestine, II, 283) to keep the passes of the hill country, etc. (cf. Gk 4:6). Bethulia is probably to be located on Sheikh Shibel, above Kafr Kūd in Northern Samaria. There was a city called Bethul in the territory of Simeon in SW. Judaea (cf. Jos 19:4) and this name was given to the place where Judith, who came of Simeonite stock (cf. 9:2), performed her heroic deed (cf. Stummer). 11. According to 8:9 the governors of Bethulia were Ozias, Chabri and Charmi. Here, however, Charmi is confused with Gothoniel (who was the father of Chabri; cf. Gk 6:15) and all mention of Chabri is omitted.
- h VII The Siege of Bethulia—2. Holofernes had in his mighty army conscripts from the various provinces which he had subjected; for 'preparations' write 'baggage'. 3. Holofernes had given orders to break up camp and march against Bethulia. Then, according to the Gk, the army camped in the valley near Bethulia, and spread itself in breadth in the direction over against Dothan and on to Belbaim (Balamon of Gk 8:3, Belma of Vg, Jible'am of Jos 17:11, the modern Khirbet Bel'ame), and in length from Bethulia to Kyamon (Chelmon of Vg, Jokne'am of Jos 12:22, the modern Tell Qaimūn). The Gk later states that when the city's external water-supply had been cut off the Edomite and Ammonite contingents in the army of Holofernes camped in the hill country over against Dothan and a part was sent to take up positions towards the south, and towards the east, over against Ekrebel (i.e. Aqrabeh, 10 m. SE. of Nablus). Thus we get a picture of the final positions taken up by the Assyrian army. 11. Instead of attempting a direct assault the Assyrians blockaded the city and sealed off its external water supplies; after 20 days of siege the water in the underground cisterns, which are a feature of all oriental cities, was almost exhausted and was severely rationed.
- i VIII Judith and her Discourse to the Governors—1. Instead of 'Ruben' read 'Israel' (Jacob), cf. Syr. 6. The usual period of mourning was seven days, (cf. 16:29). 15. God remains always the merciful and benign father who forgives his disloyal children when they return to him with a contrite heart. 22. Abraham was tried by God when commanded to immolate his son Isaac (cf. Gen 22). 29. The Gk states that Judith was requested to pray for water to replenish the water cisterns.
- j IX Judith's Prayer for God's Protection—2-5. She prayed to the God of her fathers for courage and zeal such as he gave to Simeon to slay the Shechemites because Shechem violated his sister Dina (cf. Gen 34). She based her request upon the fact that all events happen in accordance with God's all-wise providence. 10. 'destroyest' means 'putest an end to'. 11b. The horns of the altar were curved projections at the four corners. The oblation of a victim which was the specific act of the priest consisted in touching those horns with his finger dipped in the blood of the animal, and in pouring the remainder at the foot of the altar (Lev 4:17 f.). The intention of Holofernes was to suppress the worship of the God of the Israelites; cf. 3:13. 18. To succeed in her enterprise Judith had first to fascinate Holofernes.

X Judith's Arrival at the Tent of Holofernes—3. The bonnet was some kind of tiara, the garments of gladness her festal garments, and the lilies may have been a scarf embroidered with lilies. 5. Roasted corn (Heb. qālī) was a common article of food. Judith brought provisions so as not to be obliged to use heathen food which might have been offered to idols (cf. Ex 34:15), or might be meat of animals not slaughtered in the proper manner (cf. Lev 17:15), or of animals prohibited to the Israelites as food (cf. Lev 11:4 ff.; 2 Mac 6:18 ff.). 18b. According to Gk they said that not one man of the Hebrews must be left because the Hebrews would cajole the world with the beauty of their women folk.

XI Judith in the Presence of Holofernes—4. The last clause is intentionally ambiguous: Holofernes thinks of victory for his arms, Judith of the death of the enemy of her people. 11. The drinking of the blood of animals was a primeval prohibition (Gen 9:4) which was re-enacted in the Mosaic law (Lev 17:10-14). 12. Every Hebrew was bound to offer to God the first-fruits of his vineyard, of his trees, and of his corn and these were to be eaten by the priests only (cf. Num 18:11). The loaves of proposition likewise belonged to the priests (Lev 24:9). Everyone was forbidden to eat the fat covering the intestines, the great lobe of the liver, the kidneys and the fat adhering to them (Ex 29:13; Lev 3:4, 10, 15, etc.). 14. It was necessary, Judith declared, that she should remain in communication with her God and that this could take place only outside the camp and (adds LXX) by night. The liberty to go and come was essential for the execution of Judith's plan. 19b. For 'sense of words' Gk reads 'understanding of things'.

XII-XIII The Killing of Holofernes—1. Judith was led into the dining-hall where his silver-plate (ἀργυρώματα) was set. 7. The Hebrews were accustomed to perform a ceremonial washing before prayer (cf. Ex 30:17 ff.; Ps 25:6). 13-14. The opportunity to put her plan into execution is now come, and Judith answers in a tone of feigned humility and eagerness. 18. She wishes to drink her own wine. XIII:5. Judith had made this arrangement with her maid before the banquet. 10. The canopy was probably the mosquito-net which she took as a trophy. 19. The wallet was the bag which had contained the provisions (cf. 10:5). 22b together with 15:10b is read in the Gradual of the Mass for the Feast of the Immaculate Conception. The words are used in the accommodated sense of our Blessed Lady.

XIV-XV The Rout of the Terrified Assyrians—2. Judith advises the besieged to feign an attack on the Assyrian outposts. Every man is to arm himself and rush out as if intending to go down the hillside; he is not actually to do so. 3f. The watchmen will be alarmed by this show of attack and will hasten to arouse their general; on finding him dead the Assyrians will flee in panic. 5. They are to follow their enemies without apprehension (DV 'securely') for God will destroy them. 12. For 'mice' (Heb. 'aḥbārim) Gk has 'slaves' (Heb. 'aḥādīm). XV:11 Judith's abstinence from second marriage is also mentioned in 16:26. Since every woman in ancient Israel desired a numerous progeny (cf. Gen 24:60) and regarded childlessness as a dire misfortune (cf. Gen 30:1; 1 Kg 1:6), we may conclude that voluntary celibacy was rare among 309n them, and also that second marriages after widowhood were not infrequent among those who were still young. Judith according to Gk 16:22 had many suitors, but nevertheless did not remarry from (the text suggests) a religious motive. The Mosaic laws say nothing of remarriage after the death of one of the parties except in the case of Levirate marriage (cf. Deut 25:5).

- o XVI 1-21 The Canticle of Judith—2. 'Begin' means 'lead off the canticle'. 8. Holofernes was struck down not by men of huge physique, but, to his eternal disgrace, by a mere woman. The word 'tall giants' corresponds to Heb. gibbōrīm, while the sons of Titan were probably the Rephaim of Gen 14:5; Deut 2:20, etc. The valley 'of Rephaim' (near Jerusalem) mentioned in 2 Kg 5:18 is called in LXX the 'valley of the Titans'. 14. The weak (lit. 'sons of the damsels') overthrew the fainthearted (Gk 'sons of deserters'). 18. The waters are those of the Great Abyss which according to popular conception lay below the flat earth; cf. Ps 23:2. 19. We have here a striking case of haplography. It is due to the copyist of the Gk text upon which the Old Latin is based and entered Vg through the Old Latin. The eye of the Gk copyist leaped from φοβούμενους in 15c to φοβούμενος in 16c. The complete text reads: 'But to them that fear thee, thou art propitious, because a small thing is every sacrifice for a sweet savour, and a very small thing is all fat for a holocaust unto thee, but he that fears the Lord is great continually'. 20 f. The day of judgement corresponds to the 'day of Yahweh', referred to frequently by the prophets (cf. § 527i) as the day when God will intervene to punish iniquity and to reward righteousness. Their dead bodies will lie unburied, a prey to worms; they will be got rid of by burning instead of by burial; 'and they will weep' (LXX κλαύουσιν) feeling pain unceasingly. The words 'for ever' (Gk εως αἰῶνος) mean here, as frequently in OT (cf. Ex 19:9), 'while they last'. Our Lord (Mt 13:42, 50) mentions fire when speaking of eternal woes, and, if he is alluding to this passage, he is but extending the words to describe the torments of Gehenna. The words of Jesus in Mk 9:47 allude to Is 66:24 and are likewise used in the accommodated sense.

22-31 The Remainder of Judith's Life-Story—22. Purification was necessary because of the legal uncleanness contracted in killing the Assyrians (cf. Num 19:11; 31:19). 23. An offering for an anathema of oblivion meant an offering for total destruction (Heb. ḥērem). 29. Seven days was the ordinary period of mourning among the Israelites (1 Kg 31:13; Eccles 22:13). This custom technically known as šib'āh (i.e. 'seven') is a very ancient one (cf. Gen 50:10) and is still observed by all orthodox Jews. 30. She lived to be 105 years old (cf. 28) and the peace she procured lasted a long time. It seems, therefore, that Judith's glorious deed cannot have taken place in the reign of Ashurbanipal, because Josias of Judah was defeated and slain at Megiddo in 609. 31. Vg alone mentions this festival and nothing further is known about it.

b Theme and Contents of the Book—The theme of the book is God's providential care of Israel manifested in his saving the nation from a grave danger that threatened it while still in exile, in the reign of Assuerus, king of Persia. God visited Aman and the enemies of Israel with the evils they had designed for the Jews. So evident was God's guiding hand to the chief characters of the story, two exiled Jews, Mardochai and his foster-child Esther, that Mardochai, who at the beginning 'was thinking what God would do' (11:12), at the end understood that 'God hath done these things' (10:4), that 'the Lord remembered his people, and had mercy on his inheritance' (10:12).

c The story opens in the second year of the reign of Assuerus with Mardochai's dream, foreshadowing the future danger and the deliverance from it. The danger arose in the following manner. In the third year of his reign Assuerus deposed Queen Vasthi and, in the seventh year, set Esther in her place. Mardochai discovered, and revealed to the king through Esther, a conspiracy of two eunuchs against the king's life. He thereby incurred the enmity of Aman, chief minister of the king, not only for himself, but for his whole nation. When he refused to bow the knee in worship of Aman this enmity came to a climax, and Aman decided that there must be a general massacre of the Jews. He succeeded in obtaining from the king a decree to this effect. Mardochai asked Esther to intercede with the king, and she agreed to do so provided that the people first prayed and fasted for three days. She then approached the king and asked him to a banquet, at which Aman was also a guest. At the banquet she invited them to another on the following day. During the night, the king, unable to sleep, ordered the chronicles of the kingdom to be read to him. He was thus reminded of the loyal service of Mardochai, to whom the next day he ordered Aman to do special honour. At the banquet on that day Esther accused Aman before the king. The result was that Aman was hanged on the gibbet which he had prepared for Mardochai, who was made chief minister in his place. Since the decree ordering the massacre of the Jews was irrevocable, a new decree was obtained by Mardochai enabling the Jews to defend themselves. They gained a great victory on the day appointed for their destruction, and to commemorate their deliverance the feast of Purim (Phurim: 'lots') was instituted. The story ends with the interpretation of the dream with which it began.

d Text and Versions—There are two widely differing editions of the book of Esther, the Greek and the Hebrew. They differ frequently in detail, and notably in length, the Greek containing a number of passages lacking in the Hebrew. In Vg St Jerome gathered all these passages and placed them, freely translated into Latin, at the end (after 10:3) of his word-for-word translation of the Hebrew, indicating the places in the book where they were found. DV follows St Jerome's order, but gives no indication of the place of the passages in the Greek. The passages, seven in number, are as follows in the order of the Greek: (1) Prologue, the dream of Mardochai, and his discovery of the conspiracy, 11:2–12:6, before 1:1. (2) Decree of Assuerus ordering the massacre of the Jews, 13:1–7, after 3:13. (3) Mardochai's exhortation to Esther, 15:1–3, after 4:8. (4) Prayers of Mardochai and Esther, 13:8–14:19, after 4:17. (5) Visit of Esther to Assuerus, 15:4–19, after 5:2. (6) Decree of Assuerus in favour of the Jews, 16:1–24, after 8:12. (7) Interpretation of the dream, 10:4–13, after 10:3. A note on the introduction of the book into Egypt is added in 11:1.

The Greek version exists in two recensions: the LXX text, found in the uncial manuscripts Sin., A, B, and the text found in the codices 19, 93, 108, which is shorter and probably later than the other. The Syriac version derives from the Hebrew; the Old Latin from the Greek.

Canonicity—The canonicity of the book in its Hebrew form, questioned among the Jews of the 1st cent. A.D., was upheld by the Jewish councils of Jerusalem and Jamnia. The Church, however, has from the beginning recognized the book in its Greek form as sacred Scripture. The consent of the great majority of the Fathers testifies to this tradition. St Clement of Rome (1st cent.; 1 ad Cor., ch 55, PG 1, 32), Clement of Alexandria (2nd cent., Strom. 4, 19, PG 8, 1328 f.), and Origen (3rd cent.; De Oratone, 14, PG 11, 452; Hom. 27 in Num., PG 12, 780) accept as Scripture the passages not found in the Hebrew. Some few Fathers doubted the canonicity of the book. St Jerome in theory rejected but in practice used the Greek additions. The canonicity of the whole book, Hebrew and Greek parts, has been defined by the Councils of Florence and Trent; cf. H. Pope, Why does the Protestant Church read the book of Esther, DbR July (1905) 77–98.

The Original Form of the Book—Various hypotheses are advanced on the original form of the book which exists in two so widely differing editions. Apart from the Protestant theory declaring the Hebrew edition to be the original and rejecting as spurious the Greek 'additions', the history of the problem among Catholic scholars shows four different viewpoints and consequently four different solutions.

(1) Some of the older exegetes held that there were two authors, equally and independently inspired, one the author of the Greek book, the other of the Hebrew. This theory had the approval of St Robert Bellarmine and it has recently been revived; cf. A. Miller, O.S.B. and J. Schildenberger, O.S.B., Tobias, Judith and Esther (BB, 1940).

(2) Some few modern Catholic scholars assert that the Greek additions are a later inspired composition, originally written in Greek and added to the Greek version of the Hebrew book. As we shall see presently, the arguments in favour of Greek as the original language of these additions are by no means convincing.

(3) Most modern Catholic writers hold that the original form of the book was a Hebrew text substantially the same as the LXX. They adduce the 310g following reasons pointing to such a text: (i) Both Greek recensions contain the additions; (ii) these additions were used by Josephus, Ant. 11, 6; (iii) there existed an Aramaic version of them amongst the Jews, cf. J. B. De Rossi, Chald. Estheris Additamenta, Rome, 1782; (iv) the note at the end of LXX and DV, 11:1, reads: 'In the fourth year of the reign of Ptolemy and Cleopatra, Dositheus, who said he was a priest, and of the Levitical race, and Ptolemy his son brought this epistle of Purim, which they said Lysimachus, the son of Ptolemy, had interpreted in Jerusalem'; the words 'this epistle of Purim', since they immediately follow the interpretation of the dream of Mardochai, and thus suppose the dream to have been related in the beginning, must designate the whole book including the Greek additions; (v) without these additions the book is incomplete and almost non-religious, for in the whole Hebrew text the name of God does not once occur: his help is not sought, his providence is not mentioned, he is not thanked for his assistance; with the additions, and with others of a minor nature which occur throughout LXX, the religious character of the book is apparent.

h Difficulties: the more important arguments in favour of a Greek original for the additions may be reduced to: (a) the language, which lacks the characteristics of a version and shows literary superiority to the rest of the Greek book; (b) the repetitions of LXX, which are due to the additions and are inexplicable in an original text, viz. the genealogy of Mardochai, 2:5-6 and 11:2-4; the conspiracy against the king, 2:21-23 and 12:1-3; the king's two decrees, each given first in summary and immediately afterwards in full, 3:12-13; 13:1-7 and 8:9-12; 16:1-24. Answer to (a): the argument from the language is not convincing. Hebraisms, explained as arguments for Jewish authorship, may point just as strongly to a Hebrew original. Interesting evidence on the alleged literary superiority is to be seen in the verdict of a non-Catholic writer: 'a comparison between the Greek rendering of the Hebrew and the Greek of the additions does not seem to justify us in differentiating with any degree of confidence the authorship of the two parts, or in assuming the existence of an otherwise unknown Greek version corresponding to the Hebrew form of the book', A. W. Streane, p. xxx. A ready explanation of the purer Greek of the royal decrees is found in the very probable existence of an official Greek version of these, cf. 3:12, which the LXX translator could have used. Answer to (b): the argument based on the repetitions is of more weight. An answer to it depends on the further question of how and why the shorter MT came into existence. J. B. De Rossi gives, and most Catholic scholars accept, the following hypothesis. The book of Esther was read at the Feast of Purim. When this feast degenerated into a purely profane festival the Sanhedrin made a compendium of the book appropriate for public reading. To save the name of God from insult and religion from dishonour, the more religious parts and the divine name were omitted; other parts were summarized. The result was the present Hebrew text. From this abridgement there passed into the original text, through the carelessness of copyists, passages which in the fuller text were superfluous. The LXX translation was made from a text thus corrupted.

i (4) An hypothesis worthy of consideration has been put forward by F. X. Roiron, S.J., in RSR 6 (1916) 1-16, based on the references, in MT and LXX, to the two letters of Mardochai to the Jews. Disagreeing with the common interpretation of 'this epistle of Purim' (11:1), he identifies it with the first letter of Mardochai (9:20), in the Greek 'the epistle of Purim' LXX 8:64 (cf. LXX 8:61), which he tentatively reconstructs from 9:23-25 and from among the Greek additions. The second letter of Mardochai and Esther (9:29), in the Hebrew 'this second epistle of Purim', in the Greek 'the confirmation of the epistle of Purim' (LXX 8:64), he identifies substantially with the present 310l MT which, for the same reason as De Rossi, he holds to be a text deliberately excised of its more religious features. This second letter is the original book of Esther. The contents of the first letter were: the dream at the beginning, its interpretation at the end, and in between a summary account of what justified that interpretation, viz. the conspiracy of the eunuchs, the hatred, intrigues, and fall of Aman, cf. 9:23-25; LXX 8:58-60.

According to this theory the LXX translator under divine inspiration was the first to combine these two letters by substituting the second—a long detailed history—at a place in the first where a shorter account of the same history had appeared. Except for this substitution and the insertion of the decrees the LXX translator reproduced faithfully both letters, hence the repetitions of LXX. Since the royal decrees were already known to the Jews they may never have been fully in either letter. They would then be documentary additions in LXX. This hypothesis offers a satisfactory explanation not only of the repetitions but also of the different, though not contradictory, viewpoints of the Hebrew book and of the Greek additions.

The Historical Value of the Book—The book of Esther is subject to the same criticisms as those of Tobias and Judith. Some non-Catholic critics regard it as completely devoid of historical value. A more conservative opinion is sponsored by other Protestant scholars who hold that 'there is at bottom a veritable historical basis, though we may admit that the element of romance has its share in the general result', cf. Streane, p. xiv. This latter opinion has found a measure of support from some modern Catholic scholars, cf. F. Prat, ER 18 (1902) 298-312; 610-33, but while in theory it is consonant with the Catholic doctrine of inspiration and interpretation, in fact it does not seem to have in its favour the solid arguments necessary to warrant a departure from the traditional view of the book as a true historical document, cf. P. Höpfl, DBV(S) 207-8. Until the end of the 18th cent. no doubt was voiced on the historical nature of the book. The following are the chief arguments in favour of the traditional view: (1) the insistence on topographical and chronological details; the great number of proper names; the reference to the annals of the Medes and Persians; (2) the existence and observance of the Feast of Purim, which in the 2nd cent. B.C. was already known as Mardochai's day (2 Mac 15:37). The feast of Purim is celebrated to the present day by Jews on the 14th Adar (Feb.-March). Proof of the biblical meaning 'lot' given to the word 'pur' (3:7, 9:24, etc.) has recently been found, cf. A. Bea, Bi 21 (1940) 198-9. 'Pur' is originally a Babylonian word puru from the root parū 'to cut' (praecidere) and therefore 'to allot by cutting' (praecidendo attribuere). This fact justifies us in concluding that the feast of Purim was instituted in Babylonia during the Exile as is declared in the book of Esther since the name is the Babylonian not the Hebrew word for 'lot'—gōrāl. (3) Remarkable archaeological corroboration of the book's description of the acropolis of Susa was found in the excavations of M. Dieulafoy and J. de Morgan. Though the remains are not those of the palace of Xerxes and Esther, which was burned in 440 B.C., it is very probable that the later buildings of Artaxerxes II, 404-359 B.C., followed the general plan of the former; cf. Dhorme DBV(S) Elam, 948 ff.; 960; Vigouroux, La Bible et les Découvertes Modernes 4 (Paris, 1896⁶) 621-70.

The Persian king is Xerxes, 486-465 B.C. Different names, Assuerus from the Hebrew and Artaxerxes from LXX, appear in the respective parts of Vg and DV. Herodotus informs us that Xerxes, in the 3rd year of his reign, gathered the princes in Susa to consult on making war against Greece. That occasion fits the feasting at which Assuerus deposed Vasthi (1:3). Xerxes in his 6th year, 480 B.C., undertook the unsuccessful expedition against Greece and returned the following year. Preparation for war and the war itself excellently n Date and Author—The author is unknown. Clement of Alexandria and many early commentators ascribed the book to Mardochai. Many modern Catholic scholars hold that the author was a later Jew living in Persia whose sources of information were the memoirs of Mardochai: some attribute to Mardochai the greater part of the book (1:1–9:22), and to a later writer (9:23–32). The date of the book is therefore not certain, but it was probably written in Persia very soon after the events narrated.

N.B.—The commentary follows the Greek order, the order in which the DV should be read.

311a XI 2-12 Mardochai's Dream—3. 'Among the first' is said by anticipation. LXX has 'who served in the king's court. 4. Jechonias was made captive in 597 B.C. It is not necessary to suppose that Mardochai was as old as this. He was a descendant of exiled Jews and thus 'he was of the captivity which Nabuchodonosor', etc. 12. He knew the divine origin but not the meaning of his dream.

b XII 1-6 Mardochai reveals the Conspiracy of Two Eunuchs—1. 'At that time' is not the time of the dream, the 2nd year, but the time when Esther was already queen (2:21 ff.). 'In the king's court' is a general indication of the place more particularly defined by 'at the king's gate' (2:19, 21). 2. 'He told the king thereof', indirectly through Esther (2:22). 5. The 'command' in 5a may indicate that he was not previously employed in the palace, that 12:1 refers to his 'care for Esther's welfare' (2:11, 19 f.), and that now part of his reward is employment in the palace. There may perhaps be question of better employment. There is an apparent contradiction between 5b and 'he hath received no reward' (6:3). The difficulty is solved either by referring 5b to the reward given later or since no mention of the reward was made in the chronicles (6:3), it was so small as to be reckoned, by the servants, no reward. 6. The Greek has Bugite here and in 3:1, while MT and DV (3:1 and 9:24) have Agag. The Greek is the better reading. The Greek word means 'bully, braggart' but probably here it is a transliteration of a Babylonian tribal or place name. Agag of MT is a deliberate corruption of the text to brand Aman as an Amalecite, the accursed enemy of Israel, cf. 1 Kg 15. Aman was probably in the conspiracy. The hatred begotten here matured in 3:1 ff.

c I 1-22 The Feast and Deposition of Queen Vasthi—2. 'When he sat on the throne of his kingdom which was in Susa the fortress.' In the HT there is a distinction between the 'fortress' (btrāh) of Susa and the city of Susa (Sūsān alone or hā'ir Sūsān) cf. MT 8:15. The btrāh is the Acropolis, cf. Neh 1:1. 4. 180 days during which guests were entertained in relays. 6. The beds are sofas used for the reclining position at meals. 7. HT and Greek refer only to drinking. For 'one after another' read 'the vessels differing one from another'. Such a quantity of vessels stresses the wealth of the king. 8. Persian custom seems ordinarily to have imposed the drinking of a definite amount, cf. Josephus, Ant. 11, 6. 9. The historical accuracy of the account is impugned because the queen at this time according to Herodotus was Amestris. Herodotus, however, does not call Amestris queen but only the wife of Xerxes, and moreover the royal harem had often simultaneously many queens of different rank and dignity. 14. On the seven counsellors, cf. Esd. 7:14. 19. The laws of the Medes and Persians were in theory irrevocable (8:8, Dan 6:8), in practice the absolute power of the king found a way out, cf. Herodotus 3, 31.

d II 1-23 Esther, chosen Queen, reveals the Conspiracy to the King—1 implies remorse on the part of the king. LXX gives the opposite meaning 'he no longer remembered Vasthi'. 2. Fear of the vengeance of Vasthi, if reinstated, made the servants seek to render her return impossible. 5-6. The genealogy of Mardochai is here repeated, cf. 11:2 ff. 7. Vg and DV read 'his brother's daughter', the Greek 'the daughter of the brother of his father', and MT 'the daughter of his uncle'. Edissa 'myrtle' is Hebrew; Esther 'star' is Persian. The Greek adds that Mardochai intended to marry her. Perhaps as the sole heir of her parents she had to marry one of her own tribe, cf. Num 36:6-12. 10. Mardochai forbade Esther to reveal her nationality lest it might ruin her chance of becoming queen. With a Persian name and in the surroundings of the harem she could pass as Persian. Possibly Persian law required that the queen be of the Achaemenid family (Herodotus 3, 84) but as already stated (1:19), the king could do as he pleased.

15. Note the modesty and simplicity of Esther. 16. Tebeth is Dec.-Jan. LXX has the 12th month Adar, Feb.-March. The 7th year is 479-478 B.C. The battle of Salamis (480 B.C.) was in September. The battles of Plataea in Greece and Mycale in Asia Minor (479 B.C.) were a little earlier in the season than that. The fugitives from Mycale reached Sardis while Xerxes was still there. After their arrival he returned to Susa. Xerxes could therefore have been back in Susa before the end of Tebeth (Dec.-Jan.) 479-478 B.C. LXX giving the 12th month extends the time to the middle of March. This supposes the gathering of the virgins during his absence. 17. The law forbidding Jewish-pagan marriages (cf. § 557c) did not bind Esther in these extraordinary circumstances. Since she was brought to the harem by force she was almost certainly advised by Mardochai on the lawfulness of her marriage with the king; cf. 14:15 f. Polygamy was tolerated in the Old Law. 19. It is not certain whether a second gathering of maidens or a continuation of the first is meant here. The whole phrase 19a is omitted in LXX. 20. 'Neither had Esther as yet declared her country and people, for thus Mardochai ordered her, to fear God and to observe his commandments as when she was with him. And Esther did not change her way of life', LXX. 21-23. The conspiracy is here repeated, cf. 12:1 ff. Conspiracies in the palace were not rare in Persia and Xerxes himself was later the victim of one.

III 1-13 XIII 1-7 III 14-15 The Royal Decree f for the Extermination of the Jews—1-6. The events here described took place between the 7th (cf. 2:16) and the 12th years. Aman already angered by Mardochai's discovery of the conspiracy (12:6) took further offence at the Jew's refusal to prostrate himself before him. This act in itself was not forbidden, cf. Gen 23:7-12; 33:3; Ex 18:7. In Persia however it seems to have been a species of idolatry. For this reason the Spartan ambassadors refused a like homage to Xerxes, cf. Herodotus 7:136. It is possible that we have here something analogous to Dan 6:5 ff., or to the over-scrupulosity in Tob 2:21. It is certain that Mardochai's refusal proceeded from a religious motive (13:12-14). The excessive vengeance of Aman against the whole Jewish nation is paralleled in other instances from eastern history, cf. Herodotus, 1:106; 3:79. 7. Vg with DV gives an inexact translation of MT which is itself corrupt. LXX gives a better reading though it has 14th instead of the correct 13th day, cf. 13:6. 'In the first month, which is the month Nisan, in the twelfth year of king Assuerus, Pur, that is the lot, was cast, before Aman from day to day and from month to month, and the lot fell on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month that is the month Adar.' On Pur see § 310f. 10-13. The injustice of the king's action is marked by his taking no counsel; cf. 1:13. The summary of the decree is given in 18. XIII:1-7. The decree follows in LXX. The publication of this decree eleven months before its execution is intelligible in view of the superstitious faith in 'lots' and the impossibility of a Jewish flight from the vast Persian empire. The 14th day is a slip of the copyists here and elsewhere in LXX for the correct 13th. The name Jew is not mentioned in 8 nor in the decree itself.

IV 1-8 XV 1-3 IV 9-17 Mardochai's Mourning g and Petition to Esther to intercede for her People—4.

- 311g The friendship between Esther and Mardochoi was well known to her maids and the eunuchs. They may also at this time have known their kinship and the Jewish nationality of both. That the king and Aman did not know of Esther's nationality is explained by the customs and circumstances of the Persian court. XV:1-3. In LXX these verses are contained in one verse, namely 8. The religious characteristic of the Greek is evident in the mention of God. IV:9-11. Esther could have sought an audience but thinking herself not in favour she saw little hope of its being granted. 16. LXX and MT have 'fast' not 'pray'.
- 312a XIII 8-18 Mardochoi's Prayer—13-14. He explains the reason for his not prostrating himself before Aman. His willingness to do so in other circumstances shows that the acts were not intrinsically evil, but were considered by him unlawful in this case. It is never lawful to give to another the honour due to God, and on the other hand it is necessary to avoid scandal and all that in given circumstances would be considered a denial of the true faith; cf. 2 Mac 6:21 ff. 15-17. Israel is the people of God, his inheritance, his portion, his lot—titles frequent in Scripture. 'Shut not the mouths', i.e. in death.
- b XIV 1-19 Esther's Prayer—4. Her danger is so imminent that it is said to be in her hands, cf. Job 13:14. 7. There is no suggestion that she herself was guilty of idolatry. 11. The promises include those concerning the Messias; cf. Gen 12:3. 'Thy sceptre' is either God's kingly power (Gen 49:10; Num 24:17) or Israel (Num 18:2; Jer 10:16). 'Them that are not' are idols; cf. 1 Cor 8:4, 10. 13. The lion is the king. 14-19. Esther proclaims her fidelity to God and her abhorrence of her marriage which is so repugnant to her religious sentiments. For the wine of the drink-offerings to false gods, cf. Deut 32:38.
- c V 1-2 XV 4-19 V 3-14 Esther's Interview with the King and the Banquet—1-2. There is great variation between the MT and the Greek accounts of Esther's visit. Here we have an obvious instance of deliberate interference with the original HT. The original, as in the Greek, attributed the change in the king to the intervention of God. In suppressing the name of God the originators of MT suppressed also all that had direct relation with God's name, i.e. the anger of the king and the fainting of Esther. XV:11. God was the principal cause of the king's changed sentiments, his affection for Esther the instrument God used for his purpose. 12. 'Thy brother' is an expression of tenderness, protection and equality. 13. The law is that which punished with death uninvited visitors to the king.
- d VI 1-14 Aman is commanded to honour Mardochoi—1. 'The Lord withheld sleep from the king', LXX—another example of deliberate interference with the text. 3. See note on 12:5. 8. The honour rendered was common in the East; cf. Gen 41:42 ff.; 1 Kg 18:4; 3 Kg 1:38. In LXX and in 10-11 the royal crown is not mentioned. 9-11. It can justly be presumed that the chronicles mentioned the nationality of Mardochoi. The king however seems to have forgotten the decree against the Jews. The capricious character of the tyrant king and the careless indifference in issuing the decree explain this forgetfulness; cf. 3:11. 13. Even among the pagans many were convinced that the Jews had special divine protection. Add: 'because the living God is with him' (Greek).
- e VII 1-10 Execution of Aman—4. In MT 4c is probably corrupt and its meaning certainly obscure. DV gives a good sense: the cruelty of Aman could be imputed to the king because the plan had royal sanction. RV reads 'although the adversary could not have compensated for the king's damage'. The general sense of MT is that Aman in his action against the Jews would damage more than benefit the king. LXX reads 'for the slanderer is not worthy of the king's court'. 8. The covering of the face of a condemned man was a custom in Rome and Greece; however a slight consonantal change in MT would give the LXX reading 'his face grew red', i.e. with confusion.
- 9-10. The gibbet was brought before the city gates for the execution; cf. 16:18.
- VIII 1-12 XVI 1-24 VIII 13-17 Mardochoi as Chief Minister: the Royal Decree in favour of the Jews—2. Her house is the house of Aman (MT). 3-4. Esther again entered the king's presence, apparently uninvited. 7-8. In MT the king speaks throughout 8. The meaning of the king's reply is that, since he cannot revoke the former decree he grants another enabling the Jews to defend themselves. 9. Read with LXX 'the twenty-third of the first month, that is Nisan, of the same year'. On this reading there were only 10 days between the two decrees, instead of two months according to MT and DV. 11-12. The phrase 'and to stand for their lives' gives the essential feature of the faculty granted to the Jews. It is not then a case of unlawful revenge on the part of Esther and Mardochoi, rather it is the only way open to them and the Jews, granted the unwillingness of the king directly to revoke the former decree. It is not stated that the Jews made use of the permission to kill the women and children; it is stated that they did not avail themselves of the permission to take the spoils; cf. 9:10. XVI:1-9. A thinly veiled apology for the former decree is made here. 10-14. The hatred of Aman for the Jews is said to be part of his treasonable activity against the king and the Persian Empire; cf. 12:6. 'Macedonian', if authentic, means traitor. It may be a later corruption for Bugite; cf. 12:6. 15-16. The innocence of the Jews is affirmed in words that contain a reference to Cyrus, Xerxes' predecessor, who admitted having received the kingdom from the God of the Jews, Esd 1:2; 6:10; 7:23. 17. The first decree is implicitly revoked. In this sense we must understand the words of Vg and DV. The Greek reads 'wherefore you shall do well not to put in execution the letters sent you by Aman', etc. 18. All his kindred (Greek household) did not include his ten sons who probably lived apart from Aman; cf. 9:13 f. VIII:13-17. Some conversions were sincere, others were not.
- IX 1-16 The Jews' Victory over their Enemies—2. Withstand successfully; cf. Jos 10:8; 21:42. 5. This action of the Jews must not be judged by the standard of the New Law, but by that of the Old Law with its lex talionis; cf. Ex 21:23; Lev 24:20. 13. Esther asks only the same permission as on the previous day. This supposes that the enemies intended a further attack the following day. The special reasons for this in Susa are not stated. Possibly Aman's partisans were here more numerous and more determined in their opposition. The accusation that Esther here manifests vengeful cruelty is answered by the intended attack, and cruelty is foreign to the character of Esther as portrayed in the whole book. The hanging of bodies on a gibbet was customary in Persia as a warning to others. 16. LXX gives 15,000, a reading preferred by many.
- IX 17-32 Institution and Observance of the Feast of Purim—26. Omit 'because Pur, that is the lot, was cast into the urn'. The remaining words and the initial words of the following verse are obscure in Vg and DV. Read 26b as in RV, 'Therefore because of all the words of this letter and of that which they had seen concerning this matter and that which had come unto them (27) the Jews ordained and took', etc. 32. 'And the commandment of Esther confirmed these matters of Purim and it was written in the book', possibly the book of Esther.
- X 1-XI 1 Assuerus' Greatness: Mardochoi's Dignity: Interpretation of the Dream—1. The exact meaning of this verse is not clear. Probably it merely proclaims the wealth and power of Assuerus. 'Islands of the sea' are the islands and coastlands of the eastern Mediterranean. 'Tributary': MT mas, 'forced labourers', probably means tribute in kind. XI:1. Four Ptolemies had wives named Cleopatra. Commentators favour Philometor, 181-146 B.C.

b The Poetic Books—The OT contains all that we know of the poetry of Israel. As with other peoples, poetry seems to have been the earliest form of literary expression in Hebrew. Several fragments and some complete poems are embodied in the narrative books, all of them very old. The more notable are: the sword-song of Lamech (Gen 4:23 f.); the blessings of Isaac (27:27-29, 39-40); the blessings of Jacob (49:1-27); Moses' song of triumph (Ex 1:1-18); the song of the well (Num 21:17-18); the prophecies of Balaam (Num 23:7-10, 18-24; 24:3-9, 15-24); the song of Moses (Deut 32:1-43); the death-bed blessings of Moses (Deut 33:2-29); Josue's command to the sun and moon, taken from the book of Jasher (Jos 10:12-13); the song of Debhora (Jg 5:2-31); Samson's proverbs (Jg 14:14, 16). Specimens from the later books are: Anna's prayer (often compared with the Magnificat) 1 Kg 2:1-10; the maidens' acclamation of David (1 Kg 18:7); David's lament over Saul and Jonathan (2 Kg 1:19-27), and Abner (2 Kg 3:33-34); the song of David (2 Kg 22:2-51); David's last words (2 Kg 23:1-7); and the song of David when the ark was placed in the tent (1 Par 16:8-36).

c Of the prophetic writings some books or portions of books are in prose, e.g. Agg, Jon (except ch 2), much of Jer, chh 40-8 of Ez, and parts of Is, Os and Zach. Others (Jl, Abd, Mic, Hab, Soph, Mal) are definitely poetic, with the same kind of metrical structure which is used in Pss and the other poetical books.

d The didactic books which are wholly versified form a consecutive group of seven. The book of Job is a didactic poem arranged in the dramatic scheme of a dialogue; the Psalms are devotional lyrics; Prov and Eccles may be called didactic lyrics and Eccles a reflective lyric; Cant is a nuptial hymn with the dramatic form of a dialogue; Wis is a reflective, and Eccles, like Prov, a didactic lyric.

e External Form—The technique of Hebrew poetry is by no means fully understood, but some things seem to be clear. Thought and, therefore, sentences are the basis of its external form. The line or stich is the fundamental unit. The second unit is the verse, usually consisting of two lines (distich), but occasionally of three (tristich). The lines are united by parallelism, i.e. by an equal distribution or balance of thought so that the individual lines correspond with one another. This parallelism is called synonymous when the second line merely echoes the first with some modification (e.g. Ps 2:4; 36:1-2; 50:9; 69:2; 75:3; Prov 3:13-18); antithetic when it is in sharp contrast with the first line (e.g. Ps 1:6; 19:8 9; Prov 10:1-4, 16, 28; 13:9); synthetic or progressive, when the idea expressed in the first line is developed and completed in the following lines (e.g. Ps 1:1; 3:5, 6; 18:8-10; Prov 26:3). Sometimes, too, we find four lines so connected that the first corresponds to the third and the second to the fourth (e.g. Ps 126:1), or the first with the fourth and the second with the third (e.g. Ps 136:5-6).

This pairing of similar thoughts is often an aid to the correct exegesis of an ambiguous word or phrase: e.g. 'the breath of his mouth' in Ps 32:6b is simply the 'word' of line a by which the heavens were made: cf. also Ps 87:11. It should also be noted that in a couplet the phrasing is often so distributed that only from both lines do we get the adequate subject and predicate; e.g. Ps 91:3 means 'to praise thy mercy and fidelity day and night'; cf. also Ps 18:1-2; 41:9; Gen 49:27.

Rhythm—Hebrew poetry is rhythmical, i.e. there is a recurrence of stressed and unstressed syllables in a relatively regular succession. This rhythm is due to the rising (arsis) or falling (thesis) of the voice in the intonation of words. To obtain this effect some of the monosyllabic particles lose their accent to the next word, and the construct state forms one unit with its following noun. These and other peculiarities help to determine the number of accents or beats within each verse. The Hebrew verse usually has three or four accents to a line, but the rhythmic unit is not rigid or uniform. As an example we cite Jg 5:4:

b'sa'd'k'd mis-s'el' d'om,
'eres ra' d'sah, gam-samdyim natdpu,
gam-ahim ndi'pu mdyim.*

'Yahweh, at thy march from Sé'ir, thine attack from the field of Édom, earth was shaken and heaven collapsed, and the clouds poured down water.'

Sometimes we find parallelism and rhythm in perfect agreement, each word having a stress:

tizdal katdal'imraj.*

'May my doctrine drop as the rain, may my speech distil as the dew' (Deut 32:2a).

A line of five accents regularly has a caesura or pause after the third; this type of verse is called the qinah because it is used in the qinoh or Lamentations of Jeremias to produce a plaintive melancholy cadence. It is also found in the Psalms, e.g. Ps 18:10:

The fear of Yáhwé is pure, enduring forever the judgements of Yáhwé are true, just altogether.

Metre—The line itself is not governed by a fixed number of long and short syllables as in our western poetry, but by a determined number of stresses or accents (beats), and the number of unstressed syllables between any two beats seems to be governed only by the possibilities of pronunciation and the laws of 318h euphony. The expression 'metrical structure' is, therefore, analogous rather than precise.

1 Strophe or Stanza—The sense itself often demands the division of the poem into strophes: cf. e.g. the arrangement of Ps 2 in the new Latin Psalter. As the lines are related to each other within a verse by parallelism, so the strophes themselves are often connected by a higher echo of the same. Synonymous strophic parallelism is the repetition of the thought expressed in a previous strophe by further amplification (Ps 21:2-12 and 13-22); antithetic strophic parallelism expresses the contrast between various parts of a poem (Is 14:4b-8 and 9-11); synthetic strophic parallelism develops and completes the thought expressed in the first strophe (Ps 103).

j The strophic arrangement of a poem may also be identified by various stylistic devices used in the construction of a strophe: e.g. the refrain or intercalary verse: cf. Ps 41:6, 12 and 42:5 which form one poem; 45; 48; 91; the anaphora or the repetition of a word or expression at the beginning of several successive verses: cf. Ps 12:2-4; the epiphora or repetition of the same words at the end of successive lines: cf. Ps 117:10-12; the symplece or repetition of one word or expression at the beginning and of another at the end of successive verses: cf. Ps 117:2-4.

k The acrostic or alphabetical poem may also help in the reconstruction of the strophic unit: cf. Ps 9:24-33; 36:118-144; Prov 31:10-31; Eccles 51:13-29; Lam 1-4. On the Hebrew word selāh cf. § 335e.

l Some scholars believe that nearly all Hebrew poems can be divided into strophes in such a way that the second (antistrophe) corresponds to the first, the third (epode or alternative strophe) differing from the first two both in matter and form. If the poem has a number of strophes, the fourth and the fifth will correspond with each other and also with the first and second, while the sixth (or epode) is either independent or corresponds to the third: cf. Ps 38 as explained by J. K. Zenner, S.J., Chorgesänge (1896) 28. It is worth noting that the Rās-Shamra poetry comes from a cultural and literary setting more closely allied to Hebrew poetry than either the Babylonian or Egyptian, and that there are points of contact in their structural forms, e.g. in Ps 28 and 69; cf. Bs 103 (1946) 283.

m Internal Qualities—These are determined by the age, condition of life and environment in which the writers lived. Although the OT is of divine authorship, it comes also within the scope of literature, and is to be appreciated as such. For the Holy Spirit in 'Inspiration' poured the flood of his exalted message into the mould of oriental minds, leaving clearly impressed upon it the peculiarities of style of each writer and his time. The substance of the message remains unchanged, but its shapes are various. Using a simple but vigorous diction, profuse figures of speech and rhetorical devices the sacred writers left as a heritage a sublime imagery of religious thought and a great wealth of deep feeling. Thus we find:

n (a) simile, i.e. an expressed resemblance between two objects of unlike classes: e.g. man's transient existence (Ps 102:15; 128:6; Job 7:6; 9:25, 26; 14:2, 11); (b) metaphor, i.e. an implied comparison (Ps 17:3; 70:3; Gen 49:3-27); (c) allegory, i.e. a developed and continued metaphor (Ps 79; Is 5:1-7; Ez 17:1-10; Prov 24:30-34); (d) personification (Ps 18:6; Is 44:23; 49:13; Prov 8:12-36; Wis 8:2; Job 28:14, 22); (e) hyperbole (Ps 108:6-15) where the author prays for retribution upon his enemies in the 'fine frenzy' of the poet; (f) irony (Is 5:22; 47:1, 5, 8-9, 13-14; 14:9-20; Am 4:4-5); (g) word-play (cf. the Heb. of Mic 1:8-16; Am 5:5; 6:13; Os 6:8-10; 12:12; Is 10:28-29). An example from Is 5:7 will illustrate its effectiveness:

'And he looked for judgement (mišpāt); but, lo! bloodshed (mišpāh), for justice (ṣ'ḏāqāh); but, lo! a cry (ṣ'āqāh)'.

In this article we have endeavoured to explain only the rudiments of Hebrew poetry. It is, however, essential to keep in mind that the poet was not bound to absolute regularity either in parallelism or rhythm or in strophic construction. He wrote because of the divine inspiration within him and in its expression he was fettered by no poetic structure that was meticulously exact or regular in form.

The Wisdom Books—Wisdom literature is the general name given to those books of the OT whose main theme is wisdom. They are written, for the most part, in a proverbial or aphoristic style which today we call gnomic, and in form and subject-matter they find a parallel in the gnomic poetry of classical literature. These books are Prov, Job, Eccles, Eccles (Ben Sirach) and Wis, to which are sometimes added Cant and Ps. Yet the last two books are not, strictly speaking, Wisdom literature. The former is a lyrical poem, and most of the Psalms are not, in the precise sense of the word, sapiential, although Ps 1, 36, 38, 48, 72, 111, 138 and portions of other Psalms belong to this class. Job, though not gnomic in form, merits a place among the sapiential books because of its speculative discussions on the origin and moral value of suffering and its hymn to Wisdom (ch 28). Typical of wisdom literature are Prov, Eccles and, to a lesser degree, Eccles. They consist of sententious sayings that are independent, or, at most, grouped about a definite subject. The book of Wisdom, written in Greek, is more philosophical and less gnomic.

These seven books, both in the Hebrew Bible and in Vg, where they are placed in the middle, form a special group, to which we may add the eulogy of Wisdom in Bar 3:9-4:4. In the Roman Missal they have, with the exception of Ps, the collective title of 'Liber Sapientiae', when read as Epistles in the Mass. Origin—The proverb is the standard form of folk wisdom. Every people has its own collection and the proverbial style of utterance is popular among Orientals. These proverbs pass from lip to lip and embody the wisdom gained by experience. They express, in short pithy sayings, something that common experience has shown to be true. A proverb is 'the wisdom of many and the wit of one'. Among the Hebrews such popular sayings often took a religious form, and a number of proverbs, both secular and religious, are found in the early literature of Israel: e.g. 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (1 Kg 10:12 and 19:24); 'From the wicked shall wickedness come forth' (1 Kg 24:13); 'the strength of a man is according to his age' (Jg 8:21). Other early forms of wisdom are the riddle (e.g. Jg 14:14) and the fable (e.g. Jg 9:8-15) and the parable (e.g. 2 Kg 12:1-6).

In the OT the golden age of proverbial utterance is associated with the name of Solomon, the wise king par excellence. 3 Kg 4:29-30 states that 'God gave to Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much and largeness of mind as the sand that is on the seashore'. According to 3 Kg 4:32 he 'spoke three thousand proverbs'. There is no reason to deny that e The Hebrew word for proverb is māṣāl. Originally it seems to have meant 'likeness', then a short saying containing a comparison. Eventually however the word acquired an extended sense and became an expression for a sententious saying or authoritative utterance in figurative and poetic form (Num 23:7, 18; Is 14:4-6). It was in this popular form of expression that the Wisdom literature was chiefly written.

f The Wise Men—A number of proverbial sayings in the Wisdom literature of the OT may have come at first from the lips of the people, but if so, they have been altered and modified so that the stamp of the professional teacher is upon them. The prophets speak of the existence of 'wise men'. In Jer 18:18 they are clearly marked off from the other two great classes of religious teachers: 'the law shall not perish from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet'. The wise men, therefore, occupied a definite position in the religious community and the study and teaching of wisdom was a recognized pursuit. It is frequently stated that the prophets often condemn wise men and wisdom (Is 5:21; 29:14; 44:25; Jer 4:22; 8:9; 9:23), but a study of these texts shows that the abuse, not the use of wisdom, is the object of the prophets' invective. Moreover it is clear from other texts that they greatly valued true wisdom. For Isaiah it is a gift of God (33:6), and upon the Messias shall rest the spirit of wisdom (11:2). In fact it is a prophet who calls God himself for the first time by the name of Wisdom (Is 31:2; cf. 28:23-29), and Jeremiah, in full agreement with the sapiential books, proclaims in a formula dogmatically significant, that God in his wisdom created the universe (10:12; 51:15). The wise men base their teaching on revelation and human experience, the one illuminating the other, but they regard revelation as the ultimate foundation of wisdom and the fear of God as its beginning and characteristic quality.

g Wisdom in the Historical Books—In the earlier OT writings wisdom generally means the professional skill of craftsmen or administrative ability. The makers of the tabernacle (Ex 35:31-35) and of the priestly garments (Ex 28:3) received the gift of wisdom. Joseph possessed such political foresight as to win from Pharaoh the encomium of 'the wisest man' (Gen 41:39); Josue, Moses' successor, was divinely filled with the spirit of wisdom (Deut 34:9) and Solomon's wisdom ranged from political acumen (3 Kg 5:12) and keen jurisprudence (3 Kg 3:28) to the solution of riddles (3 Kg 10:1-4) and knowledge of natural history (3 Kg 4:33). This wisdom, however, is an intellectual, not a moral quality; it is practical ability, not a religious virtue.

h Wisdom in the Sapiential Books—Among these books, Prov, Eccles and Wis are of chief importance. Of lesser value for our study are Job, Eccles and Bar (3:9-4:4). Prov hold perhaps the highest place among the sapiential books. It is a composite work that gets its name from the two oldest and longest portions (chh 10-22:16 and chh 25-9) which are entitled 'The Proverbs (mišlê) of Solomon', and in it we may trace the development of wisdom literature from its earliest forms to the most evolved. Eccles was written, like Prov, in Hebrew māṣāls. It was composed about 180 B.C. and translated into Greek by Ben Sirach's grandson shortly after 132 B.C. It is a practical moral guide and praises particularly the divine wisdom manifested in the Law. Although written in the heyday of Hellenism, its author remained uninfluenced by Grecian culture and exhorted his readers to remain faithful to the Law and true wisdom (24:1-47; 36:1-19; 44:1-50:31). Wis was written in Egypt, probably at Alexandria, 150-50 B.C. It praises the divine wisdom as manifested in the history of Israel. 314b In the clarity of its doctrine on immortality (chh 3-5) it far excels other OT writings. Its language is Greek like certain of its ideas, but its doctrine is Jewish. Its purpose was to console the Jews in Egypt and to put them on their guard against the false wisdom of Hellenism.

Job is a book apart. Its author is a Hebrew, but the characters of the drama, even Job himself, are not; cf. §318a. Wisdom, then, in the mind of the Jews, though bound up with religion, can be independent of revelation; but its principles, drawn from reason and experience, shine forth in greater relief beneath the light of revelation. Eccles is a difficult book. Whatever be the solution to the problem of its literary composition (§376m-n), it teaches the vanity of earthly things and the value of true wisdom. It condemns the search for pleasure when it is absorbing and divorced from the fear of God (2:1; 7:14-15), and its final conclusion is 'Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man' (12:13). The alleged influence of Greek philosophy has been much exaggerated. By showing the insufficiency of earthly joys, Ecclesiastes prepared the Jewish mind for a fuller revelation of the future life.

The Notion of Wisdom—It is from the above mentioned writings that we gather the Hebrew notion of wisdom. In order to arrange this matter more conveniently we propose, with Fr. A. Vaccari, S.J., Greg 1 (1920) 218, the following division:

Human Wisdom—In the older portions of Prov that elementary practical wisdom which consists in knowing how to live rightly plays a notable part. It has a special name, 'ormāh' ('discernment', 'shrewd insight') and its contrary is peff or ḥ'ayyūt ('simplicity', 'inexperience'); cf. Prov 14:15; 22:3; 27:12. But this prudence, at first sight worldly and self-interested, is not without a religious content. There is a God-ward thought at the back of the writers' minds that hallowed what we call worldly wisdom, sanctified common sense, and brought religion into every nook and cranny of daily life. If, then, this human prudence is to be penetrated with religion, it is not surprising that religious wisdom itself (hokmāh) is constantly stressed. It is in this form of wisdom that the first nine chapters of Prov exhort us and their doctrine is epitomized in the axiom that is the key-note of the book: 'the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom' (Prov 1:7; cf. 9:10; 15:33; 30:3; Job 28:28; Eccles 1:16). This fear is synonymous with reverence and filial devotion. It is 'the fullness of wisdom' (Eccles 1:20); 'the crown of wisdom' (1:22); 'the root of wisdom' (1:25). In the concrete it is the practice of religion.

Theoretical Wisdom—The intellectual curiosity which gave rise to speculations about nature, man and God, is not characteristic of Hebrew wisdom. Hence it is that speculative wisdom has little place in the sacred books. Eccles, which so highly stresses and recommends practical wisdom, declares vain that wisdom which would know the ultimate reason of things, especially in the divine government of the world (1:12-18). The author of Job proposes a profound theological problem, the divine Providence in the government of the world (28:12-14), to which, however, no one but God can give an adequate answer 315e (28:23). As far as man is concerned, he concludes tersely :

'Behold the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom ;
And to shun evil, that is understanding' (28:28).

The starting point, then, of the Hebrew sage is not a question but a creed. Given that there is a Supreme Being, Creator, Sustainer, Ruler, Judge of all, then wisdom is to understand, so far as may be, God's words and ways and to turn that knowledge to practical account. Wisdom is, in all the complex relations of life and conduct, to do the will of God.

d Objective Wisdom—Since the practice of religion is essential to true wisdom, it follows that the observance of the revealed Mosaic Law is a prominent element of objective wisdom. Actually the sapiential literature, especially the older part, does not seek either the basis or the formulas of morality in the letter of the Law, i.e. in something that is specifically Hebrew. It transcends all that is local and temporary, giving to its teaching an absolute, rational foundation based on the psychological observation of the human heart and human life. Cradled in the stronghold of exclusiveness, it overleaps the barriers and reaches forth to the whole family of man. Hence its precepts have a universal application. They are the patrimony of all mankind.

e Still, revealed Law is a manifestation of divine wisdom ; hence the two, the Law and Wisdom came to be identified. This identification is emphasized in Baruch (3:10-4:1) and Ben Sirach expresses the same idea in a more dramatic and poetical fashion when he pictures wisdom as proceeding out of the mouth of the Most High, seeking a dwelling-place among the nations (Ecclus 24:7-12) and receiving an abode in Sion, where she found her full expression in the Book of the Law (24:23-24). In thus identifying the Law with wisdom, Baruch and Ben Sirach only gave greater relief to the idea already expressed in Deut 4:5-8 : 'I [Moses] have taught you laws and statutes as the Lord my God hath commanded me . . . observe and fulfil them ; for this is your wisdom', etc. It is not difficult, therefore, to understand how the Hebrews came to give the name of Wisdom to the revealed Law.

316a Wisdom as a Divine Attribute—To the writers of the sapiential books 'all wisdom is from God' (Ecclus 1:1). He is its source and he alone can give it to man (Prov 2:6). Wisdom then is an attribute of God whose clear reflection is seen in the never-ending marvels of nature (Ps 103:24 ; Prov 3:19-20 ; Wis 13:1-9), and in the ordering of human events (Ecclus 17:14-15 ; 18:12-14). God therefore is all-wise ; in fact he is Wisdom personified. Conversely Wisdom is God himself.

b Personified Wisdom—Wisdom as a principle of moral life regulating human actions is personified in Prov 1:20-28 ; 8:1-3, 12-15 and 9:1-5. But in the mind of the poet wisdom is more than a practical virtue. In Prov 8:22-31 he places on her lips those sublime and familiar words (cf. § 368m-n) :

'God possessed me as (in) the beginning of his ways,
before his works, of old ;
I was set up from everlasting, from the beginning, before the earth was.
When there were no primeval waters, I was conceived, . . .
When he established the heavens, I was present, . . .
I was by him as a master-workman, and I was daily his delight, exulting always before him, Exulting in his habitable earth, and my delight was with the sons of men'.

The Wisdom that speaks here is in God, as the idea of a masterpiece is in the mind of the artist ; but it is also conceived as distinct from God, proceeding from him by way of generation, and subsistent. It seems to be more than a poetical personification, though not yet a clearly defined personality. Meanwhile it 316b prepares the way for and prefigures the doctrine of the distinction of persons in God.

In Ecclus 24:1-16, Wisdom, again speaking in the first person, presents herself under another aspect. In this passage Wisdom is a personification of the Law. The truth revealed by God and the Law imposed by him are properly conceived as outward manifestations of the eternal divine Wisdom, as the word (logos) of God, as something that goes forth from God and comes to man, and on the journey takes on, as it were, a personality all its own ; then, deposited in writing, is concretized in the books of the Law. The same mental process may be observed in Baruch.

d If, lastly, we turn to Wis, its abstract thought and philosophical speculation tell us that, without having left Israel, we are on the terrain of Hellenism. In his description of Wisdom the author exhausts the rich philosophical dictionary of Greece. For him, too, as in Prov, Wisdom is the artificer of all, but he prefers to describe her, not in the act of creating the universe, but as continually active in penetrating (7:24), ordering (8:1) and renewing (7:27) all things. Yet though she fills the universe, she is intrinsic to God ; for 'she is a breath of the power of God, an emanation all pure of the glory of the Omnipotent ; the splendour of eternal light and the unspotted mirror of God's activity and the image of his goodness' (7:25-27) ; words so sublime and profound that St Paul appropriated them to describe in human language the ineffable mystery of the divine generation of the Word (cf. Heb 1:3 ; also Col 1:15, 17). From this portrayal of Wisdom to the definitely Personal Wisdom (Logos) of the NT was but a step.

e Foreign Influence—Analogous collections of gnomic poetry were in existence in Babylonia and Egypt before the Hebrew sapiential books were composed. Of special interest is the Egyptian hieratic text of 'The Teaching of Amenemope' published by Sir Wallis Budge in 1923-4. There is a curious resemblance between the thirty chapters of this work and the thirty quatrains (read šlōšim = 30 in Prov 22:20) which compose Prov 22:17-24:22, as well as between the thought-content and verbal expression as far as Prov 23:11. The relation between them is more than fortuitous, but scholars differ in determining it. P. Mallon (Bi 8 [1927] 3-30) admits the dependence of Prov upon the Egyptian sapiential book ; others affirm a common dependence upon an older Egyptian or Hebrew source.

f Since the 'Teaching of Amenemope' is variously dated between 1000 and 600 B.C., chronology cannot settle the question of dependence. It is to be noted, however, that the thirty quatrains in Prov run consecutively, but in Amenemope they are scattered throughout the work. This would be difficult to understand in the case of a direct dependence of the Hebrew work on the Egyptian, but is intelligible if the compiler of Proverbs made, more or less, a copy of an older Hebrew writing, while Amenemope took a number of its ideas and elaborated them in his own way, inserting them in his text wherever he thought it suitable. In any event, wherever the inspired authors have made use of the wisdom literature of other nations, they have put their own impress upon it and carefully left out all that might savour of polytheism or offend the majesty of God.

g It is often stated that the personification of wisdom in the later sapiential literature is due to the impact of Greek thought. It is, however, a canon of sound criticism not to explain by foreign influence what may well be accounted for by indigenous factors. Actually, personification of the divine attributes is not at all alien to the Hebrew mind (cf. Ps 84:14 ; 88:14-15 ; 93:15) ; and it was quite natural that the revealed word (logos) of God should be graphically personified (Ecclus 24:1-16). There is no doubt that the author of Wis was acquainted with Greek philosophy and adopted in part its logical classifications. Deeply

THE POETICAL AND WISDOM LITERATURE

816g versed in the OT doctrine, his aim was to prove to his fellow-Jews the superiority of Hebrew wisdom and to win the gentile reader to his view. To this end he clothed old truths in new formulas that were understood and appreciated by those familiar with Greek philosophy. Hellenism, however, does not enter into the texture of his thought. The closest resemblance is found in 7:22-24, but the 'spirit of understanding' that 'pervades and penetrates all things' (24b) is not the world-soul (logos) of the Stoics, immanent in all things, the active principle of a pantheistic all, but is as distinct from the world as a workman from his work, intrinsic to God and transcendent.

h In a word, the speculations of Hellas had a purely metaphysical origin and were born from the search for 816h a rational explanation of the world and its phenomena. The wisdom of the Hebrew sages springs from morality and religion. It is a divine plant with its roots in the rich soil of revelation. It is offered, not as the scientific explanation of the essence of things, but as a guide to virtue. Its personification played a great part in evolving and formulating the NT doctrine of the Word of God. In the OT all the essential elements were there. Finally the name alone was wanting. St John supplied that when, in his prologue, he proclaimed to the world the Word as the only begotten Son of God, the second Person of the Blessed Trinity.

b Contents—In the land of Hush there lived a God-fearing man named Job, rich in flocks, herds and the produce of the land, and blessed with a numerous progeny. According to current notions of God's government of the world his virtuous life and prosperity were thought to be interrelated, the latter being the God-given reward for the former, and this belief was shared by the wealthy man himself. In a council held in heaven it was urged that Job's virtue was purely self-seeking and would vanish with his wealth. With the sanction of God he was quickly despoiled of all his children and of all his belongings, but his virtue proved to be deep-rooted in a profound conviction of man's due relation to the godhead, which he expressed in the famous words 'The Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord', words redolent of perfect resignation to the divine will. A second and more violent temptation was unable to weaken his faith and trust in God. This time his whole body was smitten with a loathsome disease, so loathsome that he was deprived of the moral support of his wife, who lost her faith in the justice of the divine government of the world and urged him to show his anger by cursing God and then to die. But Job's faith was stronger than his wife's. He rejected the invitation to put an end to his life and again showed complete resignation: 'If we have received good things at the hand of God, why should we not receive evil?' 317b

Three friends belonging to different tribes and localities now heard of Job's calamitous change of fortune and arranged to come together to comfort him. When these three, Eliphaz, Bildad and Sophar, arrived and saw Job in his appalling state, reduced to sitting on a refuse-heap, their pity evaporated as they were at once convinced that they were in the presence of one cursed by God. They shared the current view that prosperity is the divine reward of virtue and calamity the divinely sent punishment of iniquity; and in view of the extreme severity of Job's losses and bodily disease it was clear to them that Job's iniquity, though concealed from men, had been very great. Silence seemed the only course; and they feared even to enter into relations with one so obviously under God's curse.

Job had now been suffering for months. It had taken that time for the news to reach the friends, for them to arrange and then to accomplish their journey in common. Job was now reduced to skin and bones (19:20). The obvious hardness of the friends' attitude and Job's bitter disappointment at the lack of all sympathy coming after the wearing experience of prolonged mental anguish and physical suffering at last proved too strong for even his heroic patience, and he broke the silence with the utterance of bitter regret that God had ever let him see the light of day.

This outburst aroused the friends who proceeded to justify God's treatment of Job according to their own theological preconceptions. Job is guilty and has merited his lot. This is insinuated at first, but later boldly stated. If Job will repent and turn to God, all will yet be well with him. God's chastisement is a blessing in disguise (5:17). God wounds but he is ready to heal. Their diagnosis of the case is based upon and defended by appeal to experience, to traditional lore and to the justice of God. Knowing nothing of rewards and punishments after death or of what had happened at the council in heaven it seemed to them that there could not be any other explanation of what had befallen Job. The sufferer on his side vehemently repelled this interpretation. He knew he was innocent and could not in conscience admit himself to have been guilty. He admits those smaller transgressions of which all men are guilty (13:26; 14:4), but nothing that could account for the sufferings he had to endure. Hence a terrible struggle in Job's soul. He knew God to be just; yet everything seemed to point to injustice on the part of God. He too had always shared the common conviction that God's treatment of man was in proportion to man's merit or demerit. How could God's justice be reconciled with his own crushing experience? The friends had an answer, but his conscience gave him complete assurance that it was false. These two apparently irreconcilable convictions, God's absolute justice and his own innocence, caused him mental anguish as painful as his bodily affliction and wrung from his tortured soul irreconcilable declarations. He accused God of treating him unjustly (27:2), and yet was firmly convinced that if only he could meet God and lay his case before the divine majesty all would be well (23:3-7). It seemed as if God did not know the true facts. If only Job could bring these to his notice, justice would be done. But all the time f At this point the argument is taken up by a young man named Elihu who has been in the circle of listeners following the debate. He is angered that his elders have been unable to vindicate God's justice and convince Job of his guilt. He is self-confident and verbose but capable of real poetic expression. Though he does not substantially further the debate, he does give emphasis to one important point which the friends had merely touched on, namely that suffering and calamity are not only vindictive but also medicinal. By them God opens the ear of the sufferer to withdraw him from his evil ways (36:7-12; 33:14-28). By his final description of the power and majesty of God manifested in storm, lightning and thunder, which he depicts as actually raging as he speaks, Elihu prepares for the coming of God himself.

317e Job knew that nothing in the world he had made escaped the notice of its Creator (16:20). These shiftings of view reflect the bewilderment begotten in Job's soul by the apparently insoluble problem of reconciling God's known justice with the hard facts of experience. But in spite of all waverings he held to his belief that justice would be done him by God in the end (19:23-27), and the final words of his last long speech express his conviction both of his own innocence and of God's justice (31:35-37).

g The Almighty himself appears in a storm to end the debate. It might have been expected that he would reveal to Job, who is directly addressed, the decision taken in the heavenly council to try his virtue, and so by this revelation place his problem in an entirely new light. But it is not for man to know the secrets of God's plans. It is for man to acknowledge not only the power but above all the wisdom of God, and therefore humbly to accept his government of the world and to submit trustingly to his providence even though it surpasses his puny understanding. The divine discourse is devoted accordingly to driving home the lesson of God's power and wisdom as manifested in the creation of the world, in the marvels of light, rain, snow and the rest, and of the animal kingdom. Again and again it is brought home to Job that he understands none of these things. How can he, who has not the understanding to explain any of the daily events of nature, expect to understand God's moral government of the world and how dare he set himself up as judge of the rightness or wrongness of that government?

These sobering thoughts restore its equilibrium to Job's fundamentally upright and God-fearing nature. He answers humbly that he has spoken inconsiderately and has no word to add.

h God now resumes his discourse this time to insist on his power and man's impotence. God made the mighty beasts like the hippopotamus and the crocodile, before which man is impotent. It is clear then that God has power to punish the wicked among men even though they appear powerful; and, if he does not, it is not through lack of strength but for reasons known to himself.

Job thereupon submits, acknowledging God's omnipotence and his own feeble understanding. He repudiates his utterances and declares his repentance.

God finally rebukes the friends for their foolish sayings concerning him but forgives them at Job's intercession. He restores to Job in double measure all that he had. Job is again blessed with a numerous offspring and dies at length in a prosperous and advanced old age.

i Unity and Consistency of the Book—Two questions now arise: (1) whether the book has reached us in the form left by its author, and (2) whether there are inconsistencies between its different elements. The former question is one of literary investigation and does not touch the inspired character of the book as a whole. Any substantial additions, as distinct from insignificant glosses, made to biblical books after they had left the hands of their original authors were made by inspired writers (Dz 784).

317j If the prologue were omitted the dialogue would be in the air and unintelligible. It is clearly necessary for the understanding of the subsequent psychological drama. Whether it was found and taken over by the author is a different question. Its artistic finish as a gem of clear, concise narrative appears decisive against the suggestion that it was a popular tale that passed from mouth to mouth. It has been urged, however, that the problem posed in the prologue is not that dealt with in the dialogue. In the prologue the question is whether the virtue even of the most God-fearing man can be purely disinterested, whereas the problem of the dialogue is whether God's providence can allow an innocent man to suffer. But this dichotomy is unwarranted. The course of the dialogue shows Job's virtue, in spite of outbursts of impatience, to stand the test, and he does not, as the Satan had foretold (2:5), abandon his religion and curse God. The question of the prologue is thus answered in the dialogue. On the other hand the problem of the dialogue is conditioned by the question of the prologue and arises out of it. It is the testing of Job's virtue by unmerited affliction which raises the problem of the suffering of the innocent.

The organic unity of the prologue and the dialogue is further shown by the references in the latter to the former. Reference to the loss of Job's children (1:19) occurs in 5:25; 8:4; (on 19:17 see comment); to his disease (2:7 f.) in 7:5; 19:17, 20; 30:17, 30; to Job's arable land (1:14) in 31:38-40; to lightning as instrument of his loss (1:16) in 20:26. Mention of the Satan after the prologue is not to be expected, for he is nothing more than the instrument of God, the supreme ruler of the world. The praise of Job's virtue (1:8; 2:3) is not in conflict with Job's admission of such smaller moral failings as are found in all (13:26), and he himself maintains his essential innocence to the last (27:5; 31:35-8). The breakdown in his high standard of patience and resignation manifest in the dialogue is not to be wondered at in view of the prolongation of his sufferings, the heartlessness of those from whom solace was to be expected, and the mental torture arising from his inability to comprehend God's dealings with him, running counter as they did to all he had been brought up to believe. The reader must also bear in mind the poet's free use of metaphor in the allusions to Job's calamities. God has removed the crown from his head and his troops had encamped round about Job's tent (19:9-12). See also 16:10-15; 22:10 f.; 30:12-14. The poet must be allowed his traditional licence and not be accused of inconsistency for his use of it.

Job's last speech contains a poem in praise of wisdom, ch 28. This is very loosely attached to its context and as an independent unit can be removed without the creation of an apparent gap. Moreover the last line (28:28), though an integral part of the poem, unduly anticipates Job's final submission to God's providence. It has therefore the definite appearance of an interpolation by a later hand. The poetic artistry of the author of Job would not have allowed the insertion of the poem except as an organic member of the whole work. Every sign of a later addition is presented also by the speech of Elihu, chs 32-7. This too can be excised without leaving a trace of the operation. Elihu is mentioned neither before nor after. No notice is taken of his utterance by Job, who had answered each of the friends, nor by God in his speech, nor in the epilogue. The divine discourse with its address to Job (38:2 ff.) would follow naturally and admirably after the latter's final assertion of his innocence (31:37). The author of Job would have integrated the young man's utterance into his work and not inserted it without adequate connexion. It is true that the description of God's power manifested in the storm (ch 37) prepares the way for the theophany of ch 38, but the conception of this link would not exceed the inventiveness of an interpolator. His purpose seems to have been to emphasize the medicinal function of deserved calamity n The argument is not quite so strong with regard to the poetic descriptions of the hippotamus and the crocodile (40:10-41:25). They have the appearance of an addition. God's case is amply expounded and convincingly established without them, and the whole, but especially the conclusion, lacks that application to Job's attitude which the poet's style gives warrant for expecting.

317m as a means of bringing a man back to God. Budde and Peters understand this of the purpose of unmerited suffering to warn a man against the roots of evil within him. They consequently see in Elihu's teaching on suffering a definite advance on that of the dialogue and the high-point of the original author's own doctrine. But in view of passages like 33:17, 27; 36:9, it seems clear that Elihu shared the friends' view that all suffering is deserved, and they had at least admitted its correctional value (5:17). The linguistic argument is developed in the larger commentaries.

o Without the epilogue the work would be incomplete, which must be judged not in the light of Christian ideas about suffering but of those prevalent for so many centuries in Israel. The author of Job and his contemporaries had no thought of rewards and punishments after death (see Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life). They had a deep conviction however that God as the just ruler of the world must requite men according to their deeds. So far as they knew, this could only be done in this life; and, therefore, although the author of Job rose to the conception of suffering being inflicted on a just man as a trial, he could not envisage this as a lifelong state. Job had to be restored to prosperity. Indeed the unmerited suffering endured itself called for compensation in order to restore the balance. Hence Job received back his former possessions even in double measure.

p Strange little interpolations are found in 42:3a, 4, words which Job could not possibly address to the Almighty in his now submissive frame of mind and which are taken from God's address to him (38:2, 36) with parts of 33:1, 31.

318a The Setting of the Story in Place and Time—It is a remarkable fact that all the persons who take part in the story of Job are non-Israelites. Job's own parentage and tribe are not mentioned. The locality of his home is, however, given as in the land of Hus ('45), which LXX 42:17b under the name of Ausitis assigns, it seems correctly, to the borders of Idumaea (= Edom) and Arabia. The name of Eliphaz of Teman, the more influential and probably the oldest of the three friends, is Edomite (cf. Gen 36:4, 11). Teman was situated in Edom (Am 1:11 f.) and was famous for its wisdom (Jer 49:7), a reputation which suits Eliphaz as Job's principal interlocutor. Bildad of Shuah (the Shuhite) probably came from Edom or Arabia. Sophar's name may mean 'Little Bird', and Naamah, his homeland, has been plausibly identified with the Arabian Gebel el-Na'ameh.

b Yahweh, the specifically Israelite name of God, is accordingly avoided in the dialogue as foreign to the speakers. The exception in 12:9 may be due to a copyist's reminiscence of Is 41:20. The other exception in 1:21 is not so easily explained but is possibly due to the words having a fixed form in common use. On the other hand the narrator uses this divine name freely as in 1:6-9; 38:1, etc.

c The general setting reflects that of patriarchal times. Sacrifice is offered not by priests, though they are mentioned in 12:19, but by the head of the family. Only the holocaust is spoken of and is offered, contrary to Israelite practice, in atonement for sin (1:5). Vows, known also in patriarchal times (Gen 28:20), are referred to (22:27) here of sacrifices of thanksgiving. And Elihu speaks of seeing the face of God, an expression which implies worship of God at a sanctuary (33:26). So also Job's husbandry, both pastoral and agricultural, recalls that of Genesis (Job 1:3, 14; Gen 26:12-4).

d Historical Nucleus—Much in the book is clearly not intended to be taken as corresponding closely to historical fact. The poetic form of the speeches excludes the idea that the reader is given a transcript of the dialogue that passed between Job and the friends. The double scene in heaven with the consultation between God and the Satan is a device to admit the reader to the secret which lies at the root of Job's troubles. The arrangement by which the news of the multiple calamities pours in on the sufferer in quick successive blows is artificially planned to heighten the impression produced by his catastrophic change of fortune. But these elements are not adequate to justify the opinion that Job never existed and is presented merely as a type. The reasons which led the unnamed Rabbi to hold this view are not recorded (TB Baba Bathra 15a). The ancients were wont to weave their stories about real personages; and had Job and his story been the product of imagination, would a non-Israelite have been chosen as the hero? Moreover, Job is introduced in Ez 14:14, 20 as a man renowned for his uprightness side by side with Noe; cf. Jas 5:11. Even a nursery rhyme like 'Little John Horner' has its historical basis. And the tradition of the Church has always regarded Job as an historical personage.

The Type of Literature—The prose introduction and epilogue cannot be used to decide the literary type of the book as a whole. In the form of a story they provide the necessary framework without which the book is not intelligible. The substance of the book is in poetry and comprises the monologues and dialogues devoted to threshing out the fundamental question whether a man may be innocent and yet the victim of calamity. The book, therefore, belongs to the Wisdom Literature characterized, as this is, by the use of human wisdom based on religion, reason, and experience. The book, moreover, is didactic in the sense that the great lesson is meant to be learnt from it, that even great suffering is no proof of antecedent iniquity, but it is not openly didactic in formally propounding the intended lesson. In the same indirect way the book may be said to be hortatory in that it proposes an example, if not of consistent patience, at least of final resignation and humble submission to the divine will.

The adjectives epic and dramatic are sometimes applied to the book, but it lacks the continuous narrative found in epic poetry, and drama is normally understood to imply not only dialogue but also action, which is lacking outside prologue and epilogue. Neither is the book just a philosophical dialogue. It is a poem, mainly in the form of dialogue, predominantly reflective but with outbursts of passion, set in the frame of a prose narrative. In so far as this study of human suffering establishes the fact of innocent suffering but provides no intellectual explanation beyond the inscrutable will of God, it may be called a problem book.

The Author of Job—According to an opinion recorded in TB Baba Bathra 14b, to St Methodius (PL 103, 1145) and others, the book was written by Moses. Mosaic authorship may have been suggested by the fact that the story recalls the time of the patriarchs and that no one was known as the chronicler of that period except the author of the Pentateuch. There is no plausible case for any other suggested authorship, and we must confess our complete ignorance, strange though it be that the author of this masterpiece of literature should have become completely forgotten.

The wide knowledge manifested in the book and in particular the deep knowledge of human nature suggest that the writer was at least middle-aged, and his intense sympathy with the sufferings of his hero joined to his interest in the problem they raise was probably won by personal experience of such misfortunes. He was an Israelite and clearly a devout servant of God. The number of Arabisms in the book, commented on already by St Jerome (PL 28, 1081), suggests a home not far removed from the Arabic-speaking world where Hebrew would be likely to make borrowings from that language. This home may therefore have been in i Canonicity and Authority—The canonicity of Job, which occurs in the Jewish list of sacred books attributed to the 2nd or 3rd cent. A.D. (Baba Bathra 14b), has never been questioned in the Church except that Theodore of Mopsuestia added an attack on the book to his other errors. His assertions on the matter were condemned by the 2nd Council of Constantinople in A.D. 553 (Mansi 9, 223-5, PG 66, 697 f.). Just before this condemnation, probably in 551, his error was repeated by his admirer Junilius Africanus (PL 68, 17).

j The canonicity of the book, however, does not confer divine authority on all that is said in the course of it. What the inspired writer himself asserts is true in the sense intended as is all to which he gives his approval, and he certainly approves of whatever utterance is attributed to God. But the same whole-hearted approval does not extend to all that is said by Job and the other human speakers. Job admits indiscreet talk (39:34) and for this he is rebuked by God (38:2). The friends too are rebuked by God for not having 'spoken the thing that is right before me as my servant Job hath' (42:7). This neither approves all Job's utterances nor condemns everything said by the friends. The approval and disapproval seem therefore to fall on the views expressed by them respectively on the main topic of discussion. Great caution is consequently required in using the sayings of the human participants in the discussion as dogmatic proofs. That such use is not necessarily excluded however is shown by St Paul's introducing words of Eliphaz with the solemn formula 'It is written' which is used only of the inspired utterances of Scripture. In the discussion of his problem the author is willing to put into the mouths of the disputants opinions with which he disagrees. By these he intends to emphasize by contrast the truth which he means finally to teach. But no such purpose would be served by the expression of false doctrines on other matters when nothing is said by way of correction. The theologian has therefore good ground for the opinion that other doctrines expressed by the disputants have the silent approbation of the inspired writer.

k Doctrine—As is manifest from the analysis of the book (§ 317e), the problem debated is the suffering of the just, the friends maintaining the traditional view (15:18) that suffering is always the punishment of guilt and Job asserting that this is not so in his own case. The old simple view dominates Ps 36 (37), which the title assigns to David. Ps 57 depicts the wicked as powerful and prosperous, but its last verse conveys the suggestion that the continuation of such conditions would provoke doubts as to God's government of the world. The psalm may be of the 8th cent. The problem was keenly felt by Jeremias (12:1-4) towards the close of the 7th cent., but he attempts no solution. The doctrine of individual responsibility and retribution is strongly urged by Ezechiel, 6th cent., together with insistence on God's willingness to forgive and forget the iniquity of the repentant (ch 18; 33:12-20). The complaints of the people in Mal 3:13-5, 5th cent., though based on mistaken self-righteousness, reveal the continued pressure of the apparent inequality of God's dealings with men. The acute anguish and even religious doubt that this could cause is to be seen in Ps 48 and 72. What is the contribution of our book towards a solution? It is that suffering and calamity are not necessarily and always the punishment of sin. The upright, God-fearing man may be sorely afflicted as a means of testing his virtue. If his virtue is purely selfish, seeking only God's rewards of piety, it will not stand the strain. Such a man will abandon his service of God as not worth while. The book also emphasizes, as we have seen § 317f, the salutary nature of condign punishment as a means of bringing a sinner to a better frame of mind, and thereby emphasizes also God's willingness to forgive. But it does not abandon the principle of retribution. This could not be, as it is founded on the conviction that God is the guardian of the moral order and the just ruler of the world he has made. And as retribution beyond the grave was as yet unknown to the Israelites, it could only be conceived in terms of this life. Hence Job's prosperity had to be restored and even in greater measure to atone for his unmerited affliction. The progress therefore, though real, is partial. Fuller understanding had to wait for the revelation of the rewards and punishments of the life to come and still more for the example of God Incarnate suffering on earth, himself led as a sheep to the slaughter.

l Among the divine attributes that which lies at the root of this problem is God's absolute justice. This is the presupposition of the book, though questioned by Job in moments of anguish. God's power is extolled (5:9-14; 40:10-41:25) for the lesson to be derived from this account is that of God's absolute control (42:2). Similarly the divine power and wisdom contrasted with man's ignorance and impotence is the theme of chh 38-9. God's mercy in willingness to forgive has been touched on above.

m Chief among the duties of man on the negative side is the obligation to avoid evil, the sense of which obligation permeates the book. The duty of resignation to God's will and the humble acceptance of his government even when it transcends the comprehension of our puny minds is the lesson inculcated in chh 38-9. A detailed catalogue of man's moral obligations is given in Job's 'negative confession' in ch 31. Kindness to the weak and the fatherless is stressed and especially noteworthy is the recognition of sins of desire (31:1).

n Prominent in the book is the doctrine that no man is entirely innocent before God (4:17; 15:14; 25:4). This belief could be founded not only on experience but also on the doctrine of retribution. All men suffer in some degree, even the youngest, and therefore all must be in some measure guilty. 14:4 as paraphrased by LXX reflects such a conception: 'Who shall be pure from defilement? Nay, not one though his life on earth be of a single day.' This is not the developed doctrine of original sin but has in common with it the fundamental element that all mankind lies in some degree under the displeasure of its Creator. Yet from this displeasure our first parents were excluded for they are recorded to have been pleasing to God (Gen 1:31). This same doctrine inspires also Ps 50:7. Cf. §§ 321c, 324e.

o The author of Job shares with all OT writers belief in the survival of man after death. But beyond this bare fact all knowledge of man's future state was negative; cf. Sutcliffe, The OT and the Future Life (59-69). Experience taught that once a man had passed to Sheol, the common abode of the dead (14:13), there was no hope of his returning to this life. This Job recognized (14:12, 14); but to read into his statement of this fact a denial of the final resurrection is to make him deny what had never occurred to his mind; cf. § 115d.

p An argument a fortiori to demonstrate the guilt of man at large is based in 4:18 and 15:15 on the fact that God had reason to distrust even his Angels and found in them 'folly' or 'error'; see on 4:18 and Knabenbauer. Before they could earn their reward the Angels like man were subjected to a state of probation and not all stood up to the test. Sanchez supposes this to have been a revelation made to the patriarchs, but of this there is no evidence. He also writes on 4:18 that Gentile nations came to know that there are good and evil Angels 'whom they called good and evil genii' from the daily experience of being violently impelled to evil and contrariwise recalled from evil to good. The same experience would be clarified for the Israelites by the story of Gen ch 3. As a sharp distinction is made in Gen 1 and 2 between man and the animals and God created all things good, the Israelites would understand that behind this serpent instigator 319p to evil there lurked as principal agent some other unseen and wicked power. Some, as Knabenbauer, have recognized in the Satan of Job 1:6 the chief of these evil spirits. But, as pointed out by Ricciotti and Kissane, in Job the name is accompanied by the definite article. It is not yet a proper name but a common noun signifying 'adversary' or 'opposer', a sense that it still bears in Mt 16:23. It is in 1 Par 21:1 that the noun first appears without the article as the proper name of one instigating to evil. In Job the Satan does not instigate to evil. He had his place in the court of heaven with the other Angels, and his function, which is analogous to that of our advocatus diaboli in processes of canonization, is to test the reality of men's virtue. The good Angels are called 'the Holy Ones' (5:1; 15:15, as in Ps 88:6, 8 and Zach 14:5). Their power of intercession is recognized in 5:1.

r Date of the Poem—In the course of the centuries the date has been assigned to various periods from that of Moses (§ 318g) to early Ptolemaic times, as by Peters. Recent opinions range from this latter date to the 7th cent. as upper limit. To cite a few examples, Budde and Bittenwieser give c 400, Dhorme 500–450, Kissane between 538 and the formation of LXX with preference for a higher date within these limits, König soon after 597, Ricciotti the reign of Manasses. The argument from literary borrowings is uncertain as apt to be coloured by subjective impressions; and different minds come to contradictory conclusions as to who is source and who is borrower. The allusion to the captivity of kings and priests (12:18 f.) brings us down at least to the capture of Samaria, 721. Priests and others were then transported to Assyria (4 Kg 17:6, 28), but the king may have been killed in the siege. And the allusion suggests rather the triple deportation of Joachaz, Joachin and Sedecias (4 Kg 23:33; 24:15; 25:7). This gives a date after 587. The nature of the problem discussed leads to a date at least as late (cf. § 318k) as do the mention of 'the Satan' and the designation of the Angels as 'the Holy Ones' (cf. § 318g). The allusion to the danger of worshipping the sun and moon (31:26–28) does not favour a date long after the return from the Babylonian exile in 538, and the merit of the work as a masterpiece of Hebrew poetry suggests that it is unlikely to date from the later period of literary decadence.

319a Ancient Near Eastern Parallels—Suffering is too universal an experience not to have presented a problem to the reflective minds of other nations, and wherever literature flourished it was inevitable that this theme of the misery of man should attract the attention of writers. From the theological point of view there is no reason why the sacred writers of Israel should not derive certain of their thoughts and expressions from pagan models. As a question of literary criticism more is required to prove dependence than community of theme if this is one common to mankind the world over, and, in this case, even identity of certain thoughts and expressions is not conclusive. The nearest ancient parallels to the book of Job are the Egyptian Colloquy of a World-weary Man with his Soul and the Babylonian poem I will praise the Lord of Wisdom. The latter describes the misery of an innocent sufferer and his eventual restoration to health by Marduk. Both may be read in H. Gressmann ATAT 25 ff. and 273 ff. The contents of neither work suffice to prove dependence but, as Peters 55* points out, the probability that the Egyptian poem was known to the author of Job is suggested by the similarity of Job's 'Negative Confession' in ch 31 to the famous document in The Book of the Dead 125 and the author's familiarity with Egypt. The study of the Babylonian work by S. Landersdorfer, O.S.B., Eine babylonische Quelle für das Buch Job, 1911 (= BS 16, 2) leads to the conclusion that there is no evidence even of indirect dependence.

b Text and Versions—The book employs many words which occur nowhere else in the OT. Many are explicable only by reference to Accadian, Aramaic or Arabic. This difficult vocabulary was not favourable to the accurate transmission of the text, which contains a number of erroneous readings. Some have rated the value of the traditional text unduly low, and it has been calculated that only about a third of the verses have escaped the attention of 'correctors'. It is now recognized that most of these emendations rested on a misunderstanding of the sense due to a lack of appreciation of the author's style or to a rejection of words which subsequent investigation has shown to be original. Peters' verdict in agreement with Budde's is that the state of the text is fairly good, but he rightly adds that the emphasis should be laid on the adjective. My own study of the text has led me to the conclusion that many of the erroneous readings are due not to copyists but to the labour of some early editor or editors. The original text made little or no use of matres lectionis and omitted aleph when silent. Early attempts to clarify the text by the addition of these elements were sometimes based on unlucky guesses as to the meaning with the result that the author's thought was quite distorted.

As to the order of the text an extreme view was taken by Bittenwieser and Torczyner, who worked on the assumption that an editor had composed the book as best he might from torn fragments. All, however, are in agreement that there are certain dislocations. Some smaller examples may be explained as accidental omissions inserted in the margin and then later transferred to a wrong position in the text. Thus it seems certain that Job's final speech ends with 31:37 and that vv 38–40 should come after v 32. Another cause of dislocation appears to have been the desire of an early editor to put more 'orthodox' sentiments into the mouth of Job. Thus 27:13–23 now occurs as part of Job's discourse, but its tenor is the reverse of all that Job has been maintaining and represents the attitude of the friends. The passage is probably part of Sophar's third speech, which is entirely absent from the received text.

Defective readings of MT may be remedied by the help of the ancient versions, the evidence of which however demands cautious handling. LXX is free in its treatment of the text. It is often paraphrastic and abbreviates liberally. It is reckoned to be shorter than MT by about one-fifth. In general the omissions become more numerous as the book proceeds; and the explanation seems certainly to be that the translator judged the book to be unduly diffuse and shortened to his own taste.

Caution is also needed in the use of the Latin Vulgate for textual emendation. St Jerome himself warns his reader that he is at times paraphrastic ('Haec translatio . . . nunc verba, nunc sensus, nunc simul utrumque resonabit', PL 28, 1081). He took particular pains over the task on account of the recognized difficulty of the book ('Obliquus etiam apud Hebraeos totius liber fertur et lubricus', ibid.) and even incurred considerable expense in hiring the services of the foremost Palestinian Rabbi of the day. Peters thinks that Jerome doubted whether this teaching had been of any help (p 89). But Jerome's words are only a modest refusal to praise himself—'It is not for me to say how much I profited by his instruction' ('cujus doctrina an aliquid profecerim, nescio; hoc unum scio, non potuisse me interpretari nisi quod antea intellexeram', ibid.).

Poetic Form—The verses composing the dialogue are normally composed of two members and are called distichs. Not a few, however, are tristichs and have three members. It is the modern custom to print the two halves of a verse on the same line, with the result that the tristichs appear to upset the balance and have consequently been unwarrantably questioned or rejected by some critics. With the separate members of each verse written in a column each under the preceding this apparent lack of balance disappears.

The principle governing the verses is not metre but rhythm, and St Jerome's statement that the verses are written in hexameters is correct only in the sense that 319g the normal number of stressed syllables in each distich is six. These stresses are usually divided equally over the two halves of each verse. The number of unstressed syllables is unimportant provided it does not interfere with the movement of the verse; and the number of beats may depart from the norm and fall to two or rise to four. There is no fixed law and the arbiter is the ear. This may be illustrated in a lower plane of composition by the unstudied rhythm of the English lines: 'So they hunted and they hóllo'd till the sétting of the sún; And they'd nóught to bring away at lást when the húnting day was dóne.' Some maintain that the individual discourses, at least in part, were written as strophes, but the case is not yet demonstrated.

i Note on Translations and Commentary—On account of the state of the Hebrew text and the number of emendations required it would be beyond the scope of this volume to indicate in every case the reading adopted. The reader will be able to supply these for himself or from the references given. Not all the readings followed or explanations given are certain, but reasons of space, as a rule, preclude the discussion of other views. It is hoped that the analysis of the speeches will facilitate the understanding of the debate.

320a i 1-5 Job's Uprightness and Corresponding Prosperity

—Job is introduced as someone previously unknown to the reader, as in our way of beginning a story with 'Once upon a time'. He was a man of a profoundly religious character, whose reverence for God influenced all the actions of his life. His fear of any offence against God was such that he even offered expiatory sacrifices for the sins his children might have committed. The measure of his virtue is indicated by the vastness of his wealth in accordance with the prevalent idea that virtue and vice met with fitting retribution in this life.

b 1. The land of Hus is mentioned also in Lam 4:21 and Jer 25:20 (here with the article, hence the form 'Ausitis'). It lay to the east of Palestine (3), contained land suitable for pasture (3) and for agriculture (14). Job's property lay near a town (29:7) but near enough to the desert to be a prey to raiders (15, 17). Job himself was 'faultless and upright, a religious man and averse to evil'. The Heb. expression for 'religion' is 'the fear of God'. 2. His virtue was rewarded by a numerous offspring (cf. Ps 126:3; 127:3), the number of his 7 sons being the ideal (1 Kg 2:5 [MT 'seven', DV 'many'], Ru 4:15). 3. The number of those in his service (DV 'family') corresponded to the vastness of his possessions. 4. On suitable occasions, as after sheep-shearing (2 Kg 13:23-27), Job's sons held a round of feasts for 7 days, each day in the house of one of the brothers. This is mentioned to illustrate their father's extreme abhorrence of evil, to heighten the idea of his prosperity, and to fill in the background for the impending calamity. 5. For fear that his children might have sinned by unworthy thoughts of God ('blessing God' is a euphemism) Job offered an expiatory sacrifice for each of them. The previous day he sent and prepared them for the solemnity (in what way is not clear) and early next day offered the holocausts. As head of the family Job was its priest and himself offered sacrifice as did Abraham. In expiation he offered holocausts, for he was not an Israelite. For expiation the Mosaic law prescribed sin-offerings and trespass-offerings (Lev 4-6), but even in that code the expiatory value of the holocaust is expressly mentioned (Lev 1:4). Such God-fearing conduct was nothing unusual in Job's life: 'Such was Job's regular practice'. The scene is now set. It was on such a blameless man as this that the most appalling calamities were to fall.

6-12 The Accusing Angel receives Divine Authority to test Job—The reader is now transported in thought to the divine abode, where God is represented as holding a court surrounded by his Angels as in the vision of Micheas, the son of Jemla (3 Kg 22:19). Job's virtue is of course known to God, but one of the Angels, whose function was to watch the conduct of men and accuse them before God, suggests that Job's good life is based on self-interest. The temporal prosperity God has showered upon him has made it worth his while to be good. God thereupon grants permission to test Job's virtue by destroying his possessions.

e 6. Just as 'the sons of man' (Gen 11:5) are men, and 'the sons of the prophets' are prophets (1 Kg 10:10; 4 Kg 2:3, etc.), so 'the sons of Elohím' are themselves Elohím or supernatural beings (1 Kg 28:13, Ps 81:6). They are not, however, gods but Angels, though the word Elohím came to signify principally God himself. One among them bore the name of the Satan or 'the opponent'. The word was originally a common noun which could be used of any adversary (1 Kg 29:4; 3 Kg 5:4 [MT 5:18]). Here it is the appellation of one of the heavenly court whose duty it was to watch men and report to God on their delinquencies and weaknesses. Later it became the name of one who instigates men to commit evil (1 Par 21:1). 7. That God should be said to have enquired of him where he had been is due only to the dramatic necessity of eliciting his reply (cf. the divine question in Ex 4:2). 9. 'The Satan answered Yahweh: "Is it for nothing that Job is religious?"' Job's wealth, he suggests, makes it well worth his while to be good.

13-19 Calamity after Calamity is reported to Job—The Satan quickly puts Job's virtue to the test, and makes his blows the more stunning by ensuring that they are all reported to Job within the selfsame hour. He chose moreover some festive occasion when Job's children had begun a new round of feasts.

13. The banquets would begin in the house of the eldest brother. If these Sabaeen raiders belonged to Sheba in southern Arabia, it would be surprising to find them so far north, but there was an homonymous place in the region of Teyma. 16. 'The fire of God' was probably a large thunderbolt to judge by the devastation caused. 17. The Chaldaeans or Kasdim were an Aramaean tribe whose eponym Késed is mentioned in Gen 22:22. They were probably widespread, and Nabopolassar, who made himself master of Babylon in 625, belonged to this people. 19. The destructive wind 'from across the desert' was a whirlwind involving the whole house in disaster.

20-23 Job's Resignation to God's Will—This is one of the most elevated and moving passages in the OT and has inspired countless generations of readers to strive to imitate the patience and resignation of holy Job.

20. That Job is said to have arisen is no indication that he had received the tragic news seated. It is the Heb. mode of introducing decided or energetic action (cf. Lk 1:39). In rending his garment Job gave the customary manifestation of profound sorrow (cf. Esd 9:3). To pluck out the hair of the beard and head, as did Esdras (9:3), was a sign of uncontrolled grief. To shave the head (cf. Jer 7:29) was a more deliberate proceeding, which shows that Job did not fall but 320g 'prostrated himself on the ground' in worship. 21. When men die, they can take nothing away (Ps 48:18). God, Job implies, has deprived him of his property and family a little sooner than he would have done in any case. The word 'thither' is difficult, but does not warrant understanding either clause of mother earth. No one reading of 'my mother's womb' could understand the words except in the literal sense. Contrast 'from the day of their coming out of their mother's womb unto the day of their burial into the mother of all' (Ecclus 40:1). The phrase is perhaps a loosely conceived paraphrase of 'Dust thou art and unto dust thou shalt return' (Gen 3:19). 22. Probably, as in Is 9:20, where the same phrase occurs, 'Despite all that had happened' Job spoke no sinful word.

h II 1-8 Job's Fresh Trial—In a renewed session of the court of heaven the Satan suggests that at least Job's virtue will not be strong enough to endure an attack on his bodily health. He uses the divine permission to strike Job's whole body with a loathsome disease.

2. The Satan's failure to mention Job suggests an unwillingness to acknowledge the falsity of his prediction. 4. The origin and exact meaning of the proverb 'skin for skin' is unknown to us. From the context, however, the general sense is clear. A man will sacrifice anything for the integrity of his skin and his life. He would give his skin, if that were possible, to save his skin. 7. The nature of the disease designated 'a very grievous ulcer' has been widely discussed. The term ḥin connotes inflammation. 'The discharge and the subsequent crusting over of these eruptions are referred to in 7:5. Other symptoms . . . are the maggots bred in the ulcers (7:5), the fetid breath (19:17), the corrosion of the bones (30:17), the blackening and falling off of the skin (30:30), feelings of terror (3:25; 6:46), and by night terrifying dreams and nightmares (7:14; cf. 7:4)', Gray 23. Dr E. W. G. Masterman writes: 'The type of disease in the writer's mind may have been true leprosy (Elephantiasis Graecorum), small-pox (variola) or, perhaps more probably, a very extensive erythema' (PEF [1918] 168). 8. 'scraped the corrupt matter': so also LXX. It is not clear whether the word had this pregnant sense, or whether the literal translation should be only 'scraped himself'. The 'dunghill', lit. 'ashes', is the mezbaleh, as the Arabs call it, to be seen outside oriental villages. The mixture of ashes and burnt dung coalesces into a compact mass, sometimes of considerable dimensions. The suggestion is that Job's state was so appalling that he was unfit to dwell with his fellow-men.

i 9-10 Job's Patience unmoved—That Job is represented as a monogamist is perhaps intended as a further indication of his virtue. He is tempted to evil by his wife as Adam was by Eve.

j 11-13 The Arrival of Job's Three Friends—Some time was required for the news of Job's calamities to reach his friends, for them to arrange a meeting-place, and to travel to Job's home. By the time of their arrival, therefore, the dread effects of the disease had had time to develop.

11. See § 318a. They came to 'condole with him and comfort him'. 12. Even from a distance they could see Job on the mezbaleh. Among the exuberant oriental manifestations of grief was also the strewing of dust on the head (1 Kg 4:12). 13. See § 317c. Seven days was the period allotted to mourning for the dead (Gen 50:10; Ecclus 22:13).

k III 1-26 Job's First Speech—Job senses a lack of sympathy on the part of the friends, and this bitter disappointment added to his calamities makes him break out into words which manifest the depth of his suffering and misery. After cursing the day of his birth (3-12 and 16) he depicts the state of the dead as preferable to that of the living (13-15, 17-19). He then poses the question why life is given to the miserable (20-23) and suggests the application of the question to himself by describing his own misery, though only in vague terms. The depth of his present suffering causes him to pass over the years of prosperity and happiness as if they had never been. He paints his life as if it had never been lit up by a ray of joy. This shows how the prolongation of his afflictions had worn down his spirit and made him forget the sublime resignation to God's holy will which at first inspired the memorable words 'As it hath pleased the Lord, so is it done' (1:21).

1-12 Job curses the Day of His Birth—1. 'his day' is his existence. His cursing falls more on the night of his conception than on the day of his birth. The words 'opened his mouth' introduce a pronouncement of importance. So before the Sermon on the Mount (Mat 5:2). 3. 'the night which said': the night is credited with a knowledge no man could have shared. 5. 'Let darkness and gloom disfigure it; let a cloud overspread it; let day-dark be its terror'. Eclipses cause great alarm to peoples ignorant of their explanation. 6. 'Let pitch dark seize upon that night': that night is to be relieved by no light from moon or star. 7. 'be sterile; let no joyful cry break in upon it': no human being is to be conceived therein and it is not to hear the joyful welcome of a new-born babe. 8. 'to raise up leviathan': best explained as an allusion to the supposed powers of magicians to render a day unlucky and even to cause a celestial monster to devour the sun and bring about the calamity of an eclipse. 9. 'Let the stars of its dusk be darkened; let it expect the light in vain, and let it not gaze upon the eyelashes of the dawn': it is to be an unending night, never to see the rays (eyelashes) of the rising sun. 11. 'Why did I not issue from the womb to die, come forth from the belly to expire?' 12. The father received the new-born child on his knees in recognition of paternity.

13-19 The State of the Dead would be Preferable!—m

13. 'For now I had lain me down in stillness.' The conception of death as sleep survives in our word 'cemetery'. 14. 'With kings and counsellors of the land.' The solitudes of DV may well be right. The pyramids built in the desert waste were famous. 15. The treasure is probably that stored up in their sepulchral homes, here called 'houses' or dwelling-places as in Is 14:18. 16. 'untimely birth that was not'. 17. The rest of the weary is conceived as due to the enforced cessation of the activity of the wicked. 18. 'So too captives are at ease; they hear not the cry of the task-master.' 19. 'Small and great are there the same.' Social distinctions are obliterated in the grave.

20-26 Why is Life given to Sufferers like Job?—n

20. 'and search for it more eagerly than hidden treasure'. 22. 'who are gladdened by the tomb [lit. 'cairn'] and rejoice when they have found the grave'. 23 is a continuation of the question asked in 20. 'and whom God has fenced about'. For the thought cf. 19:8. Job's way is hidden in darkness and perplexity and he can find no issue. 24. 'Because as food I have my sighing; and as overflowing waters so is my groaning.' Lit. 'like my food', for which meaning of the Heb. word cf. 4:19 and 1 Kg 1:16. 25. 'cometh upon me . . . befalleth me'. There seems to be no end to his miseries. 26. 'I have no peace and no quiet; I have no rest, but what comes is trouble.'

IV 1-V 27 The First Speech of Eliphaz—After excusing 321a

his intervention (2) Eliphaz points out that though Job had comforted many in their distress he seems to think that his own case is beyond comfort or remedy (3-5). As Job's trust was in religion, he should remember that no upright man ever perished altogether and that such complete and final disaster was always the fruit of previous evil-living (6-11). Eliphaz had learnt in a mysterious vision that no man is completely just before God. The inference implied is that all men must expect their share of suffering (12-21). Job will find no advocate in his plaint against God (V:1): it is only the morally insensate who foster irritation at God's dealings (2-5). Trouble does not arise outside of man; it is involved in his very being (6-7). The wise man will have recourse to God who is benevolent and all-powerful (8-16). Happy the man who submits to God's chastisements as Job would find to his own benefit (17-27).

2-11 Job should not despair—3. 'fortified many . . . b

321b feeble hands; see G. R. Driver JTS 36 (1935) 295. 5. Not a reproach, but a reminder that affliction is not beyond the reach of consolation. 6. 'Is not thy religion thy confidence, thy hope the perfection of thy ways?' Religion, generally called the fear of God, is here called simply fear. The innocence of Job judged by normal human standards is admitted, and, as God is just, he need not therefore fear the worst outcome of his afflictions. 8. 'As I have seen, they who cultivate iniquity and sow mischief, do reap them', i.e. their fruits; but such Job has not been. 10 f. Merciless oppressive men, who devour the substance of the weak, are spoken of under the figure of lions. 'Lioness': in the Heb. another word for 'lion', perhaps 'adult lion'. 11. 'The old lion' . . . the young of the lioness, the former unable through feebleness to catch its prey.

e 12-21 No Man is really Innocent before God—12. 'in secret, and my ear caught its whisper'. 13. 'in the thoughts caused by visions of the night . . . full on men'. 14. 'the quaking of my bones afflicted me'. Cf. Assyrian rābu 'to tremble' and 33:19. 15. 'a breath passed'. 16. 'It stood but I could not discern its appearance . . . I heard a voice in the stillness'. 17. 'Can a man be just in the eyes of God or pure in the judgement of his Maker?' For this use of min cf. 32:2, Num 32:22, and for the doctrine Ps 142:2. As no man is completely just and pure, all men must expect a mead of suffering. The doctrine is based on a conviction of God's absolute justice and of the connexion between suffering and moral evil. Experience shows that all mankind suffers, even babes. Therefore mankind cannot be wholly right before God. Experience showed that the sentence pronounced by God on Adam (Gen 3:17-19) falls on all men. All must therefore be guilty; cf. § 318n. The words spoken by the voice probably do not extend beyond this verse. There follows a confirmation by an argument a fortiori—even the Angels were not steadfast in goodness. 18. 'If in his servants he cannot trust and lays wickedness to the charge of his angels.' God's servants are his Angels, whose name both in Heb. and in Gk means 'messengers'. The general sense of the word translated 'wickedness' is clear from the purpose of the argument to prove that man is not just nor pure; its exact sense is conjectural. The reference is to the fall of the Angels. As the words are those of a non-Israelite, Sanchez suggests that the existence of good and wicked Angels could become known through the daily experience of impulses to evil and of contrary impulses to turn from evil to good. The author, however, was an Israelite. 19. 'be crushed like the moth (20) between morning and evening'. Man is said hyperbolically to be as perishable and ephemeral as the moth. 'They are broken because . . . Eliphaz speaks of premature deaths caused by man's moral foolishness; cf. 5:2. So in 21: 'and not through wisdom', but through folly. 21a is quite uncertain.

d V 1-5 The Lot of the morally Foolish—1. 'to whom of the Holy Ones wilt thou turn?' i.e. of the Angels, prayer to whom is attested by this verse. But it is useless to appeal to them with a plaint against God. 2. 'Vexation . . . indignation slayeth the silly': a reference to irrational repining against God's government of men, a fault Eliphaz silently imputes to Job. 3. A moral fool prospering but only temporarily. 'but suddenly his habitation was cursed', i.e. by God. So probably; and in 4-5 which depict the result of the curse, read the present tense. 5b quite uncertain.

e V 1-5 The Lot of the morally Foolish—1. 'to whom of the Holy Ones wilt thou turn?' i.e. of the Angels, prayer to whom is attested by this verse. But it is useless to appeal to them with a plaint against God. 2. 'Vexation . . . indignation slayeth the silly': a reference to irrational repining against God's government of men, a fault Eliphaz silently imputes to Job. 3. A moral fool prospering but only temporarily. 'but suddenly his habitation was cursed', i.e. by God. So probably; and in 4-5 which depict the result of the curse, read the present tense. 5b quite uncertain.

f 6-7 Why Trouble is Man's Lot—6. For iniquity does not issue from the soil. Trouble and travail (DV 'sorrow') are the fruit of iniquity and do not come without cause. The cause is man, who (7) is born 'for travail as the sons of the lightning to fly aloft'. 'The bird' alluded to is the vulture in LXX or the eagle (Dhorme).

g 8-16 Appeal should be addressed to God: his Power and Benevolence—8. 'But for my part I should seek after the Lord and lay my cause before God', in contrast to the suggestion of 1. 10b. 'sendeth forth water on the face of the fields', gushing forth from springs in the earth. 11. 'and the downcast are raised aloft to safety', in a metaphorical sense. 12. 'of the crafty . . . accomplish their purpose'. 13. 'so that the counsel of intriguers fails through haste'. 15. 'He saves the ruined man from their jaws'. Oppressors are conceived as beasts of prey; 'ruined' is an emendation (Dhorme). 16. 'The weak recover hope, and iniquity stops her mouth.'

17-27 The Happy Effects of Loyal Submission to God's Visitation—17 is an important verse. God's chastisements are for the correction of the evil-doer. 18. 'He bindeth up the wound he caused.' 19 gives an instance of the common figure of arithmetical progression, here denoting the unlimited extent of divine succour; cf. A. Bea, S.J., 'Der Zahlenspruch im Hebräischen und Ugaritischen' Bi 21 (1940) 196 ff. and § 364h. The six evils are enumerated in 20-22, 'calamity' and 'destruction' in 21 f. translating the same Heb. word.

22. 'At destruction . . . and shalt have no cause to fear the beasts of the field', which were one of the terrors of the ancients; cf. Ez 14:21. So far from being in danger of dearth Job, if he is submissive, will find his fields fruitful in virtue of a pact (23) with the stones of the field that they will not invade his land. One of the great obstacles to agriculture in Palestine is the stony nature of the ground, not to speak of frequent outcrops of rock; cf. Mat 13:5; 4 Kg 3:19, 25. The wild beasts will respect Job's flocks and will not trample down his crops. 24b. 'When thou visitest thy pastures, thou shalt find nothing missing.' 25. This is cold-hearted comfort for a father afflicted by the loss of all his children. 26. Job shall not die till his life reaches its natural term, when the full tale of his years is completed, just as it is only in the proper season that the shocks of corn are taken up to the threshing floor. 27b. 'This have we heard [LXX, Syr.] and do thou make the knowledge thine own.' Eliphaz speaks more in the tone of a schoolmaster than of a comforter.

VI 1-VII 21 Job's Second Speech—His vexation of spirit is fully justified by his sufferings (2-7). His only hope now is in death (8-10). He has not the strength to wait for future relief (11-13). His comforters have been as disappointing to him as a dried-up stream to thirsty travellers (14-21). He had not asked for any material aid (22 f.). Their reprovals are vain and hard-hearted (24-30). Man's life is a weary bondage and his own a constant torment (VII:1-6). Soon he will be in Sheol, whence there is no return (7-10). He addresses reproaches to God: why does he behave as a warder, as a tormentor, to him (11-16)? Man is so insignificant; why does not God leave Job alone and overlook whatever he may have done wrong; he will soon be in the grave (17-21).

'O that my anguish could be weighed and my calamity be put therewith on a balance!' 3. 'They would outweigh the sands of the sea-shore! Therefore is it that my words are charged with grief.' 4b-c. 'the venom whereof my spirit drinketh in'; the terrors of the Lord are ranged against me'. 5. 'low over his fodder'. Contented animals are quiet; Job's friends should understand how terrible are the sufferings which wring from him cries of distress. 6. 'or is there flavour in the white of an egg?': lit. 'in the slimy liquid of the yolk'. So probably. Proverbial expressions meaning that men cannot eat what gives no satisfaction. How much less can Job endure his lot! 7. 'My soul refuseth to be quiet; it is troubled by the sickness of my flesh.' So emended by Kissane.

8-10 Death is his only Hope—9. 'May God be pleased to crush me!' 10b-c. 'I should be steadfast in anguish that spareth not, for I have not disregarded the decrees of the Holy One.' In death, which however painful will be a release, Job will have the comfort of knowing that he has been faithful to God's will. In Job's miserable condition and without thought of reward after death this is a sign of profound devotion to God, the Holy One.

11-13 Job has no Strength to wait for a Change in his Condition—Eliphaz had held out the hope of a happy future (5:19-26), but Job's resources of resistance to calamity are exhausted. 11. 'end that I should prolong m n 14-23 He is Disappointed of Help from his Friends—

14. 'To one in misfortune is due loyal kindness from his friend, even to one who neglects the fear of God.' Though he were guilty, Job would have his claims; but these are disregarded by his friends, whom he calls his brethren. 15. 'My brethren are treacherous as a brook, as the channel of the brooks that pass by.' They are changeable and not to be relied on. 16. 'They are darkened by a pall of ice; the snow heaps up upon them.' The happy dashing waters are stilled by the frost. 17. 'When they are heated, they perish; when the season is warm, they are extinguished out of their place.' 18. 'They follow their meandering course; they make their way into the waste and perish.' After the description of the streams in winter and in summer, this verse gives a general statement. The streams die away in the desert sands (Bi 30 [1949] 68-70). 19. 'The caravans of Tema are on the watch; the companies of Saba look up upon them.' But when they at last reach what they thought to be a source of water (20), 'Their confidence is confounded; they arrive thereat and their hopes are dashed'. 21. 'Such now have you been to me' (reading kên for kî). And he had not expected from them material aid or physical effort—only sympathy and understanding! 22. 'Make me a present, or of your substance make a gift on my behalf' (23) 'or . . . out of the hands of tyrants'.

o 24-30 The Friends' Reproofs are Vain—24. 'and instruct me wherein I have erred'. 25. 'How weighty are upright words! But what avails reproof from you?' 26. 'Is it your mind to find fault with words, or to take the speeches of one in despair as empty air?' Let them show sin in his conduct and not just carp at what he says as if there were no meaning in the words of a soul in anguish! It is clear that their hearts are hard (27); 'Even on the fatherless you would cast lots and make profit out of a friend'. Children were taken as slaves in payment of a father's debts. 28. 'And now be pleased to turn to me! I shall not lie to your face!' Apparently during Job's rebuke the friends had averted their faces. 29. 'Begin again, pray! Let there be no unfairness! Begin again! My righteousness yet stands!' 30. 'Is there unfairness on my tongue, or cannot my palate discern what is pernicious?' What he expresses by his tongue is a fair account of the impression received by his palate, the organ of taste being used metaphorically for the power of mental discernment.

322a VII 1-5 The Life of Man is Hard and the Life of Job Calamitous—1. 'Is not the life of man on earth a soldier's service?' The point is not that an army has to fight but that it has to submit to all the hardships of military life. 2. 'for his wages'. 4. 'If I lie down to sleep, I say: When will the day come? and when I rise, again: When will the evening come? And I am sated with restlessness till the dusk' (so after LXX). 5. 'Rottenness' of DV may be right, the Heb. 'worms' (collective singular) being used metaphorically. For actual worms cf. 2 Mac 9:9, Antiochus Epiphanes, Ac 12:23, Herod Agrippa. 'filth of dust': 'dirty crusts' referring to the state of his skin produced by his malady. 5b is uncertain. 'My skin has cracked and run' (Dhorme); 'my skin hardens, and then runneth (again)' (Driver).

6. 'My days have sped quicker than the shuttle.'

b 7-10 Job's Life is near its End—7. 'My eye will not again see prosperity', i.e. he will not again experience it. 8. 'The eye of him that seeth me will not behold me more; thy eyes will be upon me, but I shall not be.' 9. 'to hell': in Heb. 'to Sheol', the home of all the dead deep under the earth. It is the land from which there is no return.

c 11-21 Job complains: Why does God torment him?—Job now (according to some from 7) addresses God directly. 11. 'withhold my words', lit. 'restrain my mouth'; 'I will utter my complaint in the bitterness of my soul'. 12. 'Am I the sea or a monster of the deep that thou dost set a guard upon me?' God set limits to the domain of the sea (Gen 1:9). If these limits were overpassed, it would be a disaster for the earth (Ps 103:9).

13. 'My couch will alleviate my complaining', the effect standing for the cause. 14. 'Thou dost.' 15. 'strangling; death rather than my sufferings', reading beth for mem. 16. 'I would not live on', the word ôlâm denoting a future of indefinite length. 'Leave me to myself, for my days are but a breath'; lit. 'cease from me'. 17. 'dost treat him as something great and dost set thy thoughts upon him?' The heart in Heb. diction is the seat of understanding rather than of the emotions, and Job is not thinking here of divine love. Job suggests that man is too insignificant for God, as it were, to trouble to keep a watch on his actions. Similarly Ps 8 expresses wonder that God should take thought of man and make him the lord of the visible creation. 18. 'so that thou dost visit him every morning and test him every moment', i.e. constantly visit and test him. 19. 'For how long wilt thou not turn away thy gaze from me nor leave me in peace even for an instant?' lit. 'till I swallow down my spittle', a proverbial phrase used also in Arabic. 20. 'Had I sinned, what could I do in thy regard? . . . Why hast thou set me up as thy target? And why am I become a burden to thee?' The Scribes changed 'thee' to 'me' to avoid the appearance of irreverence. The actions of puny man cannot harm God; but in his prosperity Job had offered holocausts in atonement even for possible sins (1:5). In his heart Job knew that God is the just guardian of the moral order. 21. What good can it do God that I continue to suffer? Heb. uses the same word for iniquity and its punishment. Both would be removed together; but Job has no thought of further happiness. He is soon to die, and why cannot he have peace for the brief interval before he goes down to Sheol.

VIII 1-22 Bildad's First Speech—He rebukes Job for casting aspersions on the justice of God (2 f.). If Job is upright and turns to God, his future prosperity will excel that of the past (4-7). This is the wisdom to be learnt from the ancients (8-10). As plants cannot live without water, neither can man without God (11-13). The godless man has nothing substantial on which to rely (14 f.). He may flourish for a time but is like a plant of luxuriant growth that is soon plucked up and forgotten (16-19). As God does not reject the innocent, Job [if he is really such] will again know happy times (20-22).

2-7 Job is Rebuked: the Great Reward of turning to God in Innocence—2. Job's language is vehement but idle as the wind. 3. 'Doth the Almighty distort justice?' 4. 'If thy children have sinned against him, he hath delivered them into the power of their iniquity', which brings its own retribution: a reference to 1:19. 5. 'If thou wilt seek earnestly after God. . . . 6. if thou art . . . assuredly he will presently bestir himself in thy behalf and restore the dwelling of thy righteousness': the home where Job lived in righteousness will be restored to him. Bildad does not believe that Job is innocent, as according to his religious philosophy sin brings suffering and suffering presupposes sin, and he politely hints at his doubt. 7. 'And thy former estate will have been a small affair and thy later will be magnified exceedingly': an unconscious prophecy of the actual outcome.

8-10 Appeal to the Wisdom of the Ancients—8. 'and be attentive to what the fathers have searched out'. Wisdom was known to be matured by long experience, and therefore both age and traditional lore were held in veneration. Our use of proverbs which enshrine 'the wisdom of many and the wit of one', is an acknowledgement of the same truth. 9. 'and have no knowledge; for our days. . .'. The shadow is the type of what is fleeting.

11-19 The Fate of the Godless Illustrated from Nature h—11. 'Can the papyrus grow up without moist soil?' 12. 'and not ready to be plucked': it provided writing material for the ancients (cf. also Ex 2:3, Is 18:2). 13. The meaning 'hypocrite' is unsuitable here—'the godless'. 14. 'His reliance is on gossamer and his trust is a spider's web.' The sense demands something like gossamer. If the godless man has wealth, it is ephemeral and no ground for confidence. 15b. 'but 322h it will not hold firm. His house is not the material structure, but his household and property—all that he so confidently relies upon. 16. 'He is a luxuriant plant in the warmth of the sun, which spreadeth its shoots over its garden-home.' 17. 'About a spring are its roots entwined; on a bed of stones it rejoiceth.' The plant is one like the vine or gourd with fruit to ripen. Stones placed beneath for the purpose reflect the rays of the sun, increase the warmth and retain it longer at night. So the plant has every advantage, warmth, water, room to grow in a garden. Such happy circumstances may be enjoyed by the godless, but not for long, for (18) 'If it is plucked up out of its place, it disowns it, "I never saw thee".' 19. 'Lo, such is the joy of its career, and from the soil another springs up.' After a brief period of well-being it perishes and is forgotten.

20-22 As God's Retribution is Just, Job will yet know Happiness—20. 'God does not reject the innocent nor strengthen the hands of the wicked.' Bildad pretends to suppose that Job belongs to the former class; therefore (21) 'Laughter will yet fill thy mouth and cries of joy be on thy lips.' Read 'ôd for 'ad. 22. The parallelism shows that they who hate Job are synonymous with the wicked. They are not enemies on private grounds, but men who abhor virtue. It is not implied that Job actually had enemies. The sense is hypothetical: 'if any hate thee'.

IX 1-X 22 Job's Third Speech—Job speaks again in the bitterness of his soul. It is useless for man to contend with God for justice; he is too powerful. This theme Job illustrates by examples of the divine control over nature (2-13). [Eliphaz had also given instances but drawn from God's beneficent action (5:9-15).] It would be futile for Job to cite God to show cause for his treatment of him (14-21). God treats good and bad alike, or rather favours the wicked (22-24). His days have sped by without happiness (25 f.). Now it is impossible to put his unhappiness aside, for whatever happens, he will be put in the wrong (27-32). If only there were one to arbitrate between him and God, he would speak out fearlessly (33-X:1). He would demand to know the ground of the conflict and put forward many considerations against the treatment he experiences, as that he was himself the work of God's hands and loving care (2-12). In spite of that God had secret designs against him (13-17). Why had he not been allowed to die in the womb? (18 f.) In the little of life that remains to him, let him have peace before he goes down to the land of darkness (20-22).

k 2-13 Man cannot maintain his Right against Almighty God!—2a if it refers to Bildad's statements is ironical. 2b. 'How can a man be acquitted in conflict with God?' 3. 'If God consents to argue with him, man cannot answer him one word in a thousand.' 5. The mountains personified are overthrown with such speed and ease that they know nothing of it. 8b. 'And walketh upon the high places of the sea', when it is beaten up into towering billows. 9. 'He made.' The first three constellations are probably the Hyades (or the Great Bear), Orion and the Pleiades. 'The Chambers of the South' may be identified with the 'imposing constellation, more brilliant than any other, not excepting Orion, (which) on the charts of today is distributed between Argo, the Southern Cross and the Centaur' (Schiaparelli 66). This was visible from Palestine in the first millennium B.C., though no longer to be seen from that latitude owing to the fact of precession. 10. 'His mighty works are beyond comprehension, and his marvels beyond numbering.' 11. 'If he moveth by me, I see him not; if he passeth on, I discern him not.' God's invisibility is also an obstacle, according to Job's reasoning, in the way of a mortal man's obtaining justice against him. 12. 'If he seizeth violently, who shall repulse him?' (taking away, e.g. a man's family and property). 13. 'God doth not revoke his anger; under him bow down the helpers of Rahab', an allusion to the mythological sea-monster or personification of the sea which was supposed to have rebelled to its cost against God (cf. 26:12, Ps 88:11, Is 51:9, where in each case DV has 'the proud one'). 322k

14-21 Futility of Job's attempting to dispute his Case with God—14. 'How much less can I answer him and make choice of my words in dispute with him.' 15. 'So that even with right on my side I should not answer; I should make supplication to my opponent.' In all this section God is considered not as judge but as the other party to a suit. 16. 'If I cited him and he answered me, I do not believe that he would give ear to my voice.' Job knows that there is no tribunal before which he can cite God; but if he could, it would be the worse for him. 17. 'For he would crush me with ease', lit. 'for (the price of) a hair'. This rendering is suggested by the parallelism 'without cause'; also where 'whirlwind' occurs in this book it is spelt with samech and not with sin. 18. 'He would not allow me to take breath but would sate me with bitterness.' 20. 'If my plea be just, he would condemn me; if I am innocent, he would prove me crooked.' 21. 'I am innocent; I care not for my life; I reject it.' The first clause is probably an accidental repetition of the same words in the previous verse. 'To know' in Heb. has the pregnant sense of 'know with favour, be kindly disposed to' (cf. Ps 1:6, Mat 25:12 'I know you not').

22-24 God seems even to favour the Wicked—22a. 'There is no difference; therefore I say . . .' 23. 'If a scourge bring sudden death, he mocketh at the despair of the innocent'; or perhaps 'at the trial of'. Pestilence, famine and war are scourges which do not discriminate. 24. Bribes blind judges to the claims of justice. This God allows; and as it is God who governs the world, Job says that he does it, making no distinction between what God tolerates and what he positively wills.

25-31 Job's Brief Days filled with Unhappiness which he cannot ignore—25. The 'post' is a runner bearing a message. 'Good' meaning happiness and prosperity. Job's months of weary suffering (7:3) have made him forget his earlier days blessed with wealth and peace. 26. 'as reed-built boats', light and swift which were used on the Nile. 'as an eagle swooping on the prey', lit. on food. 27. 'If I say: "I will forget my complaining, I will change to a smiling face", (28) I dread all my pains, I know that thou wilt not hold me innocent.' He addresses God directly. For the change of expression cf. 1 Kg 1:11. 29. 'I shall be held guilty; why then do I weary myself in vain?' 30. 'If I washed myself with snow and cleansed my hands with lye, (31) thou wouldst plunge me in filth and my very garments would abhor me.' Snow, a symbol of whiteness and purity, was supposed to have special cleansing powers. By a striking figure his very garments are personified.

32-X 12 Were there an Arbitrator Job would speak out 323a
—32. 'Indeed he is not a man like me that I can answer him, that we can come together in judgement.' 33. 'Would that there were one to make award between us, to impose his authority on us both (34), to take his rod from on me that the fear of him might not terrify me.' 35. 'I would speak out and would not fear him, for that is not my way . . . X:1 . . . I would give free vent to my complaining; I would . . .' As he is weary of life, in any case he would have no cause to fear. 2. 'I would say . . . "Let me know wherefore thou strivest against me." 3. 'Is it any benefit to thee that thou oppress me and spurnest the work of thy hands and lookest benignly on the counsel of the wicked?' 4. A suggested but confessedly impossible explanation of God's conduct. Man with eyes of flesh sees only the exterior and may judge amiss. 5. The meaning may be either 'Are thy days short like those of man that thou must act precipitately for fear of being unable to act at all?', or, 'days' being used as in 7:1 for what fills up the days, 'Dost thou spend thy days in the petty spitefulness which so often occupies the time of men?' 6. 'that thou shouldst inquire after iniquity in me and search after sin in me?' (7), 'although thou knowest . . .' 8. 'Thy hands have formed me and made me; and dost thou after turn and consume me?' (so probably to be emended). He finds this change in God's attitude incomprehensible. 9. 'Thou hast made me as of clay.' An appeal to God to remember the 323b frailty of man, no fit object of sustained persecution. 10. 'Didst thou not pour me out like milk?' The verse refers to the formation of the embryo in the womb. 11b. 'Thou didst weave me together with'; so in Ps 138:13. 12. God's visitation may be in love or in anger; here it is beneficent, preserving Job's life. The most obvious sign of life is respiration; and accordingly man was said to live by the 'spirit' or spiration, that is breath, which God breathed into his nostrils (Gen 2:7; Ps 103:29). Yet, Job now goes on to say, under these marks of apparent love, there lurked some sinister design.

c 13-17 God seems to harbour a Design against Job—

13. 'Yet these thoughts thou didst conceal in thy heart; I know that this is thy mind.' This refers to what follows. 14. 'If I sinned, thou wouldst set a watch upon me and wouldst not acquit me of my iniquity.' 15c. 'being sated with dishonour and having drunk my fill of affliction'. 16. 'In my weariness thou wouldst hunt me as a lion and again show thy prowess against me' (reading yāgā). 17. 'Thou wouldst renew thy enmity against me' (reading edy'kā) . . . and warlike reinforcements against me.'

d 18-22 Job again laments his Birth but reflects that soon he will go to Sheol—18b.

'Why did I not expire', adding the negative with LXX. 20. 'Are not the days of my existence few?' (reading heldi). 'Let him leave me alone that I may have a little solace.' 21b. 'to the land of darkness and gloom', to Sheol, the abode of the dead. 22. 'to the land of obscurity and disorder, where the very light is darkness' (omitting three words as erroneous repetitions).

e XI 1-20 Sophar's First Speech—

A flow of language does not establish Job's innocence and must be answered (2 f.). If only God would himself speak and put Job to the question (4-6). Does Job imagine that he can comprehend the perfection of God (7-9)? He is irresistible and knows iniquity and its workers (10 f.). But there is hope for Job. If he will turn to God and put away iniquity, his future will be bright and he will have no cause at all for fear (12-19). For the wicked, however, there is no hope (20). Sophar, like his friends, assumes Job's guilt, because he sees his suffering and suffering is the chastisement of sin.

f 2-3 Job's Foolish Talk must be answered—2.

'Is a master of words not to be answered? Or is a man right because he is eloquent?' 3. 'Is thy empty talk to silence men? And when thou mockest, is none to put thee to shame?' Sophar means that he has been mocking the justice of God.

g 4-6 He wishes that God would himself answer Job—4.

'in thy sight', in the sight of God. 5. 'open his lips in conflict with thee'. 6b. 'his providence is manifold'; uncertain and by many emended. Tūṣiyāh seems to mean 'wisdom in planning, prevision, providence, purpose'.

h 7-11 God's Perfection, Omnipotence and Justice—7.

'Canst thou discover the mystery [lit. the searching out] of God? or reach to the perfection of the Almighty?' 8. 'It is higher': the subject is God's perfection. 'Hell' stands for Sheol (cf. § 322b). 9. 'The measure thereof'. 10. 'If he seizeth and imprisoneth or bringeth to public trial, who shall repulse him?' (reading yahtōp; cf. 9:12 and 11:10b). The meaning is that God is perfectly right when he administers justice whether he chooses to manifest the reasons for his action or not. Job claimed to be innocent, but Sophar is convinced that he is not, though he himself does not know wherein Job's wickedness lay. But God is under no obligation to manifest to all what is the reason for the chastisement he inflicts. This is supported by 11: 'For he knoweth men of empty show, and when he seeth iniquity, is he not to take cognisance thereof?' The implication is that men may not have seen Job's wickedness, but God has.

i 12-20 Job's Return to God will spell Prosperity and Happiness—12.

'A witless wight may get wit when a mule is bred a stallion.' Neither is naturally possible; but Job's case is not so hopeless if he will turn to God, as is developed in the following lines. (MT reads: 'a wild-ass colt may be born a man'; cf. Bi 30 [1949] 70 f.). 13. 'If thou dost set thy heart aright (cf. Ps 77:8) and stretch out thy hands to him.' 17. 'Brighter than noontide shall thy life endure; the very darkness shall be as the morn.' Job will have no dark and gloomy periods at all. 18b. 'and well protected shalt lie down to sleep secure', without anxiety (sine cura = securus). The book being distinguished by the number of Arabic words justifies reading the pu'al with the meaning the word has in that language. 19b. 'entreat thy face': seek thy favour. 20 is a warning to Job of worse to come if he remains unrepentant. 'and their one hope shall be to breathe forth the ghost'. Life will offer no inducement to live.

XII 1-XIV 22 Job's Fourth Speech—

Job's friends are no wiser than he and the first-comer could discourse as well as they have done (2-3). The just man is mocked and oppressed by the care-free wicked (4-6). Even brute creatures know that the strong prey on the weak (7-8) and that all this lies in the hand of God (9-10). The thing is obvious (11). Useless to say that wisdom belongs to the aged, and as for God's wisdom Job suggests that it does not control his power. He gives illustrations of the divine power to humiliate and destroy but says no word to indicate that God has good reason for so acting. The implication is that God's punitive action is unaccountable, and that, therefore, Job's sufferings are no proof of his guilt. 12-25. Job knows all that the friends know. It is not with them he wishes to plead, but with God. They invent falsehoods in defence of God's action, which the fear of the divine anger should prevent them from doing (XIII 1-12). Come what may, Job will plead his cause with God. Indeed, the very fact that he dares to do so is proof of his innocence (13-19). Job now addresses God directly. On condition that God refrains from using his overwhelming power against him Job is prepared to be either defendant or accuser (20-22). Let God tell him of his iniquity! And how can God bring his terrors to bear on Job, who is as powerless as a fallen leaf driven before the wind (23-27)? Is a creature so frail as man worthy of God's indignation (XIV 1-3)? How can the defiled be made pure (4)? Let man have peace in his brief life (5-6). If a tree is cut down, it may yet flourish again; but man when dead can never rise again (7-12). Job would gladly be hidden in Sheol as a temporary refuge from God's wrath, but God has allowed no hope of new life for man (13-19). When God overpowers man by death, he knows no more what was dear to him in life (20-22). XII 2-3 Job laughs at the Friends' Wisdom—1. 'Of a truth you are the men who know and with you wisdom will die': MT 'you are the people'. 3. For the heart as seat of intelligence cf. 7:17; 10:13.

4-6 The Just are mocked, the Wicked prosper—4.

'A laughing-stock to his friend is he who calls on God and is answered.' To Job the friends' lack of understanding and pitiless words are no better than mockery. 5. 'Misfortune is despised in the thought of men at ease; for those who stumble there's a blow.' Job's sad experience has taught him that human nature has little fellow-feeling for the failure and the outcast. 6. 'The tents of brigands are at peace and free from care are men who provoke God and think themselves almighty.' This is perhaps the sense of the last clause, lit. 'and to him who brings God in his hand'. 'Hand' stands for 'power' (cf. 1:12; 2:6). God does not seem to regard men according to their deserts.

7-11 The very Beasts know the Law of the Strong—

If the friends doubt the truth of his assertions, let them learn of the beasts. They know that the strong are rapacious and prey on the weak. 8. 'The earth' coming between the beasts, the birds and the fishes points to a corruption of the text, which is plausibly emended to 'the reptiles of the earth'. 9. 'Who among them all doth not know that the hand of the Lord hath done this?' The knowledge which experience gives them of the fact is hyperbolically extended to include the Creator. On the occurrence of the name Yahweh see § 318b. 11 is a proverbial saying signifying that 323m some things are obvious and patent to all. Job implies that the prosperity of the wicked and misery of the just should be as clear to all as the taste of food, and therefore his own sufferings are no indication of guilt on his part.

n 12-13 The Appeal to Age is Useless—Bildad had appealed to the authority of tradition (8:8-9) as had Eliphaz before him (5:27) on the ground that only time can beget wisdom. In 12 Job ironically quotes a proverb to this effect. He has just shown that some facts are obvious and are known even to the beasts. Wisdom and knowledge, it is clear, are not the exclusive property of old men like Eliphaz. Men attribute wisdom also to God, who certainly has power which Job proceeds to illustrate in a way which suggests that it is exercised harshly and not necessarily according to wisdom.

o 14-25 Illustrations of God's Absolute Power over Creatures—15 has no reference to the beneficent action of rain, but only to the consequences of defect and excess, drought and flood. This is in accordance with Job's theme, which is the overruling power of God, not his paternal government. 16b. 'to him belong both he that goes, and he that leads, astray', i.e. all men according to the Heb. idiom whereby the conjunction of two opposites signifies totality. All are in God's power; i.e. the DV reference to knowledge is out of place. 18. 'He looseth the bond of kings.' The kings, whose captives he frees, he reduces to servitude. 19. 'He leadeth priests barefoot', and so in ignominy. This, the only mention of priests in Job, is general in tenor but will have been suggested by the domestic experience of Israel; cf. § 318r. 20. 'He turneth aside the speech of the trusty and depriveth the aged of judgement.' 21b. 'and looseth the girdle of the strong'. For vigorous action the Orientals must gird up their flowing robes. 22. 'He discovereth deep things out of obscurity and bringeth forth darkness into light.' This enigmatic statement interrupts the easy sequence of the passage and probably belonged originally to another context. 23b. 'He enlargeth peoples and bloteth them out.' The last verb is an emendation, with mem for nun, demanded by the parallelism with 'destroyeth'. 24b. 'and causeth them to wander in a pathless waste'.

324a XIII 1-12 With God Job would speak: the Friends are inventing Falsehoods—3. 'Howbeit, it is to the Almighty that I would speak; and it is to God that I desire to address my case.' 4b. 'and worthless healers, all of you!' i.e. in their defence, probably, of God's action by the assumption that all who suffer are guilty. 5. Cf. 'Si tacuisses, philosophus mansisses'. 6b. 'to the contention of my lips', which he forthwith proceeds to utter. 7a. 'Is it in God's cause that you speak falsely, and do you . . . ?' 8. 'Is your motive regard for him, and is it for God you plead?' Lit. 'Is it his face you are lifting up?' the idiom meaning to help and comfort a person in distress with bowed head, and so to act out of regard for one, to show partiality. Job means that their line of conduct cannot be pleasing to God. 9. 'Will it be well for you when he examineth you?' As they cannot deceive God, they are exposing themselves to an investigation which they would regret. 10b. 'if you are secretly partial'; cf. 8. 11. 'Does not his excellence terrify you?' Lit. exaltation, so majesty, excellence. 12. 'Your maxims are proverbs of dust and your answers answers of clay.' Their sententious sayings are no more weighty than the dust blown away by the first gust of wind, and their replies are moulded as arbitrarily as a potter chooses the form to give to his clay.

b 13-19 Whatever the Outcome, Job will speak out: his Plea is Ready—13b. 'that I may speak, come what may upon me'. He has nothing more to lose. 14. 'I will take up my flesh in my teeth and lay my life in my hand.' The first metaphor, which occurs nowhere else (but see on 19:20), signifies the greatest danger, possibly referring to the peril of a body carried by a lion in its jaws. 15. 'Although he would kill me, I would not tremble, but would plead my ways in his sight.' 'tremble', an emendation by changing the order of yod and heth,

He would not desist from presenting his cause though he knew that the outcome would be his death. 16. 'Rather that would be for my salvation, for no hypocrite dare come before his presence.' The fact that Job wishes to have his case tried before God is itself an indication of his innocence. 17b. 'my declaration'; DV 'hidden truths'. 18a. 'See now, I have arranged my pleas.' His case is ready to be heard. 19. 'Would anyone contend against me now that I am about to hold my peace and expire?' He has already announced his impending demise (7:21). It would be cruel now to contest his case. Still he is ready to face the issue if God will meet him fairly, as he goes on to explain.

20-28 Job addresses God—20b. 'I shall not hide myself.' Not that he thought that he could hide himself. The sense is: then will I gladly come before thee. The two conditions follow in 21. 25 is a question in MT. 26. As a judge puts his verdict in writing. 26b. 'and impute to me', lit. 'makest me to inherit'. He admits some guilt in youth, but this was venial on the ground of age, and the sins of youth are not punished in adult life. 27. Better in the present tense with MT. 28 is in the 3rd person in MT and does not fit well in this position. It fits better after 14:3. a is lit. 'who is like a worn-out water-skin'.

XIV 1-3 Man, Frail and Ephemeral, seems Unworthy of God's Anger—1c. 'sated with anxious care'.

4 Man is by Nature Defiled—'Who can make pure out of defiled? No one at all.' According as the preposition is understood as introducing the material out of which the pure is to be made or the source whence it is to be derived, the question means 'Who can make pure man who is defiled?' or 'How can man be pure seeing that he is born of an impure source?' In either case the underlying idea is that man deserves divine commiseration and forbearance not only because he is physically frail (1-3) but also in his nature morally defiled or impure. In the second interpretation this moral defect is explicitly traced to its source in human generation, and in the first implicitly, as the defect is common to all. The root of the doctrine is to be found in the universality of human suffering, even in those who by reason of age or undeveloped reason are incapable of wrong-doing. This universality shows that human nature has somehow been perverted from that rectitude which God intended. This is the doctrine of original sin in germ. The idea may have been fostered by the laws concerning the purification of mothers after childbirth (Lev 12). And there may be allusion here to 'man born of woman' in 1, where the phrase is used only to stress the frailty of man's origin. For the moral use of the two words (cf. 17:9; Is 6:5). DV with Vg paraphrases and takes 'one' to refer to God. The negative answer of MT refers only to men. Cf. § 318n.

5-6 Man's Brief Life calls for Peace—5a. 'The days of man are decreed.' Their number has been appointed by God. 6. 'Take thy gaze from off him and forbear, till like a hireling he acquit himself of his day's task.' God's gaze in anger is thought of as a burden on man. For the meaning of rāṣāh see Dhorme. The commoner meaning followed by Driver-Gray 'till he can enjoy, as an hireling, his day' is against the concept of the hireling given by Job 7:1, and the day is the labour of the day, figurative of the life of man.

7-12 A Felled Tree has Hope, but not a Dead Man—8b. 'its stock be dying in the soil'. 10. 'But a man at death wastes away; he expires and is no more.' MT and Vg 'where is he?' by change of waw to nun gives 'is no more', which better suits the context and poetic style of the passage. 11. 'Water may fail from the sea and a river become arid and dry (12), yet man . . .'. Even if the impossible should come to pass in nature, for man once dead there is no rising again to this life.

13-19 Job would take Refuge in Sheol, could it be for a Time only—13. 'O that thou wouldst lay me by in Sheol.' 14. 'If a man could die and live again, all the days of my service I would wait until my relief should come.' On the impossible supposition considered Job would patiently bear his lot, which is expressed in terms of 324h military service. 15. Still conditional: 'thou wouldst call', etc. 16. 'For then [on this supposition] thou wouldst count my steps [with loving care] and wouldst not keep watch for my sin', i.e. to catch me in sin, as he accuses God of now doing. 17. Still conditional: 'My transgression would be sealed up', etc. Job does not claim to be entirely innocent, but denies that his wrongdoing has been such as to merit his present affliction. But whatever his sin, it would then be hidden away, forgotten and forgiven. 18-19. But all this is on the supposition of the impossible. Unlikely things can come to pass over the ages, but no matter what the space of time allowed man once dead can never return to life. 'A mountain may fall and crumble and a rock be removed out of its place.' These are conceivable happenings. A rock may slowly wear away and cease to be where it was. 'But the hope of man thou hast destroyed.' 20. 'Thou overpowerest him for ever and he passeth away' in death.

21-22 Sad State of the Dead—The Hebrews had received no revelation about the condition of the dead, and their conceptions about it were negative. They knew that after death men are deprived of all that belongs to the state of the living; and what is said of the dead is to be understood of this condition of deprivation of the enjoyment and knowledge of the living. Positive knowledge of the state of the dead was not conceded to the Hebrews till the last centuries before the Christian era; cf. Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, ch 7. 21. 'His sons are in honour but he knows it not; they become of no account, but he perceives it not.' 22. 'Only for himself is his flesh afflicted; only for himself doth his soul grieve.' The thought is expressed with poetic licence. It was not imagined that the body in the grave had the power of feeling. The personal part of man, that which enables a man to speak of himself as 'I', is described as going down to Sheol (Gen 37:35). On this sad note Job ends his speech. He knows of no hope for man once death has separated soul and flesh. This is important for the right understanding of the subsequent development of the discussion.

325a XV 1-35 The Second Speech of Eliphaz—Job is not as wise as he thinks, for wise men do not use empty language (11.). Indeed, his words are blasphemous (4). They are inspired by his guilt and are a self-condemnation (5 f.). He has no monopoly of wisdom (7-10). Pride incites him to speak against God (11-13). No man is innocent—least of all one as corrupt as Job (14-16). Eliphaz, from his personal experience (17) and from traditional lore (18 f.), sets forth the retribution which wickedness brings on men (20-35). He leaves it to be understood that Job is reaping the harvest sown by his own wickedness. His tone is far more severe than in his first speech, in which he had held out the hope of recovery if Job would turn to God.

b 1-10 Job has no Monopoly of Wisdom: In fact his Words are Foolish and Blasphemous—2. 'answer with windy knowledge and fill his belly with the east wind?' The windy knowledge is contemptuously described as conceived in the belly, not in the heart, the seat of understanding. The east wind is chosen in parallelism as being oppressive and noxious. 3. 'Arguing with profitless words and speeches which avail him not?' 4. 'Moreover, thou makest religion void and doest away with pious consideration', lit. 'with consideration before God'. Job is not considering his calamities in a proper religious spirit. 'Fear' stands for 'religion' as in Eliphaz's first speech (4:6). 5b. 'and thou chooseth the tongue of the crafty'. 6. 'mouth condemneth . . . lips testify against thee'. 7. 'wast thou brought forth'. Wisdom is conceived as belonging to the ancients, and the first man was nearest to the Wisdom that was with the Lord in the work of creation and was brought forth before the hills and the mountains (Prov 8:25). 8b. 'dost thou confine wisdom to thyself?' 10b. 'than thy father'.

c 11-18 Job's Words Instigated by Pride—11. 'Are divine consolations too meagre for thee, and words spoken gently with thee?' Eliphaz refers to the consolation offered by himself, as based on his knowledge of divine things and as the privileged recipient of the mysterious message (4:12 ff.). 12. 'Why doth thy heart carry thee away, and why are thine eyes exalted?' 'Exalted' with LXX 'as if . . . things' is an exegetical addition. 13a. 'that thou dost turn thine indignation against God?' 14-16 No Man is Innocent, certainly not Job—Eliphaz repeats the thought he had expressed before (4:17-19), but adds a bitter attack on Job. 15. 'Lo! in his Holy Ones he putteth not trust.' The parallelism suggests that the heavens stand metonymically for the Angels who dwell there. However, the material heavens themselves are a symbol of purity in Ex 24:10. For the doctrine see on 4:18. 16a. 'How much more one abominable and corrupt!' He means Job.

17-35 The Normal Lot of the Wicked—By describing the misery of the wicked Eliphaz leaves it to be understood that as Job is suffering great misery, he must be wicked. 17. What he has to say is the fruit of his experience, and also traditional lore, for it is (18) 'what the wise profess and proclaim as the teaching of their fathers'. 19 carries the tradition back to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, to whom 'the land' was given (Gen 12:7; 26:3; 28:4). They lived a nomadic life removed from possible contamination by foreign people. 20. 'The wicked man is tormented all his days and few [cf. Eccles 2:3] are the years allotted to the tyrant.' 21b. 'the destroyer will come upon him'. 22. 'He has no confidence that he will escape from darkness but (feels himself) marked out for the sword.' Darkness, a metaphor for calamity (cf. Is 9:2). After death by the sword (23) 'He is cast away as food for the vulture; he knoweth that his calamity is determined.' Read nōqād, 'ayyāh, pidō. 24. 'The day of darkness terrifies him; tribulation and distress encompass him.' So with different verse-division. 26. 'He charges against him like a foe armed with his thick-bossered buckler.' 27. Corpulence among some nations as among the Chinese is considered a sign of prosperity. In the Hebrew view it makes the mind gross (Ps 118:70 MT) and inclines man to neglect God (Deut 32:15). 28. To make them his own he is ready to ravage and destroy the land of others. 29c is quite uncertain. 30c. Probably to be emended: 'his buds shall be carried away by the storm' (cf. Dhome). 31. 'Let him not be led astray and trust in delusion for delusion shall be his gain.' 32. 'His shoots shall wither before their time and his fronds shall not flourish' (cf. LXX, Syr.). 33. 'He shall drop his grapes unripe like a vine and cast his blossom like an olive tree.' Lit. 'treat with violence' and so drop prematurely. 34. 'the ungodly', DV 'the hypocrite'.

XVI 1-XVII 16 Job's Fifth Speech—All that he has heard is empty talk signifying nothing. Were their positions reversed, he could have said it all himself (1-5). On his side neither speech nor silence gives relief (6). Eliphaz and the others have treated him cruelly. He turns on them and calls them wicked (7-10). When he was at peace, God crushed him, made him a target for his arrows, though there was no wrong in his dealings (11-17). His case calls for vengeance; and God in heaven, though his persecutor, is his witness. If only there were a court where man's case against God could be tried! But Job's days are nearly at an end (18-XVII:1). Job then proceeds, in loosely connected and often highly obscure sentences, to dwell upon his unhappy state (2, 6 f., 11) and the folly of his friends (4, 10). Again he ends on a note of hopelessness: nothing awaits him but the corruption of the grave and descent to Sheol. No hope or prosperity can accompany him there (13-16).

2-5 The Friends are Troublesome Comforters—3b. 'or what ails thee that thou must speak?' : as if Eliphaz suffered from some disease that caused a flow of words. 4. 'I also could speak like you, were you in my condition.' This verse and 5 in DV correspond to 4 in MT with the result that all subsequent verses of this chapter in DV are numbered one higher than in MT. 5. 'I could join words together against you and could . . . (6), I could . . . and not withhold the solace of my lips' (cf. LXX,

h 7-10 Violence of the Attack on Job—It is disputed who is the author of the attack. Driver-Gray attributes the hostility to God, Dhorme says vaguely 'an enemy'. Job appears to speak of Eliphaz and his friends, which would explain the passage from singular to plural. 7. 'But . . . do?' is added by Vg-DV to ease the transition. 8. 'But now an envious man has exhausted me; all his band seizes upon me': Dhorme's conjecture. 9. 'He has become a witness and stood against me; my calumniator deposes against me': cf. Dhorme. 10. 'His wrath hath rent and treated me with hatred; he hath gnashed his teeth against me; my enemy whets his eyes against me.' 11c. 'united they have their way against me'.

i 12-16 God's Attack on Innocent Job—12a. 'hath handed me over to'. Job does not spare his words against the friends. Eliphaz, the last speaker, is the unjust man, and the other two are the wicked. 13. Job's metaphors here and in 14 f. are strongly worded. 14. 'His archers have compassed me around . . . poured out my gall'; cf. Lam 2:11. 15. 'He hath breached me with breach upon breach; he rusheth against me like a warrior.' 16b. 'I have plunged my horn in the dust.' A metaphor for complete powerlessness and prostration as the elevation of the horn is of power and victory (cf. Ps 148:14). 17a. 'is reddened'. 18. 'though there is no injustice in my hands and my prayer is pure'. Sacrifices and prayers are impure and unacceptable to God when offered by persons whose hands are stained by blood or who are guilty of other crimes. The hands were intimately connected in thought with prayer on account of the practice of praying with outstretched hands (3 Kg 8:22).

j 19-XVII 1 Job is Innocent and soon to die—19. Omit 'in thee'. Another strong metaphor—Job speaks as if his death were by murder. Blood unjustly shed on the ground cried to God for vengeance (Gen 4:10). If covered over its voice is poetically conceived as stifled. Job's cry is to go straight to God and not find a lurking-place on the way. In spite of all he has said of God's attacks upon him, Job knows in his heart that God is both faithful and just. His mind is torn between his experience and his faith. The latter now prevails and he thinks of God as his vindicator and faithful witness. 20b. 'he that can depose for me is on high'. 21a. 'May my wish come to pass.' So with LXX. He longs for his innocence to be vindicated by God. 22. 'O that mortals could try their case with God, even as a man does with his neighbour!' So with Syr. 23. 'For short years are to come and I shall go by a road whence there is no return.' XVII.1. 'His indignation has destroyed my days and only the grave remaineth for me.' Read rûhó, pi'el for pu'al, and ne'ezbû. MT 'graves for me' is not an expression that a Hebrew would have used to express the thought, and MT 'my days are extinguished' not only is in conflict with 16:23 but uses a verb the authenticity of which is doubtful.

k XVII 2-12 Various Reflections on his State—2a. 'Of a truth I am the object of mockery.' 3. 'Lay by, pray, my pledge with thee, for no man will go surety for me.' No man will go bail for Job's innocence and his only hope is in the sure knowledge of God which can give a pledge in his favour. Again the appeal from God whom he thinks to persecute him to God whom he knows to be the faithful guardian of men. 4. If the friends had an understanding heart, they would not doubt of his uprightness. They shall not be victorious in their attack upon him. 5. 'For a portion one denounces friends and the eyes of his children fail.' Apparently a proverb about the retribution which falls on infidelity and treachery. The sense of the solidarity of the family was strong among the Hebrews. The friends are left to take the lesson to heart. 6. Omit 'as it were' and read 'peoples'. The knowledge of Job's case has spread beyond the confines of his country. 'Men even spit in my face'; probably another strongly-worded metaphor. 7b. 'my limbs are wasting away like a shadow'; read kālim. 8b. 'the innocent moved to indignation against the godless', i.e. seeing the unmerited suffering of the guiltless and the contrasted state of the wicked. 9. 'but the just man . . .'. There is no contrast between the classes mentioned in 8 and 9, the synonyms being chosen for variety. The upright are astounded but not scandalized. 10. 'Humble, do ye all turn and come, pray.' 11. 'My days have passed away in loathsomeness; the desires of my heart are dissipated.' So a conjecture of Beer's; MT seems certainly corrupt. 12. 'They turn night into day—light is near to darkness', reading minni, an Arabic use of the preposition justified by the Arabisms which characterize this book. The allusion appears to be to Sophar's prediction in 11:17, the thought of which is paraphrased in 12b with the meaning that Job's present gloom will soon give place to light.

13-16 Death excludes all Hope—13. 'If I await Sheol as my dwelling, if in the darkness I spread my couch (14), to corruption I call "Thou art my father" and to maggots "My mother" and "My sister" (15), where is then my hope and who shall see my prosperity [with LXX]? 16. Will they descend with me into Sheol or shall we go down together to the dust?' The parallelism to 'maggots' is a sure guarantee of the meaning 'corruption'. In 16 read habb'yādi and nēhāt. This is Job's answer to what he considers Sophar's facile promise. He has no hope and will never see prosperity again.

XVIII 1-21 Bildad's Second Speech—Job misuses words (2). He even likens the friends to dumb beasts (3). Job must not expect to be treated differently from the rest of the world (4). What befalls men who act wrongfully is described at length (5-21). The sufferer is tacitly invited to draw the conclusion that he falls under the same condemnation.

2-4 Introductory Remarks—2. 'How long will you put fetters on words?' 'Fetters' as the Assyrian qinšu. Job is guilty of misusing language. If he will be sensible, further discussion will be possible. 3 refers to 16:10. The friends cannot be expected to carry on the exchange of ideas if Job is to treat them in this fashion. 4a is taken by DV as a vocative, but this is not the natural meaning of the words, which read like an incomplete sentence. 14a seems out of its context and probably belongs here: 'he who rends himself in his fury has his assurance torn from his tent'. For the proverbial form cf. Prov 17:5. Job had accused Eliphaz of rending him (16:10), but Bildad suggests that it is Job whose fury resembles that of a maddened beast. The 'assurance' is all that in which a man trusted, all that gave him security. He finds himself ruined. 4b-c. Job seems to expect treatment different from that common to mankind at large. But he falls under the same law of retribution.

5-21 The Law of Retribution for the Wicked—7. The firm rapid stride congenial to his strength shall become cautious and hesitating on account of the pitfalls and snares which beset him. 8. 'shall thrust . . . and walk onto a pitfall', covered over by earth on crossed sticks, such as are used for entrapping animals. 9. 'His heel shall be caught in a snare; a gin shall seize upon him.' 11b. 'and shall drive him at the heels'. 12b. 'and let disaster be ready for his stumbling'. 13. 'His skin shall be consumed by malady; the firstborn of death shall devour his limbs (14b) and shall conduct him to the king of terrors.' In a read niph'al and bidway (Dhorme); others, however, perhaps rightly, omit as dittography. The first-born of death is pestilence or the like; and the king of terrors is a mythological allusion to the ruler of the underworld. 14a after 4a. 15a. 'They who are none of his shall dwell in his tabernacle.' 16b. 'and above his branches shall be withered'. 18. The subject is indefinite 'they shall', equivalent to the passive. 20. 'They that went before' would be the departed in Sheol; but this would conflict with the common conception expressed in 14:21. 'They of the west . . . they of the east', that is, all mankind (cf. 23:8). The points of the d XIX 1-29 Job's Sixth Speech—He again rebukes the friends for their heartlessness (2-3). If he had been guilty of some fault, it would, after all, be his own affair ; but they should know that all his trouble has come from God (4-6). He again describes his pitiable condition (7-20). Then his tone changes and for the first time he appeals for compassion and sympathy, for he has been struck by the hand of God (21 f.). He would fain have his words inscribed for a perpetual memorial (23 f.). Again he forgets what he has said of God as his persecutor and speaks of him as the just vindicator of men. He has certain assurance that the living God will make manifest the justice of his cause and that he himself will live to see this vindication (25-27). He closes with a reminder to the friends of the retribution which awaits unjust conduct such as theirs (28 f.).

e 2-3 Rebuke of the Comforters—3. 'humiliate', DV 'confound'. 'oppress': the exact meaning is uncertain.

f 4-6 His State is due to Divine Action—4. 'And even had I erred indeed, my error would abide with me.' It would be his own affair ; but he does not suggest that he could have committed any sin which would merit his actual sufferings. 5. DV 'reproaches' means ground for reproach—'my humiliation'. 6. 'Know ye then that God hath dealt perversely with me and encompassed me with his net'. 7. 'there is no justice'. 10b. 'and he hath plucked up my hope like a tree'. 12. 'His troops come on together . . . against me'. 13b. 'and my acquaintances have become estranged from me'. 14. 'My kinsmen and my intimates have failed ; they that sojourn in my house have forgotten me.' The first words of 15 belong here as is shown by the respective length of the lines and by the gender of the verbs. 17b. 'and I am become loathsome to'. This meaning is required by the parallelism and is supported by Arabic usage. Job's children had all perished (1:19). Some therefore regard this sentence as a mere poetical amplification in Job's description of his misery, but this view implies too flagrant a disregard of paternal psychology. It is more natural to understand 'my womb' as in 3:10 where it is the Hebrew expression for 'the womb that bore me'. By 'the children of my womb' Job accordingly means his brothers and sisters. In both passages the usage is strange to us. 18. 'Even children spurn me ; when I rise up, they speak against me.' When children are rude, they normally run away at a sign of possible action against them, but Job's condition is such that they know he cannot chase and punish them. 19b should be in the plural. 20. DV represents conjectural restoration. Better : 'My bone cleaveth to my skin and there is no soundness in my body', lit. 'I have escaped with the skin of my teeth'. The gums, which are the skin of the teeth, may remain undamaged when all the external surface of the body is one wound. Hence the proverbial expression.

g 21-22 Appeal for Commiseration—21. The tenderness of this appeal has made it one of the best-known lines in the whole Bible. 22b. DV gives the sense well. MT 'and cannot be sated with my flesh', cannot feel that you have had enough of it. This comparison of the friends to wild beasts attacking prey renders almost certain the restoration of yod, giving 'ayyāl (for 'ēl 'God') : 'Why must you pursue me like a hart ?'

h 23-24 Job's Wish for a Perpetual Memorial of his Protestation of Innocence—23. 'Who will grant' is the Hebrew idiom for expressing a wish. As the Hebrew word translated 'marked down' signifies 'to incise, engrave', the suggestion may well be correct that seper here, and in Is 30:8, has the meaning not 'book' but 'copper' corresponding to the Assyrian sipparu. Ordinary writing-material, moreover, would be too perishable for Job's purpose. 24. 'that with an iron graver and with lead they might be inscribed for ever on a rock'. Many ancient rock-inscriptions survive to the present day including the famous Siloam inscription at Jerusalem. There is nothing in MT corresponding to 'or else' and therefore the 'plate of lead' can hardly be defended. The lead was used apparently for filling in the letters cut in the rock, but there is no independent evidence of this.

25-27 Job's Complete Confidence of his Vindication by God—These verses as Dhorme puts it 'have caused floods of ink to flow'. Several words are capable of more than one meaning and the text is not free from corruption. Hence in the detail of interpretation it may be said that opinions and writers are equal in number. St Jerome has treated the text with some freedom and has made it express belief in physical resurrection at the end of the world. St John Chrysostom, on the other hand, says explicitly of Job that 'Since he was just and knew nothing of the resurrection, this was the chief cause of his perturbation that he did not know the cause of his sufferings' (Epist. 2, 8, PG 52, 565). Peters 206, 208 has well explained how Jerome reached his paraphrase. Understanding 25b of Job himself, 'and last [= at the last] he will arise on the dust', he reworded the sentence after his manner to make the eschatological meaning plain. And 26a he took to mean literally 'and after with my skin they shall encompass this', and again clothed the thought so won in clearer and more harmonious language. The verb 'shall rise' of 25b is in the 3rd person in MT and all other ancient versions and has for its subject 'my redeemer' or 'my vindicator' of 25a. Had Job spoken of the resurrection it would have introduced an entirely new element into the discussion, which up to this point has been carried on by both sides on the supposition that all divine rewards and punishments for good and evil living are confined to this life. Had Job now asserted his belief in resurrection after death to be followed by a blessed union with God, the basis of the discussion would have been altered and the problem of the sufferings of the innocent in this life would have been on a fair way to its solution. But in fact the exchange of speeches continues after as before on the ground of the same postulate that all retribution is confined to this side of the grave. The solemnity of the passage, which must have contributed to its eschatological interpretation, is due to the earnestness with which Job is fighting for the recognition of his innocence against the assumption of his friends that the very violence of his sufferings is proof patent of his wickedness, hidden though that may have been. A fuller discussion may be found in Sutcliffe, The Old Testament and the Future Life, 131-7.

25. 'For I on my side know, my redeemer liveth, and as vindicator will take his stand upon the earth.' The conjunction 'for' indicates that Job is about to utter the substance, though not the form, of what he desired to be put on permanent record. The insertion of the personal pronoun, being neither required to indicate the speaker nor normal, is emphatic. Job's knowledge based on his conviction of his own innocence and of God's justice was not shared by the friends. The redeemer is God, as the sequel here shows. On the word see § 246g. The significance of 'liveth' is that he is a person conscious and active, who will not remain a merely passive spectator. 'vindicator' is based on post-biblical Hebrew ('surety, guarantee') and on the indication of the parallelism. Alternatively the word means 'last', the one whose word would finally settle the dispute. 'on the earth' in contrast to 16:20 where Job spoke of God as his witness in heaven. In other words, God will guarantee Job's innocence to men, for he esteems that it would be an injustice permanently to let men think him guilty of such iniquity as to merit his present distress. As the epilogue of the book shows, God did finally vindicate the moral integrity of his servant. 26. There is no approach to agreement as to the meaning of this verse which all admit to be partially corrupt. With various emendations the following versions have been proposed. Dhorme : 'And behind my skin I shall stand erect and from my flesh I shall see God'. Peters : 'And behind my skin thus flayed, 3261 from out of my body I shall see God'. König : 'And after the loss of my skin which has been mangled to that there, and even robbed of my flesh I shall see God'. These are quite unconvincing. Apart from the general consideration outlined above, it does not follow from the fact that a language can say 'after the rain' to signify 'after the rain has ceased' that it can also say 'after my skin' to mean 'after my skin has ceased to exist'. The dislocation of words in 20 suggests that here too they need only to be re-arranged as follows : 'Should my skin be flayed from my flesh, even after this I shall see God'. Such an emphatic expression of his invincible confidence in his ultimate vindication by God is what the context demands, and its form is suggested to Job by the state of his disease (2:7 f.). 27. 'This my hope', etc., expresses the sense well.

m 28-29 Warning to the Friends—28. 'If you say, "How shall we persecute him and find a pretext for action against him"', (29) 'Have a fear for yourselves of the sword, for wrath is kindled against iniquities.' Read tihar (tau omitted by haplography) and transpose beth before iniquities.

327a XX 1-29 Sophar's Second Speech—He must answer Job's insulting language (2-3). The prosperity of the wicked is illusory and transitory (4-29).

b 2-3 Job's Words are Insulting—There is agreement as to the meaning of 3a only. 2. 'Therefore my thoughts make me answer even by reason of my eagerness within me.' 'Therefore' : because Job has just insisted that there is a judgement ruling the world, Sophar is eager to set forth what he conceives to be its true nature. 3. 'A reproof that would put me to shame I hear, and wind without understanding answers me', omitting the possessive suffix after 'understanding'.

c 4-29 The Prosperity of the Wicked is Brief and Illusory—4. Insert colon after 'know', and in 5 omit 'that'. 'triumph' (DV 'praise'); 'godless' (DV 'hypocrite'). 7. 'like his own dung'. 10b. 'and his hands shall restore his wealth', which was ill-gotten. The logical order would not be restored by the removal of this verse, as 12 returns to the lifetime of the impious after his death in 11, where omit erroneous explanatory addition 'the vices of', and in b read 'it'. He dies prematurely. 12-13 form a protasis to which 14 gives the apodosis, the enjoyment of evil being compared to the holding of a delicious morsel in the mouth and its turning to poison in the bowels. 13. 'and will not let it go and holds it back on his palate'. 14. 'His food' (DV 'his bread'). 16. 'poison' (DV 'head'). 17. Probably 'streams of oil' (cf. 29:6). 'see' in the sense of 'have the use and enjoyment of'. 18. 'He restores the fruit of his labour and cannot swallow it down; in the product of his commerce he has no enjoyment.' So probably; his labour, as the whole context indicates, has been for dishonest ends. 19. 'Because with his might he crushed the weak . . . and shall not build it up', probably in the sense of leaving posterity (cf. Ex 1:21; 2 Kg 7:11). These are not intended to be utterances of mere general import. Sophar is hinting here that he believes Job's wealth to have been unjustly acquired. 20. 'Because he has not known contentment in his belly, his prized possessions shall not enable him to escape.' Gluttony is here a figure for rapacity (cf. 15). 21. 'No one survived his devouring, therefore his wealth shall not be abiding.' 22. 'In the fullness of his sufficiency straits come upon him.' 23. 'When he is about to fill his belly, (God) sends . . .' 24b. 'and a bow of brass shall pierce him', with its arrows. 25. 'The missile cometh out at his back and the bright point from his gall', reading šelah (LXX). 25c with 26. 'Terrors are stored up for him; all darkness is laid up for him . . . it consumes what is left in his tent' (cf. Kissane). The fire is lightning from heaven, a clear indication that Sophar has Job himself in mind. Darkness is a synonym of Sheol (cf. 10:21 f.). 28. 'A flood shall roll away his house, streams of water in the day of wrath.' Read yāgōl, or perhaps yābāl. 29b. 'and his inheritance decreed by God'.

d XXI 1-34 Job's Seventh Speech—His friends must listen. That is the only comfort he wants from them

(2 f.). His complaint is not against man, and what they will hear should astound them (4 f.). On their theory why should the wicked prosper? In fact they do (8-13), even though they impiously deny their need of God (14 f.) on account of their self-sufficiency (16). How often do they meet with retribution? (17 f.) It is no answer to say that they are punished in their children, for after death they have no further interest in their families (19-21) and God is well aware of this (22). All men are alike in death, whatever their lives have been (23-26). Job knows their thoughts about him : his house and household have perished, and therefore he must be wicked (27 f.). But any passer-by could tell them (29) that in life the wicked are powerful and protected from harm, and in death receive an honourable interment (30-33). So their proffered consolations are based on misrepresentations (34).

2-5 Introductory—2b. 'and let this be your way of consoling!' 3. 'if you please' is an addition, but the sense suggests rather 'if you can'. 5b. A gesture of silent amazement (29:9) or merely of silence (Jg 18:19).

6-13 The Disturbing Fact—the Prosperity of the Wicked—6a. 'I am disturbed.' 8. Omit 'a multitude of kinsmen'. 10. 'Their bull is fertile.' 12. 'They lift up their voices with . . . the sound of the pipe.' 13. 'in a moment': in the midst of their prosperity. No calamity intervenes before they join the dead in Sheol. 14-18 Their Godless Self-sufficiency—Without approving the blasphemous deduction drawn by the wicked, Job, nonetheless, confirms the fact of their self-sufficiency. 16. 'Lo! Their prosperity is in their own power; the counsel of the wicked is far from him.' Omit negative with LXX; 'power', lit. 'hand'; 'him' with LXX. A much-disputed verse. They have acquired their wealth and keep it by their own exertions. God in no way interferes with them nor does he appear to concern himself with their projects. Calamity (17 f.) comes upon them so seldom that it does not seem to be due to divine retribution. 'How often doth calamity come upon them, and how often does he distribute sorrows in his wrath?' 18. 'How often are they as straw before the wind and as chaff swept away by the whirlwind?' Contrast Ps 1:4.

19-22 Punishment of Offspring is not Punishment of the Guilty—19a quotes an objection. God punishes the wicked at least in their children—this in accord with the strong Semitic conviction of the solidarity of the family : 'God lays up the iniquity for his children'. This is answered in b : 'Let him requite it to the man himself that he may know of it'. 20. 'Let his own eyes see his own misfortune, and let him . . .' 21b. 'when the number of his allotted months is finished?' Cf. 14:21. 22. 'those who are on high', i.e. the Angels (cf. 4:18; 15:15). If we know that a man is not punished by what befalls his children after him, quite obviously God knows it too, and therefore this cannot be his way of chastising the wicked.

23-26 No Difference between the Deaths of the Prosperous and the Unfortunate—23. 'happy and peaceful'. 25. 'without having tasted prosperity'. The suggestion is that the prosperous have acquired their wealth unjustly or misused it; and according to the friends' theory there should not be this equality in death. Job will presently go on to show that the wicked are honoured in death.

27-33 Falsity of the Insinuation against him : the Wicked are Powerful in Life and Honoured in Death—28. This question is directed against Job, whose household had been destroyed in the midst of his prosperity. 29. 'and do you not give heed to the examples they can give?' The matter is common knowledge; any passer-by can confirm it from his own experience. The sense is weakened by the translation 'widely-travelled', which, moreover, is against the usage of 'they that pass by the way' (cf. Ps 79:13; 88:42; Lam 1:12; 2:15). 30. 'On the day of destruction the wicked man is spared and on the day of wrath he is delivered.' 32. 'He is carried to the graveyard and watch is 327] kept over his tomb. The wicked man receives every mark of honour after death. 33. The clods of the valley he finds pleasant. He rests peacefully in the earth used in the construction of his grave. St Jerome strangely took the reference to be to a stream in the underworld and introduced Cocytus, the classical name of such a river. After him all men march and before him they are without number—a description of the crowd at the obsequies.

k 34. Emptiness of the Proffered Consolation—How then can you offer me empty comfort when your answers remain a deception?—because contrary to the facts of experience.

l XXII 1-30 Eliphaz's Third Speech—The virtue of man can confer no benefit on God (2-3), but as God does not call man to book for leading a good life, it is clear that Job's iniquity is very great (4-5). As Job's wealth had been exceptionally great, Eliphaz draws the conclusion that he must have acquired and increased it by harsh and unjust dealings (6-9). This has brought on his present distress (10-11). Job is accused of saying that as God's dwelling is far aloft in the high heavens he can know nothing of what happens here below (12-14). Job appears to be following the example of the godless men who were destroyed by the Flood, a catastrophe which proves that God is not disinterested in human conduct (15-18). And good men rejoice at such condign punishment (19-20). If only Job will be reconciled to God and put away his iniquity (21-23), he shall have boundless wealth (24-25), and all will be according to his heart's desire (26-28), for God humbles the proud and heaps his blessings on innocent lives (29-30).

m 2-11 The Immensity of Job's Wickedness—2. Can man confer a benefit on God? It is the prudent who benefit by their prudence! 3. Does the Almighty find pleasure in your being just? 4. Way as often means 'the way one behaves'. 4. Is it because you are God-fearing that he reproves you? 'The fear of God', here 'fear' alone, is the Hebrew expression for 'religion, a life religiously spent'. The argument is still the same: Job suffers greatly, therefore, though his iniquity has not been manifest, he must have been guilty of enormous wickedness. 6. The scantily clothed poor are hyperbolically called naked. 7. Not 'withdrawn', but 'withheld'. 11. This wickedness is the reason further why Light has become darkness so that thou canst not see and an inundation of waters overwhelms thee. Light is a symbol of prosperous times, darkness and inundation stand for calamity.

n 12-20 The Flood a Proof that God is not Inactive in High Heaven—12. Is not God on high in heaven and doth he not look upon the stars aloft? This is the basis of the following assertion in the sense that God is too elevated above the dwellings of men to be concerned in their conduct. Hence (13), So thou sayest . . . Can he judge behind a dark cloud? 14. Clouds conceal him and he cannot see; he walketh on the vault of heaven. But the thought is that the clouds conceal the world from him. 15-17. Job appears to be following in the footsteps of the corrupt generation swept away by the Flood. Eliphaz cleverly turns the argument by putting into their mouths the impious words attributed by Job to the wicked (21:14 f.). 18b. Yet the counsel of the wicked was far from him; with LXX. Again cleverly, Eliphaz quotes and gives a new meaning to 21:16b. Though God had heaped benefits upon them, their whole way of life disregarded him. 19-20. In mentioning the rejoicing of the just Eliphaz hints at other famous examples of the punishment of the wicked, as that of Sodom and Gomorrah (Gen 19), of Core, Dathan and Abiron (Num 16:35), in which fire was a means of destruction.

o 23-30 Job's Repentance would be blessed by Wonderful Prosperity—23. and humble thyself and put away: so LXX. DV 'be built up' (so MT) interrupts the condition of restoration, of which the putting away of iniquity is part. 24. Then shalt thou hold gold as dust and the fine gold of Ophir as the pebbles of the wadies. A hyperbolic description of the reward of virtue; cf. 5:19-26, esp. 25. To understand the line as expressing contempt for wealth is to neglect the this-worldly outlook of the friends and their thesis that virtue meets with material reward. The words could signify the worthlessness of gold if it were a question of Job's parting with affection for his own lost wealth considered to have been the fruit of wickedness. 25. And the Almighty shall be thy gold and silver heaped up for thee. Job later declares that his wealth had not been the source of his joy (31:25). 27b. Vows of thank-offerings were made in petitions for benefits. So, to say that Job will pay his vows implies that his petitions will have been answered. 29. For he humbles the exalted and the proud; so probably with Beer.

XXIII 1-XXIV 17, 25 Job's Eighth Speech—If only he could find God and put his case before him, he is confident that his innocence would be established, but do what he will, he cannot make contact with God (2-12). God has his own ways, which no man can thwart. And that is why Job is filled with fear. God is the cause of this distress and not his misfortunes as such (13-17). Why does God not visit his wrath on the wicked (XXIV:1-3)? They oppress the weak and the poor in every conceivable way, but God disregards it (4-12). The murderer, the thief and the adulterer carry on their evil course (13-17). [18-24 after 27:13] Who can belie Job's words? (25)

2-12 If Job could meet God his Innocence would be established—25. His hand is heavy despite my groaning. 'His' with LXX. 3. Who will grant is a Hebrew expression to introduce a wish. 'know and find' means 'know how to find'. 4. I would set my case before him . . . with pleadings. 6. Would he contend . . . No! Surely he would heed me! 7. He would listen to a just man pleading with him and I should free myself with victory from my judge; reading yisma. 8. But Job's trouble is that he cannot enter into direct relations with God. 'if to the west I perceive him not'. 9. In the north I seek him but see him not; I turn to the south but discern him not; reading qoph for 'ain in a. 10. 'my way': lit. with Syr. 'my going and my standing still', i.e. he knows all about me, Heb. idiom expressing totality by the conjunction of two opposites. 'after he had tested me, I should go forth like gold', pure as gold from the crucible.

13-17 God's Ways are Inscrutable and the Cause of Job's Fears—God has chosen a line of action and he cannot be turned from it. He will not let Job plead his case before him, and it is this attitude of God's that fills Job with forebodings and fear, not his calamities merely in themselves. This is in answer to Eliphaz (22:10 f.). 13. When he has made his choice, who can turn him back? 14. He will fulfil. Job hints that it is not only in his regard that God's actions are arbitrary. 15. Therefore it is, on account of him, that I am troubled; of him my thoughts put me in fear. Not 'at his presence', which is precisely what Job longed for. If he could come into God's presence, he could settle the issue of his innocence. Eliphaz had said (22:10 f.) that on account of his wickedness Job was troubled by snares, fear and darkness. Here (15-17) Job answers that it is the attitude of God that causes his trouble and fear. 17. ' . . . darkness, nor of the gloom that encompasses me'.

XXIV 1-3 God seems to disregard Iniquity—1. Why are the times hidden from the Almighty and why do they that know him, not see his day? Omit the first 'not' with LXX. 'Times' implying 'happenings' as in our 'What terrible times!' 'Know' with pregnant meaning 'know with favour, love' as in Ps 1:6. God's day is the day of his vengeance on the sinner. 2. with the shepherd with LXX; DV 'and fed them'. Not content with stealing the flock they enslave the shepherd. 4-12 The Wretched State of the Defenceless—4. They turn aside the poor from the way; humble folk are all forced to hide. For fear of maltreatment they dare not be seen on the public ways. 5. Lo! As wild asses in the wilderness they go forth in their toil, searching for food in the desert, there is nothing to nourish their children. 6. They reap in fields not their own and gather the vintage for the wicked. In Job's present frame of mind the wicked and 328e the rich are synonymous. 7. 'Naked they pass the night without clothing and have no covering in the cold.' For 'naked' cf. 22:6. 8. 'press close to the rock' to get what little shelter it can afford. 9. They rob the orphan from the breast and take in pledge the infant of the needy. Later they will grow up as useful slave-workers. This verse introduces a new unnamed subject and interrupts the description of the misery of the common folk. It probably belongs after 3. 10. 'Naked they go about without clothing and in hunger they carry the sheaves.' 11. 'Bereft of song they press out the oil. They tread the vinevats and thirst'; cf. Sutcliffe, JTS 50 (1949) 174-6. They are incapable of the glad songs which normally accompanied such work. 12. 'From the cities come the groans of the dying and the soul of the wounded cries out, but God regardeth not the scandal.'

13-17 Murderers, Adulterers, Burglars—Job now leaves those who practised open oppression and turns to crimes committed under the shelter of darkness. Common to them all is that they shun the light. Hence in 14 for lā'ôr read lô'ôr, 'The murderer riseth in the dark to kill'. 14c after 15. 15. The adulterer waits for night saying, 'It will provide concealment for my face'. 14c. 'By night the burglar stalks abroad' (y'hallek). 16a. It was the burglar, not the adulterer, who dug his way through the wall of sun-dried mud to effect an easy entrance; cf. Mt 24:43. 16b-c. 'By day they shut themselves up; they are strangers to the light.' 17 is uncertain in detail. They sleep when others work. 'To them all daytime is night-time.' 18-24. after 27:13. 25b. 'and set my words at naught'.

XXV 1-6 XXVI 5-14 Bildad's Third Speech: The Power of God and the Vileness of Man—As it stands now in MT Bildad's third speech consists of five verses only, which is against the analogy of all the other speeches. Moreover, these five verses are a doxology but have the appearance of a mere torso, and as the attribution of the speeches in this part has become confused in other respects (cf. 24:18-24; 27:13-23) and the doxology of 26:5-14 forms the natural complement of 25:1-6, there is little doubt but that the two passages belong together.

Bildad praises the power of God on high (1-2) and points out the impossibility of man being just or pure in his sight (3-6). He then lauds the omniscience and power of God in regard of the underworld, the earth, the clouds, the pillars of heaven, the sea (XXVI:5-13). And all that man has heard of his doings is but as a whisper (14).

2. God's power gives reason to man to fear. His rule is the source of peace in heaven. 3 is a picturesque description of God's might. The parallelism favours LXX: 'And against whom doth not his ambush arise?' 4. 'How can man be just before God?' Job had said this himself (9:2). XXVI:5. 'The shades below are made to tremble; the waters and they that dwell therein feel awe.' 'giants' is due to a confusion of Rephaim, the name of the shades of the dead, with its homonym, the name of an early race of great stature (Deut 2:11, etc.). The waters are those under the earth (Deut 4:18, etc.) which themselves were over Sheol, the abode of the dead. 'awe' inserting with Dhorme yēhattū omitted by haplography. 6. 'Hell' stands for Sheol; cf. comm. on 5. 'destruction' is a translation of the proper name Abaddon, a synonym for Sheol. 7. The north, the part in parallelism with the whole, is mentioned perhaps as being unknown and mysterious to the ancients and in mythology even regarded as the home of the gods. 8b. 'they are not split open under their weight', lit. 'under them'. 9. God's throne is the firmament (Is 66:1), the undersurface of which is its face for man. This God 'covereth' by his clouds. 10. The flat earth was conceived as surrounded by an ocean which itself was bounded by the fixed horizon. 'he appointed the boundary between light and darkness', reading yā'ad. Light and darkness, both conceived as positive realities with independent existences, had their home, at least for the poet, at the confines of the earth. There they retired when their period of service in the world was over; cf. 38:19. 11. The supports of the firmament rest on the utmost boundary of the earth. 12. Omit 'suddenly'; '... smote through Rahab'. God showed his dominion over the ocean by confining its primeval waters and allowing the dry land to appear (Gen 1:9; Ps 103:6-9). Rahab is the personification of the sea in revolt. 13b. 'his hand hath pierced the coiling serpent', which is mentioned also in Is 27:1 and in the Rās-Shamra literature; cf. Syria 15 (1934) 305. *W. F. Albright in CBQ 7 (1945) 30. *C. Rabin in JTS 47 (1946) 38-41. The parallelism shows the serpent to be a celestial constellation, probably Draco. This is probably leviathan of 3:8 mythologically conceived as a monster capable of attacking the sun and obscuring its light. See Ball on 3:8. 14. 'Lo, these are the fringes of his ways and what a feeble whisper thereof do we catch, and the thunder of his prowess who can understand?' Ball's suggestion, rō's for ra'am, is attractive: 'the sum of his exploits'.

XXVI 1-4 XXVII 1-6, 12 Job's Ninth Speech—This speech as it stands has extraneous elements inserted in it. For 26:5-14 see after 25:6, § 328g-h. 27:7-11 treat of God's anger with the wicked, which is the theme, not of Job, but of his friends. Job maintains in his bitterness of soul that the prosperity of the wicked seems rather to indicate God's favour (9:22-24; 21:7-33). And as in the existing arrangement the third cycle of speeches is incomplete and Sophar has no speech at all, it seems that his third speech has been broken up into 27:7-11, 13; 24:18-24; 27:14-23, passages which in MT are attributed to Job but, as setting forth the sad state of the wicked, could not have been spoken by him. Note also the curious introductory formula of 27:1 which differs from all that precede and comes in the middle of words attributed to Job. What remains of Job's speech is incomplete.

Bildad has given neither help nor counsel (2-4). God has deprived Job of justice (XXVII:2). As long as he lives Job will not admit the accusations levelled by the friends against him, but will stoutly maintain his innocence (3-6, 12).

2-4 Job taunts Bildad—2. 'What help thou hast given to one bereft of strength and help to the powerless arm!' 3. 'What counsel thou hast given where wisdom is needed and what an abundance of sanity thou hast shown!' 4. 'To whom hast thou been declaring mere words? And whose is the spirit that has issued from thy mouth?' For the construction of a cf. 31:37, and for 'words' in the sense of 'mere words' 15:13. Job stands on his dignity; he does not wish to be treated as an ignoramus. 5 is ironical. Bildad has shown such marvellous wisdom that someone must have prompted him! 5-14. See after 25:4. XXVII 2-6, 12 Job will maintain his Innocence to his Last Breath—3. As in Gen 2:7; Ps 103 (104) 29 f. 4. 'what is false' (DV 'iniquity') by admitting guilt. 5. 'to be right' (DV 'to be just') in asserting his guilt. XXVII 7-11 13 XXIV 18-24, XXVII 14-23 Sophar's Third Speech—On the reconstruction of this speech see § 328j. God will not hear the prayers of the godless man (27:7-11). This means as long as he remains wedded to his evil life, and does not contradict the friends' advice to Job, whom they suppose to be wicked, to turn to God, for this advice is joined to the exhortation to put away his wickedness (5:17; 11:14; 22:23). In 13 Sophar announces his intention of describing the lot of the wicked. This he does in 24:13-24 and 27:14-23 insisting on the fallaciousness of riches and the rich man's uncertain hold on life.

XXVII 7-11, 13 God does not hear the Prayers of the Impious—7. 'be as' means 'share the lot of' as in 1 Kg 25:26. 8. 'For what hope has the impious when he intercedes [yipga], when he lifts up his soul to God?' A metaphor for prayer as in Ps 24 (25) 1. 11. 'I will teach thee what [with LXX] is in the hand of God and the dispensation of the Almighty I will not conceal', namely the lot reserved by God for the wicked. 13 puts this in plainer words.

XXIV 18-24 XXVII 14-23 The Lot of the Impious—18a. He is tossed about and has no stability. 18c.

- 329a. Perhaps: 'The wine-presser turns not to their vineyards' (dōrēk karmām, Dhorme) because there is no work to be done there. 19. 'The heat dries up the snow-waters and Sheol snatcheth away the sinner.' So perhaps (cf. Ball). 20. 'The womb that formed him [p'tāqō, Dhorme] shall forget him; his name [šmō] shall be remembered no more.' 21. 'He hath dealt evilly [hēra], with LXX with the barren.' The barren woman has no children and the widow no husband to defend her. 22a: with LXX 'He drags off the poor by his might'. 22b-23. 'He may stand erect [i.e. seems prosperous] but cannot trust to his life [it may end at any time]; God may grant him to dwell in security, but his eyes are upon his ways'; reading yiskōn. 24. 'He is lifted up for a little while and is no more; he wills like a plucked mallow [cf. LXX] and withers like an ear of corn.'
- b XXVII 14-23 The Unhappy Fate of the Impious continued—14b. 'offspring'. 15a. 'brought to the grave through pestilence'; for this pregnant meaning of 'death', suggested already by Sanchez, cf. Jer 15:2. 18. 'like a bird's nest and like a booth made by a watchman', in a vineyard or plantation; both frail and unenduring. 19. 'He lies down rich and it seemed secure; he opens his eyes and it is no more.' He loses his wealth (figured by his unsubstantial house in 18) in a single night. 20. 'Terrors overtake it like waters; in the night a storm-wind spirits it away', namely his household and fortune. So in 21. 'The east wind carries it away and it vanishes; it sweeps it out of its place.' 22. 'God hurleth at him without mercy; he would fain flee from his hand.' In 13 Sophar set out to depict God's treatment of the wicked and so the subject of the sentence could be left implicit here. 23. 'He claps his hands against him and hisses at him from his dwelling' in Heaven. With this strong anthropomorphism cf. Ps 77 (78) 65. For the signs of triumphant contempt cf. Lam 2:15.
- c XXVIII 1-28 Hymn in Praise of Wisdom—This is an insertion in the dialogue (see § 317*l*). Man has marvellous knowledge. He has explored uninhabited regions, even the bowels of the earth. He knows where the metals may be found, disguised though they are in the form of ore (1-11). But the home of wisdom he does not know (12-14). No gold nor precious stones are comparable in value (15-19). But the source of wisdom man does not know (20-22). This God alone knows (23). When he fashioned the universe, wisdom was with him (24-27). Wisdom for man is the service of God (28).
- d 1-11 Man's Marvellous Knowledge—1. 'Silver hath its source and the gold men refine hath its home.' 2. 'copper'. 3. 'Man setteth a limit to darkness and with all exactness searcheth out stone that lay in pitchy gloom.' Man conquers darkness in the mines by light-shafts (see Petrie 60*f.*, 156) and by the use of artificial light. 4. 'A sojourning people breaketh through wadies forgotten by human foot; they are exiles and wanderers from mankind.' The poet stresses the remoteness of the mines, perhaps those in Sinai of which Flinders Petrie, without any thought of Job, wrote that they 'have been the only cause of man ever visiting this region' (59). Even in these uninhabited valleys man had discovered the presence of precious stones and metals, which could be worked only by people who had come from their distant homes. The mines of Sinai were horizontal shafts cut through the sides of the wadies (cf. Flinders Petrie, 59-61, 154-9). 5. 'Out of the earth comes forth bread, but underneath it is overturned as by fire', by the labours of the miners. For the expression cf. Gen 19:24*f.* about Sodom and Gomorrah. 6. 'and gold-dust too is there'. 8. Lit. 'sons of pride', lions. Yet man has discovered their untrodden spot. 10. Rivers is used with poetic licence either for the wet galleries of the workings or for channels to carry off the water. 11 gives a different example of man's ingenuity in finding what is precious, namely by securing gold from the beds of streams.
- e 12-22 But the Home of Wisdom Man does not know; its Incomparable Value—13. 'Man knoweth not the way thereto', with LXX. 'the land of the living' is this world; omit 'in delights'. 15. 'neither can silver', etc. 16a. 'with the gold of Ophir', which was probably in S. Arabia. 18a. 'Coral and crystal'. 18b. 'a casket of wisdom is above one of pearls'; lit. 'bag'. 19b. 'pure gold'.

23-28 God Alone knows Wisdom: its Meaning for 1 Man—23. 'the way of it' is the way that leads to it. 24. 'When he beheld.' Wisdom was with God in the creation and regulation of the world. See Ps 103 (104) 24; Prov 8:12-31.

XXIX 1-XXXI 40 Job's Last Speech to the Friends—g

The three main themes of this long speech occupy each one of the three chapters into which it is divided. In ch 29, Job wistfully recalls the days of his greatness and happiness with some account of the protection and solace which his position of power and influence enabled him to afford to the weak and needy (12-17). Ch 30 describes plaintively the contrast to this lost glory offered by his present sad condition. He has become an object of scorn and abhorrence to the meanest (1-12). He depicts his troubles, especially under warlike metaphors, and with allusion to pains in his bones (13-17). He complains that God has become cruel to him (18-23). Though he had been kind to the poor he has become sorely afflicted and an outcast (24-31). Ch 31, which is only loosely joined to the preceding, contains his 'negative confession'. He pleads his innocence of the many forms of wrong-doing which might have justified his sufferings and calamities. He has never been guilty of adultery, of injustice to his servants, of idolatry, of robbery. He still has complete confidence in the case he would like to put before the Almighty (33-37). He thus maintains to the end that his sufferings are entirely unmerited and are therefore inexplicable.

XXIX 1-25 Job recalls the Days of his Felicity and h Power—1. 'Job resumed his utterance.' 3. The lamp hanging in the living-room was the symbol of domestic peace. There was no darkness then in Job's life, always illuminated, as it was, by the light of God's favour. 4. HT 'in the days of my autumn', the time when fruits ripen, the time of maturity. 'when God protected my tabernacle', lit. 'put a screen over' reading kaph for daleth. 5b. 'my servants stood [from HT of 6*b*] round about me'. 6. 'with curds', a sign of luxury. The rock stands for the olive-presses which were often hewn out of the rock. 7. 'and in the square set up my seat'. Within the city-gate was an open space, the regular meeting-place of the citizens. Here business was transacted and justice administered. 8. 'hid themselves' is a hyperbole for 'made way for me' or 'effaced themselves' (Kissane). 21-25 belong here after 10. They continue the theme of the preceding verses and in their present position the verbs lack a subject. 21. Omit 'being attentive'. 22. 'dropped upon them' like a beneficent shower of rain. 23. The latter rains are the spring rains which are necessary for the growth of the crops. For these rains the earth eagerly opens its mouth and the figure is transferred to Job's listeners. 24. 'when I smiled at them, they could not believe it'. They looked on it as remarkable condescension on the part of so great a man. 'and the light of my countenance they did not diminish', lit. 'let fall'. They were unwilling in any way to displease Job. 'The light of the countenance' signifies benevolence and favour (cf. Ps 4:7). 25. Job was always a welcome and highly honoured guest. Omit 'when'. For the last clause read perhaps with Ball 'like a captain of thousands in the host'. 14. 'I put on justice as a garment and it was my covering; my judgement was like a mantle and a turban.' 16. 'the cause of him whom I knew not'. 18. 'I thought: I shall perish with my nest, I shall multiply my days like the phoenix.' DV 'palm tree', Gk φωινίς, points back to the ancient Jewish tradition that the allusion here is to the fabulously long life of the phoenix, which was supposed to perish with its nest. Possible is 'I shall die with my nestlings [cf. Deut 32:11], I shall multiply my days like the sand'. This would be a reference to the prologue. On the phoenix, see H. Heras, S.J., in CBQ 11 (1949) 263-79. 19b. 'and the dew 3291 shall abide in my branches'. 19 and 20 continue the reflection begun in 18. 20. 'My glory untarnished in my keeping and my bow prospering in my hand'. The bow is introduced here as a symbol of power (cf. Jer 49:35).

330a XXX 1-31 The Sad Contrast of Job's Present State—

The contrast is emphasized by the repetition of 'but now' (1, 9, 16). 2b-3a. 'Their vigour was perished within them through want and harsh dearth.' 3b-c. 'who gnawed roots [cf. Ball] in the wilderness, in the land (?) of devastation and desolation'. So with Vg 'gnawed', but more probably with LXX 'who fled into the wilderness'. Other short stichs are found in 5a and 19a, and the description of their rough food comes in 4. 'who plucked purslane leaves from the shrubs and whose food was the root of the broom' called by the Arabs relem (see Flinders Petrie, 29). To use these roots for fuel is normal with the Bedouin, and, as Dhorme remarks, such use would not be a sign of special hardship. They are not normally eaten, and the indigence of these miserable folk is shown by their being driven to use them for food. 5. 'They were driven forth from the community, while men set up a cry at them as at thieves (6) to take up their abode on the side of the wadies, in holes in the earth and among the rocks.' 7. 'Among the shrubs they uttered their raucous cries, and under the thistles they huddled together.' Perhaps 'they brayed', as if they were wild asses. For an interesting account of an Arab who preferred sleeping in the open whatever the weather, see Flinders Petrie, 30. 8. 'The sons of fools, the sons of nameless men, they were scourged out of the land'—a strong expression, but the passage is strongly worded. 11. 'When (God) loosened my bowstring and humbled me, they cast off the halter before me.' God as in 3:20; 30:18 is spoken of though not named. For the metaphor of the bow cf. 29:20. The unworthy men of 30:1 ff. took advantage of God's afflicting Job to throw off all restraint. The figure is that of a horse out of control. 12 is corrupt and may perhaps be emended to 'Against me his troops arise; they mound up their paths of destruction'. Job's calamities are the forces sent against him by God. Preparations for the siege alluded to in 14 are mentioned here. The causeways are mounded up with the purpose of procuring Job's destruction. 13. 'They have destroyed my path for my undoing; they mound up with none to restrain them.' 14. 'As through a wide breach they come on; in the din and crashing they roll on.' The noise (one word in HT) is the din of battle heightened by the falling masonry of the ramparts. 15a-b. 'Overwhelming terrors came upon me; as by the wind my noble estate is chased away.' 17b. 'my wasted skeleton doth not rest'; lit. 'bones with the flesh removed' as in Arabic—a different word from that used in 30:3. 18 is of doubtful meaning: 'With mighty power he seizeth [so LXX] my garment; he bindeth me as with the collar of my tunic.' The general sense is that God took violent hold of Job and bound him preparatory to 19: 'He cast me into the mire; and I am become like to dust and ashes', something to be disregarded and cast away. 22b. 'and tossed me in the roaring storm'. 23b. 'and to the dwelling appointed'. 24 is corrupt and uncertain. 'Assuredly against the lowly I did not put forth my hand, if in his calamity he called to me (25), but I wept for him whose fate was hard.' 27. DV 'have prevented me' is an archaic Latinism for 'have come to meet me'. 28. 'without comfort', adding nun. 'I arose crying aloud', reading b'gōli. This is almost necessary to explain in 29 the resemblance of Job's mournful cries to those of jackals and ostriches (Mic 1:8).

c XXXI 1-40 Job's Solemn Protestation of Innocence—

2. 'For what is the award of God above and the heritage of the Almighty in the heights?' This introduces 3, which gives the principle of retribution Job had always believed to hold good till his unmerited calamity came upon him. 6 is a parenthesis. 'my innocence'. 8. 'my produce', or crops, as shown by the parallelism. 12b. 'and would burn (tisrōp) all my increase'. 14. 'what should', etc.; conditional, in the hypothesis that Job had committed this heinous sin. 15b. 'form us'.

16b. 'of the widow languish'. 18. 'No, from his youth I brought him up [gadd'lennū] like a father and from his mother's womb I guided him', namely the orphan of 17. The quite improbable hyperbole of MT requires the change of the suffixes. 19. 'If I saw one perishing.' 20. 'his loins'. These are mentioned as the parts most in need of the warm clothing Job provided. 21b. 'when I saw my supporters at the gate' of the city, the meeting-place for all forms of business. 22b. 'let my arm be broken from its socket'. 23. 'For the fear of God was heavy upon me, and by reason of his majesty I was powerless'; reading yā'id with Driver. 24a. 'my trust'. 27a. 'and my heart in secret was seduced' to worship sun and moon as did the Babylonians. For kissing as an expression of worship cf. 3 Kg 19:18, Os 13:2. 28. 'That too would be a grievous crime, for I had been false to God above.' 30b. 'by demanding his life with a curse'. 31b. 'Who has not had his fill of flesh from his table', lit. 'of his flesh', of flesh from his flocks and herds. 33. Job has not been guilty of manifest sin, neither had he occasion like Adam to try to conceal wrong-doing (Gen 3:8) (34) 'because I dreaded a great clamour and the contempt of kinsmen terrified me and I remained quiet not going out of doors'. 35. 'Would that God would hear me; this is my desire that the Almighty would answer me and that mine adversary had written a scroll'; cf. Bi 30 (1949) 71 f. God is Job's adversary, or rather Job so conceives him, and it is still the sufferer's complaint that, though God's hand is heavy against him, no charge has been formulated, and he is left in ignorance of the accusation against him. If only, therefore, God would commit his case against Job to writing in a scroll. The meaning 'scroll', for which see Is 34:4, is indicated by 36b. So confident is Job of his innocence that any formulation of accusations against him would be an instrument redounding to his honour to be worn as an ornament. 37. 'The tale of my steps I would relate to him; as a prince I would present myself before him.' In 14:16 Job said that God was observing all his steps, i.e. his every action. A close scrutiny would reveal nothing amiss, and therefore he would come before God not with the shamefaced look of a criminal but with confidence marking his bearing. For the intransitive use of qereb cf. Ez 36:8. 38 f. 'the owners thereof'. Job has not robbed weaker men either of their hire, their land or its produce. 40. 'thorns . . . noxious weeds'. This is an unlikely ending to Job's final solemn protestation of innocence and it is probable that 38-40 are misplaced and should be read before 33.

XXXII 1-5 Introduction to Elihu's Discourse—This is an addition to the original poem (see § 317m). 1. That Job was just in his own eyes does not adequately explain why the friends should give no further answer, for he had maintained his innocence from the beginning. According to LXX, Sym. Syr., Job had now convinced them: 'for they deemed him to be just'. 2. Omit 'was angry and'. The town of Buz (Jer 25:23) appears to have lain in NW. Arabia near to Idumaea. 3. Omit 'reasonable'. 'had condemned Job': an ancient tradition of the Jews records that this is a correction of the Scribes (tigqun sopherim) introduced as certain others to avoid apparent irreverence, and that the original text was 'had condemned God', that is, were convinced that he was punishing Job without cause (cf. comm. on 1). 4. 'while they spoke with Job'. Omit 'that were speaking'.

6-XXXVII 24 Elihu's Speech—Out of respect for age

he, as the younger man, has remained silent (6-7), but in fact mere years do not impart wisdom, but the spirit of God, and therefore he too will speak (8-10). No satisfactory answer has been given to Job (11-13). Now they are silent, he will give voice to his wisdom and will certainly not use arguments like theirs (14-17). He feels an irresistible urge to speak and will do so without fear or favour (18-22). With solemnity he appeals to Job to listen to his words full of wisdom which comes to him from the Almighty. Let Job answer if he can (XXXIII:1-5). Job need not be afraid, as he is only a man like himself (6-7). He has 330f heard Job protest his innocence and assert that God nonetheless reckons him as an enemy (8-12). Why does he strive with God, who will answer never a word (13-14)? It is in dreams of the night that God makes his revelations to withdraw man from his evil way and so save him from the grave (15-18). Or God uses sickness to try to bring man back to a better mind (19-22). Then with the aid of a wise counsellor he can be saved, entirely rejuvenated, and received back into God's favour (23-26). And he confesses before men that he had sinned and that God had saved him from death (27-28). All this God is ready to do for man to save him from death (29-30). Job should listen and answer if he can (31-32). Let them listen and test the truth of his words (XXXIV:1-4). Job has asserted that he is innocent and that God has perverted judgement (5-6). Does any man but Job indulge in such mockery, Job who associates with the wicked and claims that man gains nothing by seeking good-will with God (7-9)? The Almighty is incapable of wickedness and he requites man according to his works (10-12). He is supreme and all life depends utterly on him (13-15). It is impossible that the ruler of the world should hate justice, he who reproves kings, gives no favour to princes and strikes the mighty. He watches all man's ways, and the wicked cannot hide from his gaze (16-22). He does not enter into controversy with men, but crushes the mighty for their wickedness in rejecting his allegiance and causing the cry of the weak to rise up to him (23-28). He is beyond the reach of any action of man's, and watches over nations and individuals alike (29-30). If a man confesses his sin and promises amendment, does Job think that God will punish? (31-33) Job does not speak with knowledge, but adds to his sin in multiplying words against God (34-37). God must take cognizance of evil. It is true that the good-living of man confers no benefit, as his evil deeds inflict no harm, on God. But man's acts do affect other men, and to that God cannot be indifferent (XXXV:1-8). Still God does not always intervene. Men cry out in affliction, but without thought of God (9-10). This is to cry out like animals, and men should know better. In these circumstances God cannot be expected to pay heed (11-12). Neither will God regard a foolish cry like Job's, who wants to dictate to God when to act and what to do (13-14). So Job's complaint that God does not punish the wicked is baseless (15-16). But Elihu finds that he has more to say in defence of God, who guards the rights of the weak and the just (XXXVI:1-7a). If kings whom he has set on their thrones grow proud, and he sets them in bondage, he makes them know their iniquity. If they give ear, they complete their days in prosperity; if not, they meet their end through lack of knowledge (7b-12). The impious do not cry for help, and they die in youth. The lowly God saves (13-15). These principles are applied to Job; only let him beware of returning to evil, which has been the cause of his affliction (16-21). Elihu breaks out into the praise of God. He is exalted, beyond the control of any power and beyond the comprehension of man (22-26). It is his power that is manifested alike in destructive flood and beneficent rain, in the poisoning of the clouds and in the lightning that proceeds from them (27-33). The terrors of thunder and of lightning are from him (XXXVII:1-5). Snow, rain, frost and lightning are all his ministers to carry out his will in missions whether of punishment or of mercy (6-13). What does Job understand of the marvels of God's creation? And what part has he in God's works? (14-18) 19-22a; see comm. Elihu ends with a doxology (22b-24).

331a XXXII 6-XXXIII 7 Elihu's Apology and Reasons for his Intervention—6. 'therefore out of respect I was afraid'. 8. 'Howbeit, the spirit of God is in men.' He insinuates that youth may be wiser than age, for, after all, wisdom comes from God, and his spirit is in young as well as old. In Gen 2:7 and Ps 103:30 the spirit or breath of God is the source of life. Elihu points out that it is also the source of wisdom. 9. Elihu does not mean that the aged are never wise, but that age alone does not confer wisdom—a polite hint that he does not find wisdom in the friends. 10. 'Therefore I say . . . I also will declare what I know.' 11b-c. 'I listened for your reasons while you sought out words.' 12. 'I gave you my attention, but . . .'. 13. 'Do not say, "We have discovered wisdom; God may rout him, but not man".' This agrees with 1 and 3; see comm. The friends had discovered unexpected wisdom in Job's answers and had been convinced. But they had not reckoned with Elihu's powers of argument. He will show them how it should be done. 14. 'I will not marshal talk like yours'; so with Syr., but lit. 'like these'. 16. 'And I waited because they speak not, because they stopped and have answered no more.' He waited patiently not only while they spoke, but even when they ceased to speak, he did not hold forth at once. He gave time for them to begin again. 17b. 'I too will declare what I know.' b 19b. 'like skins of new wine it is ready to burst'. He gives the same excuse for speaking as Eliphaz (4:2). 20a. 'Let me speak and have relief.' 21. 'It is not for me to show favour or to flatter any man.' 22. 'For I know not how to flatter; for a little may my Maker bear with me.' The last clause is commonly taken to mean that God would soon take me away in punishment, but it is unlikely that Elihu would think such a penalty proportionate to yielding to human respect. The words betray a knowledge on the author's part that God is soon to intervene himself. XXXIII 4 is not out of place. The thought is the same as that of 32:8. God in making man gave him of his own spirit and thereby not only life but also wisdom. 5b. 'marshal thy reasons before me; take thy stand'. 6. 'Behold I am like thee, not God; I too was made of a bit of clay.' 'not God', aleph omitted by haplography. This introduces 7 giving the reason why Job has no ground for fear. Before moulding his product the potter first squeezes a portion of clay from the lump. 7. 'Lo, fear of me shall not terrify thee, and my hand shall not be heavy upon thee.' The reference is to Job's words (9:34; 13:21). XXXIII 8-13 Ground for Criticism of Job—9 is not a quotation of Job's words. The same accusation had been made against him by Sophar (11:4). He had admitted ordinary human sinfulness (7:21; 13:26). He denied wickedness which would merit his sufferings (9:20; 10:7; 13:18; 16:18). 10. Omit 'because' and 'therefore'. 10b reproduces Job's words in 13:24b and 11, others in 13:27. 12. 'because God'. Read prob. with LXX and Ball: 'How canst thou say "Right is with me but I am not answered"? Will God strive with man?' This well introduces 13: 'Why dost thou strive against him, because he will not answer all thy words?'

14-30 How God speaks and works Man's Conversion d —14. God will not debate with man; his word is final; cf. 12 f., and see 40:5. 16b. 'and by admonition inspireth fear'; cf. LXX. 18. 'Holding his soul back from the pit and his life from passing to the grave.' For the rare word selah, which recurs 36:12, cf. Dhorme. God does not desire man's death; cf. 2 Kg 14:14; Ez 18:32; 33:11. The second method used by God for bringing men to a better frame of mind is introduced in 19, 'by suffering'. The particular form indicated is fever: 'when his limbs [lit. bones] tremble continuously'. 20. Omit 'in his life'. 21. 'is consumed away . . . are made bare'; present tense describing the course of the illness. 22. Better 'to the grave'. 'The destroyers' are otherwise unknown in this connexion. Perhaps we should emend to 'the home of the dead'. 23. The word mal'ak in Job occurs elsewhere only 4:18 where it means 'Angels', who are God's messengers, and (1:14) of a human messenger. This latter is the meaning here, as 'one among a thousand' signifies rarity (9:3, Eccles 7:29) and all Angels are competent to interpret God's purpose to man, but among men the gift is rare. 'an interpreter, one among a thousand'. This messenger-interpreter of God is a holy man, possibly a prophet. 'to declare to man his duty';

331e what he should do to be upright. 24. The holy man finds in the sinner signs of repentance, and prays for his recovery. This prayer is continued in 25: 'Let his flesh become fresher than in childhood; let him return to the days of his youth.' 26. 'To see the face of God' is the Heb. expression for approaching God's presence in his sanctuary (Ex 23:15; 34:20) [DV 'appear before me']. The verse is a good example of the Heb. habit of leaving a change of subject to be divined from the context. The sinner prays; God is gracious. The sinner approaches the divine presence; God forgives his sin. 27. 'look upon': perhaps 'he returns to' men from his bed of sickness. 'offended': 'I have perverted the right'. 29. 'Behold, all this God worketh twice and thrice with man.' God's patience and love are not exhausted by one effort; he makes many attempts to save man. For the arithmetical progression, see 5:19 comm. 30. 'from the grave'.

f 31-33 Job must listen or answer—Elihu is afraid neither of repetition (32:10; 33:1, 5) nor of proclaiming his knowledge and wisdom (32:10, 17; 33:3).

g XXXIV 1-37 Elihu refutes Job's Accusation that God perverts Justice—3. 'trieth': tests, examines; 'as the mouth'. A comparison already used by Job (12:11). 4. 'Let us examine [an Aramaism, cf. Is 48:10] for ourselves what is right . . . what is good.' 5. Elihu repeats Job's words from 27:2. See 33:9 comm. 6b. 'my wound [prefixing mem; DV 'arrow'] is sore though transgression there was none'. 9. 'What doth man profit by his good will with God?' Cf. 9:22-24; 21:7-15. 12. Omit 'in very deed' and read hinnām for 'omnām'. 13. 'Who hath given him charge of his earth or entrusted to him the whole world?' As supreme lord of the world it is not possible that he should be swayed by any unworthy motive to act unjustly. 14. 'If he take back his spirit to himself and gather his breath to him (15), all flesh alike expires and man returns to dust.' Read yāšib and omit 'his heart' introduced to make some sense after the misreading of yāšim. For God's breath giving life and its withdrawal bringing death see Gen 2:7, Ps 103:29 f.

h 17. 'Can he restore to health a hater of justice? And darest thou condemn the Mighty, the Just One?' (Bi 30 [1949] 73-5). This alludes to Job's repudiation of God's justice in governing the world (34:5). The absolute impartiality of God stressed in 18-19 shows that he cannot act against equity. And 20 emphasizes his power over potentates: 'In a moment they die and in the middle of the night they expire' (add yigwā'u omitted by haplography; Bi 30 [1949] 75-7). This is an allusion to the fate of the firstborn of Pharaoh at the hand of the destroying Angel who passed through Egypt at midnight (Ex 11:4 f.). 'He strikes nobles and they pass away; he removes the mighty by power unseen.' For this meaning of 'not by hand' cf. Lam 4:6, Dan 2:34; 8:25; divide yigga' šō'im. 22. 'and there is no obscurity'. Read 23-24 after 25: 'But he observes their doings; he overthrows them in the night and they are crushed.' The explanation of such sudden retribution is given in 23: 'For he does not appoint man a time to enter into judgement with God; (24) He breaketh the mighty without trial and makes others to stand in their stead.' For 'ōd read mō'ēd (mem omitted by haplography). 25 after 22. 27. 'Because they failed to follow him.' 29a-b. However, God does not always take action against the wicked as described in 24-28. He is the supreme Lord: 'If he remains inactive, who can condemn him? And if he hides his face, who can spy him out?' God's hiding his face is his not showing himself by intervention. 29c-30. The sense is uncertain and there is no agreement among commentators. Perhaps: 'He watcheth [yāhaz] over nation and individual that there may not reign a man perverting [m'aqqēš] the people.' Read 'godless', which prolongs this verse unduly, as subject of 31: 'When a godless man saith to God "I have been beguiled [nissē'it]; no more ['ōd] will I act corruptly (32), I have sinned, do thou teach me; if I have worked iniquity, I will do so no more". 33. Do you think he will requite it, seeing that you reject (the teaching of our fathers)?' Cf. Dhorme. Both the length of the verse and the sense seem to show that some similar words have been accidentally omitted. 'For thou must test [Aramaism as 34:4 comm.] the matter and not I; and what thou knowest, speak.' 34. 'Men of understanding will say to me and wise men who hear me: (35) "Job speaketh without knowledge and his words are without understanding".' 36. 'Howbeit ['bāl] let Job be tested to the end for his answers in the manner of wicked men.' 37. 'For he addeth to his iniquity; he mocketh rebelliously [pō'ēa'] in our presence; he multiplieth his words against God.'

XXXV 1-8 Refutation of Job's Assertion that Human Conduct does not concern God—2. 'Hast thou devised this as a plea and said "Right is with me [sādaqti with LXX, Vg] rather than with God"; (3) as thou sayest "How does it concern thee and what do I if I sin?"' Read with LXX 'ep'al im. Elihu now takes up Job's plea in 7:20 that even if he were guilty his acts could in no way affect God. 4. 'It is left to me to answer thee.' Lit. 'I, I will answer.' The friends had failed to do so. 7. 'what dost thou give him or what doth he receive of thy hand?' Elihu agrees that man's acts can neither harm nor benefit God, but goes on to point out the fallacy of Job's deduction that therefore God need not concern himself with human conduct. It affects other human beings and God's paternal care extends to all. 8b. 'thy just-doing may help a fellow mortal'.

9-16 Why God at times seems Deaf—9. 'The weight of oppression makes men cry out.' Elihu now answers Job's allegation made in 24:12. He admits the fact, but denies that it tells against God's moral government of the world, for men's cry is not a cry to God for help: (10) 'But they do not say, "Where is God who made us?"' Read the plural with Syr. This form of words, which appears strange to us as an appeal to God for help, occurs 4 Kg 2:14; Jer 2:6, 8. 'who giveth succour in the night' of affliction. 'Succour' as in Ex 15:2, Is 12:2. Night as figure of calamity as in Is 21:11. 11. An allusion to 12:7 f. and 18:3. The beasts can cry out in suffering, but have not the intelligence required to turn to God for help. 12. 'So it is they cry out unanswered.' 'So it is', in these circumstances. God does not answer the cries evoked by the cruelty of proud men because they are uttered without thought of him.

13-16 And God will not listen to Foolish Cries—13. 'Howbeit, God will not hear an empty plea and the Almighty will not regard it.' Not only must the cry for help be directed to God but it must be a plea founded in reason. 14. 'Much less when thou sayest thou canst not see him; the case is before him, and thou dost wait for him.' A reference to 23:8-10; 13:18. Attempts to dictate the manner and time of God's action are, of course, rebuffed. 15 is a further allusion to Job's accusations (21:7 ff.) and is taken up (36:7b-15). 'And now because he doth not make visitation in his wrath.'

XXXVI 2-15 Corrective Value of God's Visitation—3. 'I will take up my theme.' 4b. 'One perfect in knowledge is with thee.' Elihu is not modest, though the faultless knowledge he claims is limited to the subject in hand. 5. 'Lo, God is mighty and fainteth not, mighty in strength and wise of heart!' Read yimma'ēs (cf. 7:5; Ps 58:8), the root being parallel to ms. wah'kam omitted by haplography. 6a. 'He doth not suffer the wicked to live.' 7b. 'Doth he place kings on the throne and establish them for ever but they become exalted (8), then he putteth (šām) them bound in chains, caught in the bonds of affliction (9), and sheweth them their works and their transgressions in that they have acted proudly (10), and openeth their ear to correct them and biddeth them to return from iniquity.' 11. 'If they listen and submit, they accomplish their days in prosperity and their years in delights.' 12. 'But if they listen not, they pass away to the grave [cf. on 33:18] and expire through lack of knowledge.' 7b-c forms the protasis, 8-10 the apodosis and 11-12 give the consequence. The poet refers to the exile and restoration of Manasses (2 Par 33:6, 11-13) and to the fate of Joakim (2 Par 36:5 f.), of Joachin (4 Kg 24:9, 15; 2 Par 36:9 f.) and of Sedecias 332d (4 Kg 24:19; 25:7; Jer 52:11). 13. 'The goddess of heart cherish wrath.' Instead of benefiting by God's chastisement they are embittered against divine providence. 14. 'in youth'. As soul and life are synonymous, the meaning is that the goddess die young and unregretted. There is no need to press the parallelism in the sense that the male temple prostitutes proverbially died young. These adjuncts of pagan worship were held in contempt by decent Israelites; cf. Deut 23:17 (18); 3 Kg 14:24; 15:12; 22:47; 4 Kg 23:7. 15. 'He delivers the afflicted through their affliction and opens their ear by means of distress.' Again the valuable lesson of the divinely intended medicinal efficacy of suffering.

16-21 Application of this Teaching to Job—The following lines have been imperfectly transmitted, but may be emended as follows. 16. 'Yea, he enticeth thee out of affliction into broad unstraitened spaces and to repose with thy table laden with good things.' For the Hebrew wide spaces symbolized freedom and well-being as for us straits symbolize trouble and distress. 17. 'Thou shalt judge the cause of the wicked and thy hands shall uphold justice.' 18. 'Watch lest thou be seduced by wealth and let not great ransom turn thee aside.' This exhortation insinuates the wrongs Elihu thinks Job must have committed in the administration of justice. 19. 'Is thy welfare to be compared to gold and the power of riches?' This consideration reinforces the foregoing exhortation. Mere riches do not spell happiness. 20. 'Crush not strangers that thy kinsfolk may mount up in their place.' So Kissane, Saydon. 21. 'Beware lest thou turn to iniquity for on that account thou hast been tested by calamity.'

22-XXXVII 22 Elihu's Doxology—22b. 'There is no teacher his equal.' Vg adopted the specialized sense of teacher of the Torah; hence 'law-giver'. But the reference is to the admonition God gives by tribulation (7-15). 23a. 'Who shall call him to account for his actions?' 24. 'Remember that thou shouldst extol his work which men have made the theme of song.' 25. 'All mankind doth gaze thereon; every one beholdeth from afar.' For the wonders of God's works Elihu has in mind are those of the skies. 27. 'When he releaseth [yipra'] the drops of water, they pour forth as destruced rain (28) and what the clouds send down falls on the land in showers.' Water released directly from the celestial ocean (Gen 1:7; Ps 148:4) comes down with destructive force as at the time of the Flood; dropped from the clouds it is beneficent rain. 29-30 after 31, which according to the sense follows 28. 31. 'For by these [destructive downpours and beneficent rain] he executeth judgement on the peoples and giveth food in abundance'. 29. 'Yea who [so Syr] understandeth the poisoning of the clouds, the elevation of his pavilion.' The suspension of the heavy, water-laden clouds in the air was mysterious to the ancients. The heavenly firmament is God's pavilion. Some exegetes introduce thunder here, but this is the subject of 37:1 ff. where it has its own solemn introduction. 30. 'Lo, he spreads his light thereon and covers its roots with the sea.' Light is one of God's marvellous creatures. As man looks up, he sees its brightness on the whole firmament. This was thought to be solid (Gen 1:6 f.; Job 37:18). Its supporting walls resting on the horizon had their 'roots' (cf. the roots of the mountains, 28:9) down in the ocean. Similarly of the mountains in Jon 2:7. 32. 'He covereth his hands with light and giveth it command against the mark.' God at his will sends forth lightning conceived as a condensed and, of course, destructive form of light. 33. Elihu now alludes, I think, to the destruction of Job's shepherds and flocks by lightning. Read, with redivision of the consonants: yegaddēa k'ro'im miqneh pā'al 'olāh. 'It cutteth down the shepherds; of the flock it maketh a holocaust.' See 1:16, and for reason. supporting the translation of 27-33 Bi 30 (1949) 77-89. XXXVII begins with the fear and wonder inspired by thunder which were the greater the less its physical cause was understood. 2. 'the rumbling of his voice'. Thunder is spoken of as the voice of God. 3. 'He sendeth it forth under all the heavens and his lightning to the ends of the earth.' 4. 'After it his voice doth roar . . . he doth not hold back the flashes when his voice is heard.' Supply b'rāqim omitted by haplography. 6b suffers from dittography: 'and the downpour of rain to be violent' ('ōzū). 7. Omit 'hand' and read b'ad. By severe weather God keeps men at home and puts a stop to their work abroad. 8 gives a further effect of the storm. 9. 'Out of its store-chamber' (cf. Ps 134:7) in the South, whence came heat (37:17) and storms (Is 21:1; Zach 9:14). 10b. 'and the broad waters are frozen'. 11. 'Yea, the clouds hurl flashes [b'rāqim]. 'light' here is 'lightning'. 12. 'And all around it [the lightning] turneth and followeth the course [yithallēk omitted by haplography] of his direction.' 13. 'If it be for a scourge, it fulfils his pleasure [y'mallē 'āšōn]; if for mercy, it attains its goal.' 15. 'Dost thou know of God's laying his charge upon them [the elements mentioned above] and how his clouds flash forth the light?' 16. 'Hast thou knowledge of the poisoning of the clouds, of the marvels of the All-knowing?' 17b. 'when the south wind turns all sultry?' The unpleasant heat is a sign of man's impotence against the powers of nature. 19b. 'in the darkness of ignorance we cannot marshal speech'. LXX: 'and we will cease from marshalling words'. 20. 'Must it be told him that I speak? Or can one say that he must be informed?' God is omniscient. The words seem to reflect confidence that God will act on what is said and intervene. 21-22a. 'Just now the light could not be seen; it was obscured by the clouds. But a wind hath passed and cleared the sky; from the north cometh a golden sheen.' The brightness heralds the approach of God. The springing of the light from the north is no reflection of meteorological fact or fancy but a poetic allusion to the ancient idea that the seat of divinity was in that far unknown region; cf. Is 14:13. 22b-23. 'About the godhead is awe and majesty; Shaddai we have not found. Manifold in power and judgement and a righteous cause he will not pervert.' God is about to manifest himself, but human attempts to come into direct contact with him are vain. 24. 'Therefore men should reverence him; he will not regard those wise in their own esteem.'

XXXVIII 1-XXXIX 32 Yahweh's First Discourse— 332a God does not explain the reasons why he allows the innocent to suffer. The approach to the problem is indirect. By repeated examples God brings home to Job the lesson of divine omnipotence and omniscience and by contrast man's puny strength and feeble intellect. Who then is Job or any man that he should presume to sit in judgement on God's government of the world? It is for man humbly to acknowledge God's wisdom and to submit to his providence trusting, though he may not understand, that all is for the best. The questions addressed to Job are of those unanswerable by the science of the day. In our time a different series would be substituted, but with the same result. Who can say what is the electricity which warms and lights our homes? Who can say what is gravity which makes the apple fall to the ground? And who can explain the simple fact that damp cold is felt more keenly than dry? Where was Job when God established the world and its laws? (4-11) What power has he over the dawn and what does he know of the ocean depths, of the abode of the dead, even of the wide earth (12-18)? Of the mysteries of light and darkness, of snow and hail, of rain, lightning and thunder, frost and ice (19-30)? What power has Job over the constellations, lightning, clouds (31-38)? And can Job provide food for lion and raven (39-41)? What does he know of the life-story of the mountain-goat (XXXIX:1-4)? Can he control the wild ass (5-8) or the wild ox (9-12)? The wonders of God's creation are illustrated by the ostrich (13-18), the horse (19-25), the hawk and the eagle (26-30). The whole ends with God's challenge to Job (31 f.).

XXXVIII 1-38 The Contrast between Divine and Human Power and Knowledge—1. The storm or storm-wind is symbolic of God's majesty. So also Ez 1:4, and cf. the thunder and lightning of Sinai (Ex 19:16, 18). The golden splendour heralding the 333b divine approach was only momentary. 2. 'Who is this that darkeneth counsel with wordy ignorance?' 7. The stars of morning occur only here. Night was symbolic of sorrow and disaster and therefore a time unsuitable for the joyous ceremony of laying the foundation-stone of the earth (cf. Esd 3:10). For the personification cf. Ps 18 (19) 2 f.; 95 (96) 11 f.; 97 (98) 7 f. The sons of God are the angels as 1:6, etc. Note that here the stars have been created before the earth exists. The chronological sequence of Gen 1 was understood to be schematic and artistic only. 13. It is the light of dawn arising in the distant east that takes hold of the extremities of the earth; and thereupon the wicked, who have plied their trade by night, must retire to their lairs (cf. 24:15-17). 14. With the coming of light the earth 'is transformed as clay under the seal'. All the fair colours of which night had robbed it, are restored. c Not only are the trees, shrubs and plants 'the garment' of the earth, but like a garment they are of beautiful hues. 15. By 'their light', it seems, must be understood the night which the wicked have turned into their day. And with the coming of dawn the arm of the wicked loses its power. Grave sins, conscious and defiant, are said to be committed with 'a high hand' (cf. § 203c). 16. 'Hast thou gone to the sources of the sea?' where it wells up from the subterranean ocean, referred to in 8. 17. The entrance to Sheol, the realm of the dead. 18. 'tell me, if thou knowest it all'. 19. Light and darkness were conceived as two beings succeeding each other over the surface of the earth. But where did the absent one go? To this question Job must know the answer (20), God implies ironically, 'for thou canst take them to their bounds and discernest the paths to their dwelling'. 21. 'Thou knowest, for then wert thou born and the tale of thy days is long.' Crushing irony! As if Job were as old as the first day of creation when the world was planned and measured and every creature was assigned its place (4-11). 22. Where the storehouses of hail and those of snow lay the primitive science of the day did not even attempt to define. It was not suspected that they are forms of frozen 'rain'. These, God says (23), 'I hold in reserve for times of trouble'. By heavy hail God aided Josue's defeat of the five kings (Jos 10:11; cf. Ps 17:14; Is 30:30). 24. Probably 'mist' (DV 'light') with LXX. The heat is that brought and spread by the sultry east wind. d The purpose of rain was conceived as either beneficent or destructive (37:27 f., 31) and therefore rain on the uninhabited desert was mysterious. 27b. Add 'from arid ground' (miššiyāh for māsā). 30a. 'They are hidden as with stone.' 31b. 'or canst thou loosen the bonds of Orion?' The three stars at his waist were judged to bind him to the sky. 32. Mazzaroth, a conspicuous star or constellation noted for its rising and setting, is probably Venus (so Vg 'Lucifer' and DV 'the day star'), Schiaparelli 74 ff. There is doubt about the last constellation (DV 'evening star'). If 'and guide the Bear with her children', the latter will be the three stars appended to the quadrilateral. If it is the Hyades, then the children are the minor stars which surround Aldebaran. 33b. 'Or dost thou establish its rule over the earth?' as exercised by sun and moon (Gen 1:16-18). 34. Job cannot issue orders to the clouds 'that they answer thee with abundance of water' (with LXX). In 35 omit 'will they return'. 'Here we are', thy servants ready to do thy bidding. 36. Prob. the ibis (DV 'the heart of man') is intended; so Dhorme. It was credited with wisdom as able to foretell the Nile floods, and was sacred to Thoth, the god of wisdom and of writing. The wisdom of the cock is shown by its skill in forecasting the coming of dawn. 37. 'Whose is the wisdom to spread out the clouds and who pours out the waterskins of heaven (38) when the soil is hard and caked and the clods cleave together?' 'spread out', i.e. yiprōs = yiprōs. e 39-XXXIX 32 The Ignorance and Feebleness of Man illustrated from the Animal World—39-41. It is God alone who can and does feed all the multitude of the beasts and birds (Ps 146:9), a simple but telling thought to which man seldom adverts. XXXIX:1. A coloured illustration of the mountain-goat or ibex, which chooses for its dwelling remote rocky regions seldom visited by man, may be seen in H. B. Tristram, The Flora and Fauna of Palestine (1884) 6. 3b. 'they cast their little ones' (lit. 'they put forth their conceptions'). The emphasis is on the ease and speed of the delivery. 9-12 treat of the wild ox or buffalo which is still found in Palestine. 12. Couldst thou trust him to return and gather thy seed into thy barnfloor? 13-18. The Ostrich—13. 'There is joy in the wing of the ostrich, gracious in feather and plumage.' MT may be so translated with 'em for 'im. But the ostrich has rudimentary wings which could not be singled out for praise. But emended with Kissane in the light of Vg: 'Is the wing of the ostrich like the pinion of the stork or the hawk?' This gives the reason for 14: 'For she must leave her eggs on the ground and hatches them on the soil.' It is stated sometimes that the ostrich leaves the incubation of the eggs entirely to the warmth of the sun. In fact, the task is shared by the hen with the cock bird. 16b. 'She has no concern for the frustration of her labour.' 18. Though the presence of an unknown word in a makes the exact sense doubtful, b shows the sense to be that in flight she easily outstrips pursuers. 19-25 The Horse—19b. 'Canst thou clothe his neck with its mane?' Dhorme has pointed out that the root meaning of r'm is 'commotion', 'trembling', and that its application to thunder with its noise is secondary. Hence here prob. 'quivering' mane'. 20. 'Canst thou make him leap like the locust?' His majestic snorting inspireth terror. 21. 'He paweth the ground in his might; he rejoiceth in his strength as he goeth forth to meet the weaponed host.' 'Might' is a meaning recovered from Ugaritic. 22a. 'He laugheth at fear and is not dismayed.' 23. 'On him.' 24b. 'nor will he stand quiet when the trumpet soundeth'. 26-30. Birds of prey. 27. Senacherib describes an inaccessible fortress as 'the nest of an eagle, the prince among birds'. 28. The eagle dwells 'in the crags and fastnesses'. 29-30 speak of the marvellous speed with which birds of prey alight from out of sight on fallen bodies; cf. Mt 24:28. XXXIX 33-35 Job's Submission (= MT 40:1-5) f —35. 'Once have I spoken, but I will not answer [cf. 32b], and twice but I will add no more.' g XL 1-XLI 25 God's Second Discourse—(MT 40:6-41:26). 334a God first reproaches Job with making light of the divine justice in order to maintain his own innocence (3) and then reminds him in various ways of his impotence (4-9). God's wisdom and power, on the one hand, and man's weakness on the other are then illustrated by the wonderful qualities of and man's inferior strength compared to the hippopotamus (10-19) and the crocodile (20-41:25). 1-9 Job's Weakness—2 is repeated from 38:3. 4. 'like b God's . . . like his'. Thunder coming from the heavens was thought of as the voice of God (37:2, 4). 5b. 'and clothe thyself with glory and splendour'. 7b. 'where they stand'—on the spot. All this is irony. Job knows that these feats surpass his strength, but are easy to the power of God. 8b. 'imprison them in gaol'. 9. 'Then [if Job prove equal to the tasks proposed] I also will praise thee, for . . .'. 10-19 The Hippopotamus—Ancient accounts may be e read in Herodotus 2, 71 and Pliny Hist. Nat. 8, 25 f. 11b. 'his force in the thaus of his belly'. 12b. 'the sinews of his thighs are close-knit'. 13b. 'his frame like bars of iron'. 14b. 'he was made the leader of his fellows' (with consonantal change into nōgēs). 15. 'The mountain beasts stare at him [in fear and wonder]; he laughs at the beasts of the field [in scorn]'. Cf. Assyrian bīlu 'quadruped, wild animal' and read l'kol . . . yīḥaq. 16a. 'He reclinieth under the lotus'. 17a. 'The shadow of the lotus trees screeneth him.' 18. 'If the river overwhelms him, he has no care, nor fear at a stream in spate.' 19. Ball and Dhorme suggest a reference to the method which Herodotus (2, 70) records to have been used in Egypt, of easily overpowering a crocodile's resistance by first smearing its eyes with mud. But this was done

d 20-XLI 25 The Crocodile (Leviathan) (MT 25-41:26)—Ancient accounts in Herodotus 2, 68-70 and Pliny, Hist. Nat. 8, 25 f. 21. 'ring': so also Theodotion; others 'cord'. 'buckle': hook or fetter. 25a. 'Can the dealers make trade with it?' 26. 'Canst thou fill his hide with barbs or his head with fish-spears?' 27c. 'Thou wilt not do it again.' Read 28 (= MT 41:1) after XLI:1: 'Is he not fierce when aroused? Who dare stand before him?' 40:28. 'even at the sight of it he is cast down': his courage will fail him. 41:2. 'Who hath faced him and been scatheless? Under the wide heavens there is none.' 8. 'I will not be silent about his members and will tell of his unequalled strength.' 4. 'Who can strip off his garment or penetrate his double mail?' 5. The portals of his face stand for his jaws. No need for emendation. 6. 'His back is of channelled shields, shut in by a wall of flint' (read hōmaš for hōām). 9. 'His snorting flasheth light', the spray cast up glittering in the bright sunlight. 'The reddish eyes of the crocodile appear gleaming through the water before the head appears above the surface. In the Egyptian hieroglyphics the dawn is denoted by the crocodile's eyes' (Driver). 10-12 give a poetic picture of the shining spray thrown up as the animal rises to the surface. 13b. Dismay spreads at his approach. 14. 'The folds of his flesh are solid: firm-set upon him, it shaketh not' (Ball). 15b. 'firm as the nether millstone'. 16. 'the billows are in dread, the breakers of the sea take to flight' (so prob.). 17b. 'the spear glanceth from his breast-plate'. 19. Arrow (DV 'archer'). 20. 'Hammer': uncertain, perhaps 'club'. 'to scorp the hurtling javelin'. 21. 'Under him are the sharpest of potsherds; he stretcheth himself like a threshing-sledge on the mire.' His sharp scales are compared to the pointed pieces of basalt or other hard stone fixed under a wooden sledge and drawn by oxen over the corn to break up the straw and thresh out the grain—an instrument still in use among the Arabs. 22b. 'and maketh the sea like an ointment-pot' as the water is lashed into foam at his passage. 23b. 'The deep has the look of a hoary head.' 25a means as it stands that he is unconcerned no matter what he sees, but prob. 'all that is mighty feareth him' ('ōfō . . . ytrā').

e XLII 1-6 Job's Submission—3a is taken with some variation from 38:2 and 4b from 38:3b. They could not possibly be uttered by Job in the present context as expressing his own mind, and there is no point in Job's repeating them as quotations of God's words. Moreover 4a is composed of fragments of Elihu's speech (33:1, 31) and is also quite out of place. 3a and 4 are therefore seen to be interpolations. God did not convict Job of sin nor assert that his calamities were merited. He demonstrated the weakness and ignorance of man and of Job in particular and at the same time the power and wisdom of the godhead. It is useless for man to fight against God, and whatever God does is wisely done. Job humbly confesses that he has learnt both lessons, the omnipotence of God (2) and that his failure, his inability to understand the wisdom of God's government is due to the limitation of his own powers (3). 334e

7-9 The Friends do Penance—7. The rebuke is addressed to Eliphaz as the oldest and the leader of the three. Elihu is disregarded—a further indication that his discourse was not part of the original composition (cf. § 317m). The whole burden of their speeches has been that suffering is always the punishment of wrongdoing and that therefore Job has been guilty. They are told that they have not spoken aright and their theology of suffering is repudiated. From this it does not follow that sin is never punished by suffering in this world; but it is wrong for man to sit in judgement on his neighbour and condemn him as guilty on the ground of his afflictions. 8. 'I will pay regard to him and not treat you severely.' Moral wrongness not only in act but in thought and speech does merit chastisement, and the friends have done wrongly in obstinately maintaining their view against the evidence, but the intercession of a just (and maligned but forgiving) man has great power with God. Note the number 7, especially sacred among the Hebrews (cf. Gen 21:30, etc.).

10-16 Job's Reward and Subsequent Prosperity—10. 'Yahweh restored the fortunes of Job when he prayed for his friends.' Not only did Job's prayer avail to avert God's indignation from the friends, but brought a great reward to himself. His prayer was an act of selfless forgiveness, by which he put away all rancour from his heart at a time when he did not yet know how God was about to restore his fortunes. 11. Job's relations recover their affection as he recovered his prosperity. 'ewe': LXX 'lamb' and so Ibn Ezra, but most understand of metal means of payment (elsewhere only Gen 33:19 = Jos 24:32). 13. Prob. 'fourteen' sons (a dual form = 'twice-seven'). Everything was doubled except the number of daughters. 'For the oriental it is the sons who count: daughters are not wealth' (Dhorme). 14. The daughters were named Yemima (Jemima), Qes'a and Qeren-happūk, equivalent to Dove, Fragrance (from cassia, cf. Ps 44:9), Beauty (lit. horn of antimony, used for beautifying the eyes; see on Jer 4:30). 15. According to Hebrew law a daughter had a right to her father's inheritance only in the absence of sons (Num 27:8), but Job was not a Hebrew. His wealth was so great that his daughters could be admitted to a share without detracting from the shares due to the sons. 16. If LXX is right here is assigning the age of 70 to Job at the time of his visitation, he lived to enjoy the doubled fortune granted to him by God thereafter for twice as long as he had enjoyed prosperity before calamity came upon him. The principle of retribution is shown in action and is thereby re-affirmed. But the story of Job has modified the accepted principle in one important respect—all suffering is not punishment of sin. A just man may be visited by grievous misfortune as a divinely intended test of his virtue; and if the sufferer's virtue emerges purified from the crucible—Job never lost his inmost conviction of God's justice (23:7; 31:35)—his endurance of calamity and suffering is itself rewarded generously.

335a Introduction—The inspired hymnal of the OT, known as the Psalter, was taken over by the Christian Church not only as part of the sacred Scriptures but also as her hymn-book. Her divine Founder had made quotations from it, had used it in prayer, and had explained it to his disciples, Mt 5:4; 7:23; 21:16, 42; 26:30; 27:46; Lk 24:44. His followers imitated his example, Ac 1:20; 2:25–28, 30, 34 f.; 4:11, 25 f. 335a SS. Paul and James both advised the faithful to use the psalms in community worship, Eph 5:19; Col 3:16; Jas 5:13. From that time onward the inspired hymns became an important part of the Church's prayers. Describing the funeral of St Paula, St Jerome tells us how the psalms were chanted by the clergy, 'now in Greek, now in Latin, and now in Syriac; and this not only during the three days that elapsed before she was buried beneath the church and close to the cave of our Lord, but throughout the remainder of the week' (Letter 108:30). From the same writer we learn that the psalms chanted in the churches were also sung in the fields: 'the toiling reaper sings psalms as he works, and the vine-dresser, as he prunes his vines, sings one of David's songs' (Letter 46:12). Before long, not only the clergy but the laity also could recite the Psalter by heart. When the times of persecution were passed away, the Church at Rome instituted the public recitation of the psalms at the canonical hours of prayer. St Benedict (†547) founded his monastic office on the Roman usage; and these two offices—the Roman and the Benedictine—became the sources of the breviary which every cleric in major orders is now bound by law to recite (Codex Juris Canonici, can 135).

Hebrew Poetry—For the proper understanding of the psalms something must be known about the principles and structure of Hebrew poetry. Like all other peoples the Hebrews had their poets—profane and religious. Quotations from the profane poetry crept into the sacred writings; cf. Gen 4:23 f.; Num 21:17 f., 27–30; Is 23:16. The psalms are religious poems of the character of lyrics. As the Greek title of the whole collection indicates, they were sung with musical accompaniment—psallein means to play on a stringed instrument. Many of them were, in the first instance, private prayers; some were composed for public worship; others were votive offerings—hymns of thanksgiving sung at the sanctuary or temple after escape from danger or persecution. Eventually all became liturgical hymns. See my article in DbR (July 1928) 95 ff.

The distinctive feature of Hebrew poetry is parallelism, that is, the repetition of the same thought in different words. It is not peculiar to Hebrew verse since it is found in Babylonian and Egyptian poems. See further § 313e–f.

Hebrew poetry has no metre (see § 313g–h) in the classical sense of the term. See Castellino, Il Ritmo ebraico nel Pensiero degli Antichi, Bi 15 (1934) 505–16. The qinah or 'dirge' measure occurs in the Psalter only in 18:8 ff.; 83, which two psalms, curiously enough, are not dirges at all. Often there is a lack of uniformity in the same poem, so much so that some writers come to the conclusion that the Hebrew poets delighted in irregular metre, while others distort the text in order to force it into regular metre, with the result that they 'merely render hideous that which is beautiful' (*Margoliouth, Relations between Arabs and Israelites, 43). 'We are still far from fully understanding the rules of Hebrew accentuation', wrote *George Adam Smith in 1910 (The Early Poetry of Israel, 12)—words that still hold good. All that we know for certain is that there is a rhythmic accentuation 835d in the poetry. Eerdmans, 13, is right when he says: 'Metric studies do not give a reliable foundation for text-emendations'.

- Were the original psalms divided into strophes? This question cannot be answered with certainty. An affirmative answer is suggested by the occurrence of refrains in some of the hymns (41, 42, 45, 48, 55, 56, 58, 79, 98, 106, 143), yet a refrain does not necessarily indicate the end of a strophe. Modern translators usually divide the psalms into strophes or stanzas; but it has yet to be demonstrated that all Hebrew poetry was originally strophic. For a criticism of Condamin's Poèmes de la Bible, avec une introduction sur la strophique hébraïque (1933), see M.-J. Lagrange in RB 43 (1934) 128-32. The presence of Sela at the end of a line has been regarded by some writers as indicating the end of a strophe, but its meaning and purpose are quite uncertain. St Marcella wrote to St Jerome to inquire the meaning of the word. In his reply, St Jerome enumerated the explanations given by commentators—change of metre, pause for breath, change of meaning, a musical direction, and gave his own preference for Aquila's del 'for ever' (Letter 28). Thus it would be a kind of ejaculation, like Amen, with which, indeed, it is coupled in a synagogue inscription of the 4th or early 5th cent. A.D. (*Sukenik, The Ancient Synagogue of El-Hammeh, 41). From the root-meaning of the word, 'lift up', some modern writers favour one of the explanations mentioned by St Jerome, viz. a musical direction, indicating either that the music is to become forte, or that the voice is to be raised for the blessing; cf. Dom Hugh Bévenot, RB 42 (1933) 510 f. Proof that the term was not used to mark the end of a stanza is found in the fact that although it occurs in thirty-nine psalms and three times in Hab 3 it is nowhere else found in the Bible. See further § 319-4.

There is no evidence to show that the Hebrew poets intentionally used rhyme. In the few instances to be found it is accidental rather than deliberate. On the other hand, some psalms are deliberately alphabetical: either each line begins with a successive letter of the alphabet (110, 111), or each distich (24, 33, 144), or each quatrain (9, 36), while in 118 the eight lines of each section have the same letter and the whole alphabet runs down the entire psalm. See also § 313k.

- f Numbering of Psalms—In MT and Vg there are 150 psalms. The LXX and Syr. versions add a 151st, telling of the victory of David over Goliath. The numbering of the psalms in MT does not tally with that in LXX; hence the disagreement between the Catholic versions (which follow LXX) and the Protestant versions (which follow MT). The following table indicates the discrepancies:

LXX, Vg, DV	MT, AV, RV
1-8	1-8
9	9, 10
10-112	11-113
113	114, 115
114, 115	116
116-145	117-146

MT and the versions dependent upon it are wrong in dividing 9 (Vg), for, although some of the initial letters have been lost through textual corruption, the psalm was originally alphabetical. Both traditions are wrong in reading 41, 42 (Vg) as two psalms, for the common refrain indicates a unity. External evidence favours the unity of 113 (Vg), but internal evidence suggests the division. MT is probably correct in reading one psalm for Vg 114, 115; on the other hand it is preferable to read two psalms 146, 147 (Vg) instead of one 147 (MT). The Jews divided the Psalter into five books, probably in imitation of the Pentateuch, Vg 1-40; 41-71; 72-88; 89-105; 106-150. Each book closes with a doxology, ending with So be it, so be it, except the fifth book, where some commentators regard the last psalm as itself the doxology; more probably, however, none was added because it was not known whether the canon of Scripture (at least as far as inspired hymns were concerned) was closed. At the end of the second book a colophon was added: 'The praises (or, prayers) of David, son of Jesse, are ended'. This shows that the present arrangement is not original, since other psalms, attributed to David, are found in later books. Further evidence of re-arrangement is seen in the repetition of psalms; thus 13 re-occurs as 52 in the second book; 39:14-18 is reproduced as 69; 56: 8-12 reappears as 107:2-6; and 59:7-14 is found again as 107:7-14. All this points to editorial manipulation. An editor also seems to have altered the divine names: for example, when 13 reappears as 52 the name Elohim is substituted for Yahweh. In the first book Yahweh occurs 272 times (MT) and Elohim 15 times (exclusive of titles); in the second book Elohim predominates—164 times against 30; in the third book the names are almost equally distributed—44 and 43; the fourth and fifth books employ Yahweh exclusively, except when 56 and 59 are repeated, and in 143:9.

Titles—Most of the psalms have titles or superscriptions. The meaning of many of these is far from certain. What is surprising is that, as far back as the 2nd cent. B.C., the Jews translating the Psalter into Greek at Alexandria faced the same difficulty over the titles as we do today, and, presumably, the rabbis at Jerusalem were unable to shed any light on the problems. As obscurity had enveloped many of these titles at so early a date, they must have represented a tradition of venerable antiquity. On this score they deserve our respectful attention and should not lightly be set aside as valueless; cf. § 49b-c.

The meaning of some of the title-words is known. They are as follows. Mizmor (57 times) means a hymn sung to the accompaniment of a stringed instrument. Hence it is the proper word for a psalm, indicating more than šir or širāh (18 times), which simply means a song. Five times we meet ṭ'pillāh, which is rightly translated a prayer, but only once ṭ'hillāh, meaning praise, although the plural of this word gives the Hebrew title of the whole Psalter. N'gīnōt (7 times) means stringed instruments. So much for titles the meanings of which are not in doubt; but the following are all disputed.

Above no less than 55 psalms is the word lamnaṣṣeah, found nowhere else in the Bible except Hab 3:19. Vg, following LXX eis τὸ τῆδος, translates in funem, but Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion and St Jerome adopt the Aramaic meaning of the word—victory or victor. Several modern writers, relying on the use of the verb in 1 Par 23:4; 2 Par 2:2, 18; 34:12; Esd 3:8, think that the reference is to the overseer of the music—the choirmaster or conductor or bandmaster or soloist. BDB's interpretation, viz. that psalms with this title were taken over by an editor from an older Psalter known as the 'Director's Collection' is not more than a conjecture. How could Hab 3 belong to this Psalter?

Maskil, Vg intellectus or ad intellectum (13 times); miktām, Vg tituli inscriptio (6 times); 'el-hann'hilōt, DV 'for her that obtaineth the inheritance', Ps 5; šiggāyōn, DV 'a psalm' (Ps 7; cf. § 540r); 'al mūt labbēn, DV 'for the hidden things of the Son', Ps 9; 'al-mah'laṭ, DV 'For Maeloth', St Jer. per chorum (Ps 52, followed by ṭ'annōt, DV 'to answer', St Jer. ad praecinendum at the head of 87) all await solution; so also does the long expression 'For a people that is removed at a distance from the sanctuary' (LXX, Vg, DV), for which St Jerome has 'For the dumb dove because it (or, David) may have gone far away', Ps 55; Eerdmans' idea that it refers to a carrier-pigeon, sent to the temple, is unlikely.

Other terms are not quite so inexplicable. Some modern commentators, depending on a statement in the Targum, suppose that 'al-haggittit (3 times) has reference to a musical instrument invented in the 336 town of Gath; but the ancient versions are probably right in reading 'for the presses' or 'winepresses' (DV 8, 80, 83), associating the psalm with the vintage. There is reason to suppose that 'al-'alāmōt, DV 'for the hidden', Ps 45, means 'for boys' soprano voices'. In what sense Ps 59 was to teach (DV 'for doctrine') is not clear; cf. 2 Kg 1:18. Nowadays it is generally agreed that what are called Gradual psalms (DV 119-133) were pilgrimage psalms, songs of ascent, because they were sung by the pilgrims 'going up' to Jerusalem for the great festivals; cf. 1 Kg 1:3; Is 30:29; Ps 121:4. When we recite St Ambrose's homily on a feast of many martyrs we say: 'Pro octava enim multi inscribuntur psalmi'. Actually for the octave is only found above Pss 6, 11. Some commentators think that the reference is to the scale of an octave, but it is very doubtful whether Hebrew music used the octave, since the primitive type of Arabian music known to us is not based on eight tones; there were, however, eight-stringed instruments (cf. 1 Par 15:21), and to these the term in the title may refer.

Some modern writers think that they can detect names of popular melodies in the superscriptions. Above 21 (DV) we read 'for the morning protection', but St Jerome translated correctly from the Hebrew: the kind of the morning, which, according to some, including NP (2nd edit.), was the tune to which the psalm was sung. This, however, is not more than a conjecture; by a slight correction Agelli renders the phrase 'at break of day' (cf. Gen 32:24 (25); Jg 19:25; 1 Kg 9:26). Another tune is supposed in the titles of 44, 59, 68, 79, where, in DV, we read 'For them that shall be changed', but in St Jer.: For the lilies, and NP: Secundum 'Lilia'. The reference, however, may be not to a tune, but to lily-shaped instruments; or the word may be of Babylonian origin and mean, according to Professor S. Langdon, an instrument of three notes, 'probably the curious pipe fashioned in the form of an ox head and found at Babylon' (Journal of Royal Asiatic Society, 1921, 180). 'Destroy not' is also supposed to be the tune for 56-58, 74 (DV), but it seems strange that this same melody should suit these dissimilar psalms; perhaps Eerdmans solution 'thou shalt not curtail (the text of the psalm)' is correct.

Some titles contain liturgical notes: 91 is for the sabbath day; 23 for the first day of the week; 47 for the second day; 93 for the fourth and 92 for the day before the sabbath; but all these, with the exception of 91, are taken from LXX. The Old Latin version, supported by the Mishnah, assigns 80 to the fifth day of the week, while the Mishnah alone gives us a Ps for the third day, viz. 81. The meaning of for a remembrance or to bring to remembrance (37 and 69) — eis anamnēnon — is probably that these psalms were to be sung during the offering of the minhah sacrifice, for the same expression is found in Lev 24:7; cf. Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:25. Ps 99 may have been sung during sacrifices of thanksgiving, Lev 7:12, for its title is rightly translated by St Jerome in gratiarum actione. At the great festivals the Jews sang or recited Pss 112-117 (Vg), a group known as the Hallel or Hymns of Praise (cf. Mt 26:30) — each psalm bearing the title Alleluia, i.e. 'Praise ye Yah'.

A wide field of exploration is open to a student who would search out the original meanings of many of the terms in the superscriptions; but he will have to solve enigmas which, as we have already remarked, baffled the Greek translators of the 2nd cent. B.C. Bearing in mind that the titles represent a very ancient tradition, it would be rash to disregard their evidence when they give the names of the composers of the hymns. Psalms are attributed to Moses (89), Solomon (71, 126), the sons of Core (41-48, 83, 84, 86), Eman (87), Ethan (88), Asaph (49, 72-82) and, probably, Idithun (38, 61, 76); but by far the largest attribution is to David (73 times in MT, 84 in LXX). Prefixed to these names is the preposition lamed, which the older grammarians named lamed auctoris, and rightly so. 336 Some writers today interpret the preposition to mean 'belonging to a collection known as (David's)'. But is it likely that Moses, Eman, Ethan and Solomon all had their collections, from which only one or two hymns came into the Psalter? And are we to suppose that Hab 3:1 bears this strange meaning? The title-writers clearly had authorship in mind, for often they mention the occasion on which David vowed that he would compose a hymn of thanksgiving should he escape from peril: 'when he fled from the face of his son Absalom' (3); 'which he sang to the Lord, for the words of Chusi the son of Jemini' (7); 'when he changed his countenance before Achimelech' (33); 'when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul' (51); 'when the men of Ziph had come and said to Saul: Is not David hidden with us?' (53); 'when the Philistines held him in Geth' (55); 'when Saul sent and watched his house to kill him' (58); 'when he was in the cave' (141). It is idle to suppose that these incidents were chosen haphazard from the Books of Samuel.

Authorship and Date—Modern criticism has called the Psalter 'the hymn-book of the second temple'. 337 But did the great temple of Solomon never resound with the chanting of hymns? What religion has ever been without its sacred music? Are we to suppose that at the Tabernacle, at the sanctuary at Shiloh and at Solomon's temple the voices of hymn-singers were never heard, that the sacrifices were offered and the altar encompassed without chant, or that, if they were, Jewish tradition lost all memory of the pre-exilic hymns? No, the 'songs of Sion', 'Yahweh's songs', were sung before the captivity, Ps 136:3 f.; pilgrimage psalms were known in the 8th cent. B.C., Is 30:29, and, at this same time, sacred songs, with musical accompaniment, associated with the name of David, formed part of the divine worship, Am 5:21-23; 6:5. David was both poet and musician, 1 Kg 16:14-23; 2 Kg 1:17-27; 3:33 f.; 22. Traditionally he is the national poet of the Hebrews, 'Israel's beautiful psalmist', 2 Kg 23:1. He was able to conduct an orchestra of 'harps, lutes, timbrels, cornets and cymbals', 2 Kg 6:5. Throughout the latter part of the OT he was recognized as the promoter of Israel's liturgical chant; 1 Par 16:7-36; 23:5; 25:1-7; 2 Par 23:18; 29:25-27, 30; 35:15; Esd 3:10 f.; Neh 12:24, 35, 44-46; Eccl 47:9-12. In the NT Christ attributes 109 to David; St Peter quotes David as the author of 2 and 15, and St Paul ascribes 31 and 68 to him, Mt 22:43; Ac 4:25; 2:25-28; 13:35 f.; Rom 4:6; 11:9. For the teaching of the Fathers and ecclesiastical writers, see my Commentary i, 30 f.

David, therefore, was Israel's best-known hymn-writer. It is not improbable that besides composing psalms he also re-edited ancient liturgical hymns; a clear example of editing is 67, where we have a combination of at least three sacred songs. A cursory examination of the Psalter shows that before the Greek translation was made in the 2nd cent. B.C. much re-editing had taken place. Hymns were combined (e.g. 107; 1 Par 16), or wrongly divided (e.g. 41 and 42), or published with an alteration of the divine Name (see § 335b), or modified (13 and 52; 39:14-18 and 69; 17 and 2 Kg 22); liturgical additions were made at the end of psalms; and into the Greek text of 13 an extraordinary insertion was introduced. Cf. § 49f.

Now that the Graf-Wellhausen theory of OT history is gradually losing favour (the supposed 'P' document written, it is contended, during or after the Exile, has not a word to say about liturgical chant!) the way is being opened for a broader view of development of Jewish worship; and it is not too much to expect that eventually the Psalter may be shown to be a magnificent collection of poems reaching from the time of the Exodus right up to the Maccabean period.

Latin Versions—In the 2nd cent. B.C., if not earlier, 338a

338a the Greek-speaking Jews resident in Egypt felt the need of a hymn-book in their every-day language; and the result was the Alexandrian version (LXX). This was to have far-reaching influence in the Christian Church. From it, with few exceptions, the quotations in the NT were taken, and the Latin versions (except one of St Jerome's translations and the New Psalter, see § 338b) were made. Before the introduction of the New Psalter, the only breviary version of the psalms was the Alexandrian version in its Latin dress.

The first Latin translation was probably made at Carthage in the 2nd cent. A.D. Whether this was the parent of all subsequent Latin versions or there were other independent African and European (Rome, Milan, Spain) translations has yet to be decided. What we know is that by the middle of the 4th cent. there were so many divergent Latin versions that Pope Damasus (366-84) decided to authorize a uniform text. He turned to the greatest scholar in Rome at the time, Eusebius Hieronymus Sophronius. After completing a correction of the Gospels (383), Jerome turned to the Old Latin versions of the Psalter. For his revision he studied the LXX (known as the 'koine' or 'vulgate'), using, in all probability, the Antiochian edition, which, from the name of its reputed writer, the martyr St Lucian, became known as the Lucian text. This first of Jerome's works on the Psalter is usually identified with the Roman Psalter, recited in the churches at Rome and in Italy up to the pontificate of Pope St Pius V, and still used in St Peter's, Rome; but, of recent years, this identification has been assailed. In our present breviary the Invitatorium, antiphons, versicles and responsories are all taken from the Roman Psalter.

b St Jerome was dissatisfied with his first work; he complained also of copyists' mistakes. So, after he had settled at Bethlehem in the autumn of 386, he decided to write a new edition. As an aid, he borrowed Origen's Hexapla from the library at Caesarea (Letter 106.2). This recension became known as the Gallican Psalter, because of its use in the churches of Gaul, into which country it was introduced by St Gregory of Tours, and later established by Charlemagne, probably on the advice of Alcuin. It is this recension that we all recited at the divine office before the authorization of the New Psalter, and it is that printed in the Vulgate Bible. The Anglican Prayer Book Psalter also is taken from it and consequently differs from the Psalter of the Authorized Version, which was made from a Hebrew text. The older version was retained in the Prayer Book because of its popularity.

By the year 405 St Jerome had translated the OT from Hebrew into Latin, which work included a translation of the Psalter (389-92). This third translation, known as the Hebrew Psalter and written to help Christians in their controversies with the Jews, was never officially adopted by the Church; again popular attachment favoured the Roman and Gallican versions. In Die Psalmen der Vulgata (1940) A. Allgeier maintains that the Gallican Psalter was the third of St Jerome's versions—written for liturgical use in the Church.

On March 24, 1945, Pope Pius XII, by Motu Proprio In cotidianis precibus, gave permission to all who recite the divine office to use the New Psalter. For an account of its making see Il Nuovo Salterio Latino (1946³), or the French translation Le Nouveau Psautier Latin (1947), written by Fr Augustine Bea, S.J., rector of the Biblical Institute at Rome, and Chairman of the Committee chosen to compose the new version. An article in English by the same writer appeared in CBQ 8 (1946) 4-35.

The Supreme Pontiff had commissioned the Biblical Institute (January 19, 1941) to prepare a new Psalter which should combine a faithful rendering of the original text with a careful regard, as far as feasible, for the venerable Vulgate and for the other ancient versions. Associated with Fr Bea were five other professors of the Institute: Fathers Vaccari, Zorell, Merk, Semkowski and Köbert. Translations prepared by members of this committee were discussed in plenary sessions, revisions and corrections were considered, until agreement was reached. After three and a half years the new translation was submitted to the Pope (August 1944), who then authorized the printing of two editions, one containing the psalms in their biblical order, the other in the order of the Psalter of the divine office.

There can be no doubt that the new Psalter (hereafter referred to as NP) is far superior to any Latin version heretofore made. Its basis is the Massoretic Hebrew, often corrected (but not so often as some may wish) by LXX or another of the ancient versions. Less of the Gallican Vulgate remains than one would have supposed; thus out of about 350 verses that make up the first 25 psalms, only 14 are unchanged. Moreover some 150 corrections, not based on any external authority, have been introduced. Many of these are of minor, but others of greater consequence, bringing in, as they do, words or phrases hitherto never recited in the Christian Church. These emendations are delicate; we want good reason for regarding them as original and inspired. We doubt whether every one of them will stand the test of time.

The Committee wisely refrained from following any metrical theory. 'All corrections were barred which depended on certain metrical systems, such as have been proposed and defended by some specialists, not because they are unwarranted but because none of them is at present generally admitted', Bea, CBQ 8 (1946) 12.

The Alexandrians were afraid of the anthropomorphisms and of some of the concrete expressions of the Hebrew original, so they toned them down to satisfy Hellenistic mood. From LXX these weaker renderings found their way into Vg. NP has rightly restored these hardy and vivid similes and metaphors. The best example is 17:2 f., where David's God is no longer his firmament, refuge, helper, protector, horn and support, but his rampart, stronghold, rock, shield, horn and fortress.

The Latinity of the Psalter has been greatly improved by the new version. Hebrew 'tenses' have been given their proper significance, and strange and unsuitable words have been eliminated. On the other hand, certain liberties have been taken with Hebrew words, e.g. hesed is 'gratia' or 'bonitas' or 'misericordia'; yāda' (even in the same Qal form) is translated by 'curo' or 'nosco' or 'cognosco' or 'scio' or 'contueor'; the Hiphil form of yādāh is frequently rendered by 'celebro', but as some of the psalms are ex-votos, one might prefer 'gratias ago'. At times the arrangement of the lines and division of stanzas seem open to question. In a few cases the Latin is not clear, e.g. 67:19c: 'vel eos qui nolunt habitare apud Dominum Deum', or, in the same Ps, verse 24b: 'ut linguis canum tuorum sit portio ex inimicis'. Seldom does the new translation seem inferior to the old; but we may question whether, e.g. 'Extollunt flumina, Domine, extollunt flumina vocem suam', 92:3, really does express the figure of 'the mighty waves of the sea, which break in greatest tumult on the shore' (Bea) better than: 'Elevaverunt flumina, Domine, elevaverunt flumina vocem suam'—where the swell of the rolling breakers is distinctly felt.

A second edition of NP, introducing half a dozen alterations, was published in 1945. Invitations are given to readers to propose further improvements.

Translations of NP into English have already been attempted. Comments on these by Mgr J. M. T. Barton may be read in CR 30 (1948) 10-21. Criticism of Mgr R. A. Knox's translation was made in CBQ 10 (1948) 42-54; The Tablet, March 6, 1948; CR 29 (1948) 305-18 (Mgr Knox's reply); CR 30 (1948) 69-72 (my reply to Mgr Knox). Although not a translation of NP, Fr R. J. Foster's Psalms and Canticles of the Breviary, an excellent 'aid' to the devout recitation of the Breviary, mirrors the new version by 338b reflexions and explanations, here and there translating individual verses.

339a Messianic Psalms—An exalted and mysterious person appears in some of the psalms. He is the anointed Son of Yahweh, who will rule over the whole world, Ps 2. His throne is to remain for ever; he is addressed as 'God', Ps 44. He is a king; on earth he rules from Sion, in heaven he shares Yahweh's throne. Moreover he is a priest, not however, in the Levitical line, but a priest-king like Melchisedech, Ps 109. Again he is introduced as a king and the son of a king; his reign will bring peace and justice, all kings and nations are to worship him, and all the tribes of the earth are to be blessed by him; he shall reign until the sun and moon are no more, Ps 71. Yet this One, the ruler of nations, whom all tribes must worship, will undergo terrible sufferings, becoming a worm rather than a man, enduring insults from a pack of evil-doers who will strip him of his clothes, dig nails into his hands and feet, and stand staring at his bones protruding from his emaciated body; howbeit when he shall have established his kingdom, a world-wide assembly, including rich and poor alike, will pay homage to him, and will partake of a sacrificial meal in his honour, Ps 21. An anointed priest, an anointed king, far superior to any merely human priest or king, this is The Anointed One, the Messias. These five psalms, 2, 21, 44, 71, 109 are Messianic; they are to be recognized as 'prophetic and Messianic psalms, foretelling the coming, kingdom, priesthood, passion, death and resurrection of the future Liberator', § 49h.

b We must never lose sight of the fact that when the risen Christ interpreted the Psalter to his disciples, they learnt that its content was far deeper than Jewish readers had suspected, Lk 24:27, 32, 44-46. It follows that when St Peter, St John and St Paul expound passages that were not recognized by the rabbis as Messianic, we may take it that this Messianic sense was taught by the divine Master. Not that all the texts are as strictly Messianic as are the psalms mentioned above; rather their complete meaning is understood—they are 'fulfilled'—only when applied to Christ. Examples are 8:5-7; 15:8-11; 117:22f. Psalms that are new songs ('canticum novum') should be accounted as Messianic, for they foretell Messianic times when the Gentiles will be converted to worship the one true God; cf. Eusebius of Caesarea, Demonstratio Evangelica, 1, 4; St Augustine, De Civ. Dei, viii, 24. No one who reads the commentaries of the Fathers can fail to notice how much Christianity they found in the Psalter. St Augustine may exaggerate when he says: 'Vix est ut in psalmis invenias voces nisi Christi et Ecclesiae, aut Christi tantum, aut Ecclesiae tantum, quod utique ex parte et nos sumus' (In Ps 59); but in our days there is a tendency to exaggerate in the opposite direction; to find little more than the rabbis found in the Psalter; to exclude from interpretation anything that might be unintelligible to the crowds that frequented the post-exilic temple; in brief, to forget that Christ enlightening the minds of his disciples made them understand what the holy Spirit meant in the Psalter, that was to become the hymn-book of the Christian Church. Wisely does the reigning Pontiff warn interpreters of Holy Writ that after discovering the literal sense of the words of the Bible, they 'must take into equally careful consideration the explanations and declarations of the teaching authority of the Church, the interpretation given by the holy Fathers, and also the "analogy of faith", as Leo XIII wisely enjoins in his Encyclical Providentissimus Deus. . . . It is therefore the duty of the exegete to discover and expound not only the proper or "literal" meaning of the words which the sacred writer intended and expressed, but also their spiritual significance, on condition of its being established that such meaning has been given to them by God' (Divino afflante Spiritu). And the Holy Father goes on to say that this sense is taught by the divine Saviour in the Gospels, is indicated by the Apostles both in speech and writing, is found in the perpetual teaching of the Church, as well as in the most ancient liturgical usage. In the commentary we will follow the apostolic and patristic rather than the rabbinical method of interpretation.

Penitential Psalms—This is a Christian designation of seven psalms which awaken sorrow for sin: 6, 31, 37, 50, 101, 129, 142. They are enumerated by Cassiodorus (†583), but they seem to have been well known before his time: 'Remember', he says, 'that this psalm (6) is the first of the Penitentials' (PL 70, 60). It is probable that Possidius is referring to these psalms when, recording St Augustine's last illness, he tells us that the saint requested that the 'psalmos davidicos . . . de paenitentia' should be copied out and put on the wall beside his bed. He goes on to say that the dying saint read them continually, shedding copious tears (PL 32, 63).

Imprecatory Psalms—In some psalms we meet passages that appear to invoke curses and revengeful punishments on enemies. During the First World War (1914-18) it was thought that these offensive passages encouraged the plea for 'reprisals', and Anglicans proposed to delete them from the Psalter of the Book of Common Prayer. It was argued that these comminatory passages owed their origin to the imperfect morality of the OT. Examples are 39:15 f.; 68:23-29; 69:3-5; 108:6-19; 128:5-8; 136:7-9.

True it is that under the old dispensation the Christian law of love was unknown, and that the lex talionis, the bill of divorce, blood vengeance, etc., were in vogue. But when St Thomas Aquinas deals with the question (Summa, 2a, 2ae, q. 25, a. 6) he does not solve it by appealing to the imperfect morality of the OT. In the body of the article he teaches that we must distinguish in sinners their nature and their guilt. Their nature, he says, is from God, and is capable of everlasting happiness; hence, according to their nature, sinners must be loved. But their guilt is something opposed to God and is an obstacle to everlasting happiness; hence, inasmuch as he is guilty and opposed to God, a sinner is to be hated—even if father or mother or relative. He concludes: 'Debemus in peccatoribus odire quod peccatores sunt, et diligere quod homines sunt beatitudinis capaces; et hoc est eos vere ex charitate diligere propter Deum'. In reply to the third objection of the article, he explains the imprecations in Sacred Scripture. 'These imprecations', he says, 'can be taken in three ways. First as predictions, and not as wishes, so that the meaning of "convertantur peccatores in infernum" is "convertentur". Secondly, as wishes, but in the sense that what is desired is not the punishment of men, but the justice of the One who punishes; so in Ps 57: "The just shall rejoice when he shall see the vengeance"; for even when God punishes he "hath not pleasure in the destruction" of the wicked, Wis 1, but in his own justice, for "the Lord is just and hath loved justice", Ps 10. Thirdly, the desire may be for the removal of the guilt and not the infliction of punishment, that is, that sin may be destroyed while man remains'.

The underlying idea of most of these imprecations is expressed in 138:21: 'Have I not hated them, O Lord, that hated thee?' Those who hated the Chosen People were enemies of Yahweh; and even an individual might hate a pious Israelite simply because the latter was serving Yahweh. Holy Church prays: 'Ut inimicos Ecclesiae humiliare digneris', and when consecrating a bishop she says: 'qui maledixerit ei sit ille maledictus'. Finally, when reciting the imprecatory passages of the OT we must not forget oriental modes of expression—vivid and vehement, but not to be interpreted too literally. Cf. Merk, 'De Inspiratione', Institutiones Biblicae, 1, 64 f. The Doctrine of the Psalter—The dominant theme is the greatness of the one and only God, the creator of all things, the ruler of the world, the King of kings, 339e the Lord and Defender of Israel his chosen race. He is the supreme Law-giver and Judge, the Vindicator of the oppressed, the Saviour of all who have recourse to him, the great Wonder-worker. Many of the hymns speak of his power and glory; his mercy, justice and love are extolled; his wonderful knowledge and his omnipresence are described in 138. He is the most Holy One, to whom are due worship and reverence from all men. He rewards the just; he punishes the wicked. His throne is in heaven, where he dwells surrounded by a court of angels; in a peculiar manner he is present in his people's sanctuary at Shiloh or Zion. Cf. 8; 10:5; 18:2; 32; 46; 94:3 f.; etc.

It is man's duty to worship God by loving him, by praying to him, by observing his law and by taking part in the liturgical services. In sickness and in health, in sorrow and in joy, in youth and age, in times of peace and in times of war man must pray. He must also observe the Law given to Moses and meditate on it; he must seek his friends among the God-fearing, avoiding evil-doers; he must be kind, faithful to his word, immune from bribery, innocent in hands and clean of heart. He must offer sacrifices in praise, thanksgiving and adoration of the God of Israel, taking care that this external cultus is accompanied by internal dispositions. This liturgical worship is most important; the true Israelite should love to frequent the sanctuary and take part in the services. He must also confess and beg pardon for his sins. Cf. 14; 23; 25:6-12; 26:4 f.; 31; 41:5; etc.

f The faithful Israelite's belief in God's retributive justice was troubled by the prosperity of wicked men. The psalmists solved the problem by saying that God hates the wicked; that their families become extinct; that they die miserable deaths, and in Sheol come under the dominion of the just. On the other hand, the just are loved by God; they experience delight in worshipping him, especially at his sanctuary; they live on in this world through their descendants, who carry on the family name; in the next life they will not be left abandoned in Sheol, but will awake from the sleep of death, to behold the 'form' of God, to see his face, and to be taken to glory—flashes of truths that were to be revealed fully in the NT. Cf. 1:6; 5:6-8; 15:11; 16:15; 33:17; 36; 48:16; 72; 74:5-11; etc.

It must be admitted, however, that this interpretation does not commend itself to all scholars. There are those (of whom Fr E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J., in his treatise, The Old Testament and the Future Life, is the best exponent) who find in the Psalter very little trace of reward for the just after death. Much depends on the interpretation of individual passages and words (e.g. ʾmūnāh, 'awaken', 'in the morning'), but discussion of these must be left to the commentary. In general we may state here that in this matter as in other OT teachings (e.g. Messianic prophecies) we must not expect to find a trend of doctrine gradually evolving from the indistinct to the distinct, nor must we expect inspired writers to be conditioned by the stage of belief of the ordinary people of their times. In the history of religion, as in the lives of mystics, revelation sometimes comes like a flash, rather than by transition from twilight to dawn. And the flash may pass unnoticed by others, and even be forgotten by the recipient. (Compare Simon Peter at Caesarea Philippi and in the courtyard of Caiaphas' house.) All Hebrews from Abraham onwards (except the Sadducees) believed in survival after death. In general their ideas were vague. The good and the wicked all went to Sheol. On earth the latter had a far better time, materially, than the former; hence the flashes of the truth (in the psalms mentioned above) that there is a reward for the just hereafter. Compare the Messianic Ps 15 in which 'the sacred writer speaks of the resurrection of our Lord' (Biblical Commission; cf. § 52g). Danger of imitation of Egyptian cult of the dead may account for the paucity of Hebrew 339f revelation on the after-life.

The Psalter and History—The whole history of the OT, from the creation up to (at least) the Babylonian exile, is put into poetry by the psalmists; the creation, 8 and 103; the deluge, 28:10; Sodom and Gomorrah, 10:7; from the patriarchs to David, 77; Solomon, 71; the destruction of Jerusalem (the Ps are disputed); the exile, 136.

Christ and the Psalter—The Psalter was Jesus' prayer-book. He learnt it at home; he used it in synagogue and temple; he recited the 'Gradual Psalms' when going up to Jerusalem for the festivals, the Hallel after the Last Supper, Ps 21 when hanging on the cross, and 30:6 when he breathed his last. No wonder Holy Church bids us pray 'in unione illius divinae intentionis qua ipse in terris laudes Deo persolvisti'; no wonder she has made the Psalter her prayer-book from earliest times. In our days it is generally recited in its entirety every week by all clerics in major orders throughout the world.

During Holy Mass psalms or parts of psalms come to the lips of the celebrant. At the foot of the altar he recites Ps 42; while he incenses the altar he uses verses of Ps 140; he washes his hands praying Ps 25. In the earliest missals the Introit, Gradual, Tract, Offertory and Communion prayer were all taken from the Psalter, a feature largely preserved in our Lenten Masses. Cf. R. Galdos in VD 14 (1934) 71-80.

The prayer-book of Christ and of his Church—such is the Psalter. Within the limits of space allowed to us we offer the reader the following notes to elucidate some of its difficult passages.

BOOK I

I—The Ps bears no title. Is it the preface to the Psalter, as some commentators have thought? This is unlikely, because it resembles 111. St Justin (PG 6, 389) and other early Christian writers, with Codex Bezae, Ac 13:33, wrongly combine 1 and 2 into one Ps. On the point see E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J. in VD 5 (1925) 372.

The way of life of the just man is contrasted with that of the wicked. The one is like a majestic tree in foliage, growing by the side of a running stream; the other is like chaff blown about by every wind. Sinners will be condemned at God's tribunal, for he observes the just man's way of life, while the wicked walk to their ruin. See Arbez in CBQ 7 (1945) 398-404.

1. 'Blessed': Heb. is an exclamation: 'O the happiness of!' 2. The law is probably the written Pentateuch, cf. Deut 17:18 f.; Jos 1:8. 3. Cf. Jer 17:8; Ez 47:12, but all three are probably independent. 4. 'the dust': 'the chaff'. 'After the corn had been threshed to loosen the grain from the husks, it was winnowed by throwing up the mingled stalks and chaff and grain with a fork or shovel against the wind, when the grain would fall to the ground and the rest be blown away' (Lattey). Cf. John the Baptist's words, Mt 3:12. 5. 'rise again': 'stand up' to justify their conduct. Some think the reference is to the ordinary Jewish court, but more probably the eschatological Judgement is meant, cf. Eccl 12:14; Wis 5:1-5; Nah 1:6. 6. The supreme Judge takes note of the behaviour of the good and of the wicked. The end of the way of sinners is ruin.

II—1 and 111 are companion psalms; so are 2 and 109; they should be read together. Both are Messianic. The theme of 2 is the conflict between the forces of evil and God, with his anointed King. Hence the frequent use of the Ps by the author of the Apocalypse, 2:26-28; 11:15, 18; 12:5; 19:15, 19. There are four parts. (i) The scene on earth—nations with their rulers attempting by rebellion to break the bonds of religion (1-3). (ii) The scene in heaven—God laughing at the rebels (oriental expression) and bringing terror upon them by the appointment of his own 340b Son as King (4-6). (iii) The royal Son, begotten of God, proclaims his sway over all nations and his irresistible power over them (7-9). (iv) The psalmist advises kings and rulers to serve and reverence Yahweh and his Son lest they perish in a blaze of divine anger (10-13).

The Jews of old recognized the Ps as Messianic; cf. Psalm of Solomon 17, 23, and the passages quoted by *Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, 2, 716 ff. In the NT Jesus is called 'my beloved Son' by his Father at the Baptism and the Transfiguration. The early Christians numbered the Jews and Gentiles who had put Christ to death, together with Herod and Pontius Pilate, among the enemies of God foretold in this Ps. St Paul regarded the Ps as Messianic, Ac 4:25 f.; Rom 1:4; 1 Cor 15:24; Heb 1:5; 5:5. The early Christians attributed the Ps to David, Ac 4:25; cf. § 49c.

3. The cry of the rebels. 'yoke': 'cords'. 'Let us endeavour that the Christian religion does not bind or be imposed upon us' (St Augustine, PL 36, 70).

6. 'I myself have set up my king upon Sion, my holy mountain'. Then the king speaks: 'I will promulgate Yahweh's decree'.

7. The solemn Introit of Christmas' midnight Mass. 'this day' corresponds to 'before the day-star' in 109:3, both signifying, as St Augustine points out, the eternal generation of the Son. Such an explicit affirmation of divine sonship is nowhere else found in the OT; it rules out any reference to King David; cf. VD 15 (1935) 79. Neither can 8 and 9 be applied to any Hebrew king. 9. The breaking of jars symbolized the crushing of one's enemies; cf. Kleber in CBQ 5 (1943) 63-7. 12. 'Embrace discipline': MT 'Kiss the Son', which may be correct (cf. 1 Kg 10:1; 3 Kg 19:18); so St Jerome at first, but, later, following Aquila and Symmachus, he read 'purely' (bar or bôr), PL 23, 432. 'Kiss purely', however, in the sense of paying homage, has no parallel in the OT. For a plausible emendation 'Kiss his feet', see RB 32 (1923) 207; so NP paraphrases, after joining to 11: 'cum tremore praestate obsequium illi, Ne irascatur et pereatis de via'. Here 'illi' must refer to Yahweh; but the anthropomorphism of kissing Yahweh's feet is without parallel and very unlikely. 13. Again the eschatological Judgement is probably meant; cf. 1:6.

III—A morning prayer (6). Threatened by an insurrection (2-3) David places his trust in God (4-5). His sleep is not disturbed; he rises in the morning, sure that victory will be his (6-8). The occasion is Absalom's rebellion, as the title states, and this is confirmed by 7; but the actual composition was probably later—a votive offering in thanksgiving for success. The Ps ends with a blessing (9), probably added when it was made a liturgical hymn.

3. 'my soul': Heb. nepes often means 'self', here me. 'salvation' (also 9) means deliverance or victory. 'in his God': the sacred name Yahweh is not put on the lips of evil-doers (cf. e.g. Gen 3, where it is excluded from the conversation between Eve and the Serpent, although it is the divine name in the rest of the chapter). 4. 'protector': Heb. shield, a frequent metaphor in Davidic Pss. 'the lifter up of my head', the one who takes away my humiliation; cf. 23:7; 26:6; Gen 40:13; 4 Kg 25:27; Eccles 11:1. 5. 'his holy hill' is Sion; cf. 2:6; 13:7; 19:3. 6. An Easter antiphon; the whole Ps can be applied to Christ humiliated and exalted. 8. 'without cause': Heb. 'on the cheek'. Oriental poetry is vividly expressive.

IV—A companion to Ps 3; but now the danger is well nigh over (7-9). The psalmist, obviously a man of dignity (David, according to the title), prays that God may hear his prayer and deliver him from enemies (2-3). He is sure that his prayer will be answered, because God has always treated him in a wonderful manner (4). He advises his enemies to think out matters quietly at night; then offer sacrifices with a right spirit (5-6). Many, weary of the strife, sigh for peace and God's favour (7). The joy of a rich harvest cannot compare with the psalmist's spiritual joy (8). So sure is he of God's protection that he can go to a peaceful bed (9). A Compline Ps; cf. 5, 9.

2. 'enlarged me': brought me relief, taken a load off my mind. 3. 'dull (hard) of heart'; cf. Ex 7:14. The text of LXX, Vg, NP is preferable to MT; cf. Bi 16 (1935) 335. 5. 'Be ye angry' with yourselves; so LXX, Syr, St Jer., Eph 4:26, against MT, NP: 'tremble' in awe of Yahweh. 'the things you say', etc. 'Commune with your heart, when on your bed, and be silent' (MT, NP); let them examine their consciences at night and resolve to cease complaining; cf. Zach 8:16 f. 8. Spiritual joy is deeper than harvest rejoicing. 9. 'As soon as I lie down I fall asleep—so tranquil is David, even in the midst of tribulations that sleep escapes him not for a moment', Kroon in VD 8 (1928) 210. 10. 'singularly': NP 'in security', unmolested by enemies; cf. Deut 33:28. V—Beset by boastful, lying and murderous enemies (who are also rebelling against God), the psalmist prays that he may be protected and allowed to return to the sanctuary. The situation is that of the two previous Pss, the time of Absalom's rebellion. In the Breviary the Ps retains its time-honoured place as the second Ps at Lauds on Monday; 4, 5 make it a morning hymn.

5. 'will stand': Heb. 'set in order'; the vb is used of preparing an altar for sacrifice, of drawing up a speech, or of arranging forces for battle. NP supposes the arranging of words in prayer, 'propono tibi preces meas', but there is no 'preces meas' in MT. Probably the meaning is 'I will prepare for battle'. Knox: 'I will present myself before thee' can hardly be got out of the Hebrew. 'see': keep a sharp look out. 8. 'temple': the sanctuary set up by David on Sion; hēkal is used of God's residence in heaven, 10:5; 17:7; Is 6:1, his sanctuary at Shiloh, 1 Kg 1:9; 3:3, or on Sion, 2 Kg 12:20, or at Solomon's temple, 3 Kg 6, or at the second temple, Agg 2:19. 12-13 contain the thanksgiving part of this votive Ps. 'shall dwell in them': better 'shall protect them' (NP). Knox: 'wilt dwell among them' reverts to the Gallican text.

VI—The first of the penitential psalms. Physically exhausted (3) and mentally depressed (4) because of persecution (8-9), the psalmist feels that his life is ebbing away (6-7); but, after prayer (2, 5), he gains radiant hope that his enemies will be confounded (9-11). The historical occasion is probably that of Ps 3-5. Because of 7 it is a Compline Ps (Monday). It can also be used in preparation for confession.

6. 'hell': Sheol, the Heb. name for the abode of the dead. OT ideas on the future life were vague and sometimes dismal; here the lament seems to be that in the underworld there is no liturgical worship, no 'remembrance' or 'praise'. We shall find brighter hopes in Pss 16, 48, 72.

VII—Against enemies who are bent on ruining his character by bringing false charges against him, the psalmist prays for protection (2-6). That his innocence may be vindicated, he appeals to God to hold an assize (7-11). God's punishments, which the wicked bring upon themselves, are described by vivid metaphors (12-17). 18 may have been added when, the danger over, the psalmist presented his composition as a votive offering for liturgical singing. The Ps is recited at Compline on Monday; in part it implies an examination of conscience, and so is suitable for night prayers. The title is probably original; Kush (Chusi) the Benjamite is otherwise unknown; a late editor would have chosen a familiar name for the adversary.

5b. NP 'qui salvavi adversantes mihi iniuste' seems unlikely. See note in my commentary, and read with St Jer.: 'and sent away mine adversaries empty-handed'. 7b. 'Lift thyself up against the fury of mine adversaries' (with NP). 8. 'return thou on high': take thy throne on high, and there give judgement in 341a my favour. 9. David, as a suppliant, pleads his innocence before the Judge. 14. 'for them that burn' refers to fiery arrows. 15. The enemy is compared to (1) a woman in travail, the child being all manner of iniquity; (2) a man digging a pitfall to entrap an animal, then falling into it himself; (3) a man throwing a missile that rebounds on his own head—a boomerang.

b VIII—God the Creator, and man the lord of Creation. The Son of Man is Jesus Christ; hence the application of the Ps in 1 Cor 15:26; Eph 1:22; Heb 2:6-8. Meditating, probably on Gen 1:14-30, the psalmist breaks out into admiration of God's work (2). Arguments of godless men are silenced by delightful cries of little children gazing at the sky (3). And when the psalmist himself looks up at the starry heavens he is led to wonder why the great Creator should care for puny man (4-5), whom he has made almost divine, giving him glory and honour and subjecting all other creatures on earth to his dominion (6-9). A renewed exclamation of wonder brings the poem to an end (10). For a thorough treatment of the Ps, see Conrad Louis, O.S.B. The Theology of Psalm VIII (Cath. University of America Press, 1946).

2b. 'Thou hast set thy majesty upon the heavens'. 3. Cf. Mt 21:15 f. 6. 'angels': so Vg, LXX, Syr., NP; but Aq., Theod., Quinta, Sexta, St Jer. all give 'Elohim' here its primary sense, 'God', and, in view of Gen 1:26 f. they are correct.

c IX (IX-X)—MT, AV, RV wrongly divide this Ps into two. It is an acrostic, the letters of the Hebrew alphabet running down the Ps in order, although some letters have been lost through textual corruption. The first part (2-21) is an act of thanksgiving for victory over foreign foes. God has favoured Israel; the enemy is vanquished; his cities are in ruins; he has been punished for forgetting that there is a God; now let him realize that man is but man. The second part (22-34) is concerned with another enemy—the godless Israelites. Puffed up by pride, convinced of his own security, and denying divine providence, he persecutes the faithful Israelite. May God rise up against this loud-mouthed blasphemer. The conclusion (35-39) sounds a note of triumph: God does see the mischief wrought by the wicked; he does hear the prayers of the afflicted; he will bring to nought the power of both foreign and domestic foes, and will reign supreme, King for evermore. For textual study, consult *G. R. Driver, Semitic Writing (1948) 200 ff. (Schweich Lectures 1944).

1a. 'The enemy are stilled, uprooted for ever'. 9. To be fulfilled by Christ, Ac 17:31. 13. 'requiring their blood': Yahweh is likened to a 'goel', a blood avenger. A kinsman was bound to avenge the blood of a murdered relative; Yahweh was united to Israel by ties of relationship; cf. § 246g. 15f. He is raised 'from the gates of death', from imminent danger of death, to celebrate victory over God's foes ('thy salvation') by singing psalms ('thy praises') 'at the gates of the daughter of Zion'—a poetical personification of the city and its inhabitants; cf. Is 1:8; 10:32; Lam 2:15, etc. 18. 'shall be turned into hell': lit. 'return to Sheol'—not as though the wicked have come from the underworld; the meaning is that their progress in life will be cut short by death; cf. Gen 3:19; Pss 54:16; 62:10; 89:3. 21. 'a lawgiver': so LXX, Vg. NP follows Aq., Theod., St Jer. in reading Heb. as 'terror'; but Sym. νόμος, in the sense of 'lesson', seems best; see Driver 204.

22 (MT X:1). 'retired afar off': stood aloof, not manifesting thy power. 23. 'Through the wicked man's pride the afflicted is burning' (with anxiety). 25 ff. 'hath provoked the Lord', hath condemned Yahweh. The impious man says: 'He (Yahweh) will not seek', i.e. God does not concern himself with what happens on earth. He goes on to say (Heb.): 'There is no God'—not that he is an atheist; he is godless inasmuch as he holds that God does not interfere in human affairs; cf. Is 29:15; Ez 9:9. To his mind God is too far away to bother with mankind; divine chastisements do not fall upon a sinner, they are 'removed' from him; he has no fear of being 'moved' by threats of punishments; he boasts that he will live on 'without evil'. 29. 'He sitteth in ambush in villages; in secret spots he doth murder the innocent'. 30. The figure of a brigand lurking in out-of-the-way places changes to that of a lion ready to pounce from his lair. 36. 'arm': power; cf. Lk 1:51. 38. NP follows MT and gives: 'Thou hast strengthened their heart, thou hast given thine ear', but LXX, Vg: 'Thine ear is attentive to the disposition of their heart' may be correct; Driver: 'Thine ear inclines to hear the purpose of his heart'.

X (XI)—To friends advising him to escape to the hills from enemies who are seeking his life, the psalmist replies by expressing complete confidence in God, who, from his throne in heaven, carefully observes everything that happens on earth (2-5). He sees the deeds of the good and of the wicked, and will reward the former and punish the latter.

2b-4. Words of the faint-hearted friends. 4. 'Since the foundations (of social order) are being subverted, what can the just man do?'. 5. 'the poor man', or (Theod., LXX U) 'the world'. One or other of these has fallen out of MT, and NP also omits. 6b. 'But the lover of violence his [God's] soul doth hate'; cf. Is 1:14. 7. 'snares'. Read with Symmachus, NP: 'coals of fire'—an allusion to the punishment on Sodom and Gomorrah, Gen 19:24. 8b. 'The upright shall behold his face' (NP). Used of earthly kings the expression signifies favourable regard of a person, 2 Kg 14:24, 28, 32, but, in relation to God, it has deeper meaning, 15:11; 16:15; cf. 48:16; 72:24-27, until, in the NT, it refers to the beatific vision, 1 Jn 3:2; Apoc 22:4. XI (XII)—The mischief done by unbridled and sinful tongues. The psalmist complains of the dearth of godly men and of the influence exercised by loud-mouthed hypocrites (2-5). In 6 God speaks, assuring protection for the afflicted and the poor. 7 is either a continuation of God's words or the comment of the psalmist. The hymn concludes with confidence in divine aid (8-9). Reciting the Ps at Compline (Tuesday) we may examine our conscience in the matter of unbridled speech.

2. 'truths': parallelism favours St Jerome's 'fideles' (also Lattey) against NP 'fidelitas'. 3. 'double heart'; cf. 1 Par 12:33; Jas 1:8. 7. G. R. Driver sees here a conflation of alternative readings and reduces the words to: 'Like silver refined in the crucible, like gold purified sevenfold', JTS 36 (1935) 147. 9b. St Jer.: 'since the vilest of the sons of men are being promoted'.

XII (XIII)—The psalmist is afraid that God is abandoning him to his enemies (1-3). He begs for help, lest he be done to death (4-5). The hymn ends on a note of joyful confidence (6). A Compline Ps (Tuesday) because of 4.

2. 'counsels': plans to evade the schemes of his enemies; but NP, Zorell, Lattey, after Syr, read 'sorrows', which has parallelism in its favour. 4. Death is spoken of as sleep, as in 1 Cor 15:51, and at the Memento at Mass. 6. NP, following MT, omits the last line of LXX, Vg.

XIII (XIV)—The moral corruption of a group of persons, apparently under the leadership of a man, the fool, whose slogan is 'There is no God', in the sense that God does not interfere in human affairs (1). But all the time Yahweh is looking down from heaven upon these senseless men, who are attempting to devour Israel (3a-b, 4, 5a). 7 was probably added when the Ps was chosen for liturgical use.

It may be that we have here an ancient hymn telling of the oppression in Egypt, and re-edited by David. It was re-edited again—Ps 52. Another manipulation is found in Vg. After quoting 2b, 3a, St Paul, in Rom 3:13-18, adds a string of quotations, Pss 5:11; 139:4b; 9:28a; Is 59:7 f.; Ps 35:2b. It would seem that a Christian interpolated the passages in LXX.

842a They are not found, however, in LXX A, MT, St Jerome's Hebrew psalter, and have been omitted in NP. Peculiarly enough they occur in Hebrew in a Hebrew-Latin Psalter at Leyden (Kennicott 649).

1. 'The fool'—not in the sense of a stupid person, but an impious man who denies that Yahweh is God. (The sacred name is not put on his lips; see on 3:3.) If, as we have suggested, the original Ps spoke of the oppression in Egypt, the fool will be Pharaoh; cf. Ex 5:2. The plural 'They' will then refer to the Egyptians, the subjects of the fool. 4. Yahweh is probably the speaker. 'devour my people as they eat bread', figurative of slandering; cf. 26:2; 78:7; Job 19:22; Mic 3:3; Hab 3:14; Is 3:15; Jer 30:16; and contrast this metaphorical with the literal sense in Jn 6; see also Wiseman's Lectures on the . . . Blessed Eucharist and my article in St Paul and His Teaching, 95. In Ex 3-10 Israel is frequently called 'my people'. 5. 'there': NP 'then'. The psalmist has in mind some occasion when Yahweh's enemies were stricken with fear. The reference may be to the plagues of Egypt; but when the Ps was re-edited (52) the allusion was to the annihilation of Sennacherib's army, for there we read 'God hath scattered the bones of those who besieged thee'. 'where there was no fear': NP, following MT, omits, probably wrongly; cf. 52:6. 6. 'you have confounded the counsel of the poor man' becomes in 52 'they have been confounded, because God hath despised them'. In the original, the poor man may have been Moses, advising Pharaoh to 'let my people go'. 7. A Messianic addition. 'O that from Sion would come the salvation of Israel'; cf. 84:10; Lk 2:30 f. 'turned away the captivity' means restored the prosperity of Israel; it does not refer to the Babylonian captivity.

b XIV (XV)—The virtues required of a worthy citizen of Sion, living in close proximity to the sanctuary. These virtues are uprightness, honesty, truthfulness, brotherly love, friendship with good men but not with evil-doers, faithfulness to the pledged word, immunity from usury and bribery. The Ps is a companion to 23, and was probably composed for the same occasion, the bringing of the Ark to Sion. Is 33:15 seems to know the Ps. Reciting it in the breviary, the priest may let his mind dwell on the virtues required of one who lives close to the Tabernacle.

1. 'tabernacle': the sacred tent which David set up on the holy hill of Sion; cf. 2 Kg 6:12, 17. 3. 'used deceit': NP 'calumniatur' seems inferior to St Jer. 'est facilis (in lingua sua)'. 4. 'to his neighbour', as Vg, LXX, Syr. seems preferable to MT 'to his hurt' and NP 'cum damno suo'.

c XV (XVI)—This Ps was written by David (cf. § 49e), but he was speaking not of himself but of Christ, as St Peter, Ac 2:24-33, explained to the people but a few days after he himself had learnt from the Master what passages in the psalms referred to him, Lk 24:44. St Paul gave the same interpretation at Antioch, Ac 13:34-37. The Biblical Commission replied in the negative to the question whether a Catholic is free to deny that the sacred writer was speaking of the resurrection of our Lord Jesus Christ; cf. § 52g. For the force of this decision consult Vaccari in Bi 14 (1933) 408-34, VD 13 (1933) 321-32; but see especially Conserva Me Domine by Rudolph P. Bierberg (Cath. University of America, 1945) where every detail of the Ps is thoroughly examined. In the divine Office the Ps is recited at Compline on Tuesday. 8-11 account for its place at Tenebrae before Holy Saturday. 5 forms part of the ceremony of the First Tonsure, the candidate repeating the words after the bishop.

1-3. While his body rests in the tomb, Christ prays to his Father, who is his sole goodness (MT 'my goodness is not beyond thee'), and has given him the saints on earth for his delight. 4. A difficult verse, see Bierberg for various solutions. The general sense is that he will have nothing to do with those who adopt false cults; he will have no part in their sacrifices;

he will not take their names upon his lips; cf. Is 65:13-15; Mt 7:23. 6. 'The lines' are the measuring-lines wherewith a portion of land was assigned to a person. (Christ's inheritance is the Catholic Church, cf. 2:8; 21:28.) 9-10. Because Yahweh is with him, his heart is glad and his soul rejoices; his very body also ('my flesh') will rest securely, because it will not be left in Sheol, there to suffer decay. 11. Yahweh will lead him into eternal life, where, in his presence, he will enjoy gladness and delight for ever. Such, in outline, is the Messianic interpretation of the whole Ps. It is fair to state that many exegetes refer only 8-11 to Christ, and some only in the full sense of the words. One must not, however, lose sight of the Biblical Commission's decision that the sacred writer of 10, 11 was himself speaking of Christ's resurrection.

XVI (XVII)—In peril because impious enemies (one of whom is conspicuous, 13) are closing in about him, the psalmist, pleading his innocence, appeals to God for help. His enemies are worldly men, seeking only this life's enjoyments. He, on the contrary, desires something far more satisfying—the beholding of Yahweh's face, the seeing, 'on awakening' of Yahweh's t'munah, God's likeness.

4. Obscure. NP 'the ways of the law' depends on Accadian and Arabic; see Zorell, VD 1 (1921) 232, Kissane Bi 9 (1928) 90. The word is not yet catalogued in Hebrew dictionaries. St Jer. 'I have kept the ways of a robber' would refer to David's life as an outlaw. 8. The apple of the eye is so delicate and precious that nature protects it very carefully. 10. 'their fat' (of the intestines) means their heart; they are without pity. 11. The distich probably contained four verbs, the first being sûr: 'they lie in wait'. 'bowing down to the earth'. What is the object—the psalmist or the eyes of his enemies (scouring the land)? The latter seems preferable. 14-15. Difficult. The main idea is that he may be delivered from men who seek after this world's goods, who fill their bellies with choicest foods, and who have many children to whom they bequeath their wealth; cf. 48:11. He, on the contrary, seeks to behold Yahweh's face and (parallel) his t'munah likeness, which LXX understood to mean the very 'glory' of God. He prays, in other words, for a privilege granted to Moses, Num 12:8, but denied to other mortals, Deut 4:12; he prays that he may receive it 'on awaking'. Does this merely mean that he hopes to see the t'munah of Yahweh next morning when he goes to the sanctuary? An impossible supposition. No, but as the note in NP correctly has it, he 'speaks of a hope of seeing God, after he has awakened, namely from the sleep of death'. For this idea of awakening from death, 'in the morning' of another life, see 48:15; 72:20; Job 19:26 ('see Eloah'); Is 26:19; Dan 12:2; 2 Mac 12:45; Apoc 22:4. In this Ps the antithesis is between men 'whose portion is in (this) life', and the pious who look for satisfaction beyond this life. *Oesterley comments: 'Taken in contrast with what is said in 14, there is some justification for the view that the psalmist envisages, though it be vaguely, awaking from the sleep of death; this would be prompted by his sense of close communion with God as exhibited in the opening verses of the Ps; his unexpressed thought may well have been: How can communion with the ever-living God be broken by death?' There are commentators, however, who do not hold this interpretation, e.g. E. F. Sutcliffe, S.J. (The Old Testament and the Future Life, 70-5), but in our view, the inspired writer had a sudden and passing flash of the truth that full satisfaction, with the vision of God, awaits the pious beyond the grave.

XVII (XVIII)—David's hymn of thanksgiving, reproduced, with slight alterations, from 2 Kg 22. He begins with an outburst of love; then likens Yahweh, his protector, to concrete means of defence; he has been (MT, NP) David's 'rampart', 'stronghold', 'rock' of refuge, 'shield', 'horn' for attack, and 'high fortress' (2-4). In times of danger of death he 342a prayed to God, and his prayer was heard in heaven (5-7). There follows a magnificent description of God's power, as shown in earthquake, volcanic eruption, thunderstorm and tidal wave. Heaven's clouds are bowed down, as he seems to descend, the lowest clouds serving as a cushion for his feet. The rushing winds are his chariot, driven by the powerful cherubim (for which see Dhorme and Vincent, RB 35 [1926] 328 ff., 481 ff.), like those in Ezechiel's storm, 1:4 ff.; 9:3; 11:22, and in Ps 103:3. Dense clouds charged with rain conceal his presence; clouds, hail and lightning hide the brightness of his glory; thunder is his voice, flashes of lightning are his arrows (8-15). This same mighty God of the storm has rescued David from many a danger, because he has kept the moral law—God's ways, judgements and justices (16-23). In 24 there may be an allusion to the king's sin of adultery—mine iniquity—which he is resolved never again to commit. God favours men according to their works, so that the pious, the perfect and the pure find help in their spiritual lives; the perverse, however, look on him as a harsh judge; he brings down their pride by punishing them (25-28). For David, Yahweh is his guiding lamp, his leader in attack, his shield in defence. All his victories came by the help of the one God, who trained him in the art of warfare and gave him strength to conquer all his enemies, both rebellious Israelites and foreign foes (29-46). So this Hebrew Te Deum ends with jubilant praise of the great God who has given salvation to the House of David. 50 is quoted in Rom 15:9 as foretelling the conversion of the Gentiles. David's 'seed for ever' is Christ, who obtained from Yahweh the throne of David, Lk 1:32 (47-51).

343a XVIII (XIX)—Hebrew poets were fond, as in this Ps, of putting in juxtaposition the physical and the moral orders—God the Creator and God the Law-giver. In 2-7 the heavens declare the work of the Creator; in 8-14 the excellence of the moral Law is proclaimed. 15 is a conclusion. The Ps is recited as a morning prayer (Prime on Monday) because of 6, 7; it has its place in the Common of Apostles because of St Paul's use of 5 in Rom 10:18, and on feasts of the Blessed Virgin because Christ the 'bridegroom', Mt 9:15; 25:1, issued from Mary's womb.

3. The psalmist most beautifully and poetically imagines how one day, having performed its course and spent it in announcing the glory of God, hands over this duty to the next day; the night also, after doing its part, gives charge to the following night to do the same' (St Robert Bellarmine). 6. The sun comes out in the morning, like a bridegroom setting forth from the bridal canopy, whence he races, like a strong runner, across the sky. 13. 'Who knows his own mistakes?' Transgressions of the Law are meant, those committed through error or inadvertence; for these he asks forgiveness. 14. 'from those of others': 'alienis' Vg after LXX supposes zārim, in which case he prays that he may be withheld from serving false gods; cf. Deut 32:16. MT has zēdim 'from proud ones'. LXX, Vg may be correct.

b XIX (XX)—This and the next Ps are companions. Here we have a prayer offered by a king before battle; his thanksgiving for victory is the theme of the next Ps. The people ask God to grant protection to their king from the sanctuary at Zion, where sacrifices for victory have been offered (2-7a). Then the king speaks, full of confidence that God will grant him success; his enemies are relying on their superior military strength, but he and his men put their trust in the name of Yahweh (7b-9). The people (at the sanctuary) cry 'God save the king' (10). The Ps may be used as a priest's prayer for his anointed brethren; 4 may be applied to their Masses.

4. 'be made fat', i.e. acceptable. 6. 'we shall be exalted'. NP, following MT, gives 'extollamus vexilla'; but parallelism suggests that nāgil 'we shall exult' or 'delight' is better than nigol. 10 is recited after the principal Mass on Sunday as a prayer for the king.

XX (XXI)—The people thank God for blessings bestowed on their king (2-8). God's punishments of Israel's enemies are described (9-13). 14 is the people's conclusion. In its full sense the Ps is Messianic—Christ is God's King who lives for ever and ever; cf. 2 Kg 7:13; Ps 88:5, 30, 38.

5. Agelli comments: 'This can only be understood as referring to Christ, who lives for ever, and by whom David lives and reigns, fulfilling the oracle which God spoke of him through Nathan'. 9-14. Addressed to God rather than to the king; so Agelli, Zorell and others. 11. 'Their fruit': their children. 13. 'in thy remnants thou shalt prepare their face'. St Jer.: 'funes tuos firmabis contra facies eorum', in the sense of fixing tent-cords in front of them, is probably correct. NP and others: 'thou shalt shoot (from) thy bowstring against them' seems less probable; see my Commentary 1, 192-3.

XXI (XXII)—Is 52:13-53:12 is the Passion Prophecy; Ps 21 is the Passion Psalm. Neither David nor any other person in the OT (the Ps clearly speaks of the sufferings of an individual, not a community; cf. Lagrange, RB 14 [1905] 51) suffered as does the character of this Ps; and no single Israelite could have expected, as the outcome of his sufferings, the conversion of the Gentiles. Christ, hanging on the Cross, uttered aloud the opening words of this Ps, and probably recited it through to the end. That this scripture 'might be fulfilled', his garments were divided among his executioners (19). He experienced the parching thirst (16); his bones were disjointed (15, 18); his hands and feet were dug into by nails (17). His enemies mocked at him, using the very words of 9; they stood staring at him (18). St Paul quotes 23 as spoken by Jesus who tasted death on behalf of us all, Heb 2:9, 12. St Thomas Aquinas writes: 'Among other matters this psalm has as its special theme the Passion of Christ; hence this is its literal sense'. The 'other matters' are the Resurrection, the conversion of the Gentiles, etc. He continues: 'And so, although in a figurative sense the psalm speaks of David, yet especially it refers literally to Christ', and he draws attention to the condemnation of Theodore of Mopsuestia at the fifth oecumenical Council for interpreting the Ps literally of David, to the exclusion of Christ (In David, ad loc.). For St Thomas' teaching on the literal sense of Scripture, see Summa 1a q1 art 10.

The Ps is divided into two parts, 2-22 and 23-32. The first describes the grief and afflictions of the sufferer; the second tells of his passion's mediatorial value. The rhythm is purposely changed, to give one note for grief and another for triumph—a minor and major key, as Lagrange points out. Naturally it is a Good Friday Ps. In the weekly office it is recited at Prime on Friday. Pss 21-24 are traditionally Prime psalms.

2. Quoted in Aramaic by Christ on the cross, Mk 15:34. Read with MT 'the words of my groaning'; NP 'verbis clamoris mei'. 3. 'and it shall not be reputed as folly in me'. NP 'et non attendis ad me' follows Vaccari 'non est auscultatio mihi', VD 7 (1927) 298. 7. Cf. Is 53:3. 8. Mt 27:39; Mk 15:29; Lk 23:35. 9. Mt 27:43. 'Wonderful prophecy, predicting not only the facts, but the very words used!' (St Robert Bellarmine). 10. Christ's Virgin Mother has a place in the Ps. 'In a particular manner Christ is said to have been drawn forth from his mother's womb, because he was conceived in a wonderful manner, and born without a human father, while his mother remained a virgin' (St Thomas Aquinas, ad loc.). 11. After the maternity, the divine paternity. When a Hebrew child was born, he was placed on his father's knees, who thereby recognized him as his own son; Gen 30:3; 50:22; Job 3:12. 13. He likens his enemies to wild beasts. 15. 'scattered': 'are out of joint'. 16. Jn 19:28. 17. His cruel enemies are likened to a pack of savage dogs. They have dug (MT 'like a lion' is impossible) into his hands and feet; they stare and gloat over his emaciated and 343d naked body. 19. Jn 19:24; Mt 27:35. 21. 'my only one', my life, parallel with 'my soul'. 22 is alluded to in 2 Tim 4:17. 'my lowness': 'my afflicted soul'.

23-25. The preaching first to the Jews; cf. Heb 2:12. Then, 26-27, the praise 'in a great church' (assembly)—the Church Catholic—in which he will pay his vows. 'What are "his vows"?' The sacrifice which he offered to God. Do you know what that sacrifice was? The faithful know what vows he paid in the sight of them that fear him, for the text continues: "The poor shall eat and be filled!" . . . The faithful know the sacrifice of peace, the sacrifice of love, the sacrifice of his Body' (cf. St Augustine, PL 36, 178). 23-29. The great assembly becomes worldwide; all nations worship the true God; his Kingdom is established on earth. 30. Rich and poor alike—'fat ones of the earth' and 'they that go down to the earth'—shall partake of a sacrificial meal. Making three correlations in MT, and following recent commentators, NP renders 30a 'All those who sleep in the earth shall worship him alone'. As Calès remarks: 'Le changement est séduisant, mais ne s'impose pas'. 31. 'my seed', according to the Targum, is the seed of Abraham, which, in the NT, is the Christian Church; Gal 3:16, 19, 29; Rom 9:7 f. 32. 'a generation to come . . . a people that shall be born': the future Christian people.

XXII (XXIII)—Two exquisite representations of God: the Good Shepherd (1-4) and the Kind Host (5-6). The Good Shepherd leads his sheep to rich pastures beside running waters, where they rest without fear, for he is close to them, ready to defend them against attack. The Kind Host invites his guests to his table; he anoints their hair; he fills their cup to the brim; throughout their stay at his house goodness and kindness are lavished upon them. This delicious poem was written by the shepherd-poet who became a guest at Saul's table. It is probably one of his earliest compositions. When recited at Prime on Thursday it can be read as a eucharistic prayer. It may also be interpreted as a hymn on the Sacraments: 'water of refreshment' (Baptism), 'led me on the paths of justice' (Confirmation), 'thy rod and thy staff' (Penance), 'prepared a table' (Eucharist), 'though I should walk in the midst of the shadow of death' (Extreme Unction), 'anointed my head with oil, and my chalice', etc. (Holy Orders), 'goodness and kindness all the days of my life' (Matrimony).

1. 'ruleth me': 'is my shepherd'. 3. 'converted my soul': 'revived me'. 'paths of justice' are right paths. 4. 'The club for defending the flock, and the crook for guiding it'; cf. VD 1 (1921) 23 f. (note in NP). 5. 'against them that afflict me', i.e. while my adversaries look on, astonished that the host should be favouring him. 'anointed my head'—a sign of his host's respect; cf. Am 6:6; Lk 7:46. 5b-6a. 'My cup overflows. Naught but goodness and kindness shall follow me'.

344a XXIII (XXIV)—A processional hymn, written, perhaps, to celebrate the bringing of the Ark to Zion (2 Kg 6). Originally 1-6 may have been a separate Ps, a companion to Ps 14, enumerating the qualities required of a worthy visitor to the sanctuary at Zion. 7-10 may have been added for the procession of the Ark to Zion. One group of singers calls upon the gates of the old city of the Jebusites to lift up their heads in honour, because the King of Glory is to pass through them to his new sanctuary. Another group asks: 'Who is this King of Glory?' The reply is given: 'Yahweh, strong and mighty, Yahweh mighty in battle'. The question is repeated, and the answer rings out: 'Yahweh of hosts, he is the King of Glory'.

1 is quoted by St Paul in 1 Cor 10:26 in support of his teaching that Christians may lawfully eat all foods. 2. 'He is not using scientific language but speaking according to common opinion, or, rather, according to appearances' (Agelli, on Ps 17:16). 4. 'who hath not lifted up his soul to falsehood', the reference being mainly to false religion. 7. Read with NP: 'Lift up your heads, O ye portals'. The ancient ('eternal') gates of the old city of the Jebusites are told to lift up their heads, that is, to become honourable and proud (cf. on 3:4), that, no longer debased by idolatrous worship, they may enclose the sanctuary of the King of Glory symbolically present over the Ark (1 Kg 4:21). 10. The Lord of hosts, sometimes denoting the hosts of angels, Ps 102:21, etc.; sometimes the hosts of heaven—sun, moon and stars, 32:6, etc.; at other times the armies of Israel, 43:10, etc. Here the reference may be to armies, but more probably to angelic hosts.

XXIV (XXV)—An alphabetical Ps. As usual with these Pss, the ideas are loosely strung together; hence, in recitation, each verse should be considered by itself. Nevertheless the main thought is contrition and forgiveness of sins. Trusting in God, the psalmist prays that he may not be put to shame before his enemies (1-3). He asks for instruction, guidance and mercy (4-5). May the sins of his youth not be remembered by God, who is always ready to teach and guide the meek in the right way of life (6-10). Again he asks for pardon, for his sin has been very great (11). He considers the blessings that accrue to a just man—prosperity, children and intimacy with Yahweh (12-14). (Contrast this with what is said in 16:14, 15.) So he turns his eyes towards God, that he may have mercy on him, free him from anxiety, and forgive him all his sins (15-18). His unjust enemies are many; may he be safeguarded because of his trust in God (19-21). 22 is probably a liturgical addition.

XXV (XXVI)—Examining his conscience, the psalmist does not find himself guilty of sinful ways, yet he is not thereby justified; he asks God to examine him (1-5). He desires to lead a blameless life, praising God at the altar of the sanctuary which he loves so well (6-8). May he never consort with sinners—men of blood and bribery, but keep on the right path, blessing God with the crowds at the sanctuary (9-12). It is a companion to 100, and can serve as a model for priestly life—meditation, examination, unworldliness, purity, love of the altar and of the sacred ceremonies. When the celebrant washes his hands at Mass he recites 6-12. St Thomas Aquinas (quoting Dionysius) observes that the extremities of the fingers are washed to remind the priest that he should be free from the slightest stains of sin (Summa p 3 q 83, art 5 ad 1 um).

4-5. Cf. 1:1. 6. Priests washed their hands and feet before approaching the altar in the Tabernacle, Ex 30:17-21. Hand-washing was also a sign of innocence, Deut 21:6; Ps 72:13; Mt 27:24. 'compass': 'It was the custom to walk around the altar while the sacrifices were being offered' (Agelli). 8. 'beauty': so Vg, LXX (cf. 26:4), which seems more probable than MT, where, by the transposition of the initial and final letters the word becomes 'habitation'.

XXVI (XXVII)—Hostilities have broken out, but the psalmist is not afraid; he has not sought the fight; his only desire is to serve God at the sanctuary (1-4). Recalling former occasions when God protected him, he is confident that he will celebrate victory by offering sacrifices of thanksgiving at the Tabernacle with the music of psalms (5-6). Then the tone changes entirely. Aware of the danger before him, he begs God for help (7-12). But stout confidence ends the prayer (13-14). Several commentators are of opinion that two distinct psalms have been combined; this may be so, but we must not forget the Hebrew love of antithesis—here, confidence and anxiety.

2. 'eat my flesh': see on 13:4. 3. 'in this': in what follows in 4. 'see the delight': 'enjoy the sweetness', NP. 6. 'I have gone round': see on 25:6. Here we have probably a conflation of alternative readings; see G. R. Driver in JTS 36 (1935) 147. 10a. A proverbial expression, meaning that one is bereft of nearest and dearest friends. A similar expression is found in a Babylonian poem, RB 32

344d (1923) 9. 13. 'in the land of the living'—opposed to Sheol; cf. 51:7; 55:13; 141:6. He believes that he will receive blessings (including peaceful worship at the sanctuary) during the remainder of his life.

• XXVII (XXVIII)—An urgent prayer (1-2) that God will not allow 'his anointed' and 'his people' (8), to fall into the hands of evil-doers (8). May these wicked men be punished, because they have no regard for Yahweh's works (5). As in other psalms, anxiety is balanced by joyful confidence: Yahweh is the psalmist's helper, shield and protection (6-7). 9 may have been added when the Ps was chosen for public worship.

1. 'the pit': Sheol. 2. 'thy holy temple': the shrine in the innermost part of the sanctuary, also called the Holy of Holies. 3. 'Draw me not'—like a criminal led to death. 4. 'Give thou to them', etc. 'This is not said in a malevolent spirit, but as approving of what God does' (Agelli). 7. 'And my flesh hath flourished again', etc. So LXX, Vg, Syr.; but read with MT, St Jer., NP: 'my heart exulteth, and with my song I praise him'. 9 is quoted in the Te Deum. 'rule them': 'shepherd them' (cf. 22:1); 'exalt': carry (the lambs) in the arms (cf. Is 40:11); so Knox, beautifully translating NP, 'evermore in thy arms upholding them'.

† XXVIII (XXIX)—God's power and majesty are seen in a mighty thunderstorm. Seven times the thunder crashes with Ql Yahweh—'Voice of Yahweh'. From the north the storm sweeps down upon the Lebanon range of mountains, smashing great cedars to pieces (3-5). Mountains leap, earth quakes, lightning flashes forth (6-7). The gale races southward, reaching down to the desert of Kadesh, where the sand rises up in a mad dance (8). Peal follows peal of thunder; the affrighted hinds give premature birth (but see below); the forests are stripped bare. The angels (see below) witnessing the storm, sing out praise in heaven to the glory of God (9). He who presided at the greatest of all storms, the Deluge, presides as King for ever. He will give strength and peace to his people (10-11).

1. 'ye children of God'. Angels? Cf. 88:7; Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; so Targum, Zorell, Boylan and NP (both 'probably'). Men (especially priests)? Cf. 81:6; Deut 14:1; so Ogara in VD 17 (1937) 142, Lattey and others. When the verse is repeated in 95:7 all texts read 'ye kindreds of the people', also 1 Par 16:28. 'the offspring of rams': not in MT nor 95:7, and probably due to a conflation of readings, 'elim' 'mighty' for LXX Elohim 'God' and 'elim' 'rams'. St Jer., seems to read only one line: 'Afferte Domino filios arietum'. 2. 'in his holy court': MT, St Jer., NP: 'in holy attire'. In 95:9 we find both 'courts' and 'attire'. Whether the 'courts' are those of heaven or those of the sanctuary on earth depends on the reading 'angels' or 'priests' in 1; so with 'attire'—either vestments of angels or of priests; cf. Ex 28:2. 3. 'upon the waters'. Generally understood of the Mediterranean Sea, north of the Lebanon range; so Lattey, Oesterley, NP and others. Possibly, however, the waters of the clouds are meant, as in 17:12. 6. MT reads: 'He maketh them to leap up like a calf, Lebanon and Siryon like a young wild-ox'. NP, with recent commentators, puts 'Lebanon' in the first line, and 'Sirion' in the second. Siryon is the Sidonian name for Mt Hermon. 'Lebanon and Hermon are mentioned as being the noblest mountains familiar to the Hebrews, and as being to the north of Palestine, while Kadesh (8) is to the south' (Lattey). 7. 'divideth the flame of fire': 'heaveth out flames of fire'—lightning flashing from the sky, as if cut out by the divine axe. 9. 'prepareth the stags': 'bringeth the birth-pangs on hinds' (St Jerome); hinds are known to drop their young prematurely, when frightened by thunder. Omitting one letter, NP reads: 'oaks' instead of 'hinds'; parallelism may be said to favour the correction, but MT can be retained: it describes the effect of the storm on beasts and trees' (Zorell). 'discover', in the sense of stripping the forests bare. 'in his temple': either the angels in heaven or the priests at the sanctuary, according to the interpretation given to verse 1. 'While the storm is raging on earth, all in heaven are praising God', NP. 10. 'maketh the flood to dwell': 'presided [as King] at the Flood', the first great storm recorded in OT history. He presides over all storms; yet his people have nothing to fear from the mighty Storm-King.

XXIX (XXX)—Thanksgiving after recovery from illness (2-6). The psalmist describes his state of mind before and during his sickness (7-11); then expresses gratitude for restoration to health (12-13). Originally the Ps was personal; later, after the plague mentioned in 1 Par 21, it was used for public recitation; cf. Porporato in VD 9 (1929) 236-40. Calmet refers the title, 'dedication of the house', to the dedication of Ornan's threshing-floor (1 Par 21:28-22:1); but perhaps it refers to David's own house or palace (2 Kg 5:11).

4b. Cf. 27:1. MT is incorrect against LXX, Vg, Syr, NP. He was nigh unto death, but just as he felt that he was descending to the underworld, Yahweh raised him up. 5. 'memory': name; cf. 134:13. 6. 'For a moment lasts his anger, while his favour is life-long' (MT); but see G. R. Driver in JTS 36 (July 1935) 299. 7. Like many others, when in good health he thought that he was proof against illness. 'my abundance': 'prosperity' or 'ease'. 10. A gloomy prospect of life after death; cf. 6:6; Is 38:18; no further opportunity of praising God. 12. 'joy': 'dancing', NP. 13. 'glory', i.e. soul.

XXX (XXXI)—Committing himself to God, the psalmist relies on divine protection against enemies, men who were following a false religion (2-9). He is worn out in body and mind and deserted even by his friends (10-14). But his confidence is unshaken (15-19); and he knows that his prayer is answered (20-23). He exhorts the faithful to love God and be of good cheer, for God protects the good and punishes the proud (24-25). Christ uttered 6 when dying on the Cross (Lk 23:46). We may read the whole Ps as a prayer of the suffering Redeemer.

4a. Cf. 17:3. 6. Fittingly recited at Compline. 7. 'vanities to no purpose': 'vain idols', NP; cf. Deut 32:21; Jer 8:19; Jon 2:9. 13a. 'I am forgotten from mind, like a dead man', NP. 17. 'Make thy face to shine': smile with approval. 22. 'in a fortified city': 'perhaps metaphorical for pressing difficulties' (Lattey).

XXXI (XXXII)—The second of the penitential psalms. It tells of the happiness of the man whose sins are forgiven (1-2), the torture of conscience he suffered while refusing to confess (3-4), his resolve to confess, and the forgiveness granted by God (5). He urges every pious man to pray that thereby he may be preserved from dangers (6). God is indeed a refuge for those who are in distress (7). God then speaks, promising instruction and guidance, provided that one is not obstinate like a mule or horse (8-9). In conclusion, the troubles of the wicked are contrasted with the blessings of the upright of heart (10-11).

The textual difficulties are considerable. For these we must refer the reader to the commentaries; also to Arconada in VD 9 (1929) 171-8; 193-201, and G. R. Driver in JTS 32 (1931) 256. The title ascribes the Ps to David, so does St Paul in Rom 4:6; see § 49e. He may have composed it after his confession of adultery and murder, 2 Kg 12:13.

1-2 are quoted in Rom 4:6-8. Sins that are covered and not imputed are taken away altogether and treated as non-existent. 3. Remorse of conscience affects bodily health; confession is good for the body as well as for the soul. 4b. 'whilst the thorn is fastened': possibly by the pricking of a thorn, i.e. the pricking of conscience; see my Commentary, and cf. Ez 28:24; Ac 9:5; 26:14. 'My strength was consumed as if by summer droughts', NP. 6. 'a flood of many waters'

345c —a frequent metaphor for distress and danger; cf. 17:17, etc. 8-9. God is the speaker.

d XXXII (XXXIII)—A hymn of praise, probably composed after a victory. It is 'a new song' (3), hence we may expect a reference to the conversion of the Gentiles (§ 339b), and this we find in 8, where all mankind are called upon to reverence Yahweh, the maker of the heavens, earth and seas (6, 7, 9). From heaven he looks down upon all the inhabitants of the earth; he sees their works, he knows their thoughts, for he fashioned every heart (13-15). Happy is Israel whose God is Yahweh; unhappy the Gentiles whose designs he will thwart (10-12). Military force is of no avail without reliance on him (16-19). A prayer from his trustful servants concludes the Ps (20-22).

6, 7, 9. A summary of Gen 1. We may see here a foreshadowing of the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity—'word', 'Yahweh', 'spirit of his mouth'. 'There is no doubt but that the Holy Ghost meant to glance at the mystery of the Holy Trinity, to be revealed in the New Testament' (St Robert Bellarmine).

e XXXIII (XXXIV)—Another alphabetical Ps, but letter waw is missing, and 23 is additional. The title states that it was written by David when he feigned madness at Geth (1 Kg 21:11-14). As there is nothing in the Ps itself to suggest this incident, the writer must have had some reason for the ascription. Probably David wrote it, in thanksgiving for his escape, when he returned to Jerusalem; thus it is a votive psalm. The ideas are loosely strung together, but the main theme is God's saving power and his watchful care over those who take refuge in him. Nowadays the Ps is recited at Compline on Wednesday. In the early Church it was said or sung at Mass, during the distribution of Holy Communion; cf. Apostolic Constitutions 8, 13; Catechism of St Cyril of Jerusalem 23. In the Stowe (Celtic) and Mozarabic missals 9 is found as a Communion prayer.

6. 'As he was mounting the stairs (of the scaffold on the Tower Hill), the south-east sun shined very bright in his face, whereupon he said to himself these words, lifting up his hands: "Accedite ad eum, et illuminamini, et facies vestrae non confundentur"' (Dr Hall, Life of St John Fisher). 9. Quoted in 1 Pet 2:3. The same epistle, 3:10-12, quotes 13-17a. Lucinius, a wealthy Spaniard of Baetica, wrote to St Jerome asking whether he should go to Holy Communion every day, as was customary in the churches of Rome and Spain. This verse is cited in the reply, advising him to go to Communion daily (Letter 71, 6).

f XXXIV (XXXV)—A prayer for deliverance from cruel and treacherous enemies. There are three parts, 1-10, 11-18, 19-28, each beginning with a request and ending with a promise of thanksgiving (Duhm). (i) The singer calls on God to come forth as an armed warrior and fight for him against his foes; when these are vanquished, he will rejoice and say: 'Yahweh, who is like unto thee!' (ii) He describes the base ingratitude of the enemies: they have requited good with evil; when they were sick he fasted and prayed for their recovery as if they were his nearest relatives and friends; but now that he is in trouble they are his bitterest foes. He vows to thank God in a great assembly if his life is spared. (iii) He prays that the treachery, cunning and insolence of his opponents may not prevail, and that all good men may join with him in praise of Yahweh who has vindicated the cause of his servant. With the Fathers of the Church we may read the Ps as descriptive of the sufferings of Christ. His enemies 'fulfilled' 19 by hating him without cause, Jn 15:25; his scourging may be seen in 15, and the false witnesses of 11 will recall Mt 26:60.

5. Cf. 1:4. 7. 'they have upbraided my soul': 'they have dug a pit for me', NP. 'The figure is taken from hunting' (Lattey). 11. 'things I knew not': crimes unknown to my conscience. 12. 'to the depriving me of my soul': lit. 'sterility for my soul', i.e. they denied him the fruit of his good works. 13. Prayer, fasting and almsdeeds were practised by the Hebrews to implore the mercy of God. 'my prayer shall be turned into my bosom'; either his head, bent in sorrow, uttered the prayer on to his breast (cf. Lam 2:10; Bar 2:18), or the prayer, bringing no blessing on his enemies, returned as a blessing upon himself. 14. 'so did I please': 'I walked about', MT, NP. 'as one mourning'. St Jer.: 'as a mother in mourning'; NP: 'as one that mourns his mother'. The maqeph in MT may be a relic of k; this would give: 'as a friend, as a brother . . . as a mourner, as a mother'. 15. 'yet upon my stumbling they were glad; they gathered together to scourge me, and I knew not why'. 16. 'They tore me and did not cease' (St Jer., NP). 20. A difficult verse; see Commentaries, also Kroon in VD 8 (1928) 204.

XXXV (XXXVI)—The wickedness wrought by a godless man (2-5) is contrasted with God's goodness and kindness (6-10). The psalmist prays that he may be protected from evil-doers, who ride for a fall (11-13).

2-3. Obscure. In MT 'Transgression' is personified; it is an evil oracle whispering temptation to a reprobate man, telling him that God never seeks out a sinner's iniquity, and does not hate him; cf. 9:25, 34. Another interpretation is that the wicked man flatters himself at finding that his iniquity is an object of hatred. 4. 'understand'; 'consider'. He ceases to think of doing good, like the fool in 13:2 f. 7. 'mountains of God'; the loftiest and most majestic mountains. God's justice is as high and as mighty as these; his judgements have unfathomed depth. All living creatures depend on his providence. 9. God is likened to a kind host, as in 22:5 f. 13. There seems to be a reference to some occasion unknown to us, but the meaning may be general. NP 'Behold, they have fallen, the workers of iniquity'.

XXXVI (XXXVII)—Not knowing the full truth about the hereafter, the pious Hebrew was often perplexed at seeing wicked men prosperous and good men in affliction. Here the psalmist attempts an answer to the problem. His solution is that a good Hebrew lives on after death through his 'seed', his 'posterity', his 'name', his 'house' (3, 9b, 11, 13, 22a, 23, 28b, 29, 34b, 37), while the wicked man is cut off with no earthly future (2, 9a, 10, 13, 15, 17a, 20, 22b, 28d, 34c-36, 38). The Ps is alphabetical.

3. The land is Canaan. Throughout the Ps insistence is laid on inheriting the land given by God to his Chosen People. A godly man lives on through his descendants carrying on the family name. Hence one of the reasons why the Hebrews attached importance to genealogical tables. 11a. One of the Beatitudes, Mt 5:4, but Christ gave a higher meaning to 'the land'; cf. the concluding line of the 'O Salutaris Hostia'. 13. 'his day'; the sinner's. 17. 'the arms' of the body, not military weapons. 20b. Difficult; see Commentaries. NP follows MT: 'as the splendour of the meadows', implying, presumably, that as flowers in Palestinian meadows are quickly burnt up by the sun, so do the wicked perish. For the idea in LXX, Vg, cf. Job 24:24. 22. 'as bless him . . . as curse him': 'blessed by him [Yahweh] . . . cursed by him'. 37. 'remnants': posterity, also 38.

XXXVII (XXXVIII)—The third penitential psalm. Afflicted in body and mind, because of sin, abandoned by his friends and persecuted by enemies, the psalmist implores God's help. By confession of sin he hopes that God will succour him. We may read the Ps as a description of Christ's sufferings, who became sin for us. In his second homily on this Ps, Origen has a long passage on Confession (PG 12, 1386). For fuller explanation of the text see Arconada in VD 10 (1930) 48-56 and G. R. Driver in JTS 35 (1934) 386.

2. Almost word for word in 6:2. 5. 'Like rushing waters that reach over my head and submerge me' (Agelli). 12. 'My friends and my companions stand aloof from my plague, and my neighbours stand afar off', NP. He is regarded as a leper; cf. Is 53:4; Lk 23:49. 14-15. Cf. Is 53:7.

XXXVIII (XXXIX)—'Here too, as in the last psalm, d

246d the psalmist is conscious he is being chastised for sin ; but the interest is not primarily either in the sin or in the chastisement, but in his own mental attitude' (Lattey). With wicked men, the psalmist will not discuss his physical and mental sufferings (2-4). He will address himself to God, to learn something about the brevity and emptiness of human existence (5-7). He comes to realize that man's only hope is in God, and that chastisement is because of transgression (8-12). With tears he asks for two favours before his sojourn on earth is finished, forgiveness and restoration of health (13-14).

8. 'from good things'. 'I kept absolute silence, speaking neither good nor bad' (Kirkpatrick); cf. Gen 31:24. 4. 'In my musing the fire kindled', MT, NP. Silence only made his feelings more bitter. He must speak to somebody; he will speak to God. 6. 'my substance': Heb. lit. 'duration' (of life); NP 'my life'. 8. 'substance': 'hope' or 'confidence' (MT, NP, St Jer.). 11b. 'By the blow of thy hand I am come to an end. With chastisement dost thou correct man's iniquity; like a moth thou dost consume his loveliness'. 13cd. Cf. Gen 23:4; 1 Par 29:15; Heb 11:13. For the Christian interpretation see Eph 2:19; 1 Pet 2:11. 14. Cf. Job 10:20 f. 'He does not speak about a future life, but he does not deny it' (note in NP).

• XXXIX (XL)—A 'new song' (4); hence it has Messianic import. NP remarks: 'Ps 39 (40) is Messianic (cf. 7-9), and according to many, especially the older commentators, it is Messianic in a direct sense'. We may connect it with the preceding Ps. There the psalmist put his trust in God alone. This confidence has not been misplaced. God has heard his cry; has lifted him out of the slough of despondency; has put a new song into his mouth, has shown him that many will be brought to put their trust in God, turning away from idolatry (2-6). Then he foretells the end of Jewish sacrifices, and the coming of One whose delight it will be to do God's will. In a great assembly this One will proclaim good tidings of God's justice, truth, mercy and salvation (7-11). So completely does the tone then change that some commentators think that 12-18 is a separate Ps; and, indeed, 15-18 were detached to form a hymn for the memorial part of the sacrifice, Ps 69. Yet, on reading 12-18 attentively, we see that they tally with the description of the Sufferer in Ps 21. Encompassed by evils and laden with sin, he prays that God may hasten to help him, and that his mocking enemies may be brought to confusion. 7-9 are put into the mouth of Christ in Heb 10:1-10.

4. Many hearing the new canticle will come to worship God. 5. 'vanities and lying follies'; idolatry, with its lying oracles. 7. 'thou hast pierced ears for me'. MT: 'ears has thou dug for me' (an extraordinary mode of expression, Oesterley), which is generally explained in the sense that God made the cavity of the psalmist's ear, and that he is always ready to hear and obey God's will. LXX: 'a body hast thou fashioned for me', quoted in Heb 10:5. 8. 'In the head of the book'; 'In the book-roll', i.e. the book itself; the parchment was wound round rollers. What book is meant? The OT in general (Didymus, Bellarmine, Boylan, NP)? The Mosaic Law (Targum, Calès, Oesterley)? 'Perhaps the passage in 1 Kg 15:22' (Boylan)? 10. Cf. 21:28. 13. 'my iniquities': Christ became sin for us.

† XL (XLI)—The inspired prophet sings this psalm in the person of Christ. In the first part he speaks of Christ; then follow the words of the Mediator speaking to his Father' (Breviarium in Psalmos, PL 26, 1003). St Cyril of Alexandria, St Augustine, Cassiodorus and many others interpret the Ps in a Messianic sense (PG 69, 991; PL 36, 452; 70, 294).

2. 'the needy and the poor' (one): cf. 39:18. None so lowly and poor as Christ our Lord, 2 Cor 8:9. 4b. 'thou hast turned all his couch in his sickness': probably in the sense of helping him almost as a nurse; see parallel. 5. 'Is this said by Christ? Is this said by our Head, who is sinless? Can it be he? Yes, 346f indeed, he is speaking for his members; for the cry of his members is his own cry . . . In him, then, we find our cry: Heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee', St Augustine, who quotes 21:2; Rom 6:6. 9. 'an unjust word': MT 'a word of Belial', which St Jerome renders: 'verbum diaboli'. It would seem that this base (the probable meaning of 'Belial') word or resolution is given in the next line: 'He that is lying down shall never get up again'. NP puts the first line also into the mouths of the enemies: 'A malign disease is put into him', changing d'ḥār to dēḥer; yet notice the same expression in 100:3 and Deut 15:9. 10. Christ teaches us that this was fulfilled by Judas' treachery, Jn 13:18. See Porporato in VD 12 (1932) 70-5. 14. A doxology closing the first book of the Psalter.

BOOK II

XLI (XLII)—The second book of the Psalter comprises Pss 41-71. The first two should be read as one, as the recurring refrain indicates; 41:6, 12; 42:5. We begin the hymns written by 'the sons of Core (Qorah)', men appointed by David to direct liturgical music, 1 Par 25:4-8; 6:33-37. Notice the difference of tone and style between these Pss and those ascribed to David.

The singer is an exile from Jerusalem, living near the Jordan (7). Probably he is a Levite, a companion of David in his flight across the Jordan at the time of Absalom's revolt, 2 Kg 15:16 ff. His one desire is to return to the sanctuary (3). Enemies tell him that he is abandoned by God (4, 11); but he takes heart, confident that God will again allow him to take part in the festivals at the sanctuary (5, 6, 9, 10, 12).

3. 'appear before the face of God': come on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, Ex 23:17, etc. 5. 'poured out my soul', in earnest prayer, 1 Kg 1:15; Lam 2:19. 'I shall go over into the place of the wonderful tabernacle'. It is not clear whether he is recalling past pilgrimages or looking forward to one in the future. NP follows MT sāk 'throng', but the word is very dubious and only found here. Adding one letter we get māsāk, the term in Exodus and Numbers for the curtain at the entrance of the Tabernacle. What more likely than that a Qorahite exile should sign to be back at the entrance of the sanctuary? The Qorahites had charge of the outer curtain, Num 3:31. 7. 'Hermonim from the little hill': the Hermon range of mountains and the hill called 'Misar'. The note in NP places Misar 3 kilometres S. of Banyas: see Bechtel in Bi 6 (1925) 405; McClellan in CBQ 2 (1940) 68. 8-9. The waters roaring over the falls remind him of dangers threatening to engulf him; but Bechtel suggests that the torrents, calling one to another, say to the psalmist: 'Day and night Yahweh sends his mercy; sing with me a hymn to the living God'. Agelli, however, thinks that the psalmist consoles himself with the thought that God sends his mercy, like an angel, to protect him by day, while at night he consoles himself by singing psalms.

XLII (XLIII)—A continuation of the previous Ps, b unfortunately separated from it in the divine office. The singer asks God to champion his cause against an ungodly nation (1). Why has God cast him off? (2). May light and truth bring him back to Jerusalem, where, at the altar, he will make thanksgiving with harp and hymn (3-5a). The refrain concludes the psalm (5b-6). This Ps is recited at the beginning of Mass, the words 'Introibo ad altare Dei' making it appropriate.

1. 'the unjust and deceitful man': probably Achitophel, 2 Kg 15:31. 3. God's light and truth are represented as angels. With the whole verse, cf. 2 Kg 15:25.

XLIII (XLIV)—The singer recalls the tradition that the conquest of Canaan, under Josue, was not due to 3476 force of arms but to divine aid (2-4). Now, in a present emergency, he exhorts his people to rely on the name of God, not on bows and swords (5-9), and this, in spite of a recent defeat with terrible slaughter (10-23). A passionate cry for help closes the Ps (23-26).

Almost every date when Israel suffered defeat has been suggested for this Ps. St John Chrysostom thought that it predicted the trials of the Maccabean age (see Lesson IV in the breviary for the 4th Sunday of October), an opinion followed by Theodoret and Euthymius (PG 80, 1177; 128, 477). Kirkpatrick assigns it to the period of the monarchy; Delitzsch to David's campaign against the Ammonites and Syrians; so also Vigouroux and Fillion. Calés thinks that the original Ps was written during the Persian period, then adapted in Maccabean times. The note in NP states that a Maccabean date is not necessarily indicated, and that the occasion may be in Ezechias' reign (cf. 4 Kg 18:13, 22-27; 19:4, 14-19) or the troublesome times that followed the death of Josias, 4 Kg 23:25-30, or the persecution in the Persian period.

2. OT tradition; cf. Ex 10:2; 12:26, etc. 3. 'thou plantedst them'—the Chosen People, like a vine on new soil; cf. Ex 15:17; Ps 79:9 ff. 'cast them out': prob. 'spread them out' (cf. 79:12), i.e. the Israelites, like a spreading vine (Agelli). 4d. 'the light of thy countenance'—God's encouraging smile. 6b. 'despise': MT, NP 'trample down'. 13b. 'and thou hast made no profit out of the sale', MT, NP. 20a. 'in the place of affliction': so NP; but MT: 'place of jackals'. Some moderns prefer St Jer. 'in loco draconum'; the dragons may be the Egyptians, cf. 73:14; Ez 29:3; 32:2. 22. Quoted by St Paul to encourage Roman Christians to face persecution, Rom 8:36. 25. 'our soul', i.e. person; see Joüon in Bi 11 (1930) 82 f.

d XLIV (XLV)—The poem is a marriage ode delivered on the occasion of a king's wedding. Apart from the introduction (2) and conclusion (17-18) it has two parts, the first dedicated to the king, and the second to the queen. The actual wedding ceremony is the setting for the expression of the poet's thoughts: he follows the bridegroom's procession to the bride's house, assists at the meeting of the two groups and at the return to the royal palace, and expresses the sentiments which the magnificent spectacle suggests to him', Pödechard in RB 32 (1923) 28.

But although the poem may have been written in honour of a royal wedding (probably Solomon's), the inspired writer's thoughts reach beyond the actual event; he sees a king fairer than an ordinary man (3), one whom he addresses as 'God' (7, 8), one whose throne is to remain for ever (7), whose rule is to extend over the world, and whose name is to be remembered through all generations (17, 18). It is not surprising, therefore, that Jews and Christians have seen here the espousals between the Messiah and his people. The Targum treats the Ps as strictly Messianic; St John Chrysostom could say that on this point Jews and Christians were agreed (PG 55, 183); St Thomas Aquinas gives the Catholic interpretation: 'The subject-matter of this psalm is the espousals between Christ and the Church'. On feasts of the Blessed Virgin, the Ps is recited at Matins; 10-16 are applied to her as the Spouse of the Holy Ghost and the Queen of Heaven.

8. In reference to Christ, cf. Lk 4:22; Jn 7:46. 4. The mighty one (cf. Is 9:6) goes forth like the Messianic warrior in Apoc 6:2. 6. 'under thee shall people fall' should be read as a parenthesis. 7. 'So clearly does this verse speak of the divinity that no other exposition is possible' (Agelli). 'The poet now addresses the king directly as God. . . . The context which says, therefore hath God anointed thee, shows that in 6 the words, thy throne, O God, are addressed to the king' (Oesterley). 'In the OT princes and judges are also called by the title Elohim, as taking the place of God (cf. Ps 81:1 f.); but the psalmist, writing under the influence of inspiration, must here be deemed to be indicating the divinity of the Messiah' (note in NP). See also Ogara in VD 14 (1934) 81. St Paul quotes 7, 8 in proof of Christ's divinity, Heb 1:8; cf. Lk 1:32 f. For the anointing of King Messiah cf. 2:2. 8. St Augustine regards the first 'God' as a vocative, addressed to the Messiah: 'O tu Deus, unxit te Deus tuus' (PL 36, 505). 'God has anointed (his Son) with the oil of gladness, an oil of coronation that will bring more gladness than it usually brings to kings anointed' (Boylan, WV Heb 1:8). See also Arconada in Bi 17 (1936) 323 note; and cf. Is 61:1; Lk 4:18. 9. Put full stop after 'garments', and continue: 'From ivory palaces [cf. 3 Kg 22:39; Am 3:15] strung music gladdens thee. Kings' daughters come to meet thee' (so NP after Pödechard; but, possibly, are among thy maids of honour). 10. The queen-bride, in the Messianic sense, is the Church. She takes her place on the right of the bridegroom. Her dress of cloth-of-gold is made of 'gold of Ophir' (Heb.), the finest gold then known, obtained at a place 'on the sea coast of southern Arabia or of east Africa' (note in NP); cf. Is 13:12; Ez 16:13; 1 Par 29:4. St Thomas remarks: 'The whole of this can be interpreted of the Blessed Virgin Mary, who is queen and mother of the king, and who stands above all the choirs of angels in her golden dress, gilded by the divinity; not that she is God, but because she is the mother of God'.

11. Address to the queen. In her love of the king, she is to forget those dear to her before her marriage. (Jews must forget the old dispensation, and Gentiles their pagan worship.) In return, rich nations (symbolized by the Tyrians) will pay her homage; cf. 21:30; 71:10 f.; Is 60:4-6. 14. A stop should be put after 'within'. Within what? Some say 'within the palace'; but the queen has not yet entered the palace (16). NP changes the adverb into a verb ('Tota decora ingreditur filia regis'), but this is without warrant. St Jer: 'intrinsic' is nearer the meaning. The poet is interested in the bride's wedding-dress; 'within' refers to the lining of the dress; even that is beautiful. The second line should read: 'Inwrought with gold is her robe of check with diamond pattern'; cf. Is 61:10; Apoc 21:2. 15b. The bridesmaids; cf. Mt 25:1; Apoc 14:4. Applying this to the Blessed Virgin, St Thomas remarks that her virgins are led to Christ by the observance of chastity and other virtues. 17. A new generation. We can apply 'princes over all the earth' to the Apostles and their successors.

XLV (XLVI)—A severe earthquake has shaken Gentile territory (3, 4, 7, 9), but, because of God's presence in her midst, Sion has escaped (5, 6). Gentile power will eventually be overthrown, and God will be exalted among the nations (8-12). We may read the Ps as descriptive of the Catholic Church, firm as a rock amid the turmoils of history. Because God is in her midst, she cannot be overthrown.

2b. 'a fully proven [lit. 'to be much found'] help in troubles', MT. 4b. MT: 'Mountains shake at the swelling thereof'. 5. Perhaps a reference to the waters of Siloe (Siloam); cf. the Ps with Is 8, esp. v 6. Others understand the river as metaphorical for the temple or God himself, cf. Is 33:16-21; Jl 3:18. 9. Possibly a reference to the defeat of Sennacherib (Is 37:36), but symbolical of a greater peace.

XLVI (XLVII)—In the Messianic age all nations will give praise to the God of Israel (2-5). He will be enthroned as King amid jubilation (6-7). Gentile rulers will unite with the children of Abraham in worshipping the true God (8-10). 'The Ps, as the Fathers saw, is a sublime presage of the future', Lagrange in RB 14 (1905) 196. It is obviously a Lauds' Ps (Monday), and one for Ascension Day.

5. Cf. Ex 15:17; Am 8:7. 6. 'is ascended'—as king on his throne. 10b. 'Because the shield of the earth' [powerful rulers, protectors of their peoples] belong to God, he is greatly exalted'; cf. 88:19.

XLVII (XLVIII)—A eulogy of Sion, the city of God (2-4), protected from attack, because of the presence of God. The invading kings became dismayed and 348c took to flight (5-8). Thanksgiving is made at the sanctuary (9-12); then the city's fortresses are inspected (12-15). The Ps is a companion to 45. Again we may apply it to the invincibility of the Catholic Church.

3. 'A beautiful height, the joy of all the earth, is mount Sion', MT. 'on the sides of the north': the extreme north was regarded as the assembly place of pagan gods; see Jack, The Ras Shamra Tablets, 20, and cf. Is 14:13 ff.; Ez 1:4; Book of Enoch 24, 25. The psalmist seems to be saying that the only God resides at Sion. Cf. Mt 5:35. 4. 'houses': Heb. 'towers' or 'palaces'. 6. 'wondered, troubled, were moved': Heb. 'amazed, dismayed, hurried away in alarm'. 8. 'ships of Tharsis': Tarshish was the Phoenician colony in Spain. Large ships were required for the long voyage, and the expression became indicative of great merchantmen (Is 2:16). As these mighty vessels are powerless against a strong east wind, so were Sion's enemies powerless against God. 12. 'daughters of Sion': the villages near Jerusalem. 14. 'distribute her houses': Heb. 'count her forts'.

d XLVIII (XLIX)—Again the problem of the prosperity of wicked men. In Ps 36 the solution was found in the possessing of the land by the good Hebrew and his posterity, and the cutting off of the evil-doer. Nevertheless the pious saw around them godless men not only growing rich and prosperous but acquiring land and giving their names to properties. Was there a further solution? Here the Korahite poet invites all men to give ear to his teaching (2-5). Rich men must die, and they cannot take their wealth with them (6-10). They go down to Sheol, where the upright gain dominion over them (11-15). And God will take the pious from the grasp of Sheol (16). So good men need not be anxious at seeing wicked men becoming rich, because their wealth will be of no advantage to them in a land where they will never see the light (17-21).

3. 'earthborn and sons of men': men of humble birth and men of high degree. 5. 'a parable': possibly in the sense of 'a mystery' (Lattey), but it may refer to the refrain, 13, 21. 6. 'my heel': NP 'insidiantium', 'my treacherous foes' (Boylan). 8-10. Difficult; see commentaries and McClellan in CBQ 2 (1940) 176-8. The general sense is that money cannot purchase prolongation of life from God. By the Mosaic Law, Ex 21:30, a homicide could, in certain circumstances, escape capital punishment by the payment of compensation. 11. 'He shall not see destruction': his money will not save him from 'the pit' of Sheol. Full stop after 'destruction'. 'leave their riches to strangers'; cf. 16:14. 12. Men who proudly gave their names to towns or districts possess, after death, only the space of their tombs. Agelli instances Caesarea, Alexandria, Antioch, Seleucia. 13. 'and is become like to them': MT, NP 'that perish'. Pöschard suggests that there is a comparison between the wealthy 'swell' and the fat beast ready for slaughter. 14. 'afterwards': NP 'and this is the end of them' seems inferior to Symmachus 'they who come after them' (their posterity). 15. 'death shall feed upon them': 'Death becomes their shepherd', MT. In Sheol 'the just shall have dominion over (the wicked) in the morning'. What is meant by 'the morning'? (So Heb. against NP which interprets: 'Cito', and attaches the word to the next line.) For the correct meaning see on 16:15. The reference is to the awaking from the night of death. The just, after death, shall have dominion over the wicked. Cf. Wis 3:8. 'and their help', etc.: the meaning of the Heb. is that the forms, or shades, of the wicked will wear out in Sheol. 16. 'receive me': Heb. 'take me'. The truth flashes across the mind of the inspired writer: while the wicked go down to Sheol, like a flock of sheep, there, in darkness, and under the dominion of the just, to waste away, God 'redeems' (pādāh, as in 8) the lives of the just, taking them from the grasp (lit.

hand) of Sheol, as he took Enoch and Elias from death, Gen 5:24; 4 Kg 2:1-11. A later psalmist will tell us that they are taken 'into glory', 72:24. See also note in NP. 19. 'his soul will be blessed': Heb. means that 'the rich man congratulates himself on his happy life' (Zorell). The second member is better taken as a parenthesis: 'And men praise thee when all goes well with thee', referring to 'the popular esteem of success and wealth' (Sutcliffe).

XLIX (L)—A theophany. With lightning and storm, Yahweh, summoning all the inhabitants of the earth, comes from Sion to hold an assize. First he judges those who mean to serve him well—'his pious ones', 'my people'. Their external worship is satisfactory, but he is not honoured by this alone. All creatures offered in sacrifice—private herds, wild animals, birds and reptiles—are his already, for 'the world is mine and the fulness thereof'; over and above these material offerings he requires the spiritual worship of the heart (1-15). Then he judges Israelites who break his commandments, thinking that because they are children of the covenant all is well with them. He warns them that he will punish them (16-22). Again he insists on thanksgiving from the heart (23). See Rinaldi in VD 18 (1938) 43-6, 109-14.

2. 'the loveliness of his beauty': cf. Lam 2:15. 7. God is the speaker. 11. 'the beauty of the field'. The Heb. probably means 'reptiles'; 'whatever moves in the field is mine' (Rinaldi). 14. He does not condemn sacrifices as such, but sacrifices offered without proper dispositions of heart; cf. 1 Kg 15:22; Os 6:6; etc. 17. 'my words': the ten commandments. He speaks of three of these, against stealing, adultery and bearing false witness. 23b. 'And he that walketh uprightly, I will show him the salvation of God', NP. We may read a Messianic interpretation into 'the salvation of God'; cf. Simeon's Nunc Dimittis.

L (LI)—The Miserere. In the old Roman and Benedictine Offices it was recited every day at Lauds. Pope Pius X partially restored this custom by placing it in the second scheme for Lauds. In the general arrangement it is recited at Matins on Wednesday. 349a

An act of contrition, confession and supplication uttered by a repentant sinner. According to the title he is David, who had committed adultery with Bethsabee. As satisfaction for his sin he promises to strive to lead sinners back to God, by preaching divine justice. Instead of a merely external sacrifice, he offers the tribute of a contrite and humble heart. Besides the Commentaries, consult Galdos in VD 10 (1930) 67-79 and Arconada in VD 11 (1931) 197-206.

3-5. There are three terms in MT, 'iniquity', 'sin', 'transgression'. The first refers to the state of the soul, which needs washing, the second to the evil, which is to be cleansed away, and the third to the violation of God's commandment, which violation must be blotted out. 6-c-d. Various interpretations are offered; see Commentaries. NP: 'that thou mayest be seen to be just in thy sentence, right in thy judgement'. St Paul quotes the text to teach that God will always prevail in judgement over man's iniquities, Rom 3:4. 7. 'Catholic tradition rightly sees here an indication of the doctrine of original sin' (NP)—not, however, that the psalmist understood the doctrine in the full sense. See § 324e. 9. Hyssop is a caper-plant, 3 Kg 4:33, the sprigs of which were tied into a bunch and used for sprinkling, Ex 12:22; Lev 14:4; Num 19:6. 10. 'bones that have been humbled': crushed by God. 12. 'a right spirit': 'the spirit of a steadfast man', G. R. Driver in JTS 43 (1942) 156. The 'perfect spirit' (14) is a 'generous' (NP) or noble spirit. 16. 'Deliver me from blood', from the guilt of having shed blood—the blood of Urias. 18. External ritual without inward contrition will not satisfy God; see § 348e. 20-21. Probably liturgical additions made after the destruction of Jerusalem, 586 B.C.; see § 49f. Mgr Knox refers to the fortifications mentioned in 2 Kg 5:9.

LI (LII)—A warning to a powerful mischief-maker b

349b and tale-bearer, who, according to the title, is Doeg, 1 Kg 21:7; 22:9 ff. God will bring him to ruin (3-7). Good men will be glad to see him punished (8-9). The Ps was probably written as a votive offering, when David was able to revisit the house of God, there to give thanks for his escape (10-11).

3-4. The Vg reading and division seem best. Doeg's tongue, like a sharp razor, brought about a bloody massacre, 1 Kg 22:18 f. 8. Not with malicious gloating, but with reverential awe will good men witness the retribution. 9. 'prevailed in his vanity'. The true reading is found in Targum and Syr. 'in his wealth', parallel to 'his riches'. The wicked man regarded wealth as power.

c LII (LIII)—A second edition of Ps 13. The chief variants are 'iniquities' instead of 'ways' (2); 'God' instead of 'the Lord' (3, 6); the omission of the passage that crept into 13 (LXX, Vg) from Rom 3:13-18, and a different text in 6c-d: 'For God hath scattered the bones of them that please men [MT, NP: 'of those encamped against thee']: they have been confounded [MT: 'Thou hast confounded them'] because God hath despised them'. This variation is deliberate. We suggested that Ps 13 was originally a poem on Pharaoh and the Egyptians at the time of the Exodus. This new edition probably celebrates the failure of Sennacherib to capture Jerusalem.

d LIII (LIV)—A prayer for help against impious enemies (3-5). The psalmist is confident that God will help him (6-7). He promises to offer sacrifice in thanksgiving (8-9). Reciting the Ps at Prime, we may connect it with the sacrifice of the Mass and thank God for victory over temptations.

8. 'I will freely sacrifice to thee'. The freewill-offering was not an obligatory sacrifice, but one offered in gratitude to God, Ex 35:29. 9. 'my eye hath looked down upon my enemies'. Complete victory. The expression probably originated from the custom of treading on the neck of a vanquished foe. Cf. the inscription on Mesha's stele (Moabite Stone); also 58:12; 90:8; 111:8; 117:7.

e LIV (LV)—Physically and mentally distressed by evils brought upon the city at a time of rebellion, the psalmist would fain escape into solitude, there to rest with God (2-9). May God bring the designs of the rebels to confusion. At their head is a once trusted friend, now turned traitor (10-16). The psalmist is sure that his prayer will be heard because these men are God's enemies (17-20). The duplicity of the traitor is described (21-22). A miserable fate awaits these bloody and deceitful men (23-24).

The Ps was probably written at the time of Absalom's rebellion. The treacherous friend may well be Achitophel. But, as Christians and following the example of the Fathers, we may read it as descriptive of the sufferings of the Son of David. See Eusebius of Caesarea, Origen, St Athanasius, St Hilary, St Augustine (PG 23, 473; 12, 1463; 27, 249; PL 9, 347; 36, 628). Kirkpatrick quotes the heading of a MS of St Jerome's Latin Version: 'The voice of Christ against the Jewish rulers and the traitor Judas'.

3. 'in my exercise' of mind: anxiety. 5. 'My soul is sorrowful even unto death', Mt 26:38. 9. 'from pusillanimity of spirit and a storm'; MT, NP 'from the stormy wind and tempest'. 10a. Allusion to punishments that befell former enemies of God—Dathan, Abiron and the builders of Babel, Num 16:30-34; Gen 11:7-9. 13. We may apply this to Christ's grief at the fall of Judas. 14. 'a man of one mind, my guide, and my familiar': MT 'mine equal, my companion, and my friend'. 15. Heb. has 'with whom I took sweet counsel, we walked together in the house of God with the throng (of worshippers)'; but LXX, Syr, Sym, Vg: 'in concord' gives better parallelism. 16. Again an allusion to the fate of Dathan and Abiron. 19b. 'for many were against me' (so St Jer.). 20. 'no change'. The context suggests the sense of moral change—amendment'

(Calès). Full stop after 'God'; then (21): 'He hath stretched forth his hand against those who were at peace with him: he hath profaned the pact (of friendship)'. 22. 'they are divided', etc.: 'Smoother than butter was his face, but war was in his heart. Softer than oil were his words, yet they were drawn swords' (MT, NP). He was a smirking hypocrite. 23. 'care'. The Heb. word occurs only here; St Jer. 'caritatem tuam'. Cf. 1 Pet 5:7. 24. 'shall not live out half their days'. Premature death will come upon them; cf. Is 38:10; Jer 17:11; Ps 101:25. Judas ended his life by suicide.

LV (LVI)—A prayer for help against enemies who are trampling on the psalmist, spying on him, and lying in wait to kill him (2, 3, 6-9). He trusts in God, knowing that God will protect him (4, 5, 10-12). The danger over, he comes to the sanctuary to make the thank-offering he had vowed (13-14).

4. 'From the height of the day'. The best rendering is that of St Jer., NP: 'O Most High'. 6. 'detested' is 'distort'. 7. 'They will dwell': 'They gather together' (MT, NP). 8. 'for nothing shalt thou save them': 'Let there be no escape for them'; cf. St Jer. 'Quia nullus est salus in eis'. 9c. 'As also in thy promise'. 'Are they not in thy record book?' (MT, St Jer., NP)—referring to the tears. 12-13. The psalmist had vowed that if his life was spared, he would offer thanksgiving at the sanctuary. He fulfils his vow by composing this Ps. 14. 'please': 'walk', MT, NP.

LVI (LVII)—Although beset by enemies (4, 5, 7) the psalmist is confident that God will help him (2-3). With a joyful heart he promises to sing to the Gentiles a hymn of God's mercy and truth (8-11). A refrain occurs in 6, 12.

2. 'the shadow of thy wings'. Like a nestling under the mother bird; cf. Mt 23:37. Reference to the wings of the cherubs over the Ark is less likely. 5c. 'I slept troubled'. No text is satisfactory. Probably: 'My soul is among lions: I must lie down among men blazing (with hate)—the sons of men; whose teeth are spears and arrows, and whose tongue is a sharp sword'. 9. 'my glory': my soul, cf. 7:6.

LVII (LVIII)—An indictment of corrupt judges—their disregard of justice, their lying, their deafness to the pleadings of the innocent, their maladministration of the law (2-6). In a series of vivid images, the psalmist describes the awful punishments that await these judges (7-10). Good men, witnessing the retribution, will rejoice (11-12). The text is very obscure in parts.

4. 'are alienated from the womb': become estranged from the moral law in their earliest years; cf. Gen 8:21; Is 48:8. 5. 'madness': Heb 'poison'. The Arabs distinguish the "deaf" serpent from that which answers the call of the charmer by hissing' (Kirkpatrick). 6. 'the wizard that charmeth wisely': Heb. 'the skilful spell-binder'. 7-10. Vivid oriental poetry. 9 and 10 'are a famous crux interpretum, and no satisfactory sense has yet been made of them', G. R. Driver in JTS 34 (1933) 41. NP gives qb correctly: 'Like a woman's abortion', but instead of 'which does not see the sun', we prefer: 'let them not see the sun' (cf. LXX). NP is doubtful in 10: 'Before your pots feel the thorn, while it is green, a whirlwind will sweep it away', for the Heb. word here translated 'whirlwind' always means God's anger. For the idea of God's sweeping anger, see Jer 30:23 f. Just as a violent storm uproots and sweeps away young thorn-bushes (cf. LXX, St Jer.) before they grow thick and hard, so will God in his anger sweep these wicked judges from the earth. 'as alive', may be an oath, as God lives! 11. 'hands': Heb 'feet'. The picture is that of a field of slaughter through which the just wade in the blood of the wicked, happy to know that there is a Judge who avenges injustice.

LVIII (LIX)—A prayer for deliverance from enemies who lie in wait to take the psalmist's life (2-8). They curse, they lie, they blaspheme divine providence; but God laughs at these dogs (8, 9, 11b-14, 16). In thanksgiving for his escape the psalmist sings of God's 350a might and kindness (17). A double refrain occurs in 7, 15 and 10-11a, 18. This 'exceedingly difficult Ps' (Briggs) seems to be composite: 9 is borrowed from 2:4; 5b and 6 are foreign to the context, and 14 is awkward. Perhaps a Ps, written when Saul sent men to kill David (see title) was adapted as a national prayer when hostile nations threatened the existence of Israel.

4. 'they have caught my soul': 'they lie in wait for my life', MT, NP. 7. 'growl like dogs and prowling around the city', MT, NP. The spies, lurking at night near David's house, are likened to wild dogs, which keep out of the way in the day-time, but come into the town at night to prowl for food. 8. 'Who hath heard us?' They deny that God cares about what happens on earth; cf. 9:25, 32, 34; 63:6. 10. 'O my strength to thee will I sing'; cf. 18. Syr. has 'sing' in both places. 12. 'slay them not'. Perhaps 'the psalmist wants them to be a lesson to his people, seeing them unable to brew mischief' (Eerdmans). 14. 'Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may cease to be', NP. 17. 'in the morning': poetically, after a night of distress (BDB), rather than at the morning sacrifice.

b LIX (LX)—During a military campaign, the situation has become so serious that defeat seems inevitable (3-6); but recollection of a divine promise brings confidence (7-10). God will again lead his people to victory (11-12). Human endeavours may fail, but with God's help success is certain (13-14).

3. 'thou hast been angry, O turn back to us!'; but the second clause may mean 'thou hast turned hostile towards us'; cf. Jos 24:20. 4. The disaster threatening Israel is likened to an earthquake. 6. 'thy beloved', a name of Israel, God's darling children. 8b. It is uncertain whether this and what follows to 10 give the divine oracle or are spoken by David. Agelli thinks that the oracle is that of 2 Kg 3:18. The places mentioned are E. and W. of the Jordan. 'The vale of tabernacles' is Succoth, E. of Jordan, in the territory of Gad, Jos 13:27. 9. 'the strength of my head'. Ephraim, a warrior tribe, provided military forces (Agelli), while Judah was the political centre, Gen 49:10. 10. Moab, the pagan territory E. of the Dead Sea, was subject to David; no honorific title is given to it, it is his 'washing-basin' (MT, NP), perhaps for washing the feet of the victorious warrior. Edom, the extensive tract of country S. of the Dead Sea, has also a menial role—to pick up the master's sandals, unless it means that David will take possession of that land, Ru 4:7. The foreigners are the Philistines. 11. 'the strong city'. 'Probably Bosra, Gen 36:33; Is 34:6; Am 1:12, etc., the capital of Edom, a city highly fortified and difficult of access', NP, note.

c LX (LXI)—A fugitive from enemies, the psalmist prays for aid and protection (2-4). He is confident that he will return to the sanctuary (5-6). 7-9 are the fulfilment of his vow; he prays for undisturbed possession of his throne for many years. The Targum interprets the king (7) as the Messiah. David's throne was to remain for ever because of his Messianic Son; Lk 1:32 f.

3. 'the ends of the earth': the confines of the land whither David has gone to escape from Absalom; cf. 2 Kg 15:22-26. 5. 'the covert of thy wings'. Here the reference is probably to the wings of the cherubs over the Ark, for the parallel line speaks of the tabernacle. 6. The inheritance is Canaan. 7. Cf. 2 Kg 7:12-17.

d LXI (LXII)—Only in God does the singer trust for deliverance from enemies (2-5). The people are exhorted to have the same confidence as their leader (6-9). Man is nothing compared with God; extortion and theft avail for naught (10-11). The singer ends by reminding the people of God's power and mercy revealed at Sinai (12-13). 'The different ways in which this psalm is interpreted is the measure of the difficulties presented by it; difficulties which are increased by the uncertainty of the text in several of the verses' (Oesterley).

2. 'Only in God is my soul at rest', NP. The key-word of the Ps is Only 2, 3, 5, 6, 7, 10. 5. 'I ran in thirst' is from LXX ἐν δίψει, which is a corruption of ἐν ψεύδει (Agelli), and ἐδραμον is mistaken by Vg as 1st person sing., whereas it is 3rd plur. Read, therefore, with NP: 'they delight in falsehood'. 6. 'my patience'; 'my trust'. 10. 'Truly nothing are sons of men; in the scales they would rise up by their nothingness, all together', McClellan in CBQ 3 (1941) 55. NP: 'Only breath are sons of men, delusive are sons of men; in the scales they rise, altogether they are lighter than breath'. 12. God spoke on one solemn occasion, at Sinai, when he uttered two truths, namely that power and mercy belong to him; cf. Ex 20:5 f. 13b. Quoted in Rom 2:6. On the day of judgement God will render to every man according to the good or evil he has done during life.

LXII (LXIII)—A morning prayer (2) of a king (12) who is hiding from his foes (3, 10, 11). He expresses his love for God's sanctuary, his delight in prayer and his reliance on divine aid (3-9). His enemies will be punished and reduced to silence (10-12). The Ps, one of the most beautiful in the Psalter, has been part of the Church's morning prayers from early times; cf. Apost. Constit., PG 1, 744. Nowadays it is recited at Lauds on Sundays and proper feasts.

2. 'Soul' and 'flesh' make up the whole man. 3. 'I contemplate thee', MT, NP. 5. 'lift up my hands': in prayer; cf. 27:2. 6. By prayer the soul is nourished as if with marrow and fatness. 7. 'in the morning': Heb. 'watches'—the night-watches, as parallelism shows. 11. 'foxes': 'jackals', animals that devour carcasses.

LXIII (LXIV)—A prayer for protection from slanderers, who, disbelieving in divine intervention, conspire against the psalmist (2-7). God will punish them suddenly; the upright of heart will rejoice in awe (8-11).

4b. 'They discharge bitter words like arrows', G. R. Driver in JTS 43 (1942) 158. 7. 'Man shall come to a deep heart'. MT has literally: 'And the inward part of each and a deep heart', rendered by NP: 'And the mind and heart of each are deep'. LXX has 'Each one approaches (to attack) with a deep heart'; cf. Is 29:15. Kroon declaims against preachers who use this text in sermons on the Sacred Heart, VD 9 (1929) 164. 8-9a. Prob.: 'God will shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly they shall be wounded; and their tongues shall fail them', i.e. their plans will fall into confusion. NP: 'their tongue shall prepare ruin for them'. 9b. 'were troubled': NP 'wag their heads', but St Jer. 'shall flee away' (in terror) may be correct.

LXIV (LXV)—Praise to God in Sion (2-3). After confessing their sins (4), the people express delight at being present at the sanctuary (5), worshipping God who made the mountains and the seas (6-9), and gives to men the fruits of the earth (10). A parenthetic blessing is invoked on the soil (11). From God come all good things—pastures and wooded hills, flocks of sheep, valleys golden with corn—and all join in the hymn of joy (12-14). Obviously a harvest hymn, sung probably at the feast of Firstfruits (Pentecost).

2-3. Fittingly chosen as the Introit of a Requiem Mass. NP, with LXX B and St Jer. omit 'in Jerusalem', but parallelism seems to favour its insertion, and haplography would easily explain the omission, the verb being y'sullām. 'all flesh' includes Gentiles with Jews. 9. 'the outgoings of the morning and of the evening', where the sun rises and sets, which together indicate the whole earth. Hence the meaning is: 'Thou dost fill the whole world with joy'. 10. 'The river of God' is the rainfall. The preparation of the ground is described in 11: 'Drenching its furrows, levelling its ridges: thou softenest it with showers, thou blindest its young shoots'. 12b. NP: 'Thy tracks drip fatness', usually explained as the fattening showers of the latter rains before harvest; but the tracks may be those of the laden waggons bringing in the harvest.

350g Oesterley renders: 'and thy waggons drip with fatness'.

3b. 'Because of the greatness of that might of thine, thine enemies cringe before thee' (NP); cf. 17:45; 80:16.

6. Ex 14; Jos 3:14-16. 'There': NP gives a logical sense 'So let us rejoice in him!', but the local sense may be correct. 9. Establishment in Canaan gave Israel a new and permanent life. 10. Reference to the sufferings in Egypt; cf. 3 Kg 8:51. 12a. Heb: 'thou hast made men ride over our heads'. Egyptian monuments show conquerors riding in chariots over their prostrate foes. 13-14. Here is an example of a Ps being part of a votive offering; see my article in Dbr (July 1928) 95 ff.

b LXVI (LXVII)—A prayer that God may bless Israel, so that the Gentiles may be led to recognize him and praise him as their leader (2-6). It is a harvest hymn (7), but a Messianic harvest may be implied, when the whole world may pay reverence to him as the one true God (8). How admirably this was fulfilled at the first Christian Pentecost!

2. Cf. the priestly blessing in Num 6:23-27, and notice the change of the divine name. 5. 'judgest', in the sense of rule, cf. parallelism. 7. 'the earth hath yielded her fruit': for a Messianic sense, cf. 84:12, 13; Is 4:2; Jl 3:18.

c LXVII (LXVIII)—'Every conceivable occasion and date have been suggested for this psalm, from the age of Joshua to that of the Maccabees' (Kirkpatrick). To us it seems to be a compilation of three sacred songs. The first may date from the time of the Exodus: Num 10:12-35 should be read in conjunction with 2-11; 16-28. Here we have the old marching-song, the manifestation at Sinai, and the gift of the manna (2-11). The giving of the Law, and the order of the march through the desert are commemorated in 16-18. But another hymn was inserted in 12-15, where we meet with words, thoughts and phrases that can be read in Jg 4-5. The theme is the call to arms proclaimed by Debhora. A third Ps seems to begin at 29 and continues to the end. Here the existence of the sanctuary at Jerusalem is supposed, and prayer is made to God that enemies may be conquered and foreign nations pay tribute to him, until all the kingdoms of the earth join in acknowledging the power of the God of Israel. As the Ps celebrates the giving of the Law and looks forward to the conversion of the Gentiles, it is recited throughout the octave of Pentecost—when the promulgation of the New Law is commemorated.

2. Cf. Num 10:35. 5. 'who ascendeth upon the west': 'who rideth through the deserts' (MT, NP). 7. 'men of one manner': 'solitary ones', i.e. men with no fixed home, as were the Israelites in the wilderness. They 'were bound', i.e. were bondmen in Egypt, but were brought forth 'to prosperity' (instead of 'in strength'). 7c. Prob.: 'But the rebellious abide in a scorched land'. Antithetical parallelism suggests an opposition to 'prosperity'. 8. The reference is to the marching in the wilderness, Ex 13:21. 9. Ex 19:16; Jg 5:4. 10. The manna, which God freely rained down, Ex 16:4, for his 'inheritance', i.e. Israel (Deut 4:20; etc.) when the people were 'weakened', Ex 16:3. 11. 'thy animals': Israel, God's flock in the wilderness.

12. Yahweh commands by an oracle. His message is published by female heralds (Heb.), probably Debhora and her associates. 'great power' is usually 351c attached to the women heralds; they are 'a mighty host'; we prefer to regard it as their call to arms: 'Let the army be a mighty one!' 13. Difficult. Instead of 'the beloved', read with MT, NP: 'they flee! they flee!' The women are cheering the men on to put the enemy to rout. 'the beauty of the house': the wives and maidens, who will divide the spoils of war among themselves. Cf. Jg 5:30; 1 Kg 18:6; Is 9:3; Ps 118:162. 14 is also difficult. If the women are still speaking, they are saying: 'If you lie asleep among your borders [cf. LXX, Vg, St Jer., Sym.] shall the Dove's wings be covered with silver, and her pinions with sheen of gold?' They are upbraiding slackers, like the Reubenites, Jg 5:16. The 'dove' is Israel, Os 7:11; 9:11. If her wings are to shine with silver and gold, that is, if she is to win the spoils of victory, her children must fight for her cause. 15. MT reads: 'While the Almighty scattereth kings on her, it snoweth on Salmon'. The last phrase may be interrogative: 'Will you (slackers) lie still like snow on Salmon?' Other interpretations are (1) a snowfall helped the Israelites to conquer; (2) the snow represents the whitened bones of the slain kings; (3) the enemy fell as numerous as snow-flakes (note in NP). Salmon is mentioned elsewhere only in Jg 9:48.

16. Join on to 11. We understand 'the mountain of God' as Sinai, not Sion or Hermon. Instead of MT, NP bāṣān, we read, with LXX, Vg, Syr., St Jer., Theod, dāṣēn. 'curdled' comes from reading a verb, from which the noun in Job 10:10 is derived. The meaning of the passage, we suggest, is that the abodes of the pagan gods may well envy Sinai, the luxuriant and creamy mountain of God (cf. 9), to which he was pleased to come, attended by myriads of angels. (The pagans believed that their gods fed on cream.) Arguing, however, from the Canaanite language as revealed in the Amarna letters, *Prof. Albright renders 17: 'Why do you dance, ye domed mountains, mountains God coveted for his abode?' CBQ 7 (1945) 24. 19. The general sense is that Yahweh, who is God, received tribute, yea, even from those who had rebelled against him. (In Heb. the word for 'those that do not believe' is the same as that for 'them that provoke' in 7.) The situation may still be the giving of the Law at Sinai, the offering of sacrifices, and the conversion of those who had worshipped the golden calf, Ex 24:6; 33:4 f. For the Christian application see Eph 4:8. 21. 'issues from death': escapes from death. 23. Again the meaning is obscure: either God will bring back his enemies as captives, even if they try to escape to the high hills of Bashan or to the depths of the western sea; or, he will repeat what he did to Og of Bashan (Num 21:33-35) and to the Egyptians at the Red Sea (Ex 14). 24. 'That thy feet may be reddened with blood, and thy dogs' tongues with the same (blood) of enemies'. 25. The nations through whose territories Israel marched saw the procession of the Ark, Num 10:12-28. 27. 'In the churches': the companies on the march. 'the fountains of Israel' means the true stock of Jacob. 28. 'in ecstasy of mind': Heb 'in command of them', or 'leading them' (NP). Judah marched in the van, Num 2:9; 10:14.

29. Here begins the third part, distinctly later, in our opinion, than the other sections of the Ps. May God show his strength at Jerusalem, as he did at Sinai and during the march to Canaan. 31. May Egypt, symbolized by 'the beasts of the reed' (the crocodile and hippopotamus) be kept in check; may her leaders, symbolized by bulls, and the people who follow them ('kine') be overthrown. 33. The outlook becomes Catholic: all nations unite in worshipping Yahweh. 34. 'heavens, to the east': 'the ancient heavens'. 36. LXX reads 'among his saints', for which cf. 15:3; 33:10; Deut 33:3. LXVIII (LXIX)—A sufferer in distress prays to God for help against unjust enemies (2-5). He is suffering because of sin, and in God's cause, for which reason he is subjected to jibes (6-18). His prayer becomes 352a more intense (14-19), for God alone understands him (20-22). He foretells the punishments which his enemies will receive (23-30). 31-37 seem to have been added later, probably to encourage the captives in Babylonia. These would see their own miseries reflected in the original hymn; but with Cyrus' conquests hope revived, and this appendix was added.

There is an over-anxiety even with some Catholic writers to limit themselves to what we might call the OT interpretation of the Ps. The writers of the NT and the Fathers had not this scruple. Why? Because Christ gave his Apostles a new insight into the Psalter, Lk 24:44. So here, the NT gives an interpretation unknown before Christ's teaching: cf. 56 with Jn 15:25 10a with Jn 2:17; 10b with Rom 15:3; 23-24 with Rom 11:9, 10; 26 with Ac 1:20; 22 with Mt 27:34, 48; Jn 19:29, 30. See Porporato in VD 10 (1930) 36-42.

5. 'then did I pay': prob. a proverbial saying. 6. 'What was more like foolishness than that having in his power to overthrow his persecutors by a single word, Christ allowed himself to be arrested, scourged, spat upon, flogged, crowned with thorns, nailed to a cross? It looked like imprudence; but this foolishness overcame the wise. . . . Christ committed no offences; he bore offences but committed none', St Augustine (PL 36, 849). 13. 'They that sat in the gate': loafers and gossipers who met together at the city's gates. 14. 'for the time of thy good pleasure': Heb. 'at an acceptable time'; cf. Is 49:8. 16. 'the pit': Sheol. 23-30. Terrible imprecations; but it must be remembered that the enemies are opposed to God's designs. St Paul regarded them as prophetic, intended for the Jews who persecuted and rejected Christ, Rom 11:9 f.; also Ac 1:20. 31. Here begins the appendix; cf. 50:20 f.

b LXXIX (LXX)—A re-edition of Ps 39:14-18, with slight alterations. The divine name Yahweh is changed to Elohim in 2a, 5c, 6b (MT).

c LXX (LXXI)—The psalmist, an old man (18), persecuted by enemies, seeks help from God, who has protected him from infancy and made him a portent to many men (1-8). Now that his strength is failing, may God be close to him, and may his enemies be covered with reproach and shame (9-13). Remembrance of blessings during his long life brings him hope and comfort (14-21). Singing on the harp to the Holy One of Israel, he brings the Ps to an end (22-24).

1-3. From 30:2-4. 7. 'as a wonder'—because God has favoured him so signally. 21. 'thy magnificence': so LXX, against MT, St Jer., NP 'my magnificence'. 'Except in the Book of Esther the word for greatness is used of God's greatness' (Kirkpatrick).

d LXXI (LXXII)—A Messianic Ps. 'It is the manner of sacred Scripture to present the truth of future things by types, as, for example, in Ps 71, which is entitled of Solomon, but which contains many statements which cannot be applied to Solomon. For he did not continue with the sun, and before the moon, throughout all generations, neither did he rule from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth, nor did all nations serve him, nor did his name continue before the sun, nor were all the tribes of the earth blessed by him, nor did all nations magnify him. Only in part, and as if in the shadow and image of truth are these statements made first about Solomon ('in Salomone praemissa sunt') that they may be completely fulfilled in the Lord our Saviour' (St Jerome, Com. on Daniel c. xi; PL 25, 565). See also St Thomas Aquinas's Praemium in David; Lagrange in RB 14 (1905) 45; Ab Alpe in VD 13 (1933) 271 ff., 302 ff.

The ideal King will bring justice and fair judgement; he will succour the poor and the oppressed; nature will welcome his coming (1-4). His reign will go on from generation to generation, bringing peace and justice; it will extend all over the world, for all kings will worship him (5-11). The poor, the weak, the needy and the oppressed will be under his special care (12-14). Gold will be presented to him, prayer will be offered to him, a wondrous growth of wheat will spring up, and his name will be blessed by all tribes and nations (15-17). An outburst of praise to Yahweh because of this wonderful king brings the Ps to a close (18-19). A note (20) was appended by an editor saying that the Davidic Ps are here ended. Apparently he was unaware of other Ps ascribed to David not included in his collection. For a detailed examination, consult A Study of Psalm 72 (71), by R. E. Murphy, O. Carm. (Cath. University of America Press, 1948).

2. The king is the Messiah, as the Targum rightly states; the king's son is the same person, the Son of David, of whom Solomon, King David's son, was a type. 3. 'the mountains . . . the hills': nature takes her part in the Messianic blessedness; cf. Is 32:15-20; 52:7; Ez 36:8. 5. 'before the moon': either: 'in the presence of the moon', or (St Jer.) 'beyond (the age of) the moon'. In either case the sense is that he will reign as long as sun and moon are in the heavens; cf. 88:37 f. 6. 'He shall come down like rain upon the fleece'. This may be the true meaning. Moderns render: 'upon the mown grass'; but the usual meaning of the Heb. word is 'fleece'. There may be a reference to Gedeon's fleece, Jg 6:37 f.; the Messiah's coming will be mysterious and quiet; cf. Os 6:3; Is 55:10, 11; Wis 18:15. 8. He will rule over the entire world, which, as known to the psalmist, stretched from the Mediterranean to the Indian Ocean, and from the river Euphrates to the farthest parts of the west. 9. 'the Ethiopians'. The Heb. means 'beasts of the desert'. Moderns alter the word to 'his foes', but without textual authority. See the inscription of Ouni. 10. Tharsis. See on 47:8. The islands are those of the Mediterranean—the extreme west; the south is represented by the kings of the Arabians and of Saba; cf. Is 60:6. 14. 'names': 'blood', MT, NP. 16. On the earth there shall be abundance of wheat; its fruit shall rustle (or 'rise up') like Libanus; see NP. In Messianic times wheat will be so plentiful that it will grow even on mountain-tops, rustling like the trees of Lebanon (or growing as tall as mount Lebanon); cf. Am 9:13. We may apply this to the Eucharistic Bread which the Messiah has given to us. 'And they of the city': the population will increase and flourish under Messianic rule.

BOOK III

LXXII (LXXIII)—Again the vexed question: why do the wicked prosper while good men suffer tribulations? In Ps 36 the psalmist told us that the god-fearing will possess the land, while the families of the wicked will be cut off. In 16:14 f., comparing his lot with that of irreligious men having good food, children and money saved up, the psalmist found consolation in looking forward to seeing the form or image of God on awakening from death. Further light on the problem was given to the Korahite psalmist (48): good and bad men die alike; the latter go to Sheol, where they have a dismal existence in darkness; but the upright awake in the morning after death, are taken by God from the grasp of Sheol, live in light, and have dominion over the wicked. Now Asaph seeks a solution. In our opinion he finds it in rewards and punishments after this life. For another view, however, see Sutcliffe, OT and the Future Life, 102-8. Originally the Ps was probably a private meditation.

The first verse is introductory, based on the solution of the problem. Then he tells how he nearly gave up his religion because of the prosperity of the irreligious, who have no anxiety about death, who escape the trials of good men. They are proud, violent, defiant of authority, and yet they prosper (2-9). Friends of the psalmist are equally perturbed. Does God really concern himself with human affairs? Is a moral and 853a mortified life to no purpose? The psalmist rejects the thought; to entertain it would make him a faithless Israelite (10-15). So he determines to find a solution. This he discovers in the final lot of the wicked—ruin, desolation, terrors. (Again we meet with the awaking of 16:15.) Spurned by God, they will exist as figures in a dream (16-20). The solution found, the psalmist reproaches himself for his former ignorance and stupidity (21-22). What then is the just man's reward? God is always close to him, guiding him through life's ways, until, hereafter, he takes him into glory (23-24). So the psalmist chooses God as his portion for ever, knowing that they who do otherwise are lost (25-28).

3. 'I had a zeal': 'I was envious'. 4. 'no regard to their death': either that they never let death worry them, or that they die easy deaths. MT and all versions read 'death'; NP follows moderns in altering the text. For a similar association of death and physical health see Job 21:23 f. 6. 'Therefore pride is their necklace'. 7. 'their hearts' desires pass all bounds'. 9. They blaspheme God, and their wicked tongues spare nobody. 10. 'It is said that few verses of the Bible have been more variously translated' (Rickaby, The Psalms made Easy). With LXX, Vg, Syr., NP read 'my people' instead of MT 'his people'. The psalmist's friends look at prosperous sinners; then, with tears in their eyes, they say 'Does God really know what passes on earth?' Or 'abundant waters' (MT, NP)—instead of 'full days'—may signify sorrow and distress. 17. The problem was a sore puzzle until he went 'into the sanctuary'. But the Heb. word is plural and the context shows that mental contemplation is meant; hence, with Sym. τὰ ἀνιδόματα, we read mysteries; cf. Wis 2:22; 6:24 and note in NP. 'their last ends': their deaths; cf. Num 23:10; Prov 5:11, etc. 18. Here begins the psalmist's solution, arrived at after his meditation; it envisages the plight of the wicked after death (19). There would be no solution if he meant that wicked men all die terribly. He must have seen, as we do today, many prosperous worldlings die without terror or desolation.

Yea, in slippery places thou dost set them, thou dost hurl them down to ruin. How are they become a waste [better perhaps, 'to appalment', parallel to 'terrors'] in a moment. Consumed with terror they come to an end. 20. Various interpretations; the 'awaking' is after the sleep of death; see on 16:15. Life in Sheol will be gloomy for the wicked; 'their image', i.e. their shades or phantoms, will be held in contempt by God; cf. Wis 4:18; Dan 12:2, and perhaps the obscure line in 89:5. 23-24. The psalmist (and all faithful Israelites) has God at his side, leading him through life by his counsel; then, after this life, he is 'taken' (as in 48:16) to God in 'glory'. Read with St Jerome: 'et postea in gloria suscipies me'. 25. So, in heaven as on earth, God alone is his delight. 26. His mortal body may 'waste away' (cf. Job 33:21), but 'the rock' of his heart and his portion for ever is God.

b LXXIII (LXXIV)—An enemy, intent on destroying the religion of Israel, has wrought havoc in the sanctuary (3-9). God has not intervened; he seems to have abandoned his sheep (1, 10, 11). Meditating on God's power against Egypt in the past, the psalmist asks for like help in the present emergency (2, 12-17). Are not Israel's enemies God's enemies? Are not those who are being afflicted the children of the Covenant (18-21)? An appeal to God to vindicate his cause closes the Ps. With many commentators NP refers the Ps to the destruction of the temple, 586 B.C. Others favour the profanation in the Maccabean age, 167 B.C. We prefer a much earlier date, viz. the plundering of the temple by Sheshenk (Sesac), king of Egypt, c 935 B.C.

3a. MT: 'Lift up thy feet to the everlasting ruins', i.e. run in haste to see the ruins wrought by the enemy. 4. 'made their boasts': Heb. 'have roared'. 5b. MT, NP: 'They were like men brandishing axes in a forest-thicket; with hatchet and hammer they have smashed down all its carved work' (NP 'doors'). 9. Words of the afflicted Israelites. 9c. Prob.: 'and there is no one among us who knoweth how long' the defeat will last. 11b. NP: 'Why keepest thou thy right hand in thy bosom?', failing to stretch it out to protect Israel. 13. The crossing of the Red Sea and the drowning of the Egyptians. 14. 'the dragon': Heb. Leviathan, the Lōtan of the Ugarit tablets; see J. W. Jack, The Ras Shamra Tablets, 46 and RB 46 (1937) 545; here probably symbolical of Egypt. 'the people of the Ethiopians': usually and probably rightly explained as 'desert-yelpers', i.e. jackals. 15a. Cf. Ex 17:6; Num 20:8. 'the Ethan rivers': 'perennial rivers', the reference being to the Jordan, Jos 3:13-16; 4:23. 16. 'the morning light and the sun': LXX 'sun and moon'; see Dumaine in RB 46 (1937) 174-7. 17. 'summer and the spring': MT, St Jer., NP 'summer and winter'. 10. MT: 'the dark places of the land are full of the haunts of violence'.

LXXXIV (LXXXV)—God addresses the people after they have given thanks, declaring that he will judge mankind at the end of the world (2-4). The proud are warned that, failing to find help on the Judgement Day, they will drink the cup of divine wrath (5-9). 11 seems to be a divine sentence.

4. Cf. St Peter's description of the end of the world, 2 Pet 3:10-12. 5. 'Lift not up the horn': do not proudly toss your heads. 7. Something must be supplied to complete the sense, e.g. shall help come; NP alters the second member to read: 'neither from the desert nor from the mountains'. 9. For the cup of wrath, see Is 51:17; Jer 25:15-33; Hab 2:16. 'Though many sinners have drunk of the cup, it is not empty. The lees are reserved for the present enemies of Yahweh' (Boylan).

LXXXV (LXXXVI)—The mighty God, whose abode is at Sion, has destroyed an army attacking Israel (2-7). (LXX and Vg state in the title that Assyria was the enemy). No one can withstand God's anger; the very earth quakes at his presence (8-10). Pagans as well as Israelites will pay homage to him whom all the kings of the earth must fear (11-13).

2. 'Judaea': 'Judah', MT, NP. 3. 'in peace': 'Salem', i.e. Jerusalem; cf. Gen 14:18. 5. 'everlasting hills': so LXX, Vg, NP, which is preferable to MT 'hills of prey'. The reference is to the hills about Jerusalem. 6. 'The stout-hearted are spoiled', MT, NP; but LXX, Vg, Syr. 'lie prostrate' gives better parallel to 'they slept'; see obs. in my Commentary. The sleep is death. 'the men of riches' are 'the mighty men' of Sennacherib's army. 11. The meaning is obscure. NP emends to read: 'For the wrath of Edom will glorify thee, and the remnant of Emath will keep festival for thee'. If we keep MT, 'the wrath of man' means God's enemies, and 'the remnant of wraths' the last of the pagan nations; the words would then have Messianic meaning; all nations will one day 'keep holiday', hold festival in honour of the true and terrible God.

LXXXVI (LXXXVII)—In anguish of mind the psalmist prayed earnestly to God, but without consolation (2-4). During sleepless nights he wondered whether God had rejected Israel (5-10); but pondering over divine actions in the past (those commemorated in the Canticle of Moses), his soul found relief and comfort (11-21). The reference to prayer at night makes the Ps suitable for Compline; it is assigned to Friday.

3. 'I was not deceived'. MT: 'without growing numb'. 4. 'was delighted': MT, St Jer. 'was troubled'. 5. 'My eyes prevented the watches': so LXX, which may be preferable to MT, NP: 'Thou holdest mine eyes awake', for cf. 118:148. 11. 'Now I have begun'. According to LXX, Vg, the psalmist indicates his change from despondency to confidence, a change brought about by his meditation on 'the works of Yah', as recounted in the Canticle of Moses, Ex 15. NP follows Aquila and St Jer. and renders: 'This is my grief, that the right hand of the Almighty hath changed', meaning that God no longer helps Israel. 13. 'inventions': deeds.

354a 14a. 'Thy way, O God, is holy' (or, 'in holiness'). 19. 'in a wheel': prob. 'in a whirlwind', but perhaps the rolling of the wheels of God's thunder-chariot is meant. 20. The crossing of the Red Sea, Ex 15:8. The divided waters returned, leaving no trace of the passage made by God for the Israelites, Ex 14:28. 21. The subject-matter of the meditation has been the Exodus.

b LXXVII (LXXVIII)—The history of Israel given in a poem, from the time of the Egyptian enslavement up to the appointment of David as king. Emphasis is laid on rebellions against God's rule and subsequent punishments. The writer's object is to give a warning against disloyalty to Yahweh. An early date is suggested by the closing of the Ps with David's accession.

2. Quoted in Mt 13:35 'from the beginning': from the past. 3. The Jews valued patristic tradition. 9. No historical reference can be found in the OT; probably the event was handed down by oral tradition. 12. Tanis: Heb. Zoan, a city on the eastern bank of the Tanitic arm of the Nile. There Rameses II held his court, and from there the Israelites marched out of Egypt. 13-24. Cf. Ex 13:21-17:6; Num 11:1, 4; 20:8-11. 25. 'bread of angels': lit. 'bread of strong ones'. The manna came by the ministration of angels; cf. Wis 16:20. 33. Num 14:22 f. 44. The plagues of Egypt, Ex 7-12. 'showers': 'streams'. 46. 'the blast': Heb. 'the caterpillar', Ex 10:12-20. 51. Cham was the ancestor of Egypt, Gen 10:6. 54. 'the mountain of his sanctuary': Heb. 'his holy boundary', the border of the Promised Land, Ex 15:13, 17. 57. 'they were turned aside as a crooked bow': Heb. 'they recoiled like a deceitful bow'; cf. Os 7:16. 60. 'put away': 'forsook'. Shiloh was north of Bethel. There the Tabernacle and Ark were set up; Jg 18:31; 1 Kg 1:3. 61. 'strength . . . beauty', descriptive of the Ark, 1 Kg 4:11-21. The Ark was captured by the Philistines. 63. 'were not lamented': cf. Jg 11:38. The Heb. word read by LXX, St Jer. is preferable to MT: 'were not praised', generally understood as 'had no marriage song' (RV). 64. 'priests', including Ophni and Phinees, 1 Kg 4:11. 'did not mourn': Vg 'non plorabantur'. as LXX, Syr, St Jer. ('non sunt fletae') reading niph'al instead of qal (MT, Sym, NP); the former is preferable. 66. The Philistines were afflicted with boils, 1 Kg 5:6, 9. 67-68. When the Ark returned it no longer found its place at Shiloh in Ephraim; eventually it was brought to Mount Zion of the tribe of Judah, 2 Kg 6:2. 69. 'as of unicorns': MT 'as the heights', which NP renders: 'as the heaven', explaining this as 'an hyperbole expressive of the height of the temple'. 70. Cf. 1 Kg 16:11-13.

c LXXVIII (LXXIX)—Gentiles have invaded Jerusalem, sacked the temple and slain many of God's servants, making Israel an object of scorn to neighbouring nations (1-4). God has been angry with his people; the psalmist implores him to forget past transgressions and show compassion (5-8). He renews his appeal, pleading that the enemy will deny Yahweh's existence (9-11). May sevenfold punishment be meted out to foes who insult God, while his people, the sheep of his pasture, render him thanks (12-13).

NP follows many commentators who think that the Ps was composed at the time when Jerusalem was destroyed by Nabuchodonosor. Others prefer a Maccabean date. But it is not improbable that it was written (like 73) after the mighty army of Sheshenq (Sesac) the Egyptian had attacked the city, polluted the temple and carried away much treasure, 'because Israel had sinned against Yahweh', 3 Kg 14:25 f.; 2 Par 12:2-9.

1. 'a place to keep fruit': 'a heap of ruins'. 2. Quoted in 1 Mac 7:17, apparently as ancient Scripture. 6-7. Cf. Jer 10:25; also 2 Par 12:7. 11. Prayer for prisoners of war. 12. 'sevenfold': completely; cf. Gen 4:15, 24; Prov 6:31; Ps 11:7.

d LXXIX (LXXX)—An appeal to the Shepherd of Israel to come to the aid of his flock (2-4). Enemies are humiliating Israel; how long will God's wrath last? (5-8). His luxuriant vine, which he planted in the Promised Land is now being trampled down and eaten up (9-14). May the vine be revived; may God's people be delivered (15-20).

A refrain occurs in 4, 8, 20; originally it may have come also after 12. LXX refers the Ps to the Assyrian invasion. Cardinal Wiseman chose the Ps as a prayer for the conversion of England: may the Good Shepherd look kindly upon a country afflicted by heresy and unbelief, and bring it back to unity of faith, under his vicar-shepherd.

2. 'thou that rulest Israel': Heb. 'Shepherd of Israel'. 3. Ephraim, Benjamin and Manasses—neighbouring tribes in the Northern Kingdom. It would seem that these territories were being overrun. 4. 'show us thy face', in loving smile; cf. RB 30 (1921) 386. 9. 'vineyard': Heb. 'a vine'; cf. Is 3:14; 5:1-7; etc. 11. 'cedars of God': tall and mighty cedars, such as grew on Lebanon. 12. The sea is the Mediterranean; the river is the Euphrates. 14. 'a singular wild beast' is a mistranslation of the Latin 'singularis', which is a noun, meaning 'boar' or 'wild ass' (French 'sanglier'). 16b is probably out of place, see 18b. 17. It is the vine that is set on fire and 'cut down' (not 'dug down'). They that 'perish at the rebuke of thy countenance' are 'the people of Israel typified by the vine' (Boylan). 18. The Targum interprets the son of man as the Messiah; also the Fathers, St Robert Bellarmine, Agelli and others; see also 109:1. But modern writers (also NP) refer it to the vine planted at God's right hand, that is, the Hebrew nation.

LXXX (LXXXI)—A Ps for the Feast of Tabernacles, celebrated on the 15th day of the 7th month, at the time of the full moon (4b). On the 1st day of the same month the trumpets were blown (4a). The fruits were gathered in during this festival, hence the title 'for the wine-presses' and 17. It was the most joyous of Hebrew feasts (2-4); it commemorated the Exodus (5-13). Israel is exhorted to listen to the true God; failure to do this in the past has led to wars and defeat (14-16).

4. 'on the noted day of your solemnity': 'at the full moon, our festival day'; cf. Lev 23:24; Num 29:12 ff. 5. 'an ordinance of Jacob's God'. 6b. Joseph represents Israel coming out (so LXX, Vg, Lattey, Oesterley against MT, NP 'against the land') of Egypt. 6c. NP begins a new stanza, introducing the priest or prophet who utters the words of God that occupy the rest of the Ps; but LXX, Syr., Vg, with verbs in 3rd person may be correct: 'Joseph heard a tongue which he knew not, that is, the voice of God speaking as a Saviour who would remove the burdens from the backs of the Hebrew slaves carrying bricks in baskets. 8. 'the secret place of tempest': the thunder-cloud. 9. 'waters of contradiction': 'waters of Meriba', Ex 17:1-7; Num 20:1-13. 11. Cf. Ex 20:2; Deut 5:6. 'Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it': God will give a plentiful harvest; no foreign god can do this. 12. The disobediences during the wanderings. 16. 'have lied': MT, NP 'come cringing'. 16b is difficult. Whose time is meant? NP translates 'their lot', and suggests that the lot of Israel's enemies will be irreparable and perpetual. Others think that the 'time' is that of Israel, whose good fortune will last for ever. But parallelism makes it possible that the conversion of the Gentiles who have submitted to Yahweh is meant. 17. 'them' (bis): we prefer this, with LXX, Vg, St Jer., to 'him', MT, NP; also the 3rd pers. for verbs. Who is to be fed? Either Israel or the converted Gentiles, according to the interpretation adopted in 16b. 'the fat of wheat' is the choicest wheat, and 'honey out of the rock' signifies abundance of honey, Jl 3:18. In the Corpus Christi Office, the Church uses the verse to express the sweetness of the Bread from heaven.

LXXXI (LXXXII)—God, the supreme Judge, up- 355a

855a braids earthly judges for their favouritism and their injustice to the poor (2-4). These men are undermining the moral and civil life of the nation (5). God reminds them that although, because of their high office, they are entitled to be called 'gods' and 'sons of the Most High', yet they are but mortal men who will die like Adam or 'one of the princes' (6-7). The Ps ends with an appeal to the universal Judge. Similar denunciations are found in Is 1:23; 3:13-16; 5:23 f.

1. See *Wheeler Robinson in JTS 45 (1944) 155; but the usual interpretation of 'gods' is judges; cf. Ex 21:6; 22:8 f., 28; Deut 19:17. 6. Christ used these words, Jn 10:34-38, when accused of blasphemy. 7. 'like men': Heb. 'ādām might mean 'Adam' (so St Jer.) or 'mankind'. The parallel 'one of the princes' favours the singular, which expression the older commentators (Eusebius Caesar., Theodoret, Origen, Hesychius, St Augustine and others) referred to the fall of Satan. Moderns, however, think that it means simply 'like any prince'. Zorell explains this by saying that 'in every age some princes die a sad and violent death', but this fails to account for K'ahad, which supposes an individual.

b LXXXII (LXXXIII)—Enumerating the nations hostile to Israel (6-9) the psalmist prays that they may be overthrown, for they are God's enemies also (2-5). Past victories are recalled (10-12). May present foes be defeated; may they recognize that Yahweh alone is the Most High God (13-19).

2. 'who shall be like to thee?' Read with MT, St Jer., NP: 'be not silent'. 7-9. Apparently an idealistic rather than a factual confederation. For the occasions when Israel was in conflict with any of these nations see my Commentary, II, 87 f. 10-13. Cf. Jg 4-5; 7:25; 8:3. 14. 'like a wheel': either whirling dust, or a wild artichoke with wheel-shaped top, which, when detached, is driven by the wind across the Palestinian plains.

c LXXXIII (LXXXIV)—This Ps has affinity with Pss 41-42, and seems to be a sequel, thereby confirming the title: 'for the sons of Core'. The singer has returned to the sanctuary, like a bird flown back to its nest (2-5). Happy is he to make this pilgrimage to Zion, in spite of the difficulties that came his way (6-8). At the sanctuary he prays for the king (9-10); he declares that one day at God's house is worth a thousand spent elsewhere (11); and he thanks God for blessings bestowed on those who lead innocent lives (12-13). This is the first of the psalms in the priest's Preparation for Mass. It has a natural place in the Corpus Christi Office.

6b-8. Difficult. 'the vale of tears' may be his place of exile; cf. 41:4. Many moderns regard it as a proper name 'Balsam-vale', but such a place is not mentioned elsewhere. NP renders: 'dry valley', referring to Arabic baka'a, meaning 'having little moisture'. 10. 'our protector': Heb. 'our shield', i.e. the king, parallel with 'Christ', i.e. anointed one. 11. 'be an abject in': MT, NP: 'be at the threshold of'; the sons of Core were the ostiarīi of the OT, 1 Par 9:19; 26:19.

d LXXXIV (LXXXV)—Using the prophetic perfect tense the psalmist foresees a golden age when God will no longer be angry with his people (2-4). At the present moment, however, God's wrath hangs over the nation (5-8). Let the people take heart: a reign of peace, security and glory is to come, wherein mercy, truth, peace and prosperity will be established on earth (9-14). Thus the main theme is the Messianic age. This is the second Ps of the Preparation for Mass.

2. 'turned away the captivity of Jacob': not a reference to the Babylonian Captivity, for the expression is found in pre-exilic writings; it means restoration of Israel's fortunes. 10. 'glory': the divine presence. (When reciting this Ps before Mass, we may think of the graces that come from Christ's Presence on our altars.) 11. 'Mercy and truth' came with the Incarnation, Jn 1:17. It also brought justice and peace, Rom 5:1 f. 13. Spiritual blessings are meant rather than fertility of the soil. The Church uses the verse in its Messianic sense at the Communion on the 1st Sunday of Advent. 14. Cf. the Corpus Christi hymn: 'Per tuas semitas duc nos quo tendimus, ad lucem quam inhabitas'.

LXXXV (LXXXVI)—Reciting this Ps as the third in the Preparation for Mass we may hear Christ, 'the servant' of Yahweh (2, 16), praying to his Father, who is so kind to all who invoke his aid (1-7). May all nations come to worship the one and only God (8-10). The servant rejoices, and will praise Yahweh's name for ever, because he has delivered him from the underworld (11-13). He asks for strength against his insolent and godless enemies; he begs for a sign that those who hate him may be abashed when they see Yahweh helping and comforting him (14-17). The Ps is largely composed of passages from other Pss.

9. Messianic universalism; cf. 21:28; Apoc 15:4. 13. 'lower hell': perhaps poetical for the depths of hell; cf. Deut 32:22. 16. 'the son of thy handmaid': 'Whose handmaid? She who replied when his birth was announced: Behold the handmaid of the Lord' (St Augustine).

LXXXVI (LXXXVII)—'I think this is the most difficult of all the psalms', Mgr Knox (Tablet, June 23rd 1945). The main idea is that glorious Zion, beloved of God, is the spiritual mother of all nations. NP speaks of the psalmist 'lyrically binding together the prophecies concerning Zion, Is 2:2-4; 54:1-3; 60:3-9; Ez 37:28; Am 9:11 ff.; Mich 4:1-3; Gal 4:26'.

1. MT: 'His (God's) foundations are on holy mountains'—Zion and Moriah upon which the Holy City was built. 4. Who is the speaker? Commentators are not agreed. Some say God, others Zion, others the psalmist. Rahab is Egypt; the foreigners are the Philistines. 'these were there': MT, St Jer.: 'this man was born there'. 5. Heb.: 'Yea, of Zion it shall be said: Every man (lit. 'man and man') was born in her. Yea, the Most High doth establish her. Yahweh doth record in the peoples' register: This one was born there'. For God's record-book, see 68:29; 138:16; Ex 32:32; Is 4:3. 7 in our opinion is a kind of colophon, a tribute to the temple choir—every one of the singers and pipers was born at Zion. The word translated 'rejoicing' comes from a Hebrew root meaning 'play on the pipe' or from a similar root meaning 'dance'. Then 'princes' (6) is in Heb. 'singers'. The singers and the pipers (or dancers) are all natives of Jerusalem. Cf. 67:27.

LXXXVII (LXXXVIII)—Day and night the psalmist prays, for he is exceedingly depressed and feels like a man dead and buried (2-7). God's wrath lies heavily upon him; all his friends have forsaken him (8-10a). With outstretched hands he prays that he be not sent to Sheol (10b-13). Still he prays, asking why has he been rejected, why have so many troubles come upon him, for what reason has he incurred the divine displeasure, and why have his dearest friends deserted him? (14-19). Such is the ordinary interpretation of the Ps, but another is very probable, viz.: the sufferer is meditating on death, and pictures himself as already in Sheol (5-7); the questions he asks (11-13) are genuine: contrary to common belief, he asks, may there not be room in Sheol for God's wonders? may it not be that the dead can praise God, and recount his mercy, truth and justice? May not his prayer greet Yahweh when he (the psalmist) awakes from death?

5. 'the pit': 'Sheol'. 6. 'free': see Job 3:19; all are equal in Sheol. But NP, detecting a similar word, found only in Ez 27:20, meaning 'saddle-cloths', renders 'Among the dead is my bed'. We regard it as uncertain. 9c. Heb. 'I am under restraint and cannot come forth'. 10. 'poverty': Heb. 'affliction'. 11. 'physicians': 'the shades' of the dead. In the Rās-Shamra tablets the 'rephaim' (the Heb. word here) are the dead. 12. 'destruction': 'Abaddon', proper name, meaning 'place of destruc-

356a tion'; a synonym for Sheol. 14. If the second interpretation (above) is correct, 'in the morning' means the same as in 48:15, i.e. after death; see on 16:15. 16b. MT 'I have carried thy terrors, I am distracted', but the meaning of the last verb (found only here) is uncertain. It is generally emended to mean 'I grow faint'; so NP.

b LXXXVIII (LXXXIX)—Inasmuch as the main argument is that the throne of David is guaranteed by divine promise to remain for ever, the Ps is Messianic. It begins by stating that God's mercy and truth cannot fail, his promise to the House of David can never become void (2-5). Who can compare with God, all powerful in heaven and on earth, kind, just and faithful to his people and to their king? (6-10). Then the psalmist recalls the promise made to David (2 Kg 7), whereby an everlasting covenant was established and the throne secured (20-30). Even if Israel should prove faithless and have to be punished, the promise to David's House will never be annulled (31-38). But now the promise seems to have failed. David's kingdom is in a desperate condition; its enemies are triumphant; its fortifications are destroyed; its throne is overturned (39-46). May God remember his great promise, otherwise the House of David will suffer everlasting reproach (47-52). 53 is a doxology closing Book III of the Psalter. The title attributes the Ps to Ethan the Ezrahite. As this man lived in the reign of Solomon, 3 Kg 4:31, it is not unreasonable to suppose that he witnessed the sack of Jerusalem by Sheshenq (Sesac) of Egypt, 3 Kg 14:25 f. For the first time since the great promise was uttered by Nathan, the House of David had suffered a violent shock. The Ps was written, in our opinion, not in Exilic or Maccabean times but in the 5th year of the reign of Roboam.

6. 'the church of the saints': Heb. 'the assembly of holy ones', the angels; also 8. 'the sons of God' in 7 are also the angels. Cf. Job 1:6, etc. 11. 'the proud one': Heb. 'Rahab', a primeval monster of the sea (cf. Job 9:13, etc.). In 86:4 it was used as an emblematical name for Egypt (because the Nile was supposed to rise from the subterranean ocean), also Is 30:7. 13b. Thabor and Hermon—the chief mountains of Palestine—here represent all mountains. 18. 'our horn', i.e. power, also 25. 19. 'our protection', i.e. the king (see parallelism); Heb. 'shield', who is our king, 'belongeth to Yahweh'. 20. 'thy saints'—Nathan and David, 2 Kg 7:8-16. 21. Cf. 1 Kg 13:14; 16:1-13; 2 Kg 12:7. 28. 'set his hand': give him dominion over the sea (the Mediterranean) and the rivers (prob. the Euphrates and Tigris). The prophecy foretells the universal reign of the Son of David, the Messiah. 30. 'as the days of heaven': 'as long as this world lasts' (note in NP). 38. 'a faithful witness': either the moon (so note in NP), or the rainbow (St Robert Bellarmine and others) or God himself, Job 16:20.

39. Here begins the psalmist's complaint. If the disaster refers to Sheshenq's sack of Jerusalem, 'thy anointed' is Roboam. 45. 'made his purification to cease': Heb. 'put an end to his lustre'. 46. 'shortened the days of his time': 'of his youth'. The House of David has become prematurely old. This suggests that the disaster has followed soon after the promise to David. 48. 'Remember what my substance is': Heb. 'Remember how short is my time'. 52. 'the change': MT, St Jer., NP 'the footsteps'. The Targum applies this to the delay in the coming of the Messiah.

BOOK IV

357a LXXXIX (XC)—This is one of the most beautiful of the Pss. The eternity of God is contrasted with the brevity of human life (1-6). Man may make his short life miserable by committing sin, thereby living under God's displeasure (7-10). May men be given the spirit of wisdom that they may enjoy years of happiness under divine direction, instead of years of affliction 357a (11-17). The title attributes the Ps to 'Moses, the man of God'. On this, Mgr Knox remarks: 'Not that Moses necessarily wrote it, but that it refers throughout to the Mosaic situation; i.e. to the divine sentence which condemned the first generation of Israelites to perish, for their infidelity, in the wilderness. Re-read the poem with that in view, and the whole falls into place' (Tablet, July 14th 1945).

3. 'Turn not man away to be brought low': Heb. 'Thou turnest man back to dust'. 'Be converted, O ye sons of men': Heb. 'Return, ye children of Adam'. The reference is to Gen 3:19. 5-6a. Obscure. Perhaps: 'Thou dost sweep them away; they become (like) sleep, as grass that fadeth in the morning'. The underlying notion may be that of 72:20, life after death is like living in dreamland. 9c. 'We bring our years to a close as a sigh' (NP)—a passing sound full of sorrow. 10. 'For mildness is come upon us: and we shall be corrected': 'It [life] is soon over, and we take our flight' (MT). 12. 'and men . . . in wisdom': 'that we may acquire a heart of wisdom' (MT, NP). See McClellan in CBQ 4 (1942) 256. May knowledge of the brevity of life lead men to spend it wisely. 15. 'Make us glad as many days as thou hast afflicted us' (MT, NP).

XC (XCI)—An act of calm confidence in God. The soul that shelters under God's protection shall be shielded from all dangers—especially from the plague; the guardian angel shall keep it from all harm and lead it through all perils into safety (1-13). Then God speaks: he will indeed protect the soul that trusts in him; he will give it long life and salvation (14-16). It is a Compline Ps (Sundays and special feasts). During the Second World War many recited it during air-raids.

3. 'sharp word': 'pernicious pestilence' (MT, NP). 6b. 'business': 'pestilence'. 6c. 'the destruction that wasteth at noonday' (MT, NP). This is the fourth mention of time: he that trusts in God will escape evil at whatever time of the day it is abroad. 11. Guardian angels; cf. Gen 24:7; Ex 23:20; Ps 33:8. This verse and 12 were uttered by Satan when he tempted Christ, Matt 4:6; Lk 4:10 f. 13. Figurative expressions; cf. Mk 16:18; Lk 10:19.

XCI (XCII)—It is good to sing the praises of God to the accompaniment of the harp, to tell of his mercy, fidelity and creative works (2-5). Godless men flourish but for a time; their end is destruction (6-10). God-fearing men live on to old age, and witness the downfall of the wicked (11-12). The final stanza describes, under the figure of a majestic tree, the spiritual growth of holy men (13-16).

7. The senseless man and the fool is the person who denies that there is a divine Providence; cf. 13:1; Rom 1:21. 8c. 'The destruction of evil-doers is eternal; it is not a question of merely temporal punishment' (NP note). 10. Cf. Rās-Shamra text in RB 46 (1937) 534. 11. 'the unicorn': Heb. 'wild-ox'; cf. 21:22; Deut 33:17—a symbol of strength. 'in plentiful mercy': 'oil' (MT, Sym.). Rubbed into the limbs, oil gives suppleness and a feeling of youthful vigour; hence a symbol of well-being.

XCII (XCIII)—God, the eternal King, reigns over the world he has made (1-2). He is Lord also of the rushing waters and the breaking waves (3-4). The moral order was established by him; holiness becometh his house (5). The Ps keeps its traditional place at Lauds on Sunday.

1. God's creative work is like a beautiful robe. 5. The juxtaposition of the physical and moral orders is not uncommon in the OT.

XCIII (XCIV)—May God punish those who ignore the moral law: the vices and blasphemies of these sinners are enumerated (1-7). Addressing these senseless men the psalmist asks whether the designer of the ear and eye cannot hear and see? Cannot he who punishes pagan nations punish individual sinners? Does not he from whom all knowledge comes know the vain thoughts of men? (8-11) It is well for a man 357e to live under God's rule; he will enjoy peace and protection, while the wicked go to their doom (12-15). God's kindness and consolations have sustained the psalmist's hope (16-19). He is the refuge of those persecuted by sinners, and he will bring iniquity to an end (20-23).

1. 'hath acted freely': 'shine forth' (MT, St Jer., NP). 10a. 'This assumption that there is a divine education of the Gentiles, as of Israel, is practically unique in the Old Testament; the Targum substitutes the Jews for the Gentiles' (Lattley). 10b. The original probably read: He that teacheth man, hath he no knowledge? 11. Quoted in 1 Cor 3:20. 15. 'For judgement shall come back to justice, and all the upright of heart shall follow it'; the administration of justice will cease to be corrupt. 17. 'hell': Heb. 'silence', or, probably 'darkness' of Sheol. 20. 'seat of iniquity': the bench of unjust judges. Can this be allied to the divine law so long as it frames mischief against innocent men by distortion of the law?

f XCIV (XCV)—The invitational psalm of the Divine Office. Let Israel worship Yahweh the great God and King, Creator and Lord of earth and seas (1-5). Let the people kneel down and worship him as the Shepherd of Israel (6-7). Speaking in the person of God, a cantor warns the worshippers against falling into disobedience, thereby incurring God's wrath and rejection, as did their fathers in the wilderness (8-11).

1. 'God our saviour': Heb. 'Rock of our salvation'. 3. 'above all gods': not that these had any real existence in the psalmist's thought. 6. 'weep': MT, St Jer., NP 'bend the knee'; but see Emery Barnes in JTS 36 (1935) 127. 9. 'in the provocation': Heb. proper name 'Meriba', and 'temptation' is 'Massa'; cf. Ex 17:7; Num 20:2-13. 'they proved me, and saw my works': they tried to put me to the test, by demanding further miracles after seeing all the signs I did in Egypt and in the wilderness; cf. Num 14:22. 11. Num 14:23-33. For St Paul's application see Heb 3 and 4.

g XCV (XCVI)—A 'New Song'—Messianic in the sense that it foresees the Kingdom of Yahweh extended over the whole world. Jews and Gentiles acclaim his glorious name. Yea, the whole of nature rejoices and makes merry at the coming of Yahweh as King. All nations are called upon to proclaim Yahweh's glory (1-3); for he alone is the true God, who made the heavens, where honour and glory are given to his excellent majesty (4-6). All peoples are summoned to take part in worshipping him and acclaiming him as king (7-10). Nature participates in the universal rejoicings (11-13). Rightly does St Augustine refer the Ps to the establishment of the City of God, the Catholic Church, all the world over (De Civ. Dei 8:24). One edition of the Ps was sung by Asaph and his brethren when the Ark was brought to Zion, 1 Par 16:23-33.

5. 'devils': Heb. 'things of nought', NP 'figments'. 6. 'his sanctuary': the context suggests heaven. 9. 'his holy court': Heb. 'in holy attire'; see on 28:2. 10. Some Gk, OL and Roman copies have 'reigned from the tree'; hence the line in the hymn Vexilla Regis 'Regnavit a ligno Deus', where the 'tree' or 'wood' is that of the Cross; but the addition is unauthentic.

h XCVI (XCVII)—A companion to the preceding Ps. Yahweh is King. Nature rejoices as he comes in stormy theophany to judge mankind (1-6). Zion is glad, and those who adore idols are confounded (7-9). The final stanza exhorts just men to hate evil and to rejoice in him who guards their lives and gives them light and gladness (10-12).

2. Cf. 17:8-16. 7. 'his angels': Heb. 'all ye gods'; cf. 95:5. 8. 'The daughters of Judah' are Zion's neighbouring towns; cf. 47:12.

358a XCVII (XCVIII)—Another 'New Song', closely allied to 95 and 96. Again the theme is the acclamation of Yahweh by the whole world. He has done a marvellous thing inasmuch as the ends of the earth recognize that he has kept faith with the House of Israel (1-3). All nations join in orchestral tribute to the King (4-6). Nature also plays her part; seas, rivers and mountains shout for joy together (7-9).

1. 'His right hand and his holy arm have wrought victory for him' (MT, NP). Messianic triumph seems to be in the singer's mind.

h XCVIII (XCIX)—Yahweh, enthroned at Zion, is King of all nations. Let people praise his great and terrible name, for it is holy (1-3). Justice marks his reign: let Israel worship him before the Ark, for it is holy (4-5). Let prayer be made to him, prayer such as Moses, Aaron and Samuel offered, for he answered their prayers, even though their misdeeds had to be punished (6-8). Let Israel worship towards his holy mountain of Zion, for he is holy (9).

1. 'be angry': Heb. 'tremble (in awe)'. 'the cherubims': over the Ark; cf. 79:2; Ex 25:22; 1 Kg 4:4. 4. 'Thou hast prepared directions': Heb. 'Thou hast established rightfulness'. 5. 'adore his footstool': 'before his footstool', the Ark; cf. 1 Par 28:2; Ex 25:22; Lam 2:1; Ps 131:7. 6. Cf. Ex 17:10-16; Num 14:13-19; 16:46; 1 Kg 7:5, 8 f.; 12:18.

XCIX (C)—All nations are invited to unite with Israel in worshipping the one true God, maker and shepherd of all men (2-3). May they praise and bless his holy name, for he is good, kind and ever faithful (4, 5).

3. 'and not we ourselves': 'and we are his' (Qeri, St Jer., NP).

d C (CI)—David's resolutions for leading a perfect life worthy of a god-fearing man (1-2). He will not look at anything vile; he will have no friendship with apostates and sinners (3-4). No slanderer or proud man shall sit at his table; honest men alone shall be his ministers (5-6). Deceivers and liars need expect no favours from him; daily he will bring the force of the law against evil-doers, until he has thoroughly purged the city of Yahweh (7-8).

2. 'when . . . to me': an aspiration 'Ah, when wilt thou come to me!'. 8. 'In the morning': MT 'Morning after morning', i.e. 'daily' (NP). The courts of justice were held in the morning, 2 Kg 15:2; Jer 21:12.

e CI (CII)—The fifth of the penitential psalms. Afflicted in mind and body, mocked by enemies and cast off by God, the psalmist implores him to hear his prayer (2-13). Then the tone changes: May Yahweh have pity on ruined Zion, rebuild the city, and bring Gentile nations there to worship him (14-23). The original theme is resumed at 24. The singer complains that his strength is exhausted and begs to be saved from premature death. God's eternity is contrasted with the transitoriness of heaven and earth; his changelessness assures the permanence of the race of Israel (24-29). It seems clear that 14-23 refer to the time of the Babylonian Exile. The question is whether these verses were inserted into an earlier Ps describing the sufferings of an individual, or whether, in the first and third parts, the individual represents the misery of the nation during the Exile? We prefer the former of these alternatives.

5. Illness has robbed him of his appetite. 6. He is reduced to skin and bones. 7. The pelican is a bird that seeks solitude; the 'night raven' (i.e. the owl) makes its home among dismal ruins. 9b. Those that used to praise him now swear against him. This reading of Vg, LXX, Syr. seems preferable to MT, NP: 'those mad against me'. 10. 'ashes': a symbol of mourning; cf. Job 2:12; Lam 3:16. 11. Like Job, blessed by prosperity, then reduced to ruin. 12. As the sun sets, the shadows lengthen; so his life is drawing to a close. 13. 'memorial', i.e. name; cf. 29:5; 96:12. 21. 'children doomed to death' (MT, NP), probably referring to the exiles in Babylonia. 24. 'He hath brought low my strength in the way; he hath shortened my days' (MT, NP); the 'way' is life's journey. 25. 'in the midst of my days': in middle age; cf. Ezechias' prayer in Is 38:10. 28-29. A beautiful description of God's eternity and f CII (CIII)—Thanksgiving to the good God who has pardoned the psalmist's sins and restored health to his body (1-5). How compassionate and forgiving is God, who has made his ways known to Moses and Israel! (6-10). His kindness is that of a father, who, knowing the frailty of his children, is ever ready to forgive (11-14). Man's life is brief, but God's mercy is un-failing towards those mindful of his commandments (15-18). The angels in heaven and God's works on earth are invited to join in his praise (19-22). The recitation of the Ps at Compline on Saturdays gives us an opportunity of expressing our gratitude to God for all the blessings of the past week.

5. There was an ancient belief that the eagle renewed its youth by soaring up to the sun and then diving into the sea. But some think that the reference here is to the yearly renewal of the eagle's plumage, while others say that the poet has in mind the long age of the griffon-vulture. 8. Cf. Ex 34:6; Ps 144:8; Jl 2:13; Jon 4:2. 13. Such fatherly love of God for his faithful children is almost unique in the OT. 16. 'the spirit'; the wind, that passes over the flowers of the field.

g CIII (CIV)—A magnificent hymn of the Creation. God created light; then the heavens above (1-4). He separated the waters from the land; he formed mountains and valleys (5-9). He made rivers and rainfalls, that give drink to beasts and birds; grass for cattle and corn for man's bread (10-15); tall trees and mountain heights which are the habitats of birds and beasts (16-18); the sun and moon; night-time, during which beasts prowl about, day-time for man to do his work (19-23). The inhabitants of earth and seas all depend on divine Providence (24-30). Glory be to Yahweh, who can cause earthquakes and volcanic eruptions! May he accept this hymn of praise; may sinners cease to exist! (31-35). There are striking parallels between this Ps and the Egyptian hymn composed by Akhenaton (Amenophis IV) in honour of the Sun as supreme god. The psalmist, however, makes Yahweh the one and only God and the maker of the sun. See Oesterley, A Fresh Approach to the Psalms, 15-18.

1. 'put on splendour and beauty'—by his wonderful work of creation. 2. 'like a pavilion': a tent-curtain. 3. The waters above the firmament are regarded as the floor of 'the higher rooms' in which God dwells; cf. Gen 1:17; Am 9:6. The clouds are the divine chariot, as in the Räs-Shamra texts; cf. RB 46 (1937) 548. 4 is capable of various renderings; see my Commentary. NP chooses: 'Thou makest winds thy messengers, a flaming fire thy ministers', referring to Heb 1:7 and explaining St Paul as follows: 'As far as the angels are concerned, their dignity is less than the dignity of the Son; for God uses even winds for the office (of messengers), and flames of fire for the office of ministration'. But we prefer Mgr Knox's translation: 'Thou wilt have thy angels be like the winds, the servants that wait on thee like a flame of fire'. 6. 'The deep': same word in Gen 1:2. 7. Cf. Gen 1-9. 11. 'As a specimen of the wild beasts provided for, the psalmist mentions the wildest and least partial to men—the wild ass' (Boylan). 16. 'The trees of the field': originally 'trees of the Almighty', which was changed to 'Yahweh's trees', meaning gigantic trees. But *Sparks suggests that the original was 'trees of Sirion', parallel to 'trees of Lebanon', JTS 48 (1947) 58. 17. 'the highest of them': MT, NP 'the fir trees', but if the psalmist has Lebanon in mind, fir trees are not found there. The stork ('heron') makes its nest on the top of trees; so LXX may have the true text. 18. 'irchins': conies; see photograph and article in RB 44 (1935) 581. 19. Gen 1:14. 25. Gen 1:20-22. 26. 'sea dragon': Heb. 'Leviathan', originally a mythical monster, but here representing all sea monsters that besport themselves in God's oceans; see RB 46 (1937) 545. 30. Heb. 'Thou sendest forth thy spirit (i.e. 'breath'), they are created; and thou renewest the face of the earth'. See Porporato VD 12 (1932) 140-7. 35. The only blot on God's creation is man's sin; sinners must be converted or perish. At the close of the Ps in MT, NP we find the first occurrence of Hallelu-Yah, a liturgical call for praise of Yahweh. LXX, Vg place it at the head of the next Ps, where it is more suitable. The same applies to the three following Pss.

358a CIV (CV)—The psalmist invites Israel to sing and make music in praise of Yahweh (1-7), who made a covenant with Abraham, renewed it with Isaac and Jacob, promising them the land of Canaan, and protecting the tribe during its nomadic infancy (8-15). Joseph became a slave in Egypt, but later was released, whereby Jacob and his family came to reside in Egypt (16-23). When the Chosen People were suffering persecution, Moses and Aaron were sent to deliver them (24-26). As a result of plagues inflicted on the Egyptians, Israel was allowed to depart with much treasure (27-38). During the wanderings God manifested his presence in wonderful ways—the cloud and the fire, the quails, the manna, the water from the rock (39-41). He kept his word to Abraham, by giving the people Canaan, where they were to live and to observe laws (42-45).

1. Quoted in Is 12:4. 8. Cf. Lk 1:72. 9. Cf. Gen 12:7; 13:14-17; 15:18-21; 22:16-18; 26:2-5. 15. 'my anointed . . . my prophets': the patriarchs; cf. Gen 12:11-20; 20:1-18; 26:7-11. 18. 'the iron pierced his soul': NP follows Calès: 'his neck was bound by an iron (collar)'; but the Hebrew word is the ordinary one for 'soul'. 19. 'until his word came', viz. to fulfilment. Some think that the 'word' is God's, but it may be Joseph's interpretation of Pharaoh's dream; Gen 41:39. 20. Gen 41:14. 23. 'land of Cham': Egypt, Gen 10:6. 28. 'grieved not his words': 'they resisted his words' (LXX, Syr., NP). For the plagues, see Ex 7-12, but the order is different. 31. 'sciniphs': gnats. 34. The 'bruchus' is the cankerworm, locusts in the larva state. 40. The bread of heaven is the manna, Ex 16:4. 44. 'the labours of the people': the cities built by the Canaanites and their cultivated lands.

b CV (CVI)—A companion to the preceding; but here, in contrast to God's faithfulness to the covenant, we have Israel's repeated infidelity. Both Pss were sung when the Ark was brought by David to Sion and were probably composed for that occasion, 1 Par 16. After the invitation to praise the greatness of Yahweh and to ask his favour (1-5) the poet enters upon his theme—Israel's ingratitude. The people sinned in Egypt and at the Red Sea (6-12). They sinned during the wanderings—at the graves of lust, at the time of the rebellion of Dathan and Abiram, and in making the golden calf (13-20). But for the intercession of Moses, God would have made an end of them, yet disaffection again broke out at the return of the spies (21-27). Another relapse occurred at Baal-Peor; it was punished by a pestilence, and only the conduct of Phinees prevented extermination. At Meriba even Moses fell into sin and had to be punished (28-33). Settled in Canaan they disregarded the divine injunctions, so God allowed enemies to oppress them (34-42). Again and again in their history God forgave them, for he would not break the covenant (34-42). 46 may be a later addition; 47 is post-exilic; 48 is a doxology closing the fourth book of the Psalter. The last line is a liturgical direction.

6. Cf. 3 Kg 8:47. The solidarity of the nation. Sins of Israel's ancestors must be confessed by succeeding generations; cf. Lev 26:39 f.; Ps 108:14. 7. Cf. Ex 14:11 f. 14. Num 11:4-7; Ps 77:29-31. 15. 'fulness': LXX and Syr prob. read zārā 'a loathsome thing'; cf. Num 11:20. MT, St Jer. 'leanness' seems less probable. 16-18. Cf. Num 16. 20. 'their glory': God manifesting himself by what was later called the 359b Shekina. 23, 'in the breach'—a military metaphor of an heroic soldier defending the wall. 24. Cf. Num 13-14. The desirable land is Canaan, Jer 3:19; Zach 7:14. 26, 'lifted up his hand' in solemn oath. 28, Beelphegor—the Baal of Peor, i.e. Chemosh, the god of the Moabites. 'sacrifices of the dead': sacrifices to dead idols. 30. Num 25:7-15. 32-33. Cf. Num 20:1-13. Moses was punished by not being allowed to enter the Promised Land. 'He distinguished with his lips' means that he spoke rashly with his lips. 34. Cf. Jg 1:21, 27, 29; 2:2, 11; 3:5-7. 39, 'went aside': Heb. 'went a-whoring'. Israel was Yahweh's spouse; by unfaithfulness to him the nation committed spiritual adultery; cf. Ex 34:15 f.; Deut 31:16; Os 2:2.

BOOK V

360a CVI (CVII)—Men rescued from perils by God's kindness are called upon to give thanks to him (1-3). Four classes are mentioned: (i) travellers who had lost their way in the desert (4-9); (ii) prisoners released from misery and hard labour (10-16); (iii) sick men restored to health (17-22); (iv) shipwrecked sailors brought safely to harbour (23-32). At 33 the structure and tone change so abruptly that some are of opinion that two distinct Ps have been joined together. The poet draws two pictures: the first of a fertile land (Sodom and Gomorrah?) made barren because of the sins of its inhabitants; the second of a wilderness made fertile and populous (32-42). The conclusion (43) exhorts wise men to take note of God's mercies. A refrain is found in 8, 16, 21, 31. NP says that the liberation of Israel from the Babylonian Exile is clearly indicated in 2. But the redeemed of Yahweh are not necessarily the exiles; they are those mentioned in the subsequent verses, men rescued from divers disasters; we do not hear of Babylonian exiles returning by sea (23-32).

8. The refrain: 'Let these thank Yahweh for his mercy, and for his wondrous dealings with the children of men'. 9b. Quoted in the Magnificat, Lk 1:53. 17a. Read, either MT: 'Fools because of their way of transgressions', or NP: 'They were sick because of their transgression'. 20, 'sent his word', like an angel; cf. Wis 16:12; 18:15. 32. Let them praise him at the city's gate, where crowds gather and elders sit in council; cf. Ruth 4:2. 34. Cf. Deut 29:23; Gen 19:24. 37, 'fruit of birth': Heb. 'fruitful produce', good harvests. 40. Apparently a quotation from Job 12:21. 42. Cf. Job 22:19. 43. A quotation from Os 14:10.

b CVII (CVIII)—This Ps is made up of two fragments, borrowed from 56:8-12 and 59:6-14.

c CVIII (CIX)—An appeal for divine aid against enemies who have repaid the singer's love with calumny and treachery (2-5). Terrible curses are invoked upon their leader, because he is merciless, has persecuted 'the afflicted and poor one', and despises blessings (6-19). The psalmist renews his appeal for help; his strength is failing, while his enemies are wagging their heads at him (20-25). A third time he prays, asking that his enemies be covered with shame, while he gives thanks to Yahweh in the midst of many people (26-31).

The imprecations in 6-19 are dreadful. Traditional interpretation frankly admits that they come from the lips of the psalmist himself; but some modern writers, including Boylan, Rickaby and Barnes, would say that the curses are invoked on the psalmist by his enemies. This solution, however, is not without difficulty, for in the OT we have similar, if not such awful, imprecations. Regarding them as uttered by the psalmist we must bear in mind (1) that he lived under the old Law which included the lex talionis; (2) that oriental poetry is vividly expressed; (3) that he would rather that his sinful enemies were converted than punished. St Peter applies 8 to Judas, Ac 1:20.

Reading these verses in the Divine Office we cannot do better than follow the mind of the Fathers, who regarded them as prophetic of punishments on Christ's enemies.

1. 'in my praise': 'O God whom I praise' (MT, NP). 6, 'the devil': Heb. 'satan', here a human 'accuser'; cf. Zach 3:1 f. 7b, 'May his prayer be inefficacious' (Zorell). 8, 'bishopric': the Heb. word means 'office'; see Ac 1:20. 12-16. The solidarity of the Hebrew family is in the writer's mind. 23. Tossed about by a strong wind, locusts become helpless; so the psalmist feels that his staying-power has gone. 24. His flesh is reduced from fatness to thinness through lack of nourishing oil. 25. See the description of the Messianic sufferer in 21:8.

CIX (CX)—The principle key to the interpretation of Ps 110 (109) is Ps 2. The two Ps have the same subject—enthronement or appointment of a king; both mention a divine decree or oracle addressed to or concerning the king; both allude to hostile nations and kings; both mention the anger of Yahweh; both allude to Sion as the theocratic capital; both allude to the king's rod of iron or might' (E. Burrows, The Gospel of the Infancy and other Biblical Essays, 81).

The psalmist has in mind the ideal Priest-king of the House of David. The Talmud interprets the Ps in a Messianic sense. Christ himself, SS Peter, Paul and Stephen all bear witness to its Messianic character. 'The text itself, the testimony of the NT, the unanimous consent of the Fathers and of Catholic commentators all show that this Ps treats of the Messiah. Christ, our Lord, himself interpreted the Ps of the Messiah, Mt 22:42-46', NP. The author is David; see title and § 49c.

David's Lord, his enemies vanquished, is summoned by Yahweh to sit enthroned at his right hand (1). Messianic rule will originate from Sion (2). 8 is obscure; the text of LXX seems best—the Messiah, who was begotten before the creation of the stars, will one day manifest his power and glory. By solemn oath Yahweh has appointed the Messiah a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedech (4). He shall overthrow all foes, even kings, and gain complete victory (5-7). In addition to the commentaries, consult Sisto VD 10 (1930) 169-75, 201-10; Ogara VD 13 (1933) 209-14; Herkenne Bi 11 (1930) 450-7. With 109 the Vesper psalms commence.

1. The Heb. is: 'Oracle of Yahweh to my Lord' ('ādōn'); cf. Num 36:2. Here the 'Adon' is the anointed son of Yahweh. Cf. 2:2, 7 and Mk 16:19; Ac 7:55. On the footstool of Tutankhamen's throne are representations of defeated enemies. 2. The Lord here is Yahweh. He addresses David's Lord, the Messiah. 'Rule thou', etc.: cf. 2:6; Is 2:3. 3. See McClellan CBQ 5 (1943) 207; Bea CBQ 8 (1946) 8 f. Challoner's translation comes close to the original; but 'principality' should be power or nobility, and 'in the brightness of the saints' should be in holy adornment (cf. MT 29:2; 96:9; 1 Par 16:29), referring to the holy adornment of the Priest-king. 'from the womb before the day star I begot thee': hence 'before the day star' (or 'dawn') is parallel to 'today' in 2:7; both refer to the eternal generation of the Son. Reference to 2:7 also shows that there is no need to correct (as some Catholic commentators do) 'I begot thee'. NP happily retains 'genui te', but its omission of 'ex utero' and reading 'tanquam rorem' is perhaps less felicitous. The LXX is clearly superior to MT, which reads, word for word: 'Thy people are freewill offerings in the day of thy might, in the majesties of holiness; from the womb from dawn for thee dew of thy youth'. For the Hebrew underlying LXX see my Commentary II, 243. Consult also G. R. Driver in JTS 32 (1931) 46. 4. By an irrevocable decree Yahweh ordains his Son a priest (cf. Zac 6:13) after the manner of Melchisedech, the Priest-king of Salem who offered a sacrifice of bread and wine, Gen 14:18. The Levitical priesthood is thus set aside; cf. Heb 7:11-28. 5. 'The Lord' is again David's Lord, the c CX (CXI)—An alphabetical Ps extolling the omnipotence, majesty, mercy and fidelity of Yahweh. He has kept the covenant he made with Israel, giving the lands of the Canaanite nations to his people. His laws are stable; his name is holy and awe-inspiring; reverence of God is the zenith of wisdom.

380d Messias, who, with Yahweh's help, will overthrow his enemies. 'in the day of his wrath' refers especially to the Messianic judgement at the end of time; cf. 2:13. 6. 'fill ruins': 'heap up corpses' (NP). 'in the land of many': 'over a wide country' (MT). 7. Many interpretations are given: (i) he will relentlessly pursue his enemies, halting, but for a moment, to quench his thirst at a wayside brook, then, on again, until he lifts his head high as a victor, so NP. (2) Like Samson, worn out by the slaughter, he needs refreshment to raise himself revived; cf. Jg 15:18. (3) The heads of his slain enemies will lie in ditches as if drinking the water there (Boylan). (4) Many of the Fathers see in a the humiliation of Christ, and in b his exaltation. This seems the best interpretation. 'lift up the head' signifies exaltation after humiliation (see on 3:4); the drinking 'of the torrent in the way' shows that the fight is over.

2b. Heb. means: 'to be studied by all who delight in them'. 4. The remembrance is the paschal meal; cf. Ex 12:14, 24. The Church applies the verse to the Eucharist. 9. The redemption is the release from Egypt; cf. Deut 7:8; 2 Kg 7:23.

f CXI (CXII)—Another alphabetical Ps and twin to 110. What was said of Yahweh there is here said of the godly man. Happy is the man who reflects God in his life. The blessings that will be his are enumerated.

3b. Cf. 110:3b. 4b. Cf. 110:4b. The exemplary life of a religious man is a light in this world's darkness. Christ is the Light of the world. 5a. 'From this we gather that rich men are not sole owners of their wealth, but stewards and dispensers' (Agelli). 5b. Cf. 110:7b. 6. He will never come to ruin. 8. 'look down' on his enemies reduced to shame. 9. Applied to the abundance of grace given by God, 2 Cor 9:9. The horn here means dignity or power. 10c. Cf. 1:6b.

g CXII (CXIII)—The group 112–117 form the Hallel or Hymn of Praise, which was embodied in the Hebrew liturgy for the great festivals. At the paschal meal 112–113:8 were sung before, and 113:9–117 after the supper. For the latter see Mt 26:30; Mk 14:26. The singer invites the servants of Yahweh to praise his name day by day (1–3); for no being can be likened to him who dwells in heaven and condescends to look down to earth in order to lift up the poor and the lowly and to make a barren wife a happy mother (4–9).

1. 'ye servants'. 7–8b. Taken from 1 Kg 2:8. The dunghill signifies extreme degradation; outcasts and lepers sat by the mazbala to get warmth from the smouldering rubbish; cf. Job 2:8. 9. Cf. 1 Kg 2:5.

h CXIII (CXIV–CXV)—At 9 MT begins another Ps, and Vg, DV number the verses afresh. The first part tells of the share nature took in the story of the Exodus—the Red Sea, the river Jordan, the trembling mountains of Sinai, the quaking earth (1–7). 8 seems to be an afterthought—the striking of the rock. The second part (or next Ps) compares Yahweh the living God with the lifeless idols of the heathens. Priests, people and proselytes of Israel, trusting in Yahweh, find that he is their help and shield. May he bless them all, increase their numbers and give them life, that they may bless him henceforth and for ever (9–18).

1. 'a barbarous people': Heb.: 'a people of strange speech'; cf. Gen 42:23. 3. Ex 15:8; Jos 3:17. 4. Ex 19:16–19; Jg 5:5; Ps 67:9. 8. Ex 17:6; Num 20:11.

i CXIV–CXV (CXVI)—In MT these two psalms are one. The first is an act of the love of God recited by one who has been rescued from death. The second is an act of hope in God recited by one who has lost confidence in men; to God he will make an ex-voto offering as an act of public thanksgiving. These two Ps are recited at Vespers on Monday. Ps 115 is part of the priest's Preparation for Mass; reciting it, we may refer it to Christ, 'the servant of Yahweh', offering the 'chalice of salvation' in the presence of all nations, as a memorial of his death, so precious in the sight of his Father.

1. Heb. should probably be rendered: 'I love! [a fervent ejaculation] because Yahweh hath heard'. 2. 'in my days': all my life, now that I am restored to health. 3. 'sorrows': 'cords' (MT, NP). 'hell': Heb. 'Sheol'; cf. 17:5–7. 6. The little ones are those who depend on God as their father; cf. 18:8; Mt 11:25. 9. See on 26:13. 10. NP: 'I was confident, even when I said: I am exceedingly afflicted'. 11. 'in my excess': the Heb. root means 'haste'; here we suggest in my emotion. 13. A reference to the drink-offering that accompanied the thanksgiving sacrifice. Cf. Mt 26:27. 15. The meaning is that the life of a saint is so precious in the sight of God that he will preserve it from violent death. When we use the verse on the feast of martyrs, the sense is that their heroic deaths are precious in God's sight.

CXVI (CXVII)—All nations are invited to praise Yahweh because of his kindness and fidelity. The psalmist, as a prophet, foresees the conversion of the Gentiles. 2 may be understood as their own prayer (cf. Rom 15:11); and in this sense we sing the Ps at the close of Benediction.

CXVII (CXVIII)—The last Ps of the Hallel. Assuming that this was the 'hymn' mentioned in Mt 26:30, Christ recited it when, rejected by the Jews, he was about to become the corner-stone of the Church (22). Originally a processional hymn, it was sung antiphonally by people, priests and proselytes entering into the temple to thank Yahweh for victory and renewal of national life (1–18). The thanksgiving is repeated and a day of rejoicing is proclaimed at Yahweh's altar (19–29).

1. 'Give thanks'. Cf. 105:1; 106:1; 135:1. 5. 'enlarged me': 'gave me relief'. 14. Based on Ex 15:2; cf. Is 12:2. 15. The Ps was sung on the Feast of Tabernacles (Succoth). 22. The stone is the Hebrew nation, regarded as useless by Gentile nations, but now raised by God to a conspicuous position, made the important corner-stone that binds the walls together; cf. Is 28:16. Our Lord, as the Jewish Messias, applied this verse to his own rejection and exaltation; Mt 21:42; etc. 25. 'save': omit 'me'. Heb. hōšā'a-nā becomes 'Hosanna' in Aramaic—a liturgical cry; cf. Mt 21:8f. 27. 'Appoint . . . the altar'. NP: 'Arrange a procession with thickly woven boughs' may be correct, but an alternative is: 'Bind the festal sacrifices (or 'victim') to the horns of the altar with cords'; in favour of 'thickly woven boughs' see 2 Mac 10:7. 'horn' should be horns; the corners of the altar of holocausts were shaped like horns, Ex 27:2. See McClellan in CBQ 5 (1943) 211–3.

CXVIII (CXIX)—An alphabetical Ps, in which the initial letter of each set of eight consecutive verses is the same, until the alphabet is exhausted. The subject is the observance of the Mosaic Law with its eight divisions: laws, testimonies, precepts, statutes, commandments, judgements, words and sayings. The artificial arrangement is at the expense of consecutive thought; hence, at the divine Office, each verse should be read as a separate entity. Consult Bi 4 (1923) 375; RB 46 (1937) 182–206; 48 (1939) 5–20; CBQ 5 (1943) 345–7.

5. 'justifications': 'statutes' (NP). So elsewhere in the Ps. 11. 'words': 'sayings', and so throughout. 27. 'I will meditate on thy wonderful deeds' (MT, NP). 28. 'My soul melteth [or 'sheds tears', NP] through grief' (MT). 39. 'reproach whereof I am afraid' (MT, NP). He fears the contempt and insults of his enemies. 48. 'lifted up my hands'—venerating the commandments, as if in prayer. 67. 'Before I was afflicted' (MT, NP); suffering brought his soul to God. 69. The Heb. is: 'The proud have besmeared me with lies'; NP renders 'Machinantur fraudes'. 70.

361e 'curdled like milk': 'gross as fat'; a heart wedded to sin becomes insensible to spiritual impressions; cf. 16:10; Mt 13:15. 73. A beautiful thought: God makes and moulds the soul, and will give it spiritual understanding: cf. Deut 32:6; Job 10:8. 88. 'a bottle in the frost': NP with MT 'a bottle in the smoke'; but LXX, Vg, St Jer., Syr., Sym. may well be right in reading 'frost': a wine-skin bottle lying in the frost becomes shrivelled up and needs warmth; so does the psalmist need the warmth of divine comfort. If we read 'smoke' we must suppose that the wine-skin is shrivelled up and blackened by the smoke of the fire in the house. 91. The Hebrew means that the permanence of heaven and earth is a symbol of the Law that does not change. 96. 'What men call "perfect" is limited, but the divine Law has no limits' (NP note). 103. Cf. 18:10 f. 109. He is continually exposed to death; cf. Jg 12:3; 1 Kg 19:5; 28:21. 120. MT, NP: 'My flesh shudders for fear of thee'. 'A profound religious awe is meant' (Lattey). 131. Like a thirsty deer panting for water, he longs for the spiritual refreshment of the Law; cf. 41:2. 140. 'refined': like gold or silver in fire; cf. 11:7. 148. He forestalls the dawn to meditate on the Law. 160. Cf. Jn 17:17. 164. 'Seven times a day': throughout the whole day—seven denoting completion; cf. 11:7; 78:12; Prov 24:16. The division of the Church's prayer into seven canonical hours may have been derived from this text.

d CXXIX (CXX)—The first of the fifteen 'Gradual' Pss, Pss appointed to be sung by pilgrims 'going up' to Jerusalem. Here the pilgrim prays for deliverance from treacherous enemies who use their tongues against him (1-4); and he laments that he has to live amongst godless barbarians who give him no peace (5-7).

3. A form of oath. May God curse thee, thou deceitful tongue! Cf. 1 Kg 3:17; 14:44; 25:22. 4. Often understood as the punishments of the curse invoked in 3 (so NP), but in the light of other OT passages (63:4-6, 8 f.; Prov 25:18; Jer 9:3, 8) it would seem to be descriptive of the treacherous tongue. The evil tongue is likened to 'a fighter's sharpened arrows' and 'hot charcoal of broom-wood' (MT). Cf. Jas 3:6; Prov 16:27. 5. 'is prolonged': 'is in Meshech' (so MT; NP 'Mosoch'). The Moschi were a barbarian tribe dwelling between the mountains of Armenia and the Black Sea, Gen 10:2; 1 Par 1:5; Ez 27:13; 38:3; 39:1. The tribesmen of Kedar dwelt in the Syro-Arabian desert, Gen 25:13; Is 21:16 f.; 60:7; Jer 49:28. The two names are representative of hostile tribes through whose territories pilgrims had to pass on their way up to Jerusalem.

e CXX (CXXI)—A beautiful hymn sung by the pilgrims as they made their way over rough roads (3) in the heat of the day or during night-time (8) towards the hills of Judah, on which Sion was built (1). Yahweh, Maker of heaven and earth and Guardian of Israel is their Guide on the journey (2, 4, 5, 7, 8).

5. 'protection': Heb. 'shade'; cf. 90:1 f. 6. The moon is really dangerous in oriental countries, where it produces, in those exposed too long to its rays, painful ophthalmia and cerebral inflammation, which sometimes proves fatal (Fillion). 8. 'coming in and going out' is an expression denoting all one's activities; cf. Deut 28:6; 31:2, etc.

f CXXI (CXXII)—Joy at the prospect of making the pilgrimage (1). Arrival at the city, which is the seat of government (2-5). Prayer that Jerusalem and its temple may enjoy peace and prosperity (6-9).

4. 'the testimony of Israel'; cf. Ex 23:17; 34:23; Deut 16:16. 5. 'Yea, there the seats of judgement are set, the seats of David's house' (MT, NP), i.e. the law courts.

g CXXII (CXXIII)—It is not easy to find a pilgrimage motif in this Ps. The singers are being persecuted. Perhaps the proud (4) are the heathens who attack the pilgrims, or, possibly, they are godless Israelites who pour scorn on the pilgrimage. As slaves keep their eyes fixed on the hands of their masters or mistresses for signals, so do the pilgrims lift up their eyes to 361g Yahweh, waiting for him to show them pity in the distress they are suffering from their enemies.

CXXIII (CXXIV)—Thanksgiving to God who has intervened in defence of Israel when enemies (perhaps those mentioned in the previous Ps) would have overwhelmed them like a rushing torrent. The pilgrims were like a bird caught in a trap; the snare is broken and the pilgrims are safe.

8. Frequently used in the Church's liturgy. In the Ps it means that the pilgrims obtained help by invoking the name of Yahweh, who, as Maker of heaven and earth, has illimitable power.

CXXIV (CXXV)—The girdle of hills around Jerusalem reminds the pilgrims of God's protection of his people (1-2). He will not allow pagans to hold sway over the land of Canaan, lest his people be contaminated by their evil manners (3). Prayer is offered for blessings on the upright of heart, for chastisement of those who follow pagan ways, and for peace upon Israel (4-5).

3. 'the sceptre of the wicked' (LXX, Syr., Sym.), 'the lot of the just' is Canaan, the land assigned by God to Israel. 5. 'bonds': Heb. 'crooked ways', i.e. pagan practices.

CXXV (CXXVI)—The singer looks forward to Messianic days, when, as in dreamland, the people will be exceedingly happy. Then, also, will the Gentiles recognize what great things Yahweh has done for Jews and Gentiles (1-3). But these happy days are in the future; at the moment the people are sowing seed with tears. May God bring prosperity, as water brings fertility to the parched Negeb (4-6). The Ps regards the future and the present in much the same way as Ps 84. It is taken for granted by some commentators (including NP) that this is a hymn of the exiles returning from Babylonia; rather it is a 'pilgrim psalm', supposing the existence of the temple.

1. 'brought back the captivity of Sion': restored prosperity to Sion. There is no allusion to the Babylonian exile; cf. 13:7; 84:2; Job 42:10. 'like men comforted': Heb. 'like men in a dream', i.e. enjoying happiness that seems too good to be true. 2. 'shall be'. 4. The Negeb, or southern desert of Judah, was parched in the summer, but its stream ran with copious water when the autumn rains fell. So Israel, now dry and fruitless, will gain prosperity in the Messianic days to come.

CXXVI (CXXVII)—The blessing of having a large family. Children are God's gift; without them the labours of the present generation are in vain, and the security of the state is imperilled (1-3). Children are like arrows in a warrior's quiver; with weapons like these a man can defy his adversaries (4-5).

1. 'build the house', i.e. give offspring, so that the family line may continue; cf. Ex 1:21; Deut 25:9, etc. 2. 'and take rest late, eating bread of toil' (MT). Vain for men to get up early and work till late at night if there is no family to benefit by this. 'When he shall give sleep to his beloved': differently interpreted. It would seem that the 'beloved' are the Chosen People, Deut 33:12; Is 5:1; Jer 11:15; Ps 59:6. As they 'sleep' in death, Job 14:12, they need sons to follow after them. Another interpretation is that God gives children, forming them in the womb during sleep; cf. Wis 7:2. See also Joüon in Bi 11 (1930) 84; Kroon in VD 11 (1931) 38; McClellan in CBQ 5 (1943) 348. 4. 'children of youth' (MT, NP), children born when their parents are young; these sons will grow up to defend their parents before the latter come to die. 5. 'the desire': 'his quiver' (MT, NP) 'Obviously a strong bodyguard of sturdy sons would help to secure for their father fair play when he had trouble with rivals at the gate of the city' (Bovlan).

CXXVII (CXXVIII)—A sequel to the previous Ps. Here are described the blessings of religious home-life. The good father provides for the needs of his family; his wife attends to the household duties, and, like a fruitful vine, bears healthy children, who sit round the family board like so many olive-shoots from the parent 3611 stem (1-3). God bless this good father, giving him long life, while peace and prosperity reign in Jerusalem! (4-6).

3. 'in the inner parts of thy house' (MT, NP). She does not gossip on the door-step, like the foolish woman of Prov 9:13 f. The olive is a symbol of health and vigour; as the parent tree grows old, young shoots spring up around it.

m CXXXVIII (CXXXIX)—From the time of her youth (in Egypt) Israel has suffered many persecutions, but has never been exterminated. Her foes have cut long furrows into her back, but Yahweh has always come to her aid (1-4). May Sion's enemies be confounded; may they be as short-lived as grass that grows on a house-top and is never reaped with a harvest blessing (5-8).

3. 'Upon my back ploughmen have ploughed: long were the furrows they made' (St Jer.); cf. Is 51:23; Mic 3:12. 4. 'necks', as LXX, may be correct; MT, NP 'ropes' may refer to the ropes of the yoke (3). 6. 'On the flat and mud-plastered roofs of Palestinian houses of yore grass sprang up after the rains, but it quickly withered away in the heat of the sun' (NP). 8. The greeting of the reapers; cf. Ru 2:4.

362a CXXXIX (CXXX)—The sixth penitential and the final Ps in the Preparation for Mass is an act of contrition. The Church has adopted it as an official prayer for the holy souls in Purgatory. From the depths of depression, due to a sense of sin, the psalmist cries out to God to hear his prayer. Should strict justice be demanded no man would be acquitted; but God is forgiving (1-4). So, with hope and patience, the singer (representing Israel) waits for redemption from all iniquities (5-8).

4b. NP 'that thou mayest be served with reverence' follows MT; but LXX, Vg 'by reason of thy law I wait for thee' deserves attention. The law contained the 'word', i.e. the promise of forgiveness; cf. 118:74, 81. See Arconada in VD 12 (1932) 213-9. 6. 'From the morning watch even until night', as LXX (Sin.), Vg, may be preferable to MT 'more than watchers for the morning, watchers for the morning' where dittography may reasonably be suspected. NP follows MT but makes the second phrase the opening of a new stanza.

b CXXX (CXXXI)—As a baby reposes untroubled in its mother's lap, so does the singer, disdaining high and mighty thoughts, commit himself entirely to God. 3 may be an addition. With the Ps cf. Mt 18:3; 1 Pet 5:7. Here the 'Little Way' of St Teresa of Lisieux is found in a nutshell; see my article in Sicut Parvuli 8 (1946) 134 ff.

c CXXXI (CXXXII)—The first part tells of David's ardent desire to build a temple for the God of Jacob (1-5). The second part expresses the enthusiasm of the people and their eagerness to bring the Ark to Sion (6-10). The third part speaks of the establishment of the Davidic throne (11-12). God's promise of blessings on Sion is given in the fourth part: he will provision the city, feed its poor, sanctify its priests; and from the House of David shall come forth the Messias, whose enemies shall be brought to shame (13-18). Cf. Ps 88.

2. 'God': Heb. 'Mighty One' (also 5). Cf. Gen 49:24; etc. 6. Ephrata is probably another name for Bethlehem, David's native town, Gen 35:19 etc. 'the fields of the wood': Heb. 'fields of Ya'ar' is Qiryathyearim where the Ark remained for some years, 1 Kg 7:1 f. 7. 'the place where his feet stood' is the Ark, upon which the divine Presence was enthroned; cf. 98:5; 1 Par 28:2; Lam 2:1. 8. 'thy resting place' is the permanent sanctuary at Sion, 1 Par 28:2; 2 Par 6:41 f. 9. Cf. David's command in 1 Par 15:12, 14, 27; 2 Kg 6:12, 15. 10. 'thy anointed' is Solomon. 11. 'Of the fruit of thy womb'; see 2 Kg 7:12. 14. See David's words in 1 Par 28:2. 15. 'I will indeed bless her supply of food' (MT, NP); but see Joüin in Bi 11 (1930) 85. 17. 'bring forth a horn': the Heb. means 'cause to sprout', whence Messianic name semah 'the sprout'; cf. Jer 23:5, etc.

The horn, par excellence is the Messias; cf. Lk 1:69. 362c The ever-burning lamp is the permanence of the Davidic line: cf. 2 Kg 21:17, etc. The Jews understood that the verse referred to the Messias; doubtless this was also the meaning in the psalmist's mind.

CXXXII (CXXXIII)—How good and pleasant for pilgrims to be gathered together at Sion! As the sacred oil of consecration, poured upon Aaron's head, trickled down to his beard and then to the collar of his robe, and as the dew of Hermon may be said to descend on Sion's hill, so do God's blessings flow from Sion, the capital city, and extend over the whole land, giving life to its people for evermore.

3. For the many interpretations of this verse see my Commentary II, 350 f. If the text is left unaltered we have the choice of taking 'the dew of Hermon' proverbially or literally. NP prefers the former: dew, as abundant as that on Hermon, represents the crowds of pilgrims to Jerusalem. But the literal meaning is more in keeping with 2. As the sacred oil falls first on Aaron's head and then comes right down to his collar, and as dew falls first on Canaan's most conspicuous mountain and later reaches the hill of Sion, so do God's blessings fall first on the capital city and from there extend over the whole land.

CXXXIII (CXXXIV)—Priests and Levites are summoned to praise God at night service in the temple. Or the 'servants of the Lord' may be pilgrims who are worshipping at the sanctuary during the night. 3 gives the priestly blessing (Num 6:24). Obviously a Compline Ps (Sunday).

CXXXIV (CXXXV)—God's servants, gathered together in the temple, are called upon to praise Yahweh for choosing out Israel as his special possession (1-4). Yahweh alone is God, Lord of heaven and earth; it is he who causes mists, lightnings and rain (5-7). He brought Israel out of Egypt and gave Canaan to his people, after smiting kings—Og, Sehon and the kings of Canaan (8-12). Idols are fashioned by men's hands (13-18). May all classes of Israelites bless Yahweh, whose dwelling-place is at Sion (19-21).

4. Based on Deut 7:6; cf. Ex 19:5; Deut 14:2; 26:18. 'Though Israel was God's special possession, to the Word made Flesh it was said: Ask of me and I will give thee the Gentiles for thine inheritance' (Agelli). 5. 'gods'; see on 94:3. 11. Sehon and Og seem to have been regarded in early Hebrew history as the most formidable opponents of Israel's entry into the Promised Land; Num 21:21 ff.; Deut 2:30 ff., etc.

CXXXV (CXXXVI)—The theme is similar to that of Ps 134; but here the matter is arranged in litany form for antiphonal chanting. Praise and thanksgiving are offered to Yahweh, Maker of heaven and earth, who brought Israel out of Egypt, smote Pharaoh's army, led the people through the wilderness, slew their enemies and gave them possession of Canaan. The good God feeds all his living creatures; his kindness never fails. In the Talmud the Ps is known as the Great Hallel. It was sung on the seventh day of the passover feast. See *Slotki in JTS 29 (1928) 255 ff.

5. 'in understanding': in an orderly manner, not haphazard; cf. 103:24; Prov 3:19.

CXXXVI (CXXXVII)—The only Ps that unmistakably speaks of the Babylonian Exile. It was composed during or soon after the Captivity. Gathered together on the banks of Babylon's streams (probably for ceremonial ablutions) the captives, with tears in their eyes, remember Sion. Their musical instruments, that once accompanied Pss in the temple, now hang silent on the poplar trees (1-2). How impossible to sing a hymn to Yahweh on a foreign soil! (3-4). Cursed be the hand and tongue of any exile who should forget Sion! (5-6). May God bear in mind the savage cruelty of the Edomites on the day of Jerusalem's downfall; may vengeance come upon the Babylonians who have taken Israel into captivity (7-9).

5. 'my right hand be forgotten': become paralysed and unable to play on the harp. 6. 'cleave to my 362h palate, and so be unable to sing Pss any more. 7. For the hostility of the Edomites towards their Hebrew kinsmen see Is 34:5-15; Jer 49:7-22, etc. 9. 'The cruelty mentioned in the text was common in wars of those times. It was not regarded as unjust. It was a right, or rather an intolerable abuse, authorized by custom and recognized by either side of the combatants. We find it in Os 14:1 and in Homer, Iliad, XXII' (Calmet).

1 CXXXVII (CXXXVIII)—Thanksgiving to God for his kindness and faithfulness and because he has heard the psalmist's prayer (1-8). May all the kings of the world sing his praises, for great is his glory (4-6). He will surely protect the singer from his adversaries; he never forsakes the works of his hands (7-8).

1. 'angels': so LXX, Vg, NP. Heb. 'elohim' may mean 'gods', so St Jer., Aq., Quinta, EVV. If 'gods' is the meaning, the psalmist is, as it were, challenging them, without, however, implying their existence. 2. 'temple': prob. heaven. 4. 'the words of thy mouth': perhaps God's Messianic revelation; cf. 2:10-13; 71:11. 5. 'sing of thy ways' (MT, NP). 8a. 'will repay for me': LXX 'dealeth well with me' seems correct against MT 'will bring to an end on my behalf', which NP renders 'but perfect for me what is begun'.

2 CXXXVIII (CXXXIX)—A beautiful Ps, but textually difficult. It describes God's omniscience (1-6), omnipresence (7-12), and his marvellous formation of the human frame (13-16). Beyond reckoning are his plans; wickedness alone mars his work; may sinners be slain; the psalmist hates them because they hate God (17-22). Should he be going astray, may God lead him back to the right way (23-24).

3. 'my line': besides meaning 'line' or 'rope' the word in LXX means a 'rush-bed', which agrees with Heb. 'my lying down'. God knows every act of our lives. 4b-5a. 'For ere a word is on my tongue, lo, Yahweh, thou knowest it thoroughly' (MT, NP); cf. Mt 6:8. 5b. 'the last and those of old': 'Back and front thou hast fashioned me' (St Jer.); cf. 118:73. 11b. Probably: 'Night shall be (as) light about me'. 13. 'possessed my reins': formed the internal parts of my body. 'protected me': Heb. 'knit me together'. 15. The foetus hidden in the mother's womb developed under God's watchful eye. 16. 'my imperfect being': my embryo state. A modern emendation 'my acts' is adopted by NP. 'And in thy book all (my life) was written; days were fixed, although not one of them as yet had come'. Our lives are foreseen by God, and all our actions are recorded, as it were, in his book, even before we are born. See CBQ 6 (1944) 99; VD 11 (1931) 243. 17. 'How precious [perhaps in the sense of 'inscrutable'; but NP reads 'arduous' following some moderns] are thy thoughts unto me, O God! How great the sum of them!' (MT). 18. 'I rose up': Heb. 'I awake'. Some say, to consciousness at birth; others that he awakes to find himself doing what he did before he went to sleep, namely meditating on God's works. NP reads 'if I finish' (also Gunkel, Oesterley). The awakening may be from death; cf. 16:15; 72:20. Death does not separate the singer from God: 'I am still with thee'. 19. 'O that thou wouldst'. 20. The text is corrupt. With Boylan and Oesterley we prefer to read: 'They take thy name in vain'. NP has 'Thine enemies are puffed up perfidiously'. 21b. 'and loathe those who rise up against thee' (MT). 24. 'the eternal way': NP has 'the ancient way', i.e. the way in which the pious men of old walked, Noe, Abraham and others; cf. Jer 6:16; 18:15.

3 CXXXIX (CXL)—Prayer for deliverance from enemies who, by poisonous words and plotting, seek to ensnare the psalmist (2-6). May God thwart their designs and punish them (7-12). May pious men thank Yahweh, who maintains the cause of the oppressed (13-14). This and the next three Pss are in the style of the Davidic hymns of the first book of the Psalter.

8. 'overshadowed my head'—as a helmet. 9a. 'Grant not, O Yahweh, the desires of the wicked' (MT, NP).

10. A difficult verse; see commentaries. We prefer (with Oesterley): 'May they who surround me not lift up their heads', but be humiliated. b. 'may the mischief of their lips overwhelm them' (NP). 11. Punishment such as fell on the Sodomites. 11b. Probably: 'may they fall into pits whence they shall not rise'. 12. 'A man full of tongue' is a slanderer.

CXL (CXLI)—After a petition that his prayer may be heard, the singer asks that he may be kept from associating with men whose speech is evil and whose deeds are iniquitous (1-4). He welcomes correction from pious men, but has no desire to consort with sinners; rather he wishes to see them destroyed (5-7). Lifting up his eyes to God, he prays that he may escape traps set to catch him. May the wicked fall into their own traps, while he passes on his way safely (8-10). In the early Church the Ps was known as the epituchnos because it was recited at evening (2), when the lamps were lit (Apost. Constit. 2, 59; 8, 35). 2-4b are recited at Mass, when the altar is being incensed at the offertory.

2. Incense was offered morning and evening at the altar, Ex 30:7, 34, 37. The lifting up of hands signifies prayer, 27:2. 4. 'to make excuses in sins': 'to commit wicked deeds' (NP). 'I will not... of them': 'Let me not eat of their dainties' (MT). Agelli sees a reference to fornication, Prov 9:17; 30:20; others say that he refuses invitations to banquets given by worldly men. 5. We prefer LXX, Vg; the double rōf in MT is suspicious. Oil was poured on the head of guests; the psalmist does not want this oil from sinners. 6-7. Very difficult; see commentaries. The 'judges' are probably the leaders of the psalmist's adversaries. In vivid language he asks that they be hurled down a cliff, that their bodies may burst open, and that their bones be strewn before the mouth of devouring Sheol. Cf. 2 Par 25:12; Ac 1:18. 10. Heb. 'while I pass on (unharmd)'.

CXLI (CXLII)—In utter distress because he is caught in an ambush, the psalmist cries out to God, his only hope, for release and restoration to his friends. The title says that the Ps was composed by David 'when he was in the cave', 1 Kg 22 or 24. We need not suppose that it was written in the cave; rather it is a thanksgiving hymn (8) commemorating the occasion. Internal evidence supports the Davidic authorship. We may apply it (Vespers on Friday) to the sufferings of the Son of David.

5. 'my soul': my life. 6. 'the land of the living'; see on 26:13. 8. 'prison': probably figurative of David's distress.

CXLII (CXLIII)—The last of the penitential psalms. The singer prays for clemency, for, in God's sight, no living man is perfect (1-2). Persecuted by an enemy and sick at heart, he recalls God's former mercies, ardently desiring his aid (3-6). May his prayer be speedily answered; may he be granted deliverance and guidance (7-8). He repeats his request and asks for the destruction of his enemies, for he is the servant of Yahweh (9-12).

2. Should God judge men according to strict justice, no one would be acquitted; cf. 50:6; 129:3, etc. The verse is recited at the Burial Service. 3c-d. Quoted in Lam 3:6. 'darkness': Heb. 'dark places', either figuratively or referring to the dark cave in which David was forced to hide, places where 'those that have been dead of old' were buried. 8. To say that when he worships the next morning (the morning being one of the times of prayer) he hopes to hear God's mercy, seems too banal an interpretation. Hardly satisfactory is the suggestion that the morning will bring hope after a dark night. NP interprets 'in the morning' by 'cito'. Possibly the phrase may refer to the morning after the night of death (cf. 16:15; 48:15); the psalmist has just spoken of those who 'go down to the pit' of Sheol. 10. He prays that the holy spirit of God (cf. 2 Esd 9:20) may lead him in (or 'into') a 'right land'. The mention of 'land' is strange. May he be thinking of life hereafter?

363d CXLIII (CXLIV)—The first part of the Ps, in which the singer thanks God for military victories, asks for a theophany and for protection against foreign foes, is made up of passages taken from other Davidic Pss (1-8). In the second part (or is it a separate hymn?) it becomes Messianic—'a new song'. It foresees victory for the House of David and happy times for the people: fine sons and daughters, storehouses full, thousands of flocks, an end of wars and civic strife. Happy the people who shall live in this golden age! (9-15).

1. 'my God': Heb. 'my rock'; cf. 17:3. 3. 'that thou . . . to him': 'that thou takest knowledge of him' (MT); cf. 8:5. 4. 'vanity': the Heb. also means 'breath', 'vapour'; NP 'a breath of air'. 7. 'strange children': foreigners. 8b. The right hand was uplifted when taking an oath; hence NP 'their right hand swears a lie'. 12. NP 'sculptured as columns of a temple'; but a slight change in the Heb. gives the meaning that the maidens were clothed in dark-hued dresses, such as were worn in palaces. See Agelli, and cf. 2 Kg 1:24; Ps 44:15.

• CXLIV (CXLV)—An alphabetical Ps. Letter n is missing in MT but preserved in LXX, Vg. As usual the flow of thought is hampered by this artificial setting, but the keynote is in 13; God's kingdom shall last for ever. The hymn opens with praise to God, the great King, whose wonderful deeds are to be proclaimed throughout all generations (1-7). He is patient and good to all men; may his pious servants extol the splendour of his kingdom (8-13). He is faithful; he is holy; he lifts up the fallen; all creatures depend on his providence (14-16). He is just; he listens to the prayers of those who revere him; he watches over those who love him, but he destroys wicked men (17-20). May all mankind bless his holy name (21). Part of our Grace after Meals is taken from 15-16, verses which occur in the Gradual for the Feast of Corpus Christi; from early times they have been used as an Eucharistic prayer; see St John Chrysostom, PG 55, 464.

5. The text in LXX, Vg is better than that in MT. 8. Cf. 102:8; Ex 34:6.

† CXLV (CXLVI)—Instead of relying on human potentates, let faithful Israelites trust in Yahweh; for whereas princes die, he who made heaven and earth remains for ever (2-6). It is he who gives just judgements, feeds the hungry, releases prisoners from captivity, gives sight to the blind, lifts up the down-trodden, loves the upright, watches over travellers, helps widows and orphans, but punishes the wicked (7-9). Sion's God reigns for ever (10).

4a. An allusion to Gen 3:19; see also 1 Mac 2:63.

• CXLVI (CXLVII 1-11)—Praise to Yahweh who has built up Jerusalem and gathered together the dispersed of Israel, healing the broken-hearted and binding the wounds of those who have been hurt (1-3). He who can count the stars and whose knowledge is infinite upholds the afflicted and brings down the wicked (4-6). What follows is probably an attachment; for whereas the first part seems to celebrate the dedication of the walls of the City after the return from Captivity (2 Esd 12:27 ff.), at 7 there begins a hymn of thanksgiving to God, by whose providence beasts and birds are fed. He delights not in physical strength but in the love of those who revere him (7-11). MT continues with what in LXX, Vg is Ps 147. Originally there may have been three Pss.

8. Cf. 103:13 f. 9. Young ravens are mentioned because, left at an early age to fend for themselves, they require special protection from the Lord (Boylan). 10. 'the legs of a man'—upon which he depends for flight from danger; cf. 17:34; Am 2:14 f.

CXLVII (CXLVII 12-20)—Let Jerusalem praise Yahweh, because he has made it secure, blessed its inhabitants, established peace on the borders of Israel, and given a good harvest (1-3). He is Lord of all nature; at his bidding fleecy snowflakes fall, frost lies like powder on the ground, layers of ice appear on the waters (4-6). Again, at his command, the thaw sets in and the waters flow again (7). Nature's Lord is also the great Lawgiver; he has revealed himself to Israel as his chosen race (8-9).

5. 'mists': 'hoarfrost'. 'ashes': white ash or powder. 6. 'crystal': ice. 'morsels': the ice on the water resembles thin layers of bread; but if, with NP, the former word is translated 'hailstones', the meaning will be that these come down like 'crumbs' of bread. 8. Cf. Deut 4:8.

CXLVIII—All creatures are summoned to praise God. 1 First, those in heaven and the sky—the angelic host, the sun, moon, stars and clouds: they must praise God because, at his word, they came into being (1-6). Then, the creatures below the heavens—the great deep and its monsters, all kinds of severe weather, mountains and hills, vegetative life, sensitive life, intellectual life from kings to babies (7-12). He is worthy of all praise, for he reigns in majesty above earth and heaven. He has given strength to his people, in thanksgiving for which this hymn is written (13-14).

2. 'hosts': here angelic armies, as the parallelism shows; cf. Jos 5:14; 3 Kg 22:19. 4. 'heavens of heavens': the highest heavens; cf. Deut 10:14; 3 Kg 8:27. 'waters above the heavens': cf. Gen 1:6 f.; Ps 103:3. 7. 'dragons': sea-monsters, Gen 1:21. 14. 'the horn of his people' may mean strength and dignity as in 17:3, or may have Messianic significance as in 131:17; Lk 1:69.

CXLIX—A 'new song' celebrating the triumph of the people of God over Gentile nations. The singer pictures the victory celebrations—singing, dancing, cheering, with swords ready for any emergency. The Christian counterpart is the 'new song' of Apoc 5:9, the Messianic triumph over every tribe and nation and race.

3. 'choir': Vg 'choro' here means 'dance'. For religious dances see Ex 15:20; 1 Kg 18:6; 2 Kg 6:16; Jer 31:4; Ps 150:4. The timbrel is the tambourine; the psaltery is a kind of lyre. 5. 'in their beds'—resting after victory; cf. Os 2:18. 7-8. Cf. Messianic Ps 2:6-9; Is 45:14. 9. 'the judgement that is written', the prophecies foretelling victory over the Gentiles, e.g. Ps 2. The subjection of the Gentiles will redound to the glory of pious Israelites.

CL—The full orchestra—horns, harps, lyres, tambourines, stringed instruments, castanets and cymbals—bursts forth in a magnificent finale, calling upon the angels in heaven and every living creature to praise God because of his mighty deeds and his abundant greatness. It is part of the priest's Thanksgiving after Mass. The angelic orchestra accompany him in thanking God for the adorable mystery of the altar! Alleluia!

PROVERBS

b Title—In MT the title is 'Mishle Shelomoh'. The word māšāl seems originally to have signified 'likeness', 'resemblance' (e.g. 26:1 f.), then a short comparison (e.g. 25:25 f.), and eventually a sententious saying in general. In the oldest texts in which the word māšāl is found (Num 23:7, 18; 24:3, 15), it designates the revelation granted by God to Balaam as expressed by him in a figurative and poetic form, and in the Psalms (e.g. MT, 49:5 and 78:2) it is again the vehicle of divinely inspired instruction. The 'three thousand proverbs' (māšāl) pronounced by Solomon were the results of the 'wisdom given by God to the king' (3 Kg 4:29, 32). Every māšāl of the Prov is also regarded as a divinely inspired teaching, often enclosed in an expressed or hidden comparison which demands from the reader the effort of penetration necessary to grasp its meaning and import. LXX bears the title παροιμία Σαλωμώντος which can mean either the 'Proverbs' or 'Parables' of Solomon. Vg has translated the word māšāl by 'parable' in 1:1. The book was also known to the Fathers of the Church as the 'Wisdom of Solomon'.

c Division—The book may be divided according to author, matter, and literary form, into nine sections with a short introduction (1:1-7) containing the title and purpose.

Section

- | | |
|--|-------------|
| 1. A general invitation to acquire Wisdom | 1:8-9:18 |
| 2. A first collection of Solomon's proverbs | 10:1-22:16 |
| 3. A collection of sayings of the wise men | 22:17-24:22 |
| 4. Another small collection of sayings of the wise men | 24:23-34 |
| 5. A collection of 'Proverbs of Solomon gathered together by the people of Ezechias' | 25:1-29:27 |
| 6. The 'Sayings of Agur, son of Jakeh' | 30:1-14 |
| 7. Numerical sayings | 30:15-33 |
| 8. The 'Sayings of King Lemuel' | 31:1-9 |
| 9. A portrait of the virtuous wife | 31:10-31 |

In LXX, these sections follow in the order 1, 2, 3, 6, 4, 7, 8, 9, 5. It also has quantitative difference, i.e. longer or shorter verses, an indication that two different recensions of the book were once in circulation.

d Authorship, Date, and Method of Composition—The authors (with the exception of the anonymous sections

1, 7 and 9) are named in the text. The body of the book consists of two collections of proverbs attributed to Solomon (10:1-22:16 and 25:1-29:27), to which section 1 (1:1-9:18) serves as an introduction, and the smaller sections 6-9 form an appendix. This is why the book itself, taking the name of the principal author, is called in the title and in ecclesiastical usage 'Proverbs of Solomon'.

That the aphorisms of sections 2 and 5 go back to the initiative of Solomon is beyond reasonable doubt. 3 Kg 4:30-32 tells us that the wisdom of Solomon surpassed the wisdom of all the Orientals and that 'he pronounced about three thousand parables' (māšālīm). From the use of the word, 'pronounced' however, we may gather that the wise maxims uttered by Solomon in his discourses were first handed on orally, and were only later put into writing. One confirmation of this is found in the text itself (25:1), where it is stated that the second series of Solomon's proverbs was collected by King Ezechias (721-693); another in the fact that the second series repeats several proverbs of the first, and that there are repetitions in the first series itself (cf. 14:12 and 16:25; 16:2 and 21:2). The proverbs attributed to Solomon in our book number about 510.

The 'wise men', authors of sections 3 and 4, are unknown. They treat of social duties and of man's relations with his neighbour, in quatrains of synonymous parallelism.

The sayings of Agur (section 6) extol the divine wisdom and the 'golden mean' in the possession of earthly goods; those of Lemuel (section 8) give advice to kings in quatrains. For these two persons, otherwise unknown, cf. § 375a.

The anonymous author of section 7 presents his observations in a literary form relished by the ancient Hebrews and recently found among the writings of Rās-Shamra: 'Three things have a certain characteristic and a fourth more so', followed by their enumeration (cf. also 6:16-19, Am 1:2, and note on Job 5:19).

Section 9 is one of the finest examples of an alphabetic poem in the OT in the form of synthetic parallelism.

The present arrangement of the book may with good likelihood be explained in this fashion. About 800 B.C., of the many sayings of Solomon, about 375 were collected in a book and given the title 'The Proverbs of Solomon' (section 2). Shortly afterwards 'the sayings of the wise men' (section 3) were added to this collection. The initiative of King Ezechias was responsible for the editing of a second series of Solomon's proverbs (section 5). Other maxims (sections 4, 6-8), composed or collected somewhat later (perhaps after the exile) were then added to the Solomonic collections, but in a different manner in different editions (cf. the arrangement in LXX). Finally in the 4th cent. B.C., a last editor added the appendix on the worthy wife (section 9) and the general introduction (section 1).

Content—The sayings of 'Proverbs' deal with the art of right living. They deal with a great variety of subjects, but handle certain points with special emphasis and detail. Thus Wisdom and Folly, Justice and Injustice, Piety and Impiety, Pride and Humility, 364j Honesty and Dishonesty, Love and Hate, Anger and Meekness, Wealth and Poverty, Industry and Idleness, hold a prominent place. Emphasis is laid on the relations between God and man, parents and children, kings and subjects, man and woman, master and servant, friend and enemy. There are warnings against debauchery, hard-heartedness and cruelty, unrighteousness and dishonesty, corruption and evil-doing, avarice and greed, hypocrisy and flattery, anger and quarrelsomeness. Unwearingly recommended are the fear of God, love of one's neighbour, charity, truthfulness, temperance, sagacity, careful speech and prudent silence. The law of retribution receives special stress, cf. § 365f.

k Purpose—The purpose of the book is to enable the reader, especially the young, to live rightly. For the attainment of this goal, it offers to the understanding wholesome teaching about true Wisdom, and to the will powerful incentives for the ordering of life according to the knowledge acquired. For the adequate management of life, however, there is required not only a knowledge of important philosophical and religious truths and a way of life in harmony therewith, but also the possession of a certain measure of practical sagacity in the conduct of everyday affairs. Hence its counsels are not restricted to fundamental beliefs and moral teachings but embrace all human activity. The book also aims at furthering OT piety. It would win the reader to the Wisdom contained in revealed religion and impress its principles upon every aspect of his life; so it presents them in a variety of forms and displays their excellence in a manner calculated to woo and inspire. It endeavours, by earnest warning and by stressing the advantages of virtue, to shape the reader's life in accordance with its teaching.

365a Moral and Religious Instruction—Wisdom is the central theme of Proverbs. It is, by definition, knowledge and understanding of words and things, reflection and insight in the realm of thought and action (1:2-7); but its special interest lies in practical life which it aims to direct in conformity with the laws of religion and morality. He, therefore, alone is 'wise' who knows and fears Yahweh (2:1-5), who understands and puts into practice uprightness and equity (2:9). The ungodly and the sinner are 'foolish' (5:23; 9:13, etc.). The fear of Yahweh (i.e. true worship of God) is the beginning of wisdom (1:7; 9:10) and it goes hand in hand with confidence in him (3:5; 29:25), having the same prerogatives and producing the same effects (16:20; 28:25). Fear of God and confidence in him are thus the basis of religion and morality.

b In the course of the book all Israelite society is passed in review and judged, according to a norm of morality the sources of which are human experience and religion. From experience, the teacher of life, the sages draw practical lessons. Religion, although not systematically expounded, either in its dogmatic foundations or in its liturgical practices (since the purpose of the book is rather to offer maxims of right conduct), is, however, always presupposed and, in fact, regarded as the basis of all morality (1:7; 9:10; 14:2, etc.) and declared the source of all true happiness (14:26; 15:16). Stress is often laid upon the essential truths that God sees all things (5:21; 15:3, 11), takes account of everything, even the heart's most hidden thought (16:2; 17:3), governs all (20:12, 24; 22:2; 29:13), and can do all (19:21; 21:30); that apart from God there can be no good (15:29); that to submit to him is to find strength, contentment and joy (3:5; 16:20; 18:10, etc.). Most effective in its simplicity of expression is the oft-repeated motive for avoiding sin, 'it displeaseth God', 'God abominateth', etc. (3:32; 11:1, 20; 12:22).

c Man and his Destiny—(a) Man is endowed with a life principle (n'sāmāh, 'vital breath'). This is compared to a 'lamp' which is lighted by Yahweh himself and illumines man's whole 'interior' (20:27).

This life-principle is in a body (20:27b), also made by Yahweh (20:12).

(b) In his moral existence man is free. He can resist the call of Wisdom and neglect her counsels (1:24 f.). By nature, therefore, he is not immune from sin and cannot be certain that he has never sinned (20:9).

(c) Immortality. That man in some way lives on after death is the constant teaching of the OT. According to Proverbs the dead 'descend' (1:12; 5:5; 7:27) to Sheol, the abode of all the departed. There they form a sort of 'assembly' (2:18; 9:18; 21:16) and are called Reph'aim (feeble ones, shades), but the ontological reason for their continued existence, i.e. the possession of an immortal soul, is nowhere given.

(d) Retribution. The book accepts the prevailing OT view that the just are rewarded and the wicked punished in this life. It is generally denied that there is mention of a sanction beyond the grave. The pertinent texts are 10:25; 11:4; 12:28; 14:32; 15:24; 23:18 (cf. 24:14); 24:20. Of these 10:25; 11:4 need only mean that the just live out their full life's span while the wicked die prematurely. 14:32 'the just hath hope in his death' seems decisive in MT, but LXX and Syr. read 'in his integrity'. The probative value of 23:18 and 24:20 depends upon the meaning there of 'ah'rit. Elsewhere it means 'consequence' (5:4, 11); 'the end or final outcome of a course of action' (14:12); 'a future', i.e. a happy close of life (19:20). This latter appears to be its meaning in 23:18 and 24:14, i.e. the just will experience that mellow period of peaceful decline denied to the evil-doer. Perhaps, too, in these texts, the word contains a suggestion of 'posterity'; cf. Ps 37:37 (MT). In MT 12:28 there seems to be a clear enough statement of a blessed life after death, but the reading is doubtful (cf. comm.). 15:24, 'The path of life (goeth) upward for the wise, so that he turneth from Sheol beneath', may only have in view the reward of a long life for the just. It must be observed however that, according to more than one exegete, the statement in both 12:28 and 15:24 that virtue leads to life, is expressed in such a manner that it is difficult to avoid the conclusion of a blessed hereafter for the just. But if the sages had attained to the notion of a blessed immortality, they would have made more use of a doctrine which would have solved an urgent problem and have provided them with another strong motive for right living.

Sources of Proverbs—The proverbial style of utterance is a favourite form of oriental literature. Israel, too, had its own popular proverbs which passed from lip to lip and embodied much current wisdom. Such may have been the source of a number of the sayings in the book, but if they came from the lips of the people, they have been polished into epigrammatic form by reflexion and literary skill, and written down under divine inspiration. The consideration of the already existing OT books could also have inspired the writers of the later collections to present their reflexions upon them in gnomic form. Nor is there any reason why they should not have availed themselves of non-Israelite material. Recent discoveries have brought to light Egyptian gnomic writings older than Prov and their resemblance suggests an influence upon it. This resemblance is most marked between the 'Teaching of Amen-em-ope' (Amenophis) and Prov 22:17-13:11; see § 316e.

Text and Versions—Prov was written in Hebrew, but MT is not in good condition, chiefly because of the mistakes of copyists. The principal versions are LXX (from which were made the Coptic, the Hexaplar Syriac and the Old Latin), the Peshitta Syriac, the Targum, fragments of the later Greek translations (Symmachus, Aquila, Theodotion), and the Latin of St Jerome.

The value of LXX is limited: sometimes the translator misunderstood the Hebrew prototype; at other times the translation is more elegant than literal;

365h the text is often paraphrased and contains additions (e.g. 4:27; 9:12; 24:22, etc.), some of which may come from a Hebrew text older and better than MT (e.g. 11:16; 27:20, 21). Omissions also are to be observed (e.g. 1:16; 4:7; 8:29, etc.): cf. Vaccari, De Libris didacticis, nr. 57. Vg, translated from the Heb. about A.D. 398, was hastily made (cf. Praef. in libros Salomonis, PL 28, 1307), but does not differ much from MT. In the course of time a number of additions from LXX (Old Latin) were introduced into the text and of these about twenty remain in the Clementine Bible; this however does not exclude the study of other texts to determine their authenticity.

1 Canonlicity—The Jewish synagogue considered the book canonical and ranked it among the 'Sacred Writings'. The Greek translator of Ecclesiastes appears to allude to it in Ecclesiastes 47, 18 (Vg), while Talmudic difficulties caused by certain inconsistencies in MT (e.g. 26:4-5) and by the realistic description of the adulterous woman (7:10-22) were settled by the Council of Jamnia, c. A.D. 100.

The Christian Church has always acknowledged Prov as canonical. The NT has citations from it (cf. Jas 4:6 with Prov 3:34; Heb 12:5 with Prov 3:11; Rom 3:15 with Prov 1:16 and 12:20 with 25:21-22), and allusions to it (1 P 2:17; 4:8, 18; 5:5; 2 P 2:22). Our Lord himself seems to have illustrated some of its maxims (cf. Lk 14:10 with Prov 25:7).

The Fathers of the Church found in Prov abundant matter for the instruction and edification of the faithful, and today it holds an important place among the sapiential books in the lessons of the Greek and Latin liturgies. The Second Council of Constantinople (553) condemned Theodore of Mopsuestia for denying its inspired character.

366a I-IX Section 1 The Praise of Wisdom.

I 1-7 Introduction—1. The title refers especially to 10:1-22:16 and 25:1-29:27 (cf. § 364d) which form the greater part of the book. 'parables': cf. § 364b. 2-6 state the purpose of Prov, (a) theoretical: to instruct the reader in true Wisdom; (b) practical: to have its principles accepted as the rule of life and basis of conduct. It is primarily intended for the instruction of the young (4), but it will also enrich the store of those who are already wise (5). 1-4 form a single sentence: 'Proverbs (given) that a man may know wisdom', etc. The motto (7) is the key-note of all the teaching that is to follow, and an epitome of its spirit.

b 2a. Wisdom is the central theme of Prov and in the following verses its scope and functions are variously expressed. It is 'instruction', or rather 'discipline', not only intellectual, but also corrective. 3a. It is intelligent, understanding 'words of prudence', i.e. instructive discourse. 3b. It is practical, for it educates in 'doctrine' ('wise dealing'). It trains in 'justice and judgement' ('probity') and equity.—4. It matures the judgement, for it imparts 'subtlety' or 'shrewdness' (in a good sense) to 'little ones' ('the inexperienced'). 5. It makes 'wiser' those already wise, and gives 'governments' ('steerings'), i.e. skill and facility in the management of life. 6. It enables one to understand a 'parable' (i.e. a 'proverb'), and whatever needs interpretation; 'the words of the wise, and their mysterious sayings' (the figurative language in which a proverb is often clothed); cf. Perowne, 40. 7. 'The fear of the Lord [i.e. religion] is the beginning of wisdom': the first of the virtues and the foundation of right living. MT can also be rendered 'the chief part of wisdom'.

c 8-19 A Warning against Evil Companions—8a. 'My son'. Throughout this section of Proverbs (chs 1-9) the sage addresses himself to the young with the affection and solicitude of a father. 8b. 'law': 'teaching' or 'admonition'. 9a. 'For they shall be a graceful chaplet unto thy head'. 11a. 'If they shall say': governs 11-14; the apodosis is found in 15. 11b. 'for blood': i.e. to shed blood. The phrase signifies robbery with violence. 11c. 'hide snares': 'lure'. 12a. 'hell': Sheol, to which 'the pit' of 12b is a parallel. The thought is that of a sudden murderous assault. 13-14 state the inducement that the robbers hold out to induce their recruit to join their ranks. 15-19. The reason for avoiding such companions. 17. 'Surely in vain the net is spread in the sight of any bird'. If it sees the net, it takes alarm. In like manner, for youth to be forewarned is to be forearmed. 18. Evil-doers really prepare destruction for themselves. 18b. 'and lurk for their own lives' (cf. 11). 19. Read with LXX 'ah-rîlî (fate) for 'or-hôlî (ways). 'Such is the fate of every covetous man; it taketh away the life of its possessors'. Those who plot against others dig their own graves. 20-33 The Invitation of Wisdom—Objective Wisdom, i.e. the moral law which is an emanation of the essential holiness and justice of God, and which makes itself heard by the voice of conscience, the preaching of God's ministers, etc., is here personified, and speaks and acts with divine authority. 20. 'Wisdom crieth aloud in the streets, in the broad places she uttereth her voice', i.e. in the places of assembly before the city gates. 21a. 'She calleth out on the top of the walls' (LXX). 22a. 'children': i.e. without proper training or virtue. 22b. 'and scoffers delight in scoffing, and fools hate knowledge?' The 'scoffers' are defiant and cynical despisers of religion and morality; the 'fool' is 'one who is insensible to moral truth and acts without regard to it' (Toy). 23a. 'Turn ye': listen to my reproof. This reproof is contained in the verses which follow. 24a. 'Because' governs the verbs of 24 and 25; the apodosis is 26. 26a. 'destruction': 'calamity'. Wisdom will justly rejoice that their obstinate perversity has been punished. 27. 'When your (ground for) fear cometh as a storm: when distress and anguish befall thee you'. 28. Those who have deliberately rejected the counsels and appeals of Wisdom, will cry out to her in the day of distress, but solely to escape punishment; then, however, it will be too late; cf. Jn 7:34; 8:21. 29b. 'received not': 'chose not'. 31. As they sowed, so they shall reap. Punishment is, in the just ordination of God, the natural 'fruit' of sin. 32. 'The turning away' from Wisdom and right living will prove the undoing 'of little ones', the 'inexperienced' who are easily led into temptation, and the 'careless ease of fools shall destroy them'. 33b. 'enjoy abundance': 'be secure'.

II 1-22 The Blessings conferred by Wisdom—This section is divided into two parts of similar construction, 1-9 and 10-22. Part 1: Diligent application to the study of Wisdom (1-4) will result in the fear and knowledge of God (5), the divine protection (6-8), and right understanding (9). Part 2: Wisdom, indwelling in the soul (10), will be a guide (11), which will save the young from evil men (12-15) and evil women (16-19), and so lead to the reward of the just (20-21) in contrast with the fate of the wicked (22).

1-9. The speaker is now the sage. 1b. 'hide' as a treasure carefully stored. 2. 'So that thou incline thine ear unto wisdom, and apply thy heart to prudence'. 3. 'Yea, if thou criest unto understanding, and liftest up thy voice to prudence'. Wisdom, prudence and understanding are different aspects of the same virtue. 4a. 'money': 'silver'. 5. The fear of the Lord (cf. 1:7) and the knowledge of God are the essence of true Wisdom. Only the virtuous can grasp and appreciate it. This and the following verses reveal the deeply religious conception of Wisdom. 6. As God is the author of Wisdom, he must also be the goal of every human search of it. 7. 'He layeth up salvation for the righteous, is a shield to them that walk uprightly'. 8a. 'justice': or 'probity'. 8b. 'saints': God's devoted followers. The verse emphasizes the divine protection of searchers after true Wisdom. 9. It is assumed that he who knows the good path will follow it.

366g 'That thou mayest be delivered' may be read: 'She (Wisdom) will save thee': so also 16. 16. 'Strange women' and 'stranger' are the author's words for the dissolute woman, either because she is not the wife of the person addressed or because women of this class were often non-Israelites. It is difficult to see in the 'strange woman' a personification of Greek culture against which the Maccabees were later to rise. 16b. 'softeneth': uses cajoling words. 17. The first line of 18 should be joined with this verse. The woman who by her evil arts seeks to seduce the young, betrays not only her husband but also God, who was called to witness her fidelity to the marriage contract, which is of divine origin and sanction (cf. Mal 2:14). 'guide': 'associate' or 'companion' (cf. Jer 3:4; Prov 5:18). 18. 'hell': 'the dead'. 'Her house': association with her leads to ruin and death. 19. The harlot is like a whirlpool that engulfs its victims and from which there is no return. 20a. 'That thou mayest walk', etc., may be read: 'Thus thou shalt walk in the way of the good'. 21a. 'earth': land of Israel. 21b. 'simple': 'perfect'. 22. The happiness promised in the OT to the Chosen People consisted above all in the long and peaceful enjoyment of the Promised Land. Expulsion from it by exile or death was the principal sanction of the old economy: cf. Ex 20:12; Deut 5:16; Ps 36 (37):9, 22, 29. 22a. 'destroyed': 'cut off'. The unrighteous shall have no place in Israel. How this was to be effected is not stated here.

h III 1-10 The Blessings of Obedience and Trust in God—The sage exhorts the young man to heed his instructions; the reward will be a long and happy life, and the favour of God and man (1-4). He is to trust in God (5-8), fear him and avoid sin (7-8), and render him his due (9-10). 1a. 'my law': my precepts for right living. 3a. 'mercy and truth': the Heb. words are better expressed by 'goodness' of heart towards God and one's neighbour, and 'faithfulness' or fidelity to one's word and social obligations. These two virtues are often recommended, 14:22; 20:28, etc. 3b. 'put': 'bind'. 4a. 'grace': 'favour'. 6b. 'direct': 'make smooth thy paths'. 7a. 'conceit': 'eyes'. 8a. 'navel': the addition of a single letter gives the Heb. word for 'body' (bāsār). 8b. 'moistening': refreshment. The practice of religion and morality will also promote bodily health. 9. 'substance': riches. 10. With this promise cf. Deut 28:8. 'abundance': read with LXX 'corn'.

j 11-20 The Excellence of Wisdom—Even if you suffer in the pursuit of Wisdom, do not be downcast (11-12); for it is well worth the cost (13-20).

k 11b. 'faint': 'feel not loathing'. 12b. Read with a correction from LXX (cf. Heb 12:6): 'and afflicteth the son that he holdeth dear'. The quatrain (11-12) anticipates an objection against the rich promise of the preceding verses; the apparent exceptions in the sufferings of the just are divinely given for their correction and instruction; cf. Job 5:17 f. 13b. 'is rich in': 'obtaineth'. 14. 'Her acquisition is better than the acquisition of silver, and her revenue than fine gold'. 15. 'She is more precious than pearls; no treasures are to be compared with her'. 16. Wisdom confers a long and honoured life upon those who are attached to her. 16b. 'glory': 'honour'. 18. The practice of Wisdom will result in advantages analogous to the beneficent effects of the tree of life, Gen 2:9. 19-20. Wisdom is a source of blessing because it has its origin in God who manifested it in the creation of the world and still manifests it in the physical order of the universe. 20. When 'the fountains of the deep burst forth' (cf. Gen 7:11), and when 'the clouds drop dew', the Wisdom of God is working; cf. 8:22 ff.

l 21-26 The Security given by Wisdom—It confers both strength and beauty (22); it preserves alike in action and repose (23-24); it is equal to any emergency (25-26).

m 21b. 'prudence and discretion' (or 'reflection'). 22. 'They shall be life unto thy soul and grace to thy neck'. They will be as attractive on your person as a gracious ornament on a woman's neck. 25b. 'nor of the storm of the wicked when it cometh'. 28a. 'For the Lord will be thy confidence, and will keep thy feet from capture' by the snares of deceit and misfortune.

27-35. A series of short, detached maxims enjoining Kindness to one's Neighbour, differing from the rest of chh 1-9 and more closely resembling the aphorisms of Solomon, especially 16:1-22. 27. 'Withhold not good from the needy, when it is thy power to do it' (LXX). 28b. 'when thou hast it by thee'. 29a. 'Practice': rather 'Devise'. 29b. 'while he dwelleth trustfully by thee'. 31a. 'the unjust man': 'the man of violence' who oppresses his neighbour. 31b. 'nor be incensed because of' (LXX). 32a. 'mockers': 'the perverse man'. 32b. 'communication': his intimate converse is with the upright. 33. 'The curse of the Lord is on the house of the wicked; but the habitation of the just he blesseth'. 35a. 'possess glory': 'inherit honour'. 35b. 'promotion' is the Heb. verb 'to exalt'. 'Shame exalteth fools' is possible, but forced. The parallel suggests an easy emendation: 'fools shall gain shame'.

IV 1-9 The Paternal Lesson—In a tender passage the sage repeats to his young disciple the lesson he himself had learned at the feet of his parents. It gives a charming picture of a pious Jewish household; cf. Wordsworth's 'Wisdom doth live with children round her knees'.

2. 'For good counsel I give you: forsake not my teaching'. 3a. 'tender': i.e. of youthful age. 6. Both sense and grammar demand that 6 be placed after 7. 7a. 'The beginning of wisdom (is) get wisdom'. A suggested emendation is: 'In the beginning of thy strength, get wisdom'. 7b. 'with all thy possession': at all cost. 8a. 'Take hold on her': 'prize her'. 8b. 'she shall bring thee honour, if thou embrace her'. 9. 'She shall give to thy head a chaplet of beauty, bestow on thee a crown of glory'; cf. 1:9.

10-19 The Two Ways—It is difficult to decide whether these are the words of the sage or of the father. The contrasted fortunes of the wicked and the just are presented as motives for right living.

12. 'When thou walkest, thy steps shall not be straitened [hampered], and when thou runnest, thou shalt not stumble'. In a virtuous life there will be no narrow or difficult ways. 13. 'instruction': 'discipline', a virtue which demands a strict control of self. 13b. 'Note the gradual deepening of the sense of 'life', beginning with prolonging of days, as in Deut 32:47, and gaining in spiritual content until it comes to mean the knowledge of God and communion with him (Jn 17:3; 1 Tim 6:19)! (S. H. Hooke in Peake's Comm. on the Bible, 399). 14a. 'Be not delighted': 'Enter not'. 14b. 'and go not in the way of evil men'. 16b. The wicked are unable to sleep unless they have done some evil deed; cf. Juv. Sat. III 281 f. 17b. 'iniquity': 'violence'. This verse may mean either, wickedness and violence are to them as meat and drink, or, they get their living by fraud and violence. 18. 'The path of the just is like the light of dawn that shineth (ever) brighter till the full day cometh'. 19a. 'darkness': 'like darkness'.

20-27 Exhortation to Constancy—All man's faculties must co-operate in the moral life; this whole-hearted striving for virtue will also bring material blessings.

22b. 'flesh': i.e. to 'their' whole being. 23b. 'for out from it are the issues [origins] of life'. The heart is the inward source of spiritual life; to keep it pure, great diligence is needed. 24b. 'detracting': 'perverse'. 25b. 'and let thy eyelids be straight before thee'. The virtuous man fixes his eyelids (metaphorically for 'gaze') upon the goal and lets nothing turn them aside. 26a. 'Make straight': rather 'weigh', 'ponder'. 26b. 'established': ordered aright. Take care that the way along which you wish to walk be the right way of virtue. 27. One can deviate to the right by an excess of zeal or to the left by lack of it. Virtus stat in mediis. After 27, LXX, Vg insert two verses. It is difficult to decide whether these lines ever had any Heb. original or are the work of a scribe.

367g V 1-23 The Sixth Commandment—After the usual exhortation to give heed to Wisdom (1-2), the sage describes the deadly influence of the wanton woman (3-6), cautions the disciple to avoid her lest dishonour, destitution, physical deterioration and the pangs of remorse come upon him (7-14), urges him to conjugal fidelity (15-20), the motive presented being the fate of the wicked (21-22).

h 2. A suggested emendation reads: 'That thou mayest keep the counsel of my mouth and preserve the knowledge of my lips'. The last line is an addition from LXX. 3a. 'For the lips of a harlot drop honey'. On 'harlot', cf. 2:16, note. 3b. 'throat': 'palate' used figuratively for 'speech'. Mistress of cajolery (7:14-18), she invites to sin. 4a. 'her end': the final outcome of relations with her. Line a may be read: 'But at the last she is bitter as wormwood'. 5. 'Her feet go down to Death and her steps lead down to Sheol'; to associate with her is to go the way that shortens life and leads to spiritual death. 6. Read perhaps: 'She treadeth not (reading bal or lô for pen) the path of life; her steps stray, she knoweth not (whither)'. 'life': in the moral as well as in the physical sense.

i 7-14. The folly of sexual licentiousness. 9a. 'Give not': 'lest thou give'. 'thy honour': the freshness and grace of youth. 9b. 'the cruel': refers apparently to the outraged husband; cf. 6:34 f. 10a. 'strength': 'wealth'. The victim of lust is like the prodigal son who 'devoured his substance with harlots' (Lk 16:30) and was forced to become a hired servant. 11. The physical results of sexual indulgence. 12-14. The pangs of remorse and upbraidings of conscience form the terrible climax to the loss of honour and health and substance (Perowne). 14. 'I had almost fallen into all evil in the midst of the congregation and assembly'; i.e. into condemnation to death by the judicial court according to the law against adulterers (Lev 20:10; Deut 22:22).

j 15-20 The remedy is to be found in the divinely ordained intercourse of marriage. In figurative and decorous language the disciple is exhorted to be content with his lawful wife and to give her all his affection. 15. For the wife as a 'cistern' or spring, cf. Cant 4:15. 16. 'Should thy spring be scattered abroad? Thy streams of water in the streets?' 17a. 'Do not squander thy virile strength'. 18a. 'vein': rather 'fountain'. 'blessed': LXX reads 'thine own' which agrees well with the preceding context. 19. The 'hind' and the 'graceful fawn' ('doe') are, for the oriental poet, symbols of grace and feminine beauty. 19c. 'delighted': 'ravished'. 20a. 'art thou seduced': 'dost thou go astray with'. 20b. 'art cherished': 'embraced'.

k 21-23. A final motive for conjugal fidelity. 21b. 'considereth': 'weigheth carefully'. 23a. 'He shall die for want of discipline', for lack of the corrective influence of Wisdom. 23b. 'be deceived': 'go astray'. A slight change from yisgeh to yissâpeh gives 'he shall perish'.

l VI 1-15 contains three illustrations of Folly written in the style of the 'Sayings of the wise men' (22:17-24:34): cf. 6:6-11 and 24:30-34. They are followed by a numerical saying (16-19), resembling in form 30:15-33; then the subject of sexual immorality is continued from ch 5. The section 1-19 thus breaks the connexion and was probably inserted after the compilation of chh 1-9 as an exemplification of the principle announced in 5:23b.

m 1-5 The Danger of Suretyship—The practice of being surety for a friend, and the folly entailed by that risk is a frequent subject of warning in Prov. (11:15; 17:18; 20:16; 22:26; 27:13). 1b. 'If thou hast stricken the hand for another', pledged thyself for thy friend; 'friend' and 'another' are synonymous, not contrasted. Striking hands was a way of sealing a bargain; cf. 4 Kg 10:15. 3-5. The endangered surety should take strong measures to force his friend either to meet his liabilities or to set him free from his bond. 3. 'Then do this, my son, to deliver thyself, because thou art fallen into the hand of thy neighbour; 367m go, bestir thyself and storm thy friend'. 5a. 'from the hand': the addition of a consonant to the Heb. word for 'hand' (yâd) gives 'hunter' (şayyâd).

6-11 The Sluggard—The ant is often mentioned in ancient folklore as an example of thrift and industry (cf. 24:30-34). LXX adds a parallel passage on the bee, quoted in several patristic writings, e.g. Clement Alex., Strom. 1.6. 10. 'A little sleep, a little slumber, a little folding of the hands to rest'. These lines continue the remonstrance of the sage. 11a. 'traveller': in the sense of 'highwayman'. Want and poverty are dangerous assailants who will make away with the sluggard's substance. The last distich is from LXX.

12-15 The Mischief-Maker—12. 'A man of Belial' (Heb. b'liya'al a worthless, good-for-nothing person), a man of iniquity, walketh with crookedness of mouth' (i.e. deals in lying speech). 13-14 describe the underhand methods, the veiled suggestions of mischief-makers. 15a. 'To such a one': 'Therefore'. 15b. 'and shall no longer have any remedy': 'and no healing'.

16-19 Seven Things Hateful to God (cf. 30:15-33). 16a. 'Yea, seven are an abomination to him'. Six things . . . seven is a rhetorical way of expressing an approximate number without implying that the list is complete. The seven sins are then enumerated.

20-35 Warning against the Adulteress—This section is a continuation of ch 5, having the same general theme. Obedience to parental instruction is invoked (20-23), 'to give weight to another earnest warning against the sin which destroys purity and saps the foundations of family life' (24-35), Perowne, 69.

20a. 'commandments': 'precept'. 20b. 'law': 'instruction'. 21. Cf. 3:3. 22-23. Sense and syntax demand the inversion of these two verses. 23a. 'commandment and law': 'precept and instruction'. 23b. 'reproofs of instruction': moral admonitions. Parental teaching will, like a lighthouse, guide the young man embarking on the sea of life. 22. 'When thou goest, it shall lead thee; . . . it shall talk with thee'. 24a. 'to keep thee', etc. 'evil woman': a slight alteration of MT from râ to rêa gives the meaning 'wife of another'. 25b. 'winks': 'eye-lids' with allusion to seductive glances. 26. MT is obscure. There is a contrast between the harlot and the adulteress; the latter commits the graver sin. 26b. 'the woman'; the adulteress. A change in the Heb. of the first line (b'ad to tâsûd) gives the same verb in each line: 'A harlot hunteth for a piece of bread [i.e. a livelihood], but the adulteress hunteth the precious life'. 27a. 'hide': 'take'. 27b. 'whoever toucheth her shall not go unpunished'. 30. 'Do not men despise a thief if he stealeth to satisfy his appetite?' (i.e. his greed). 31a. 'sevenfold': according to Ex 22:1, fivefold was the legal limit of restitution; 'sevenfold' is here a general term meaning 'in full measure' (cf. Mt 18:22). 32. 'But he that is an adulterer is void of sense; he destroyeth himself who so acteth'. 33-35. An allusion to the penalty and shame that both the law and public opinion inflict upon the adulterer. 34a. 'Because jealousy is fury in a man'; it enrages the husband. 35. 'nor will he regard any ransom nor be content, though thou givest many gifts'. The adulterer cannot escape the penalty of the law by any private arrangement with the jealous husband.

VII 1-27 The Adulteress—After an earnest plea for obedience to his words (1-3), i.e. to Wisdom (4), that the pupil may avoid the adulteress (5), the sage describes her fatal wiles (6-23) and the fate of her victim (24-27). The chapter has high dramatic merit. 2a. 'thou shalt live': the practice of Wisdom will ensure a happy life and save from premature death. 4b. 'friend': 'one well known', here as in Ruth 2:1, 'kinswoman'. The writer wishes to inculcate deep affection for, and familiarity with, virtue.

6. 'For at the window of my house, through my lattice, I looked forth'. The sage begins the description

- of a scene that he had more than once observed from behind an oriental window with its elaborate lattice work which forms an effective screen from the street, though permitting the watcher within to observe all that goes on without. 7. The transposition of na'ar to line a gives: 'And I beheld among the simple ones [the thoughtless] a youth, and I discerned among the youths one void of understanding'. 8a. 'by the corner': 'near'. The young man is pictured as taking the road where the house of the adulteress stood.
- d 10-12 Description of the Adulteress.—10b. For the harlots dress cf. Gen 38:14. 'prepared to deceive souls': MT is obscure; Vaccari renders 'with secret intent'. Line c should be transferred to 11. 'wandering': 'wilful', though sôbâbet for sôrâret gives the Vg reading. 11b. 'Her feet rest not in her house'. 12. 'Now in the streets, now in the broad places [squares], now at every corner she lurketh'.
- e 13-20 Her Invitation.—13b. 'flattereth': not in MT. 14. 'A sacrifice was due from me: this day I pay my vows'. She has promised a sacrifice of thanksgiving for a favour received. Such sacrifices ended in a sacred banquet to which friends were invited to consume the meats offered at the altar (Lev 3:16 f.; 7:15). 14b. 'this day': the meat had to be eaten the same day or burnt. 15a. 'Therefore': since I am able to provide a banquet. 16. 'I have spread my couch with coverlets, with striped cloths of Egyptian yarn'. 18. 'Come let us take our fill of love till morning, let us solace ourselves with loves'.
- f 21-23 The Youth yields.—22-23 must be taken together. The text is extremely difficult. With corrections from LXX we may render: 'He goeth after her stupidly, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, as a stag fastened to a chain until an arrow strike through its liver; as a bird hasteneth to a snare, and knoweth not that it concerneth his life'. The verses describe the brute-like stupidity with which the youth goes to his doom.
- g 24-27 The Fate of her Victims.—25a. 'be drawn away in': 'turn aside to'. 25b. 'and go not astray in'. 26. 'For many are the dead she hath cast down, and numerous are her slain': i.e. materially and morally ruined. 27a. 'hell': 'Sheol'. 27b. 'reaching': 'going'. Though said of temporal death it is not less true of eternal death, of hell in the Christian sense.
- h VIII 1-36 The Appeal of Wisdom—This chapter forms the climax of the first section. Wisdom is personified as in 1:20-33, but with greater relief and richness. After an appeal to be heard attentively (1-11), she proclaims her salutary efficaciousness in human society (12-21), and her activity in the creation of the universe (22-31), concluding with yet another plea to seek blessedness in following her (32-36).
- i 1-11 The Call of Wisdom—3. 'Beside the gates, at the entry of the city, at the entrance of the gates she crieth aloud'. 'gates': cf. 1:21, note. 5. 'Learn, O ye simple, sagacity, and ye fools, learn understanding'. The simple fools are those who do not lead a 'wise' life: cf. 1:22, note. Sagacity means true knowledge of the principles of life. 6a. 'great': 'princely' or 'noble'. 6b. 'and the utterance of my lips shall be right things'. 7a. 'meditate': 'uttereth'; present tense. 8. The Wisdom that speaks here is neither deceived nor wishes to deceive. She speaks with divine authority. 10a. 'money': 'silver'. 10b. 'and knowledge [doctrine] rather than fine gold'. 11. Cf. 3:15.
- j 12-14 The Attributes of Wisdom.—12. 'I, Wisdom, dwell with sagacity, I possess knowledge and insight'. 13a is to be omitted because of metre and context. 13c. 'double': 'perverse'. 14. 'With me is counsel and skill: I am prudence; strength is mine'. Wisdom alone can give these gifts to her friends. Here Wisdom identifies herself with God, the source of all good; in fact, what Wisdom claims for herself here, is attributed directly to God in Job 12:13-16.
- k 15-16. Rulers discharge their duties through the guidance of Wisdom. 15b. 'and magistrates administer justice'. 16b. MT: 'and nobles, (yea), all the rulers of the earth'; LXX better: 'and nobles govern the earth'.
- 17-21 The rewards of Wisdom. Those who seek her not only find her, but gain riches, honour, and blessings more valuable than gold. 17b. 'and they that seek me, find me'. 18a. 'glory': 'honour'. 18b. 'glorious': 'ancient' and so 'durable'. The idea is that of a patrimony built up for many years. 20-21. Wisdom concludes her promises by affirming that she deals equitably with her friends.
- 22-31 Wisdom in the Creation and Ordering of the Universe—Here the eulogy of Wisdom touches the sublime. God himself made use of Wisdom as a 'master-workman' in the construction of the marvellous universe, as well as in the establishment of the wondrous order that rules it. The picture is similar to that of 3:19-20, but is more detailed and striking. Wisdom is presented as a concrete being, living and operating at the side of God. It is not, however, a creature, but a divine being, for it existed before the creation of anything (22-26), and concurred in the creation of all things (27-31). On the one hand, it is intrinsic to God, his essential Wisdom; on the other, it is represented as something distinct from God and coming from him by way of generation (24-25). It is not yet a distinctly defined personality, but it is so vividly personified that from this description to the distinction of more than one person in God was only a step. That step was manifest when the divine Wisdom was made incarnate in Christ Jesus. See § 316b.
- 22-26. Wisdom was with God at the beginning of creation. 22a. 'possessed': the Heb. word qānāh means 'to acquire' without defining the method of acquisition. In Gen 14:19, 22, it is by 'creation'; here, however, it is by 'generation' (cf. 24 where Wisdom is portrayed as the possession of God by the title of 'generation', not 'creation'). Perhaps the most satisfactory rendering of qānānī is 'begat me'. For the meaning 'possessed', cf. Prov 1:5; 4:5, 7; 15:32; 16:16; Deut 32:6; Pss 74:2 (H); 139:13 (H); Is 1:3. 22b. 'in the beginning': '(as) the beginning' or 'principle' of the divine activity, either because Wisdom was conceived before all divine works in regard of creatures, or because she concurred in the creation of everything (30). Wisdom was before the universe was made; she is placed outside the works of creation. 24. 'When there were no depths, I was born, when there were no fountains rich in waters'. 25a. 'Before the mountains were sunk' in their fixed places. 25b. 'rivers', etc.: 'fields, nor the first [or, mass of] dust of the world'. 27-31. Wisdom was present at, and rejoiced in, the works of creation. 27b. 'when he set a vault upon the face of the deep': the vault of the firmament whose rim seems to rest upon the surface of the ocean. 28a. 'When he made firm the skies above'. 28b. 'poised': 'fixed fast' (LXX). 29a. 'When he set bounds to the sea'. 29c. 'balanced': 'laid'. 30a. 'I was at his side (as) a master workman', giving him, so to speak, the design of the things to be made. Wisdom found intense joy in the task assigned to her by God and in the contemplation of the works of creation; above all she rejoiced in man, the most perfect creature of the visible world. 30-31 is a poetical description of Gen 1:31.
- 32-36 Closing Exhortation.—32a. 'Now therefore', because I give, and am, all this. 32b. 'children': 'sons'. 35b. 'salvation': 'favour'. 36a. 'shall sin against': 'misseth', which preserves the contrast with 'findeth' in the previous verse. 'soul': 'life' or 'self'.
- IX 1-18 The Choice between Wisdom and Folly—P The chapter contains contrasted pictures of Wisdom (1-6) and Folly (13-18). Between them is inserted a section of general teaching (7-12).
- 1-6 The feast which Wisdom offers. Wisdom is here presented as the rich and virtuous mistress of a palace who invites her followers to a sumptuous feast. The exquisite viands are the sublime doctrine and noble virtues inculcated by the divine law. 1b. 'seven 368q pillars': 'the number invites mystical treatment (e.g. seven gifts of the Holy Spirit, seven Sacraments), but probably originally it signified completeness' (A. E. Morris in A New Comm. on Holy Scripture, 388). 2b. 'mingled her wine': with spices. 3b. 'to the tower' etc.: 'from the high places of the city'. The maidens are in fact the preachers of the divine word; cf. 1:20, note. 4a. 'a little one': 'simple'. It is in parallelism with the 'unwise' of 4b. 6a. The fruit of Wisdom is life in the deepest sense of the word: cf. 3:18; 4:13; Jn 17:3.

r 7-12 contain short aphorisms drawn from some other source and introduced here by a later editor. 7-9 are in the style of 22:17-24 and deal with the opportuneness of correction, and 10-12 are isolated couplets. 7a. 'He that correcteth a scoffer, getteth to himself ignominy' (or 'insult'). 7b. 'blot': the blemish of a useless reprehension. 9. 'Give (counsel) to a wise man, and he will be yet wiser': teach a just man, and he shall increase in learning'. 10a. Cf. 1:7. 10b. 'and to know the Holy One is understanding': 'holy': the parallel shows almost certainly that God is meant. The knowledge of God is the 'beginning' or 'chief part' of Wisdom, and the recognition of him in a practical way by the fulfilment of religious duties is true Wisdom. 12. The individual both reaps the benefit of his wisdom and pays the penalty of his contempt for the moral law.

s 13-18 The Character of Dame Folly—This section is in sharp contrast to the picture of Wisdom given in 1-6. Folly, represented by a woman of vicious life, has, like Wisdom, her own house (14), where she spreads her feast (15), and then issues her invitation (16), couched, in part at least, in identical terms. This description has something in common with that of the wanton woman in 2:18 and 7:11-19. Here she represents vice in general, but in the mind of the sage impurity stands first among the vices.

t 13a. 'and full': 'is full'. 'allurements': MT reads 'simplicity' but a slight alteration from ḥayyūt to məḥṣāḥ gives the meaning 'enticing' adopted by Vg. 14a. 'sat': 'sitteth'. 15b. 'to call to them that are going their ways'. 16. Cf. 9:4. 17b. 'hidden bread': bread eaten in secret. The sage has sexual immorality in mind. 18. 'But he knoweth not that the dead are there, that her guests are in the depths of Sheol'. The acceptance of her invitation leads to physical and spiritual death: cf. 5:8-10; 7:21-27. The house of Folly is, so to speak, a grave that holds entombed all who enter: cf. 7:27.

369a X 1-XXII 16 Section 2 The First Collection of the Proverbs of Solomon—This is the central part of the book and the oldest portion: cf. § 364e. It consists of 375 proverbs, each of two lines formed strictly on the model of Hebrew parallelism. The parallelism from ch 10 to ch 15 is, as a rule, antithetical; from 16:1 to 22:16 synthetic or progressive. There is but little attempt at subject-grouping and no indication of the way in which the collection came to be made. X 1-10-2. Cf. 11:4. Only good works (here perhaps 'justice' = 'almsgiving') merit a long life; cf. 11:19; 12:28. 3b. 'deceitful practices': 'desire'. This verse, like 2, is in harmony with the OT doctrine of temporal reward and punishment. 4. The additional couplet is found only in LXX and Syr. after 9:12. 5. 'He that gathereth in summer is a wise son; but he that sleepeth in harvest the son of confusion'. 6a. 'blessings'. 6b does not fit here. It is also found in 11 where it is evidently in place. Perhaps the original half-verse was lost. MT: 'the mouth of the wicked hideth violence'. 7a. 'with praises': 'is blessed'. 7b. 'shall rot': an emendation of MT gives 'is cursed'. 8b. 'a fool is beaten with lips': 'a prating fool shall fall'. 9b. 'shall be manifest' destroys the antithesis. A slight change in MT (yēḥā for yiwāḡā) gives 'shall suffer hurt'. 10b has come in by mistake from 8b. LXX and Syr. have apparently preserved the right reading, 'he that reproveth frankly maketh peace'. To close the eye to wrongdoing is mistaken kindness. 369a

11-20 Proper Speech—11. 'vein': 'fountain'. The utterance of the just man is a source of wisdom and inspiration to others. 11b. 'covereth iniquity': conceals his wicked purpose. 12b. 'charity' which forgives the transgressions of others; cf. 17:9; 1 Cor 13:17; 1 P 4:8. 14a. 'lay up knowledge': 'conceal their knowledge'. 14b. 'next to confusion': 'impending destruction'. At times silence is golden; he who senselessly blurts out all he knows, only does mischief; cf. 12:23. 15. 'The rich man's wealth is his strong city; the terror of the poor is their poverty'. Wealth is a protection against the vicissitudes of life. 16a. 'work': 'earnings'. For the good riches may lead to long life and happiness; for the wicked they only multiply sin. 17. 'He is on the way of life that heedeth instruction; but he that neglecteth admonition goeth astray'. 18b. 'uttereth reproach': 'spreadeth calumny'. 19. The wise man controls his tongue. 20b. 'nothing': 'little'.

21-XI 8 The Happiness of a Virtuous Life—21. The just man not only walks in the right way himself, but guides others along it. 22b. 'neither to them': 'and toil addeth nothing thereto'. God's blessing is the chief reason for prosperity; human effort counts for little: cf. Eccles 11:23; Ps 127 (128). 23. 'It is as a sport for a fool to work mischief and for a man of sense to act wisely'. The latter practises virtue with the same ease that the fool commits evil. 24. God will, in his own good time, mete out the requital that the wicked fear and the good desire: cf. 1:26. 25b. The tempest of divine retribution will sweep away the wicked (cf. 1:27), but the just will stand like a house on the rock, unshaken by the storm: cf. Mt 7:24-27. 26. A shiftless messenger gives more trouble than real service. 27. Cf. 3:2; 4:10; Ex 20:12; Ps 54 (55):24. A long peaceful life is normally the reward of piety. This belief was later challenged in Job. 28. 'is joy': will end in gladness. 29. 'God is a stronghold to the upright in way, but the terror of evil-doers'. 30. Cf. note to 2:21 f.

XI 1 'deceitful': 'false'. 1b. 'will': 'delight'. 2. 'When pride cometh, then cometh shame, but with the lowly is wisdom'. Pride ends in failure and disgrace; humility is a wise counsellor, bringing wisdom and honour. 3a. 'simplicity': 'integrity'. 4a. 'revenge': 'wrath'. The words refer to any divine judgement. When God decides upon the chastisement of the wicked, riches are powerless to avert it. 5. 'make his way prosperous': 'make smooth his way': cf. 3:6. 6b. 'snares': 'calamity'. 7 is difficult. MT with ʾwllm (ungodly) for ʾnīm (strength) may be rendered: 'When the wicked man dieth, hope perisheth, and the expectation of the ungodly perisheth', i.e. the hope of the evildoer to escape retribution is frustrated by the divine punishment of death. But there is no satisfactory antithesis in the second half of the verse. LXX remedies this defect: 'When the just man dieth, hope perisheth not, but the boast of the ungodly perisheth', a reference to the happy lot of the just after death. 8. 'shall be given up for him': 'taketh his place'. The wicked fall into the peril in which they had plotted to involve the just, cf. Mardochoai and Aman, Daniel, Susanna. This concept is founded on the justice of God who governs the world.

9-16 The Public Good—9b. 'but through the knowledge of the just they [the 'friend' of a] are rescued'. 10b. 'praise': 'jubilation'. Upright citizens are true promoters of the public good. 11a. 'by the blessing of the just' either by their prosperity, as in 10, or the blessing conferred on a city by their presence and beneficent words (involving deeds). 12. 'The senseless man sheweth contempt for his neighbour, but the man of discretion keepeth silent'. The discreet man, whatever he thinks, keeps his thoughts to himself. 13. 'a tale-bearer revealeth secrets, but a trustworthy man concealeth the matter', keeps a confidence. 14b. 'much counsel': 'a wealth of counsellors': cf. 15:22; 20:18; 24:6. 15b. 'he that hateth suretyship is secure': cf. 6:1-5. 16a. 'glory': 'honour'. 16b. 'the strong': 'ruthless f 17-23 Rewards and Punishments—17*b*. 'casteth off his own kindred': 'doeth harm to himself'. 18. 'The wicked earn delusive wages, but he that soweth justice a sure reward'. The apparent prosperity of the wicked is illusory. 19. MT is uncertain; perhaps: 'He that followeth justice taketh the road to life; he that pursueth evil the road to death'. 21*a*. 'Hand in hand': a Heb. expression meaning perhaps 'of a truth' or 'sooner or later'. 'shall not be innocent': 'shall not go unpunished'. 22*b*. 'is a fair woman lacking in taste'. The nose ring was a regular ornament of the oriental woman; cf. Is 3:21. 23. 'The desire of the just endeth only in good; the expectation of the wicked in wrath'. The desires of the just are satisfied, but divine wrath prepares chastisement for the wicked.

g XI 24-XII 12 Beneficence—25*b*. 'he that watereth shall be watered himself'; an agricultural metaphor, expressing the same thought as Lk 6:38 'Give and it shall be given unto you'. 27. MT: 'He that seeketh good winneth favour, but he that seeketh after evil, it shall come unto him'. The good seek (and find) God's favour; the wicked only bring upon themselves the evil they pursue. 28. The man who trusts in riches without regard for virtue will wither and fall like a leaf without sap. 29. 'inherit the winds': he who manages his household stupidly will find his substance reduced to nothing and will become the slave of a more prudent man. 30. The sense of gob is uncertain in MT; following LXX we may read: 'The fruit of justice is a tree of life, but violence destroyeth men's lives'. 31. If the just will not escape the consequences of their faults 'on the earth', how much less the wicked. XII:2. 'A good man findeth favour with Yahweh but the wicked man he condemneth'; cf. Wis 2:14-16; 4:16. 4. 'A worthy wife is a crown to her husband, but a shameful one is (like) rot in his bones'. The Heb. phrase is 'a woman of power', i.e. the capable mother of a family who knows how to manage her household; cf. 31:10 ff. 5*a*. 'judgements': i.e. right. 6. Slander, false testimony, etc., are like assassins lying in wait for victims. 7*a*. 'The wicked turn about and are not', i.e. they will 'vanish in the twinkling of an eye'; cf. 10:25; 12:3. 10. The good man treats animals with kindness; the wicked is cruel even to his fellow-men. 11. LXX and Vg add another couplet to this verse, not found in MT. 12. With an emendation of MT (lehem for leb), 11 and 12 may be read: 'He that tilleth his land shall have plenty of bread, but he that followeth idle pursuits shall have none. Wickedness is a net of evils, but the root of the just yieldeth (fruit)'. Evil men are caught by their own bad conduct.

h 13-23 Use of the Tongue—13*a*. 'By the sin of the lips the sinner falleth into snares' (LXX), which the sincere and candid in speech escape. 14*a*. 'with good things' is probably a gloss. A man reaps what he sows. 18. 'There is (one) that speaketh rashly like sword-thrusts; but the tongue of the wise man bringeth healing' by pouring the balm of kindly words into the wounds opened by ill-considered speech. 19*b*. 'but for an eyewink [for a moment only] a lying tongue'. 20*b*. 'take': 'give'. 21*a*. 'No mischief befalleth the just, but the wicked are full of misfortune'.

i 24-XIII 6 Labour—24*a*. 'valiant': 'diligent'. 26. MT: 'The just man surpasseth his neighbour, but the way of the wicked leadeth them astray', i.e. virtue gives its possessor an advantage over other men. The text, however, may be corrupt. 27*a* appears to be a hunting metaphor and may be read: 'The slothful man roasteth (starteth) not his prey'; and 27*b*, by the transposition of one word, gives 'but plentiful is the substance of the diligent man'. 28*b* is a crux interpretum. MT may be read: 'and walking in its pathway—not death' (Zorell, Heb. Lex.). From this reading one would conclude to eternal life for the just. A slight correction of the text gives with Vg and DV, 'the by-way (or 'the way of the wicked') leadeth to death'. Amid a variety of readings it seems best to retain Vg and DV, in which, however, 'life' of the first line, according to some commentators, is used in a sense so wide and embracing that it is not to be restricted to long life on this earth; cf. § 365*f*.

XIII 1 The addition of the letter h to the Heb. for 'father' gives: 'The wise son loveth instruction, but the petulant heareth not rebuke'. 2*b*. 'the desire of the treacherous is (for) violence'. He whose counsels help others will share in the blessing he bestows; but the perverse seek only their own advantage in the harm they do their fellow-men. 3*a*. 'soul': 'life'. 4. 'The sluggard desireth but (getteth) nothing; the desire of the diligent is richly supplied' (lit. 'made fat'). 5*b*. 'but the wicked acteth odiously and shamefully'. 6*a*. 'the way of the innocent': 'the man of integrity'. Goodness is the best guarantee of a proper life; cf. 11:5.

7-12 Poverty and Riches—7. 'One feigneth to be rich, yet hath nothing; another feigneth to be poor, yet hath great riches'. 8*b*. 'beareth': 'heareth'. The wealthy can buy their way out of any peril. The last part of b seems to be an erroneous repetition of MT from the end of 1*b*. The thought is not characteristic of Prov and gives no contrast to a. The original reading has been lost. 9*a*. 'giveth joy': an emendation of the Heb. verb (yismāh to yizrah) gives the preferable reading 'shineth brightly'. 'Light' and 'lamp' are symbols of life and prosperity; cf. 4:18; 24:20. 10*b*. 'with them that take counsel, is wisdom'. 11*b*. 'but he that little by little amasseth, increaseth'. 12. 'Hope deferred maketh the heart sick; but desire fulfilled is a tree of life'; it gladdens and gives refreshment.

13-20 Docility—13. A small change in MT gives: 'He that despiseth an order shall perish, but he that feareth the command shall be required'. Observance of law, both human and divine, is recommended. Vg and DV add a couplet found in LXX after 9. 14*b*. 'ruin': 'snares'; cf. 10:11; 14:27. 15 is obscure, but MT may be read: 'Fine perception winneth favour, but the behaviour of the treacherous is hard (or by reading 'ēdām for 'ēdān 'is their ruin'). Gentle and considerate treatment of others wins their esteem. 16*b*. 'layeth open his folly': 'maketh a display of folly'. 17*a*. 'An incompetent messenger maketh (his sender) to fall'. The contrast is between the mischief caused by an unreliable messenger and the success insured by a competent envoy. 19. 'Desire fulfilled is sweet to the soul; but fools hate to turn from evil'. The two lines appear to be unrelated. 20*b*. 'become like to them': 'shall become evil'; cf. Eccles 22:14 and 13:1.

21-XIV 14 Rewards of the Just—21. Cf. 10:24; 11:21, 27. 23. The wide variety of renderings in the versions shows the obscurity of this verse. MT, slightly modified, may be read: 'The great man devoureth the land of the poor, but such is swept away without judicial process', i.e. he is punished by divine judgement. 24. 'Spare the rod and spoil the child'; cf. 3:12. 25. 'and filleth his soul': 'to his heart's content'; cf. 10:3.

XIV 1. Read perhaps: 'A wise woman buildeth up her house, but folly teareth it down'. The well-being of a household depends chiefly on maternal solicitude. 2. 'He that walketh uprightly feareth the Lord, but he whose ways are crooked, despiseth him'. 3*a*. 'rod': 'shoot'. 'The branch of pride springs from its stem in the fool's mouth' (Toy); cf. Apoc 1:16. Some suggest 'the rod for his pride', i.e. his words will be a scourge to the fool himself. 4. An emendation ('ēbūs to 'epes) gives: 'Where there are no oxen, there is no corn; an abundant crop is in the strength of the ox'. 6*b*. 'but to the man of understanding, knowledge is easy'. Wisdom is readily found by the sincere seeker; cf. 2:1-6. 7. 'Go from the presence of a foolish man, for thou hast not discerned (there) lips of prudence'. Perhaps MT is corrupt. 8. Foresight and a capacity to choose the proper course of action are characteristic of the prudent man. 9 makes good sense, but differs from MT, in itself obscure. By adding 'among' to a and by a change of one letter in the verb (s to n), we may read: 'Among fools guilt abideth, but among the just favour', i.e. of God. Fools always have a conscience burdened 370a with guilt; only on the upright does God's favour rest. 10. 'The heart knoweth its own bitterness and in its joy no stranger shareth'. 11. Cf. 12:7. 13. 'Even in laughter the heart is sad, and the end of joy is mourning'. Cf. Shelley's Ode to a Skylark: 'Our sincerest laughter with some pain is fraught, our sweetest songs are those that tell of saddest thoughts'. 14. 'The recreant shall reap the fruit of his ways, and the good man of his deeds'.

b 15-25 Prudence—15. 'innocent': inexperienced. The second couplet is found in LXX. 17b. 'but the prudent man endureth' (LXX), is patient. 18a. 'childish': inexperienced. 18b. 'look': 'embrace'. 19. Moral goodness will triumph; the wicked will 'bow' as suppliants at the gates of the just. 22. 'Do they not err that devise evil? but benevolence and fidelity [God's constant favour] shall be to them that devise good'. 23. 'In all labour there is profit, but mere talk tendeth to penury'. 24. 'The crown of the wise is wisdom, the chaplet of fools is their folly' (LXX). 25b. 'he that uttereth lies is a cheat'.
c 26-35 Religion and the State—26. 'In the fear of the Lord is the hope of the strong man, and to his children it shall be a refuge'. Even the strong man must not rely on his strength, but on the practice of religion. 27b. 'ruin': 'snares'. Religion gives strength to avoid sin which draws down divine chastisement; cf. 13:14. 29. 'He that is slow to anger showeth much wisdom; the short-tempered showeth great folly'. 30a. 'A tranquil mind is the life of the body'. 32b. 'death': read, by transposing two letters, b'jummō (innocence); 'but the just findeth refuge in his innocence'. 33b. 'and even among fools it is made known'. Wisdom also makes itself heard in the remorseful conscience of the wicked.
d XV 1-12 Gentleness—1a. 'breaketh': 'turneth away', 'sootheth'. 2. The urbanity of the wise makes knowledge pleasing and acceptable; cf. 15:7. 3b. 'behold': 'keeping watch upon'. Nothing escapes the eye of God; cf. 5:21. 4. A gentle tongue has the power to heal and lift up the spirit; cf. 12:18. 5b. 'shall become prudent': 'acteth wisely'. The second couplet comes from LXX. 6. 'In the house of the just there is ample wealth; the revenue of the wicked is (only) trouble'; cf. 10:16. 7b. 'the mind of the foolish is not right'. The wise man knows how to communicate wisdom; the fool is himself too confused to be of assistance to others. 8. 'The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord, but the prayer of the upright is his delight'. External worship without interior holiness is not pleasing to God. 10a. 'There is stern correction for him that forsaketh the way'. 11. 'Hell and destruction': 'Sheol and Abaddon lie open before the Lord'. Abaddon is a synonym for Sheol; cf. 27:20. If the profound and mysterious abode of the dead lies open before God, how much more the thoughts and motives of men. 12b. 'nor will he walk with the wise'.
e 13-24 Happiness of Heart—15. 'All the days of the poor are sad, but a joyous heart is a continual feast'. True happiness is found in contentment and joy of heart. 16. Cf. Amenophis: 'Better is poverty at the hand of God than riches in the storehouse. Better is bread with happy heart than riches with vexation'. 17. 'Better a dish of herbs where love is than a fatted ox and hatred with it'. 19. 'The way of the slothful is hedged with thorns, but the path of the diligent is a highway' (LXX); cf. Is 57:14. 22b. 'are established': 'stand', succeed; cf. 11:14; 20:18. 23. 'An apt utterance is a joy to a man; and a word in season, how good it is!'. 24. 'The path of life (goeth) upward to the wise, so that he turneth from Sheol beneath': another form of the proverb that virtue leads to life (cf. 10:17; 13:14) and sin to death; but here expressed in a manner that makes it difficult to avoid the impression of a blessed hereafter for the just; cf. however §365b.
f 25-33 Enemies and Friends of God—25b. 'widow': as typical of the poor and oppressed. God will not permit the removal of the boundary stone marking the limits of her land; cf. Deut 19:14. 26b. Perhaps the original reading was 'and gracious words are pleasing to him'. 27. Inordinate desire of wealth leads to bribery and acts of injustice that eventually bring ruin; but the man of incorruptible honour will be rewarded with a happy life. 28a. 'obedience': 'to answer', the prudent man weighs his words before giving answer. 30a. 'The light of the eyes': a radiant countenance. 30b. 'good news maketh the bones fat', a figure for physical well-being. 31a. 'of life': salutary. 32a. 'soul': 'life'. 33a. 'lesson': 'guidance to wisdom'. Religion is the basis of right living. Humble submission to God is the way to 'honour'; cf. 18:12; 22:4.

XVI 1-9 Divine Providence—1. 'To man belongeth the preparations of the mind, but from the Lord cometh the answer of the tongue'. Man's words, like his deeds, are subject to divine control; cf. Mt 10:19. 2a. 'open': 'pure [right] in his own eyes'; yet the final verdict comes from God. 3a. 'lay open': 'commit'. 4a. 'The Lord hath made everything for its own end'. MT, however, permits the translation 'for his own end'. By making a thing to serve its own purpose, God makes it serve his purpose. 4b. The wicked, by a deliberate choice of evil, fall under the divine law of chastisement. 6. 'redeemed': rather 'expiated'. Kindness towards our neighbour can repay our debt to God; cf. Lk 11:41. 9. Man proposes and God disposes; cf. 1.
10-15 The Ideal King—10a. 'Divination': 'an oracle'. The king's decisions are divinely guided. 11. The reading: 'Balance and scales are set by the king; all the stones in the bag are his concern', seems preferable in the context. 'the bag', in which sellers kept their weights; cf. 11:1; 20:10. 13b. 'they love him that speaketh right things'. A ruler needs honest counsellors. 14. It is perilous to antagonize a monarch; this was especially true of the Ancient East. 15b. 'latter rain': 'like a spring rain-cloud', necessary for the ripening of the corn.
16-22 Wisdom and Humility—16. The omission of mah in the Heb. (dittography) gives: 'The getting of wisdom is better than gold, and the getting of understanding more precious than silver'. 17b. 'he that guardeth his way [conduct] keepeth his life'. 18b. 'and a haughty spirit before a fall'; cf. Lk 14:11. 20a. 'He that giveth heed to the word shall find good'. The 'word' refers to the divine admonitions contained in the Mosaic Law; cf. 13:13. 21b. 'and sweetness of speech increaseth persuasiveness'. A pleasant manner of imparting wisdom will make teaching more effective. 23-33 The Gift of Speech—23b. 'grace': 'persuasiveness'; cf. 21. 24a. 'Well ordered': 'gracious'. 25b. 'but the end thereof (is) the way to death': a repetition of 14:12. 26. 'The appetite of the labourer, labourereth for him; because his mouth [hunger] impelleth him'. Man is driven to work to provide himself with food; cf. Gen 3:19. 27-30. Slander. 27b. The tongue of the slanderer is like a devastating fire; cf. Jas 3:5-6. 28b. 'and a whisperer separateth friends'. 30. 'He that winketh his eyes deviseth falsehoods; he that compresseth his lips hath brought evil to pass'. The outward expression betrays the inner thought; cf. 6:13. 31b. 'when': 'and'. The practice of virtue will lead to a venerable old age; cf. 3:2; 4:10; 10:27. 32. It is more glorious to control one's passions than to win battles; cf. Ovid (Epist. ex Pont. II. 75): 'Fortior est qui se quam qui fortissima vincit moenia'. 33. The favourable or unfavourable decision of the lot depends on God. In OT the use of the lot to decide public and private affairs, to resolve doubts, etc., was accepted; cf. 1 Kg 10:20 ff; Jos 7:14; Lev 16:8; and in NT Acts 1:26.
XVII 1-14 Kindness to Others—1. 'Better a morsel and peace with it, than a house full of feasting and strife'; cf. 15:16 f. 2a. 'foolish': 'shameful'. An intelligent servant may be raised to the position of son. 3. 'The crucible is for silver, and the furnace for gold, but the Lord is the trier of hearts'. 4a. 'obeyeth': 'giveth heed to malicious lips'. 7. 'Eloquent 370k words': 'sublime speech'. A proposed correction of MT (yeter to yöser) gives 'upright speech'. 7b. 'how much less do lying lips a prince'. 8. A difficult verse. 'A bribe is a precious jewel to its possessor; wherever he turneth, he prospereth'. The glitter of gold is a strong temptation and often the means of success in a dishonest undertaking. 9. 'He that seeketh friendship concealeth a transgression; he that repeateth a matter separateth friends'. A true friend will overlook the faults of another; cf. 1 Cor 13:7. 11. 'evil': 'rebellious'. 11b. 'angel': 'messenger'; he will receive a sharp lesson. 12. 'Meet a bear robbed of her whelps, but not a fool in his folly'. 14. A difficult verse. MT may be rendered: 'The beginning of strife (is as) when one setteth water free: and before there be quarrelling, cease'. A small fissure in a dam may open the way to an overwhelming flood; so contention to a passionate outburst.

1 15-26 Justice—16. 'Of what avail is money in the hand of a fool to buy wisdom, if he hath no sense'? The second couplet is found in LXX. 17b. 'and a brother is born for adversity'. A friend is friendly at all times, but the specific function of a brother is for the hour when friendship is most severely tested. 18. 'Void of sense is he that pledgeth himself [lit. striketh hands], and becometh surety for his neighbour'; cf. 6:1-6; 11:15. 19. 'He loveth sin that loveth strife; he that raiseth high his door, seeketh ruin'. Sin is the ordinary sequel to strife: ostentation, exemplified in the building of a pretentious house-door, can dissipate a fortune. 21. 'He that begetteth a fool, doth it to his sorrow; and the father of a fool hath no joy'. 22a. 'A joyful heart maketh for sound health. 23a. 'taketh': 'receiveth' a bribe from the fold of the garment in which it is concealed. 24a. 'Wisdom is before the face of the wise', as the object of his contemplation and the norm of his conduct, whereas the fool is incapable of fixing his mind on anything. 26a. 'to do hurt': 'to fine'. 26b. 'nor to scourge the noble against equity', i.e. unjustly. The verse deprecates injustice in the law-courts.

m 27-XVIII 5 Practical Wisdom—27b. 'precious': 'calm'. 28. The value of silence. XVIII: 1. An obscure verse. Vg and DV state that a man, wishing to alienate himself from his friends, seeks pretexts, but is always liable to reproach. MT may be emended to read: 'The unsocial man seeketh pretexts (for quarrel); he quarreleth with all (sound) wisdom'. 2. 'A fool hath no delight in understanding, but only in revealing his heart', in blurting out his own ideas and opinions. 3. 'When wickedness cometh, there cometh contempt, and with dishonour cometh reproach'. 4. The words of the wise are profound, beneficent and instructive. 5. As in 17:26 the reference is to the perversion of justice in the law-courts.

n 6-15 Foolish Talk—6a. 'intermeddle with': 'enter into' or 'bring'. 6b. 'quarrels': 'stripes'. The fool's thoughtless words involve him in disputes that call for punishment. 7b. 'soul': 'life'; cf. 10:14; 12:13; 13:3. 8. 'The words of the whisperer are like dainty morsels, that go down to the inner parts of the belly'. Malicious gossip is eagerly welcomed and deeply affects men's thoughts and actions; cf. 26:22. The second couplet is from LXX. 9. The slothful and the spendthrift make a well-matched pair. 10a. 'The name of the Lord': all that which the ineffable name of Yahweh connotes. In true religion man finds a sure bulwark against the vicissitudes of life. 10b. 'exalted': 'safe'. 11. The wealthy, by contrast, place their hopes in riches; cf. 10:15. 12. Cf. 15:33; 16:18; Lk 14:11. 14. 'A brave spirit upholdeth a man in his infirmity, but a broken spirit who can bear?' When the spirit, which is the source of strength, is itself crushed, what hope is there?

o 16-23 Litigation—16. 'A gift maketh room for a man, and bringeth him before the great'. The reference is to the oriental custom of making presents to influential men to gain their favour and patronage; cf. Gen 33:17. 'He appeareth right who pleadeth first in his own cause;

then cometh the other and testeth him'. An admonition that both parties to a dispute must be heard. 18. A doubtful case was settled by the lot, thus preventing recourse to violence. 19. MT is untranslatable: 'A brother offended (?) is (more than?) a strong city, and contentions are like the bars of a castle'; they form an impassable barrier to reconciliation. a of Vg and DV follows LXX and is a praise of brotherly help. 20b. 'offspring': 'outcome'. Prudence is required in speech, for a man must take the consequences of his words; cf. 12:14; 13:2. 21 is a development of the preceding verse. 22b. 'and obtaineth favour from the Lord'; cf. 12:4; 19:14; 31:10. The second couplet is an addition from LXX. 23. 'The poor man useth entreaties; but the rich answereth roughly.

24-XIX 7 The True Friend—24. 'There are friends for society, and there is a friend that clingeth closer than a brother'. This reading, however, is somewhat doubtful. XIX: 1a. 'simplicity': 'integrity'. 1b. The contrast and the parallel in 28:6 suggest the reading 'than he that is perverse in his lips and rich'. 2. MT reads: 'Zeal, too, without reflection is not good; he that hasteth with his feet misseeth (his way)'. A warning not to follow impetuously the blind impulse of passion. 3. 'The folly of a man subverteth his way; and his mind fretteth against God'. How often we blame God for our misfortune, though the fault is with ourselves. 4b. 'but the poor man is forsaken by his friend'; cf. 14:20; 19:7. 6a. 'honour': 'smooth the face of', flatter. 7b. Read: 'how much more do his friends stand aloof from him'. In MT a single defective line follows this couplet. The DV rendering of it is conjectural.

8-15 The Man of Sense and the Fool—8a. 'He that acquireth understanding wisheth well to himself'. 9. Cf. 19:5. 11. 'It is good sense in a man to restrain his anger, and it is his glory to pass over an offence'. This maxim approaches the NT precept of the forgiveness of injuries. 12b. 'cheerfulness': 'favour'. A king's anger is a fearful thing, but his favour is refreshing. 13b. 'the contentions of a wife, a continual dripping'. The incessant wrangling of a wife becomes as intolerable as the steady dripping of water from the roof. 14. Cf. 18:22; 31:10. 'True marriages are made in heaven'. 15a. 'He who will not work reaches a state in which he cannot work' (Oesterley).

16-23 Respect for God—16. 'soul': 'life'. It is probable that 'his' in b represents an original Hebrew abbreviation of the name 'Yahweh'. 17. Cf. Mt 25:40. 18a. 'despair not': 'seeing there is hope', of emendation. 18b might be a warning against either excessive correction or over-indulgence, both of which may prove fatal. 19. MT is corrupt. Perhaps: 'He that giveth way to anger shall pay the fine; and if he sheweth contempt (of court) he hath to pay more'. 20b. 'in thy latter end': in the future. 21a. 'thoughts', projects, schemes. 21b. 'but the plan [design] of God will succeed'; cf. 16:1, 9, 33. 22. Another crux interpretum. Perhaps: 'The ornament of a man is his kindness, and better a poor man than a liar'. 23. Long life and prosperity are the normal rewards of the God-fearing; cf. 14:27.

24-XX 6 Correction and Laziness—24a. 'The slothful burieth his hand in the dish', after the oriental fashion of eating. 25a. 'wicked man': 'scoffer'. 'fool': 'simple'. The chastisement of the irreligious will afford an object lesson to the merely ignorant. A simple admonition is sufficient for the man of sense. 26b. 'acteth shamefully and disgracefully'. 27. 'Cease, my son, to hear instruction, if it be only to wander from words of knowledge'. It is useless to hear advice without desire to put it into practice. 28a. 'An unjust witness scoffeth at justice'; cf. 15:28. 29a. 'judgements': MT š pātim (judgements) is a textual error for š bātim (strokes) which offers a better parallel to 'stripes' (not 'striking hammers') of b. XX 1. 'Wine is a mocker, strong drink a brawler; he that is intoxicated therewith is not wise'. 'mocker': scoffing at all things good and holy. 2a. 'dread', inspired by the fury of a king: a suggested change in MT gives 'wrath' (h'maš). 2b. He who provokes a king to anger

371d may forfeit his life (DV 'soul'); cf. 16:14. 4. 'The sluggard will not plough in autumn; (then) he seeketh in the harvest, and there is nought'. The word rendered 'autumn' is a general one for the colder half of the year when ploughing is done. 5. A clever man by shrewd inquiries can draw out of others their secret thoughts. 6a. 'are called merciful': 'profess kindness', i.e. to be well disposed. 'Fair promises are common, but faithful performance of them is rare' (Perowne).

XX 7-15 Right Conduct—7a. 'simplicity': 'integrity'. The virtuous life of a father also ensures the future for his children: cf. 14:26. 8b. scattereth: 'winnoweth', i.e. he quickly perceives evil and applies a remedy. 9. Man cannot be absolutely certain that he is free from sin: cf. 3 Kg 8:46; Job 14:4; 15:14; Ps 18 (19), 13; Eccl 7:21; Eccles 5:5; Rom 3:23; 1 Jn 1:8. 10. Cf. 11:1; 16:11; 20:23. 11a. 'inclinations': 'actions'. Children show their character by their conduct; hence the training of the young must begin early. 12. All man's faculties are the gift of God. The suggestion is that they must be used in obedience to him. 13. Cf. 6:9-11; 12:11; 19:15. 14a. 'Bad, bad, saith the buyer'. The buyer, in order to get an article cheaply, depreciates it, and then goes his way, boasting of his cleverness.

f 16-25 Just and Unjust Acquisition—16b. 'and hold him in pledge [as security] for strangers'. If a man has been foolish enough to go surety for another, the creditor is to hold him to strict account. According to Ex 22:26; Deut 24:10-13, a man's garment could be taken as security. 18. By reading t'kôn for tikkôn we get 'Regulate thy plans by counsel, and make war (only) under wise guidance': cf. 15:22; 24:6. 19. 'A talebearer revealeth secrets; meddle not with him that openeth wide his lips', with a gossip. 20b. 'in the midst of darkness': 'in deepest darkness'. 'his lamp': a figure for prosperity; cf. 13:9. 21. Cf. the prodigal son, Lk 15:13. 24b. 'how then [or, how little] can a man understand his way'. Man's intellect cannot comprehend the Providence which guides him. He must learn to trust God; then his life will be properly directed. 25. 'It is a snare for a man rashly to say: It is holy; and to reflect (only) after his vows'. By pronouncing the word 'Holy!' over an object it was removed from profane use (cf. Mk 7:11 ff.) and reserved for God and sacred purposes. A warning against binding oneself by vow without due reflection.

g 26-XXI 5 King and Government—26a. 'A wise king winnoweth the wicked, and bringeth over them the wheel', i.e. of the threshing cart that separates the wheat from the chaff; cf. Is 28:27. 27a. 'The spirit of man', which is infused by God. Cf. Gen 2:7 where the same Heb. word is employed to designate the vital principle or soul. Here, however, it rather means 'conscience'; cf. 1 Cor 2:11. 30. 'Wounds from stripes cleanse away evil; and strokes, the inward parts of the belly'. Chastisement effects moral improvement. XXI 1. 'The heart of a king is like channels of water in the hand of the Lord; he turneth it whithersoever he will'. The irrigator has full control over the water supply; so also God over his earthly representative. 2. Cf. 16:2. 3b. 'victims': sacrifices. The outer act without the observance of the moral precepts, is but an empty form; cf. 15:8; 21:27; Am 5:22; Is 1:11. 4. 'Haughty look and proud heart'—the lamp of the wicked is sin. The wicked place their happiness in self-exaltation and pride of place (cf. 13:9 for the 'lamp' as a symbol of prosperity), but precisely in this consists their sin. Some commentators read nîr 'tillage' for nêr 'lamp'. 5. 'The plans of the industrious (tend) to profit, but every one that hasteth, (cometh) to want'. The Vg and DV reading, however, supplies a better antithesis.

h XXI 6-12 Malice—6b. 'is vain and foolish': by emending niddâp to rôdêp MT reads: 'pursueth after a vapour and the snares of death'. 7a. 'robberies': 'violence'. 7b. 'do judgement': act justly. 8. 'Crooked is the way of the vicious man; but the doing of the pure is right'. 9b. 'common': a house shared in common with her. A transposition of the Heb. letters gives the reading 'wide' (râhâb); cf. 25:24. 11. 'When the scoffer is punished the simple becometh wise; when the wise man is instructed, he gaineth knowledge'; cf. 19:25. 12. 'The Just One considereth the house of the wicked; he overthroweth the wicked to their ruin'. God observes and punishes the actions of the wicked. 13-29 Charity and Justice—14. Cf. 17:23; 18:16; 19:6. 15a. 'do judgement': act justly. 16. 'A man that wandereth from the path of wisdom shall abide in the assembly of the Shades'; cf. 2:18; 5:5; 7:27. Most commentators understand the verse to mean that evil men die prematurely; on the other hand, the assertion that the penalty of evil conduct is to dwell always among the dead, may imply that perpetual life in Sheol will not be the fate of the just. The Vg and DV rendering of 'giants' is due to a mistaken reading of MT. 18. 'The wicked man is a ransom for the just; and the faithless taketh the place of the upright'. The chastisement of the wicked is, so to speak, the price paid for the immunity of the just. 20a. 'to be desired': precious. The wise man is thrifty; the fool wasteful. 22b. 'hath cast'. Knowledge and skill are superior to brute strength. 23b. 'his soul': 'himself'; cf. 13:3; 18:21. 24. 'The proud and arrogant man, scoffer is his name! He worketh in unbridled pride'. 25-28. He whose desires never materialize into action ruins himself, but the just man is ceaseless in his works of charity. 27b. 'How much more when he bringeth it with evil intention', e.g. to save himself from the consequences of evil-doing without inner repentance; cf. 15:8; 21:3. 28b. MT reads: 'the man that heareth, speaketh constantly'. A lying witness forfeits the right to be heard, but he who speaks only after careful consideration will always be heard. Neither the text nor sense is certain. 29b. 'correcteth': 'maketh firm'. The comparison is between firmness of conduct and hardness of face.

30-XXII 16 Divine Sovereignty—30. Cf. 1 Cor 1:19; 1 Jn 3:19. 31b. 'safety'; 'victory' or 'deliverance'. Human effort is required but the final outcome of everything depends on God. XXII:2. 'have met': 'meet one another', stand side by side in the present order. 'The true remedy for social inequalities is to recognize who it is that has appointed them and the obligations of mutual consideration and respect which they involve' (Perowne); cf. 29:13. 3. 'The prudent man forsooth danger and hideth himself: the simple go on and pay the penalty'; cf. 27:12. 4a. 'is': 'and'. Worship of God in true humility will win the divine blessing. 5. 'Thorns and snares are on the path of the wicked; he that watcheth over himself departeth far from them'; cf. 16:17. 6a. MT reads: 'Train up a child according to his way', in the way he is to go. The child is father to the man. 8b. A slight alteration of MT gives 'and the produce of his tillage (šêḇer 'bōdāṭā) shall fail'. 9. Cf. 14:21; 19:17. The additional couplet is from LXX. 11. 'The Lord loveth cleanness of heart: grace of lips pleaseth the king' (LXX). Purity of heart pleases God; graciousness in speech, earthly monarchs. 12. God, who sees all, protects 'knowledge', i.e. the wise man, and brings to nought the subtleties of the wicked. 13. Humorous sarcasm to show how the indolent exaggerate difficulties; cf. 26:13. 14. The seductive mouth of the adulteress is like a deep pit dug by the hunter for his prey. 15a. 'bound up': folly is part and parcel of his life. The discipline of the rod is the best remedy; cf. 13:24; 19:18; 23:13; 29:15. 16. Perhaps the best reading is: 'He that oppresseth the poor (only) enricheth him; he that giveth to the rich doeth it (only) to his want'. Evil done to the poor does not profit the oppressor, but rather, by the disposition of divine Providence, the poor themselves.

372a by the introduction (17-21), its hortatory tone, and by the strophic arrangement (usually four lines to a strophe) instead of couplets. The first half of the quatrain generally contains a prohibition, for which the second half gives the reason. This collection contains several striking similarities with the Teaching of Amenophis (cf. §316e).

b 17-21 Introduction—The unknown author speaks to the reader as to a son, after the fashion of chh 1-7, exhorting him to study the maxims and to make them his spiritual possession. Through them he will acquire trust in God and an adequate answer for all who question him. MT is poorly preserved. 17. 'Apply thy heart to knowledge'. 18. 'For it shall be pleasant to keep them in thy breast, and to have them ready on thy lips'. 19. That thy trust may be in the Lord, I have made known to thee this day his ways. 20. Behold! I have written for thee thirty sayings, wherein are counsels and knowledge. 21. To make thee know the truth, sincere words, that thou mayest answer him that questioneth thee'. 20. 'three': 'thirty', the number of maxims contained in this collection. The Heb. šālšīm should be šlōšīm.

c 22-29 22b. in the gate: at the city entrance, where the court of law was held (Deut 21:19). 22b. 'and will despoil of life them that despoil them'. 25b. 'and get a snare to thy life'. 26a. 'fasten down': 'strike'; cf. 6:1 note. 27b. Omit 'what cause is there' and read 'they will take away thy bed from under thee'. The usual warning against suretyship; the creditors, in compensation, will seize even necessary furniture. 28a. 'bounds': 'landmark' designating the limits of one's property. The land of the poor was often encroached upon by the powerful; cf. Deut 19:14; 27:17. 29a. 'swift': 'deft' or 'diligent'.

d XXIII 1-3 At Table—This saying inculcates respect and circumspection when dining with the great. 2a. 'put a knife to thy throat': probably a proverbial expression of self-restraint. 2b. 'if thou be a man of keen appetite'. 3a. 'meats': 'dainties'. 3b. His hospitality may be only to cloak some ulterior purpose.

e 4-5 Against Anxiety for Wealth—4b. 'desist from thy wisdom', from such a thought. 5. Read with correction of MT 'When thou settest thine eyes upon it [wealth], it is gone; for it maketh itself wings like an eagle that flieth towards heaven'. Riches can vanish in a moment.

f 6-8 The Niggardly Host—6a. 'envious': 'avaricious' or 'grudging'. 7a. Lit. 'As he thinketh within himself, so is he', an obscure line which may, perhaps, be emended to 'He thinketh only of himself'. 8b. 'and thou shalt waste thy goodly words'. The feast will be a failure. The food will nauseate and any attempt at agreeable conversation will be thrown away.

g 9 The Fool. 10-11 The Land of the Poor—10a. 'Remove not the landmark of the widow'; cf. 22:28. 11a. 'near kinsman': lit. 'redeemer', i.e. the next of kin who was bound by law to redeem his kinsman's land; cf. Lev 25:25. Here it is God himself who will protect the widow and the orphan.

h 12-14 Training of Children—13b. Death here is the consequence of the sin, into which the pampered child will fall, rather than the effect of corporal punishment. This view is borne out by the next verse. 14b. 'hell': 'Sheol'.

i 15-18 Reward of the God-Fearing—16. The heart and the kidneys were regarded as the seats of intellectual and emotional life. 18. 'If thou keepest it [fear of the Lord], it shall be well with thee in the end, and thy hope shall not fail' (LXX): thy last days shall be blessed; cf. 24:14.

j 19-21 Warning against Drunkenness and Gluttony—20-21. 'Be not thou among wine-bibbers, among gluttonous eaters of flesh, for the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, and drowsiness shall clothe a man in rags'. 'drowsiness': the torpor occasioned by excessive eating and drinking.

22-25 Value of Parental Instruction.

k 26-28 Warning against the Harlot—26. The sage identifies himself with Wisdom (cf. chh 1-9). 27. Cf.

22:14. 28b. 'and increaseth the faithless among men'. 372k She seduces men to betray the faith pledged to their consorts and to God; cf. 2:17.

29-35 Against Intemperance—29a. 'Who crieth I woe?' who 'alas'? who hath contentions? who complaints? 30b. 'and go to test mixed wine', mixed with spices. 31a. 'yellow': 'ruddy'; 31b. 'when it giveth its eye [gleameth] in the cup'. 31c should be transferred to 32. 32b. 'basilisk': a fabulous creature. The species of snake meant is unknown; one common rendering is 'adder'. 33-34. The physiological effects of drunkenness. 33a. 'women': 'things'. 33b. 'perverse': distorted. A reference to the distorted fancies and irresponsible speech of the drunkard. 34 is difficult. 'Thou shalt be as one that lieth down at sea, as one that sleepeth upon the top of a mast (?)'; the ground will seem to rise and fall as though he were on board ship or at the mast-head in a rough sea. 34b is translated by LXX: 'as a pilot in a violent storm'. 35. The half-stupid utterances of returning consciousness. The drunkard's first thought is to get back to his debauch. 35b. 'they drew': 'they have smitten'.

XXIV 1-6 Diverse Utterances—1a. 'Seek not': m 'Do not envy'. 2a. 'robberies': 'violence'; cf. 3:31; 23:17. 3-4. Practical utility of Wisdom. The reference is to the literal building and furnishing of the home. 5-6. Value of Wisdom in military strategy. 5. 'A wise man is better than a warrior, and a man of knowledge than he that hath strength' (Toy). 6. 'For war is managed by wise guidance, and victory lieth in counsellors'. Cf. 11:14; 20:18.

7-10 contain couplets in the style of the 'Proverbs of Solomon'. 7a. 'Wisdom is corals to a fool'. Vg gives the best sense possible of an obscure line. 7b. 'in the gate': in the place of public deliberation the fool will have no authority. 8b. 'Men call him a master of (evil) plans'. 9a. Sin is the aim and object of the fool's planning. 9b. 'detractor': 'scoffer' at religion and morality. 10. MT is incomplete. 'If thou art slack in the day of prosperity (?), in the day of adversity thy strength shall be little'.

11-22 Duties towards One's Neighbour—11-12 deal with the same subject. 11b. 'drawn to death': 'tottering to the slaughter'. 12. 'If thou sayest Behold I knew not this' (reading yāda'tt for yāda'nū), he that weigheth hearts, doth he not take note? He that observeth thy life, doth he not know? And shall he not render to every man according to his work? He who is able to prevent another's death and, on a weak pretext, fails to do so, will be held guilty by divine justice. 13-14. Wisdom (virtue) is to the soul what honey is to the 'palate'. 14b. 'If thou findest it, it shall be well with thee in the future', etc.; cf. 23:18 note. 15-16. A warning against violence to the just. 15. 'Lie not in wait, O wicked man, for the house of the just, and lay not waste his dwelling-place'. 16a. 'seven' is a round number; cf. Lk 17:4; Mt 18:21. The just man, no matter how often he is struck down by misfortune, will, with God's help, rise again, but the wicked 'are made to stumble', succumb to calamity. 17-18. To rejoice in the misfortune of enemies displeases God; perhaps his anger will turn from thy neighbour to thee. 19-20. The wicked are not to be envied. 19. 'Be not wrathful over the wicked, and envy not the ungodly'. 20a. The prosperity of the wicked will not last. 20b. Cf. 13:9, note. 21-22. Disobedience to authority is dangerous. 21b. 'detractors', lit. 'those who change', i.e. the factious. 22b. 'the ruin of both', inflicted by God and king.

XXIV 23-34 Section 4 Further Sayings of the Wise Men—This small, independent collection of proverbs, forms a second appendix to the first collection of the Proverbs of Solomon (10:1-22:16).

23a. 'These also are the sayings of the wise men'. 23b-25. Partiality in judicial decisions invokes the curse of God and man; justice brings rich blessing; cf. 17:15; 28:21. 25b. 'a blessing': MT adds 'rich'. 26. Straightforward speech is a mark of true friendship. The kissing of lips is nowhere else mentioned in the OT.

378a 27. An exhortation to get the land well in order and have a definite source of income before setting up a home and family. 27c. 'that': 'then'. 29. Cf. Mt 7:12. 30-34. The sluggard's vineyard. 32b. 'I saw and I learned a lesson'. 33-34. Cf. 6:10-11.

b XXV-XXIX. Section 5 Proverbs of Solomon. Second Series (cf. §364e)—1. The title informs us that, in addition to the proverbs of 10:1-22:16, other collections of Solomon's sayings were in existence, probably in written form, and that these were edited by scribes of the court of Ezechias, king of Judah (721-693).

c 2-7 On Kings—2a 'the word': 'a thing'. 2b. 'the speech': 'a thing' or 'a matter'. The inscrutability of God's designs in the government of the world (cf. Rom 11:33 f.; 1 Tim 6:16) is both a proof and the glory of his transcendental Sovereignty over creation. Earthly rulers ought not to decide affairs without examination and discussion. 3. At times, however, in the purposes of kings, there must necessarily be an element of secrecy. 4-5 form a comparison. 4a. 'rust': 'dross'. 5a. 'wickedness': 'the wicked'. As silver must be freed from dross, so the ruler from evil counsellors. 6-7 also form one quatrain. 6a. 'Appear not glorious': do not put on airs. 7b. 'be humbled': be put lower (at table); cf. Lk 14:8-11.

d 8-15 The Contentious Spirit—8b. 'for what wilt thou do hereafter when thy neighbour putteth thee to shame?' The forced withdrawal of a rash charge will only fill one with confusion. 9a. 'friend': 'neighbour'. 10. 'Lest he that heareth, reproach thee, and thine ill-repute pass not away'; i.e. 'Do not talk about your neighbour's affairs lest you become known as a gossip'. The second couplet is from LXX. 11-12: a quatrain on the value of wise advice. MT is obscure; a probable rendering is: 'Golden fruit on silver platters is a word fitly spoken. A golden earring and a necklace of gold, is a wise reprover to an obedient ear'. 13a. An emendation of the Heb. word for 'time' (b'ôym to b'hôm) gives the reading 'heat'. 13b. 'for', etc., is a gloss. 14. The original is more forceful. 'Clouds and wind and no rain—so is the man that boasteth of a false gift', one he does not give. The rising wind and gathering clouds unaccompanied by rain are an apt symbol of empty promises. 15b. 'hardness': 'the bone'. Forbearance and mildness overcome the greatest obstacles.

e 16-28 Moderation—16a. 'If thou findest honey'. Self-control is recommended even in pleasant things. 17a. 'Let thy foot be seldom in'. 18b. 'dart': 'hammer'. 19b. 'weary': read mô'adeṭ 'tottering'. One cannot rely on a bad tooth or a tottering foot; nor can a disloyal friend be trusted in time of trouble. 20 should begin with 'Vinegar'. The preceding line is probably due to the mistake of a scribe who inadvertently copied the Heb. consonants of 19b twice over. 'As vinegar on a wound, so is the singing of songs to a troubled heart' (LXX); both give an added pang. 22. A quatrain on kindness to enemies. 22a. 'coals of fire': the burning pangs of shame which may lead to repentance and charity; cf. Rom 12:20. 23. 'The north wind bringeth rain, and the backbiting tongue an angry countenance', to the right-minded hearer. 24. Cf. 21:9. 25. Cf. 15:30. 26. 'falling down': 'wavering' in the practice of virtue out of human respect. 'troubled': 'trampled'. His weakness of character ruins his other good qualities. 27b. MT reads 'and the investigation of their glory is glory'. Vaccari suggests 'It is not good to eat much honey, and to search into majesty is no glory'; too much curiosity about the divine Majesty brings neither glory nor profit to man. 28. 'A breached city without a wall—such is a man without self-control'. He is easily conquered by his passions.

f XXVI 1-12 The Fool—1b. 'glory': 'honour', high position. 2. 'Like the sparrow in its flitting, like the swallow in its flying, so a curse that is groundless: it cometh [strieth] not'. A protest against the popular superstition that gave magical power to a curse. 378b 4-5. Do not descend to the level of a fool unless it be to make him conscious of his folly. 6b. 'cutteth off' (his own) feet, drinketh violence'. An incompetent envoy is harmful to the sender. 7a. The verb is not clear. A probable reading is: 'The legs of the lame hang loose; so doth a proverb in the mouth of fools'. A fool can make no better use of a wise saying than a lame man of his limbs. 8. The least improbable translation of MT is: 'As one that bindeth a stone in a sling, so is he that giveth honour to a fool'. In each case the act is absurd, for a sling is meant to discharge stones, not to hold them. In Vg the reference is to a casting of stones on the cairns sacred to Mercury and the comparison is with the folly of pagan superstitions. 9. Obscure. 'A thornstick that cometh into the hand of a drunkard, so is a proverb in the mouth of fools'. A wise saying may be misused. 10 is perhaps the most obscure and difficult in the book. The following translation seems preferable: 'As an archer that woundeth every passer-by, so is he that hireth a fool and a drunkard' (Bickell); i.e. both acts are foolish. Vaccari renders: 'The litigant setteth everything in motion; he hireth the foolish and the passer-by'. 11. Cf. 2 Pet 2:22. 12. Presumption and self-conceit are worse than ignorance.

13-16 The Sluggard—13. Cf. 22:13. 14. 'Movement, without progress'. 15. Cf. 19:24. 16b. 'that speak sentences': 'that (know how to) answer discreetly'. Ignorance, the daughter of slothfulness, is the mother of presumption.

17-22 The Busybody—17. 'He taketh a dog by the ears (LXX: 'tail') who meddleth with a quarrel not his own'. Both acts invite trouble. 18-19. 'As a madman that casteth brands and arrows, so is he that deceiveth his neighbour, and saith: 'I did it in jest!' A condemnation of malicious cleverness. 20b. 'and where there is no talebearer', etc. 21b. 'coals': 'bellows' (LXX). 21b. 'so a quarrelsome man to inflame strife'.

22a. 'simple': 'dainty morsels': cf. 18:8.

23-28 The Hypocrite—23. 'Swelling': read with LXX h'laqim 'smooth' or 'flattering' for dol qim. A fair exterior hides the inner falseness of the flatterer. 24a. 'He that hateth, dissembleth with his lips, but in his heart he layeth up deceit. 25a. 'When he maketh gracious his voice'. 25b. 'seven': cf. 24:16, note. 26. Though one may with guile conceal his hatred for another, sooner or later it will be made public, perhaps in a judicial assembly. 27. Mischief recoils on the perpetrator. 28a. 'loveth not truth': 'hateth the oppressed', a corrupt text. Read perhaps yaṣgi, 'multiplieth the oppressed' (Zorell).

XXVII 1-22 A Collection of Aphorisms on Various Subjects—1-2. On boasting. 1a. 'for': 'of': cf. Jas 4:13 f. 3b. Some suggest that 'anger' is an addition; it is the fool himself who is a burden; cf. Eccles 22:18. 4. 'Wrath is ruthless, anger a torrent; but before jealousy who can stand?' It is the most tenacious and terrible of the passions: cf. 6:34. 5-8. Salutory rebuke. 5a. 'love that conceals': that fears to rebuke. 6. 'Faithful [well meant] are the wounds of him that loveth, deceitful the kisses of him that hateth'. 7. Hunger is the best sauce. 'He that is full trampleth upon [rejecteth] the honeycomb; but to the hungry every bitter thing is sweet'. Cf. Horace, Sat. II, 2, 38. 8. There is no place like home. 9b. MT is untranslatable; Vg, by inversion, has an appropriate parallel. 10. Hold fast to old friendships. In the day of trouble a tried friend of the family, if he be near at hand, is of more worth than a kinsman who dwells far off. 11b. 'that I may answer him that reproacheth me'. The good conduct of the pupil will be the best proof of the character of the master's teaching. 12. Cf. 22:3. 13. A repetition of 20:16. 14a. 'in the night': 'morning'. 14b. 'it shall be reckoned a curse to him', the neighbour. Excessive demonstrations of affection are suspect. 15. Cf. 19:13. 16. MT is corrupt; 'The north wind is a severe wind, but by its name is termed auspicious' (LXX). Vg connects the verse with the 374a preceding, but 16b should be read: 'and whose right hand encountereth oil'; it is as difficult to restrain a contentious woman as to restrain the winds or grasp oil. 17b. 'countenance': the person. Social intercourse sharpens the wits. 'Conference maketh a ready man'. 18b. 'honoured'. Duty well done brings its own reward. 19. MT runs: 'As (in) water face (answereth) to face, so the heart of man to man'. As the face seen in water resembles the face of which it is a reflection, so do the hearts of men resemble one another in the essential features of their common nature. 'As water', however, is probably a mistaken translation of the Heb. k'mô = 'as'; hence the original text would read 'As face to face, so the heart of man to man'; as human countenances show differences, so too, there is diversity in the inner, moral being of men. 20a. 'Sheol and Abaddon are never filled'. Abaddon: cf. 15:11, note. The desires of men are as insatiable as Sheol. 21. Praise tests a man's virtue as fire tests metal. The second couplet is from LXX. 22b. 'sodden barley': 'grain', but the clause reads like a gloss and should be omitted. The proverb states graphically that the fool's folly is his nature.

b 23-28 Care of the Flock—23a. 'countenance': 'state' or 'appearance'. 24a. 'power': 'riches'. 24b. For u'im nêzer ('and doth a crown?') read u'ên ôsâr, 'nor wealth from generation to generation'. The continual effort of the farmer is necessary against the day of want. 25. 'When the hay is removed, the tender grass (of the second crop) appeareth, and the herbs of the mountains [the upland pastures which are mown later] are gathered in'. 26b. The sale of flocks will purchase more land. 27a. 'There shall be goat's milk enough', etc.

c XXVIII 1-XXIX 1-1. The courage of a good conscience; cf. Hamlet: 'Conscience doth make cowards of us all'. 2. The text is uncertain. 'For the transgressions of a land its tyrants are many; but by a man of intelligence and insight right order is prolonged' (Vaccari). 3. 'A wicked man [or ruler] that oppresses the poor is a beating rain—and no bread' (LXX); he is like a rain which takes away man's food by flattening the grain and washing the seed out of the earth. 4a. 'that forsake the law', divine or moral. 5. 'Evil men do not understand justice, but they that seek the Lord understand all'. Vice destroys the moral sense in man; but the sincerely religious man has a mind exquisitely attuned to the perception of all things, cf. 1 Cor 2:14 f. 6a. 'in his simplicity': 'uprightly'. 6b. 'than one perverse in his ways, though he be rich'; cf. 19:1. 7b. 'he that consorteeth with profligates'. 8a. 'loan': 'interest'. Money wrongfully acquired (cf. Ex 22:25; Deut 23:19 f.) will finally fall into the hand of the charitable man; cf. 13:22. 9. Prayer made with an obstinate affection for sin is an insult to God. 10a. 'deceiveth': 'causeth to go astray'. 'destruction': 'pit'. 11. The ability to amass wealth is no sure sign of wisdom; a poor man who has discernment is able to see through the rich. 12. 'When the just triumph, there is great glory; when the wicked rise, men hide themselves' [lit. 'must be searched for']. When evil men are in power, the people suffer. 13. Cf. Ps 31 (32) 5 f. 16a. 'A prince that is void of understanding multiplieth extortions'. 17. 'A man oppressed by [laden with] blood guilt runneth to the grave; no one succoureth him'. There is no sympathy for a murderer. 20. 'A trustworthy man shall be richly blessed; but he that hasteneth to enrich himself shall not go unpunished'. A commendation of honest dealing. 21. 'To have respect of persons is not good—for a morsel of bread a man sinneth!' To pervert justice by showing partiality in the law-court is a grave sin; yet how many are tempted even by a small bribe! 22. 'An avaricious man [lit. 'a man of evil eye', i.e. selfseeking] hasteneth to be rich, and knoweth not that want shall come upon him'. 24. He who steals from his parents is ready for any crime. 25. 'A greedy man stirreth up quarrels; he that trusteth in the Lord shall be made fat'. A man of grasping disposition rouses antagonism, but he who trusts in God and not in riches will prosper. 28. 'He that trusteth in himself is entrusted to a great fool' (St Augustine). 27b. 'He that hideth his eyes', who takes no notice. XXIX:1. 'He that being often reproved hardeneth his neck (like an obstinate ox), shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy'.

XXIX 2-14 Good Government—2a. 'increase': a slight emendation of the Heb. word birbôt to birdôt gives 'are in authority', a change demanded by the parallel in 2b. 2b. 'maintaineth': 'consorteth with'; cf. the prodigal son (Lk 15:30). 4b. 'covetous': lit. 'a man of contributions', whose exactions are excessive. 5. 'A man that flattereth his neighbour spreadeth a net for his steps'. 6. 'In the path of the wicked man is a snare, but the just shall sing and rejoice'. The path of the wicked seems enviable, but, in reality, it leads to perdition. 7b. 'is void of knowledge': does not bother to look into the case. 8a. 'Scoffers [at moral obligations] set a city on fire', by fanning the passions of men. Prudent men, on the other hand, bring calm. 9b. There is no coming to an understanding with a fool, either by severity or by banter. 10b. 'soul': 'life', i.e. the just seek his well-being. 11. 'A fool uttereth all his anger, but a wise man stilleth it in the end'. 12. If a ruler listens to falsehood, the entire court becomes corrupt. 13. 'The poor and the oppressor meet together [e.g. in the market-place], and the Lord giveth light to the eyes of both'. Although it takes all sorts to make up a world, it is God, who gives to all the 'light' of life and keeps them in existence; cf. 22:2.

15-21 Education—15. Cf. 10:1; 13:24; 17:21; 19:18; 22:15; 23:13. 17a. 'refresh': 'give rest' from anxiety. 18a. Without divine 'revelation' the bonds which hold society together are relaxed and broken. The salvation of a people and the individual stands in the observance of a divinely given law. 19. The servant, like the son, must be corrected by the rod. 20. 'Seest thou a man hasty in his words? There is more hope for a fool than for him'. 21b. MT is uncertain, the last word never occurring elsewhere. The Vg reading makes good sense.

22-27 Mildness and Humility—22a. 'passionate': 'irascible'. 22b. prone to: 'abounding in'. 23b. 'but he who is humble of spirit shall obtain honour', cf. 16:18. 24a. 'hateth himself', by incurring the guilt and penalty of a thief. 24b. As a partner in crime he is like one who, having been put on oath in a law-court to reveal what he knows, conceals the perpetrator of a crime (Lev 5:1). 25a. 'The fear of man layeth a snare', i.e. by yielding to human respect one may easily be led to do something wrong, or to refrain from doing what is right. 25b. 'on high': in a safe place. 26. It is the favour of God and not of men that one must seek, for the destiny of men depends on God alone. 27. MT is more trenchant: 'The abomination of the just is the wicked man; and the abomination of the wicked is he of upright way'.

XXX 1-14 Section 6 The Sayings of Agur—A short collection of miscellaneous proverbs. 1 is enigmatic. 1a constitutes a title; 1b is to be joined with 2-4. 1a. 'The sayings of Agur, the son of Jakeh, the Massaites'. DV gives the signification of the names, 'Gatherer' and 'Vomiter', not the names themselves. Agur, like Lemuel with whom he is to be ethnologically connected (31:1), came from Massa (if, as is probable, mašā is a place name), a region in Transjordan originally inhabited by the Ishmaelites (Gen 25:14). In the course of time, however, Israelite families must have settled there, bringing with them their religion, for Agur is a worshipper of Yahweh (30:9) and both he and Lemuel have merited a place among the inspired writers. Mašā, however, could also be read as a noun signifying 'oracle' (cf. Is 13:1; Nah 1:1). The more commonly accepted reading of 1b is: 'The inspired utterance of that man: "I have wearied myself, O God. I have wearied myself, and I am faint"'. 375 a 375a 2-4. The divine nature and its attributes transcend human intelligence. A proof of this is to be found in the marvels of creation (cf. Job 38:4-11). 2a. 'For I am more brutish [stupid] than men (in general)'. 3b. 'saints': 'of holy things' or 'of the Holy One'; cf. 9:10, note. 4c. 'as in a garment': i.e. in the clouds. 4d. 'raised up': 'fixed'. 4e. To know a man's name or his son's name, is to be well acquainted with him. The meaning of the verse is that no man is responsible for the magnificence of the universe but God, who is beyond the feebleness of human comprehension. 5. Revealed doctrine is true and trustworthy like metal that has passed through the refining pot, cf. Ps 11 (12) 7; like a shield it wards off error. 6. Do not give out your own thoughts as divine revelation; cf. Deut 4:2; Apoc 22:18. 7-9. A prayer to be kept from insincerity and from the evils of excessive wealth and poverty. 8a. 'vanity': 'falsehood' on account of the parallel. 9b. 'forswear': blasphemy or charge God foolishly. 10a. 'Accuse': 'Defame'. 10b. 'and thou pay the penalty'. 11-14. Four odious types: despisers of parents, self-righteous, proud, and extortionate. 13. 'Men of haughty looks and supercilious bearing' (Toy). 14b. Lit. 'and their jaw-teeth as knives'.

b XXX 15-33 Section 7 Numerical Sayings—The fact that in LXX these verses stand after 24:34, indicates that they once formed a separate collection. MT is poorly preserved.

c 15-16. Four insatiable things. Sheol (cf. 1:2; 2:18; 27:20), the barren womb, earth, and fire. 15a is probably corrupt, and may be a gloss. In view of what follows, the original thought seems to have been that the leech is never sated with blood. 15b. 'three . . . fourth': a rhetorical figure. 16a. 'the closing of the womb'. The reference is to the desire of a childless wife for children. 17. Punishment of filial disobedience. 17a. 'labour': 'old age' (LXX). 'in bearing him': omit.

d 18-20. Four wondrous things. 18b. 'yea, four which I know not'. 19d. 'in youth': 'in a young woman' or 'with a maid'. The soaring flight of a bird, the mysterious movement of a serpent, the path of a ship through the sea, the procreation and growth of a human being in the womb (cf. Ps 138 (139) 13-18; Job 10:11)—or perhaps the birth in the heart of a youth of that affection by which he is drawn to a maid—all excite admiration. In the first explanation 'almāh means a young woman of marriageable age, presumably a virgin, who in lawful matrimony will realize the mysterious designs of Providence in the procreation of life. 20 is only loosely connected with 19 and is probably a gloss. Presumably it was thought to be an appropriate explanation of the last line of 19 where however there is no question of an immoral act; nor is the point of 19 their tracelessness but the wonder they excite.

e 21-23. Four unbearable things. 23a. 'odious': not beloved. 23b. 'is heir to': suppliants.

f 24-28 Four things small but wise. 25b. 'summer'. 26a. 'rock-badger'. 28a. 'The lizard can be taken hold of with the hands, yet', etc.

g 29-31 Four majestic things. 29. Lit. 'are stately in step' and 'stately in going'. 30b. 'and turneth not back before anything'. 31a. 'cock': thus all the ancient versions, but some moderns suggest 'the war-horse' accounted for battle (cf. Job 39:19-25). 31b. 'whom none can resist': MT is corrupt. Vaccari reads 'at the head of his people' (cf. Zorell under the word 'alqūm).

h 32-33 MT is uncertain. Perhaps: 'If thou hast done foolishly in exalting thyself, reflect—hand to mouth'; i.e.

learn to keep a modest silence. 'For pressing milk bringeth forth curd, and pressing the nose bringeth forth blood, and pressing wrath bringeth forth strife'. Self-glorification (cf. 32) only rouses wrath that ends in strife.

XXXI 1-9 Section 8 The Sayings of Lemuel—This short collection consists of four quatrains containing counsels of moderation and generosity, given to the king by his mother. In terms of ardent affection (2), she warns him again impurity (8), inebriety (4-7), and urges him to befriend the helpless and judge with equity (8-9). MT is in a very poor state.

1. Superscription. 'The sayings of Lemuel, king of Massa which his mother taught him'. 'Lemuel': cf. 30:1. 'vision': 'of Massa'. 2. 'What': thrice repeated, it expresses earnestness. 'beloved': 'son'. 'of my vows': given as a result of vows; cf. 1 Kg 1:11. 3a. 'substance': 'virile strength'. 3b. 'and thy ways (of life) to them that destroy kings', i.e. evil women. 4. 'It is not for kings, O Lemuel, it is not for kings to drink wine, nor for rulers to desire strong drink'. 5a. 'Lest they drink and forget that which is decreed', the laws. 6-7. Two proper occasions for the use of wine, bodily suffering and mental distress; cf. Ps 103 (104) 15. 6a. 'sad': 'perishing' from hunger and want. 8a. 'dumb': defend those who have no one to plead for them. 8b. 'children that pass': (read hōlī for h'ōlōp) 'the sons of sickness', i.e. all who suffer.

XXXI 10-31 Section 9 The Virtuous Wife—An anonymous, alphabetical poem, the 'ABC' of the ideal wife. 10a. 'valiant woman': lit. 'woman of strength' or 'capacity'. The best English rendering is 'a worthy wife'. 10b. 'far above pearls is her worth'. 11b. 'and he shall have no lack of gain', i.e. income. Her husband confides to her the management of the household, certain that all will go well. 13a. 'She seeketh wool' for the weaving of garments. 13b. 'counsel': 'alacrity'. 14. From all quarters she provides maintenance for the household. 15a. 'a prey': 'food'. 15c. 'victuals': 'tasks'. 16b. 'with the fruit of her hands': with her earnings. 18a. 'She hath tasted': she perceives with relish that her commerce is profitable. 18b. 'her lamp goeth not out by night': either she works indefatigably, or, because the lamp is the symbol of prosperity (13:9; 24:20), her house is prosperous even in distressing times. 19a. 'to strong things': 'to the distaff', but this meaning is not certain. 20. Economy does not forbid charity. 22a. 'clothing of tapestry': 'coverlets'. 23a. 'honourable': 'known', i.e. honoured. 'gates': the assembly place of the city's 'elders'; cf. 24:7. 24b. 'Chanaanite': the word came to be synonymous with 'trader' to whom she 'gives' the girdles she has woven in exchange for money, etc. The Canaanites or Phoenicians were the great mercantile people of the period. 25a. 'beauty': 'dignity'. 25b. 'in the latter day': 'at the future'. Her foresight has enabled her to face the future without anxiety. 26a. 'with wisdom'. 26b. 'law of clemency': kindly counsel. 27. She keeps diligent watch over the conduct of her family and domestics. 28. Peace and harmony reign in the household; she is appreciated and praised by husband and children. 29. The encomium of her husband. 'Many daughters [i.e. women] have done well'. 30-31. 'Favour' (or 'grace') and beauty are prized in a woman, but they will pass away. Of how much more value is virtue founded on the 'fear of the Lord', i.e. on religion. 'Thus does Wisdom return in her last utterance to her first (1:7), and place once again the crown on the head of the godly' (Perowne).

b Name—The Hebrew title is Qôheleṭ which in LXX is rendered by 'Εκκλησιαστής. The Vg 'Ecclesiastes' is but a transcription of the title in LXX. The Hebrew form is the active participle in the feminine singular of the Qal conjugation, from a verb qâhal found elsewhere only in niph'al and hiph'il and meaning 'to assemble'. The precise meaning of the form here is uncertain. The principal renderings put forward by commentators are: one who convenes an assembly; member of an assembly; official speaker in an assembly; head of an assembly of wise men; preacher; debater; the great collector of sayings. The feminine form may be explained either (a) as arising from the abstract conception of an office, e.g. Podestà, the Italian designation for Mayor, means literally 'power', or (b) as in Arabic, denoting an individual as one who realizes in its completeness the idea expressed in the root.

c Canonicty—The canonicity of Eccles. was doubted by none of the early Fathers or ecclesiastical writers, not even by Theodore of Mopsuestia who, however, attributed to it a minor degree of inspiration. In the Jewish world a discussion arose between the disciples of Hillel and those of Shammai as to its admission into the Canon of Sacred Books. Eccles., however, was accepted as canonical at the Jewish Council of Jamnia (about A.D. 95), although echoes of the former discussion lingered on even to the time of Jerome.

d Authorship and Date—Scholars generally up to the 19th century held that Solomon was the author of the book. They argued from Jewish and Christian tradition, from their interpretation of 1:1, 12, and from the mention, especially in ch 2, of the great wisdom and opulence which the writer says he acquired. Critics today, with perhaps some exceptions, are agreed that the book is pseudepigraphal, and that the authorship of Solomon—who was for the Hebrews the ideal wise man—is a literary artifice. The Book of Wisdom is another instance, admitted by all, of this not uncommon literary device. The arguments put forward against Solomonic authorship seem convincing: (a) The book contains many words and constructions which elsewhere are found only in the latest parts of the Hebrew OT, and some others used elsewhere only in the Mishnah. The latter book received its present form about A.D. 230 but contains much older elements. (b) The social state described in the book is unlike what we know to have been the condition of the Israelites in Solomon's day. The author deplores the greed and cruel tyranny of corrupt officials and the consequent misery of the rank and file. He speaks of disorders in the state due to incompetent rulers. It is, moreover, unlikely that Solomon would have given this picture of moral and social evils the responsibility for which would in great part be his. It seems then that the writer, part of whose purpose was to point out that earthly goods are unsatisfying, chose to impersonate Solomon, since he above all others was noted for all those possessions which seem to make for happiness. The words of such a one as Solomon would enforce most effectively the teaching that material prosperity is unsatisfying. We notice that the claim to personate Solomon is more in evidence in the earlier part of the book.

While critics are agreed that the book is post-exilic, they disagree as to the precise period to which it should be ascribed. From the contents of the book we may conclude that it is earlier than Ecclesiasticus (written 190 B.C.) which seems to have been acquainted with its teaching, and that it is later than Proverbs and Job since the old doctrine of earthly retribution is definitely abandoned. It holds, therefore, a central position in the Wisdom literature and belongs to a transitional period when the currents of thought which gave rise to the Sadducees, Pharisees and Essenes were already in existence and when Jewish writers began to be acquainted with Greek philosophy. From these considerations we may fix the date somewhere towards the close of the 3rd century B.C.

Argument and Theme—When Ecclesiastes wrote, the dogma of retribution in a life hereafter had not yet been definitely accepted in the Hebrew creed. Rewards and chastisements were therefore considered in terms of this life. An infinitely just God rewarded obedience to his laws by the bestowal of temporal goods, and punished disobedience by their deprivation. Interest was thus riveted to life on earth and men's ambition was a long and prosperous one. But this doctrine of earthly retribution as applied to the individual caused perplexity, for the experiences of life contradicted it. Those experiences taught Ecclesiastes that temporal goods, wisdom, pleasures, power, riches, were inadequate as a reward for the observance of the Law.

Ecclesiastes firmly believes that God created the world and man (7:14, 30a; 12:1), that he still orders their affairs (8:17; 9:1), and that being infinitely just he will reward the good and punish the wicked (3:17; 8:12 f.; 11:9b). His problem is to reconcile with God's creative and administrative power and his retributive justice the following facts drawn from experience and observation. Man's labour is profitless and meaningless. Those things which man acquires by his labour and which—according to the received doctrine—constitute the rewards of a virtuous life are transitory and unsatisfying. Moreover, the distribution of those goods—such as they are—is sometimes made without regard to merits or demerits; the wicked man is sometimes seen to flourish and the just man to suffer. And, what is more, man is crushed by his fellow-man; oppression and tyranny caused by despotic officials and corrupt judges are rife in the state. And because judgement is not speedily pronounced against these evil-doers they continue in their evil ways. Belief and experience, then, are in conflict. Experience 376g points to seeming inconsistencies in the divine moral government of the universe. In the days of Ecclesiastes thinking people, no doubt, began to ask: why all the feverish activity, why the varying fortunes of individuals? There was a tendency to abandon the effort of living a moral life, for doubts would have arisen as to the existence of a divine administration of the affairs of men. Some must have finally given way to religious and moral laxity, for the accepted doctrine lacked the efficacious sanction of the Law. The thoughts of those people would not have been unlike those expressed by St Paul: 'If (according to man) I fought with beasts at Ephesus, what doth it profit me if the dead rise not again?' (1 Cor 15:32).

h Ecclesiastes' problem is, then, to reconcile with the creative and administrative power of an infinitely just God the facts of human life. He declares that the reason why human endeavour seems profitless and aimless is that the circumstances and events of life form part of a divine plan which for man is unsearchable. Man cannot discover the divine purpose, and so fails to comprehend the importance of his labours in the whole scheme of God's administration and to know why the just man sometimes suffers while the wicked man prospers (cf. 3:1-8, 11; 7:28-30a; 8:17; 11:5). Ecclesiastes furthermore declares that the received doctrine of temporal retribution finds no justification in fact (cf. 7:16; 8:14; 9:2 f.). He does not, however, deny the justice of God. On the contrary, he insists that God will intervene in judgement to redress injustice and reward righteousness (cf. 3:17; 8:12 f.; 11:9b). When and how this will happen Ecclesiastes does not say. The fuller revelation of the true nature of the hereafter had yet to come, and his teaching is in consequence necessarily negative.

i Ecclesiastes is not wholly concerned with giving the facts of human life drawn from experience and observation, and with making the above-mentioned declarations. In addition, he proffers positive advice to the people of his day how best to live their lives. This advice scattered here and there, frequently repeated and often enforced by the insertion of maxims, may be summarized as having reference to man's private, social and religious life.

j Private Life—(i) Every man can and should find real happiness, fleeting though it be, in and through his daily labour. A discreet and temperate enjoyment of the fruits of labour is to be indulged in, for this is man's portion given to him by God and is a means of soothing the sorrows of life. A day-to-day enjoyment is counseled and man is not to trouble himself with speculations about what the future may bring by way of happiness. This advice, which connects 'eating and drinking' with 'labour' and speaks of the enjoyment as the gift of God, is very different from the Epicurean doctrine which makes a slothful self-indulgence the summum bonum. The advice of Ecclesiastes is found in 2:24 f.; 3:12 f., 22; 5:17 ff.; 7:15; 8:15; 9:7 ff.; 11:7 ff. (ii) Gravity rather than frivolity is to be cultivated (7:3-7). (iii) Hasty anger and foolish talk are to be avoided (7:9-11). (iv) Man should engage in prudent enterprise (11:1-6).

k Social Life—(i) Companionship and a spirit of co-operation are advantageous (4:9-12). (ii) Silent submission in face of despotism and the capriciousness of rulers is best (7:30b-8:8; 10:4-7, 20).

l Religious Life—(i) Proper worship is to be practised (4:17-5:6). (ii) God is to be feared (7:19b; 8:12). Note that the expression 'to fear God' means generally in the OT to be pious, to recognize in practice God's claim to the homage of his creatures. Finally, Ecclesiastes urges that man be guided in all the activities of his private, social and religious life by wisdom. While wisdom from the point of view of making one happy is a vanity, yet as a guiding principle of life's activities it is to be sought after.

m Unity—The reader of Eccles. in its present form will notice, firstly, the lack of any systematic development of the theme, and, secondly, the presence of statements and passages some of which apparently interrupt, and others contradict, the context. The lack of logical development may be explained by the supposition that the book is in the nature of a diary written up over a period by the author. The presence of statements and passages which apparently interrupt or contradict the context has led to various explanations. Certain critics advance a theory of multiple authorship, although there is some disagreement among them as to the number of authors who contributed and as to the extent of the individual contributions. The view most common among them, however, is in its main outlines that first put forward by McNeile. It is substantially as follows. Four successive authors thus contributed:

(i) A pessimist who is responsible for the original core of the work.

(ii) A wise man—the hākām glossator—who sought to emphasize the importance of wisdom as he believed it to be unfairly depreciated. To him are assigned 4:5, 9-12; 6:7, 9a; 7:2a, 5-13, 20, 30b; 8:1; 9:17 f.; 10:1-3, 8-14a, 15, 18 f.; 12:11 f. These passages are alleged to interrupt the context.

(iii) A pious Jew—the hāsīd glossator—who, believing that the work was unsafe for the orthodox, gave a religious impress to the book by adding sentences which centre round two chief thoughts: (a) the paramount duty of fearing God, and (b) the certainty of God's judgement on those who do not fear and please him, so Oesterley and Robinson, Introd. to the Books of the OT (London, 1934), 212. These sentences are: 2:26 (except the last clause); 3:14b, 17; 4:17-5:6; 7:19b, 27b, 30a; 8:2b, 3a, 5, 6a, 11-13; 11:9b; 12:1a, 13 f. These passages are said to contradict the general argument.

(iv) An editor who is responsible for the passages in which Ecclesiastes is spoken of in the third person, viz. 1:1 f.; 7:28; 12:8-10.

Many exegetes especially among Catholics maintain, however, that a solution may be found within the framework of unity of authorship, although they too advance various theories. They all seem to agree in denying that the context is frequently interrupted, while admitting that the connexion of thought is often difficult to grasp. They disagree in their explanations of the apparent contradictions of context. The enumeration of the theories put forward would here serve no useful purpose. The theory which we favour is this: with the exception of the passages 1:1 f.; 7:28; 12:8-14 which were probably inserted by a later inspired editor, the book is a unity and was composed by the so-called 'pessimist'. It is unnecessary to postulate the existence of the two glossators of the multiple-authorship theory, because (a) as will be seen from the commentary the passages given above under (ii), with the exception of 7:20, do not, when rightly understood, break up their context, and (b) it will be seen from a correct understanding of the argument of Ecclesiastes that the sentences given under (iii) above do not contradict the context. Ecclesiastes denies that a divine retribution of the kind taught by the traditional or received Jewish doctrine exists. But his belief in God postulates a divine retribution for God's justice demands that he intervene in judgement. And if, as Ecclesiastes is convinced, this judgement is a certainty, it is hard to see why he should not have warned his readers to fear God.

The book of Eccles. marks a step forward in the development of the doctrine of retribution; the traditional theory of earthly rewards and punishments is weighed and found wanting, and men's minds are thereby directed away from transitory and unsatisfying goods to the expectation of more lasting and more substantial rewards. It points to the need of a fuller revelation of God's will and purpose for man. We who, though participants of that fuller revelation, are sometimes perplexed by the many anomalies and inconsistencies of life here below may well sympathize with those early Hebrews who in their sorrows and privations had no bright hope of a blissful immortality to sustain them.

b 2-11 Preface—The feverish activity of all creation, especially of man, is profitless and meaningless. Even granting that something tangible does result from all the labour of life, it is 'vanity'.—Vanity (Heb. hebel) means 'a breath' or 'a vapour', and 'vanity of vanities' is the Hebrew way of saying 'the merest breath'. 3. Under the sun: in the visible universe. 4. The earth remains unaffected by the labours of succeeding generations of inhabitants. 5. Returneth: panteth to his place where he ariseth. 6. The wind goes to the south and circles to the north, it circles, circles on its course, and on its circuits the wind returns. In 5-7 the writer, according to an ancient conception, views the earth as a flat disc resting on the waters of the Great Abyss, and crowned by the arched canopy of the sky. He pictures the sun as moving across the sky from east to west by day, and returning hurriedly eastwards beneath the earth by night. The wind he conceives as ever gyrating, presenting a series of endless repetitions. Finally, he represents the rivers as coming from the Great Abyss through fissures in the earth's surface and flowing into the sea, which in turn has an outlet to the Great Abyss, the source of all. 8. All things are toiling to weariness; no tongue can describe nor can eye or ear grasp all this wearisome toil. 9 ff. All activity has accomplished nothing new. One may, by way of challenge, point to some new phenomenon or some new gain, but all to no purpose. It has been before in past ages. It seems new to men because former things are soon buried in oblivion. So also the future shall not be remembered by still later generations.

c 12-II 26 Lessons from Experience in the Pursuit of Wisdom and Pleasure—Ecclesiastes speaks in the person of Solomon, who for the Hebrews was the ideal wise man and was, moreover, noted for his wealth and for his pleasure-seeking. He sets his mind (Heb. 'heart'; in Hebrew psychology the word 'heart' embraces the whole mind, feelings, will, and especially the intellect) to investigate the results of human activity, being guided in his investigations by the wisdom which he has. It is God who placed in man the desire to search out everything, but it is a painful pursuit because the desire cannot be satisfied. All the works of man are vanity and striving after wind (DV 'vexation of spirit'). Much knowledge, sense pleasures, and worldly goods are shortlived and empty. 14. 'Vanity' indicates the brevity and transitory character of earthly things, while 'striving after wind' indicates the fruitlessness of effort. 15. What is bent cannot be straightened, and a deficit cannot be counted as a whole. One cannot rectify the essential positive and negative defects of created beings. This is the first of many aphorisms quoted by the writer as already current. 16 ff. To acquire wisdom, he expends much labour, even toiling to study folly and madness (DV 'errors') in order to grasp more clearly their opposite, viz. wisdom. He arrives at the conclusion that no happiness results from wisdom. We should note that in later passages the writer praises wisdom. There is no real contradiction, however, for, while denying that wisdom is a real gain in itself, Ecclesiastes recommends it as a guiding principle of life's activities.

d II:1-11. He tries the more material pleasures of life and finds that they likewise are vanity and a striving after wind. He gives way to merriment and indulges in the pleasures of the table. To satisfy every wish, he has new and costly palaces built, vineyards and orchards planted, and reservoirs dug. He surrounds himself with a retinue of servants; raises fine herds and flocks; gets tribute from subject kings; amasses great wealth; employs the best musicians; keeps in his harem many concubines. When, however, he turns to contemplate his delights and the toil they cost him, he finds nothing solid, nothing by way of profit. 2. I said of laughter, it is mad: and of mirth, what does it do? (i.e. what use is it). 3. I sought in my heart to pamper my flesh with wine, and, while guiding my heart with wisdom, to lay hold on folly till I could see what was good for the children of men to do, etc. Folly is practised not for its own sake but under the guidance of wisdom in order to learn its value from experience. 7a. And had home-born slaves (DV 'a great family'): there were two classes of slaves, viz. those born and reared in the master's house, and those bought or taken captive in war. 8. The words rendered 'cups and vessels', etc. in DV are obscure and probably indicate concubines. The DV (following Vg) derives the two words of the Hebrew text from the Aramaic root šdā 'to pour out'. 12-17. Ecclesiastes pauses here to compare wisdom and folly on their practical side. Wisdom has a superiority over folly, because it is a light which enables man to see not only the vanity of folly but also the insufficiency of wisdom itself. Yet what use is this when the same fate, viz. death and oblivion, overtakes both the wise man and the fool? Life with its toils seems to no purpose. 12b is out of place and should follow 18 below. 14b. And I learned that one fate befalls them all. 15b. And why was I then over-wise? (DV 'what doth it avail me', etc.). 18, 12b, 19 ff. Ecclesiastes recounts another reason why he hates his labours. There is no guarantee that improvements made by a wise man will last, since his successor is likely to act like previous less wise rulers. From the thought expressed in 16, viz. that because the wise man must die his toil is vain, Ecclesiastes goes on to say that even the good he has done may not last but be undone by his successor. This shows the vanity of labour. 12b. For what will the man do who comes after the king? what they have done formerly (i.e. that which men have done before). 19. At death the fruits of his toil will pass to an heir who has not laboured for them, and who, moreover, may be a fool and riotously squander them. 20. Therefore I abandoned my heart to despair for all the labours in which I had toiled under the sun. He looks back despairingly at the absence of any satisfying gain from his labours. 24-26. Practical advice (see § 376j). Enjoyment, fleeting and incapable of satisfying all man's desires though it be, may be experienced both in labour itself and in the fruits of labour. This present enjoyment men should take, for it is God's gift to man. The writer connects 'eating and drinking' with 'labour', and speaks of enjoyment as the gift of God. His advice is thereby far removed from that of epicureans, for whom a slothful self-indulgence is the summum bonum. We are not, however, to expect from Ecclesiastes the perfect morality of the New Dispensation. 25. Who can eat or have delight apart from him? (DV 'as I'). This reading is that of LXX, Syr. and Jer. 26. There is no reference here to the old Jewish doctrine of temporal retribution. It is simply the general law of God's giving that the morally good man is enriched still more with God's gifts of wisdom, knowledge and peace of mind. The sinner, on the contrary, loses God's favours, and is frequently given worldly cares the fruit of which will eventually be inherited by the good man. This (viz. the labour of the sinner) also is vanity and a striving after wind (DV 'a fruitless solicitude of mind').

III 1-17 The Divine Plan and Man's Inability to comprehend It—The circumstances and events of life form part of a divine plan, but since this plan is for man inscrutable he rarely orders his life in conformity with its ordinances. Each event is appropriate in its season (DV 'good in its time' 11a), but man cannot be sure that he has found the right season, ignorant as he is of the divine purpose. Moreover God has placed in man's heart the desire to grasp as one whole the successive and varying events of life (DV 'the world'; Heb. ôlām) which form part of God's plan. Man, however, can see them only according as they appear, and hence disjointed and unconnected. The only course is to follow the practical advice given above in 2:24-26. The works of God are permanent (in the sense that each obeys fixed laws) and complete. God made them so, that man, contemplating the immutable ordinances of the Governor of the universe, should 377f reverence him. And, a further point, there are corruptions in civil administration and men thereby suffer. But God, in his own good time, will right all wrongs, for he has fixed a time for every concern and for every work. 12. The words 'to do well' have not the ethical sense that they have in 7:21. They are to be understood rather as a synonym of rejoicing, i.e. to do oneself well; we find a similar use of lôb, 'good', in the same context in the following verse and elsewhere. 14. Man cannot alter the arrangements of Divine Providence with reference to human actions (cf. 3:1-8). 15. God's works are of an everlasting sameness. 17b. for he has fixed (reading sâm for sâm which means 'there') a time for every concern and for every work.

378a 18-23 Man compared with the Beasts—God wishes to convince man of his insignificance. Human observation shows that man is similar to the beast. What happens to man happens likewise to the beast, each dies. Man and beast have one spirit. At death the bodies of both man and beast return to dust. What of the spirit after death? 21. Who knows whether man's spirit goes up and the beast's spirit goes down? The writer sees that there is another view but does not accept it. This statement is sometimes taken to be a denial of the spirituality and immortality of the human soul. Many commentators explain it as follows. Man, according to the Semitic notion, was composed of three elements (trichotomy), body, soul, and breath of life (Heb. bâsar, nepes, and ruah). In the statement under consideration there is question not of the soul but rather of the breath of life. Against this view, however, there seems to be no clear evidence in the Bible for the existence of a trichotomy. There is no real distinction between soul and breath of life. The two words are interchanged in the same passage, correspond to each other in parallel passages, and receive the same attributes. Hence both words indicate one and the same soul as opposed to the body (cf. Prat, St Paul, 1913, II 73-9). The words sometimes differ not really but conceptually, the word ruah being used to emphasize the immaterial, spiritual aspect of the soul, while nepes is used of the soul as united with the body. Thus nepes suggests the soul regarded as sentient, ruah the soul regarded as intellectual. If Ecclesiastes held the theory of trichotomy we should not expect him to use ruah but nepes of the soul of the beast. In the above statement, therefore, ruah means the soul as opposed to the body. The true interpretation of the passage depends on the time and circumstances of the author which have been discussed in the Introduction.

b The accepted Jewish teaching of the time spoke of the souls of the dead as going down to Sheol, which was conceived as located in the bowels of the earth. Ecclesiastes has heard of the view held by a sect called the Essenes who, following the Greek teaching of Plato and others, maintained that souls 'when they are set free from the bonds of the flesh, then, as released from a long bondage, rejoice and mount upwards' (Jos BJ 2, 8, 11, ed. Whiston). They held, therefore, that the souls of men go upwards to God after death. But Jewish religious authorities have not yet accepted the new doctrine, and so Ecclesiastes does not admit it. At the same time he does not call it a false doctrine, and later on (12:7) he seems to accept it. There is no reason to deny a progress in his thought on this matter. There is, therefore, no direct reference to the immortality of the human soul, which in both views, viz. that of the accepted Jewish teaching and that of the new doctrine, survives after death; the reference is rather to the destination of the human soul. 22. The result of the writer's meditations—present enjoyment is best; for man, being ignorant of the principles of the divine administration, cannot know the order in which future events will unfold themselves.

c IV 1-16 Reflections on Oppression, Envy, Miserliness, High Position—In all four sections of this passage the writer includes a contrast, the oppressed and the unborn (1-3), the striver and the idler (4-6), the solitary miser and two or three in co-operation (7-12), the old foolish king and the young wise king (13-16). 378c

1-3. Ecclesiastes states that inhumanity and oppression make life not worth living. 4-6. The striver and the idler are compared to the advantage of the idler. The striver's efforts are spoiled by the jealousy of his neighbour. The expression 'he eateth his own flesh' means that he becomes thin through not having sufficient food. One sees especially in eastern towns idlers who loll about in indolence content with a little food. (The word 'saying' of 5 is to be omitted with the MT and LXX.) The vanity of life is shown by the fact that the strivers who should fare better than the idlers often fare worse relatively, in the sense that their efforts remain barren and unrewarded by happiness while idlers make no efforts. Hence, one handful of rest is better than two handfuls of toil and fruitless effort (6). Ecclesiastes does not recommend idleness but merely shows the vanity of toil when as often labour is without its reward. 7-12. The writer contemplates the insatiable striving of the lone and kinless miser to amass wealth, and turns to show by illustrations the advantages of pulling harmoniously together in a spirit of companionship and co-operation. 13-16. Better than an old but foolish king who will no longer accept advice is the youthful but wise man who, with wisdom as his sole advantage, overcame the initial disadvantages of youthfulness, poverty and imprisonment—evidence of his intrinsic worth—and rose to the highest position in the land. This wise young man began to reign as the popular hero, but, in a very short time, even he—a wise king—lost his popularity. The lesson of the whole passage is that wisdom even when it obtains the greatest success is still vanity and a striving after wind because its fruits do not last. 18b. Who knows not to accept advice any more. 14. For out of prison he (the youth of 13) came forth to reign; yea, even in his kingdom he was born poor. 15. I saw all the living that walk under the sun with the second (namely) the youth that stood up in his stead. 16. 'All that were before him': all in front of whom he was. He is pictured as marching at their head.

17-V 6 Counsels concerning Proper Worship—Reference d is made to worship in general (4:17), prayer (5:1 f.), and the fulfilment of vows (5:3 ff.).

17a. Watch thy step (DV 'Keep thy foot') when thou goest to the Temple. The words have a moral sense. 17b. Obedience is more acceptable to God than the sacrifice of evil-doers. Ecclesiastes condemns not sacrifice nor ritual but sacrifice offered without the proper dispositions (cf. Ps 49). 5:1. Undue haste and excess in words at prayer are condemned. The great gulf which separates us from God should inspire us with reverence. 2. As a mind much occupied with business cares occasions dreams, so a thoughtless fool utters verbal prayers lacking in sincerity and reality. 3 ff. The writer warns the reader that vows, once they are uttered, are to be performed without delay (cf. Deut 23:21-23). He also warns the reader against uttering a vow which he will not duly perform, for he thereby deliberately sins (cf. Deut 23:21-23). We should note that, generally speaking, a vow had to be supplemented in due time by the presentation of a thank-offering in the Temple. This involved great expense and, it seems, some of the contemporaries of Ecclesiastes sought to evade the offering of the sacrifice. Ecclesiastes warns them, in particular, against representing to the pries' (DV 'angel') who offers sacrifices that the vow was inadvertently uttered. A vow uttered without advertence constituted, indeed, a sin of inadvertence (DV 'there is no providence'), but the sacrifice required to expiate it was not costly (cf. Num 15:27 ff.). Ecclesiastes declares that God will be angry with him who utters a vow in connexion with his service and then lies saying that the vow was inadvertently made. 6. For in a multitude of dreams and of words there are many vanities: fear God!

V 7-VII 1 The Greed of State Officials and the Vanity of Wealth—5:7. One is not to wonder at the oppression 379a 379a of the poor, for there are many officials, high and low, who seek to enrich themselves. 8. And the profit of the land is for all (i.e. the avaricious officials of 7), a king is served in view of land. Service is given not out of loyalty but solely in the hope of aggrandizement. 9. Wealth is unsatisfying. 10. With the increase of a man's riches comes an increase in the number of retainers whom he must support, and the rich man's only advantage is the sight of his riches. 11. Anxiety to increase wealth and worry lest it be diminished cause sleeplessness. 12 ff. Suppose furthermore that through a reverse of fortune he loses his money, his heir is left destitute, and at death he has not even the satisfaction of having done well in life. He has stinted himself to amass riches, lived in misery, and gained nothing save mere wind. 17 ff. The writer, as before (cf. 2:24; 3:12 f., 22), counsels present enjoyment—such as it is—of the fruits of labour, such enjoyment and the capacity to enjoy being God's gifts to man. He who takes the joys of each day as they come will not worry himself with speculations as to what the future has in store for him. 6:1 ff. A rich man may lack the ability to enjoy what life offers; he may be denied by God the capacity to enjoy; he may not have even the satisfaction of leaving his possessions to children of his own. Even though he should have a numerous progeny and attain to a ripe old age, yet if he lacks the capacity to experience enjoyment, feels dissatisfaction, and receives no burial, he is worse off than the premature, still-born child. 4. For it (i.e. the untimely born) comes in vanity and departs in darkness, and its name is covered in darkness (i.e. is not announced). 5a. Moreover, it (the untimely born) has not seen the sun, and thereby has escaped all the trials which are the normal experience of life on earth. 6. Yea, if the rich man has lived very many years and has not enjoyed his life, what advantage is there in a long life? There is but one end to all men, i.e. Sheol, whence they do not return. 7. Man labours to get enjoyment but he is never satisfied. 8. The wise man together with the fool, the poor man who knows how to live prudently (lit. 'to walk before his fellow-men'; DV 'to go thither where there is life'), all find life's enjoyment unsatisfying. 9. Present enjoyment, fleeting and unsubstantial though it be, is better than yearning after the unattainable. 10. Whatever is, its name has been already called (i.e. it already existed, cf. 1:10) and that which is man is known: he cannot contend, etc. The first clause states that the world in general does not change. The second clause means that what man was yesterday he still is and always will be. Man is powerless to foresee or modify the course of events; he can never alter the ordinances of the divine government of the universe, and thus is unable to attain all his desires. 11. Expostulation with God is worse than useless. To multiply words is to multiply vanities and brings no advantage to man. Vg misinterprets the last member of this verse and attaches it incorrectly to the first member of the next verse (7:1a). 7:1. This verse gives an added reason why it is futile to dispute with God. Man knows not what is best for him to do during the days of his life which flits like a shadow. For this a knowledge of the future would be necessary.

• VII 2-23 Rules of Right Conduct and Practical Aphorisms—2. A good name (Heb. šēm) is better than precious ointment (Heb. šemen). Note the play on words. The day of death which brings relief from life's sufferings (cf. 4:2) is better than the day of birth. 3 ff. Seriousness rather than frivolity should be cultivated. Serious thought on life's trials and sorrows builds up character. A deathbed scene reminds man that he too must die. Trouble purifies the heart. 4a. Sorrow (not 'anger') is better than laughter. 7b-8. And this also is vanity, that exactions turn a wise man into a fool, and presents corrupt the heart. Extortion drives a man to do foolish things through indignation. 9 ff. Hasty anger and foolish talk are condemned. We should be exceedingly cautious in speech; we should be patient, not hasty and arrogant. 12 f. Wisdom together with a patrimony is good; they are an especially profitable combination. Both are a defence against life's ills, but the excellency of wisdom is that it preserves the life of him who possesses it. 14 f. Man's attempts to change God's handiwork are futile, so he is to enjoy the prosperity God gives, and in the day of adversity consider that God's method with regard to the distribution of adversity and prosperity is to balance one against the other, so that man may find no fault with him. 14. Consider the work of God: for who can make straight what He has made crooked? 15. In the day of prosperity be glad, and in the day of adversity consider: God has even made the one side by side with the other, to the end that man should not find out anything after him. 16. The observations of Ecclesiastes contradict the accepted Jewish doctrine that a just man may hope for length of days (cf. Ps 90:16) and that a wicked man will be cut off prematurely (cf. Ps 36:10). 17 f. In interpreting these two verses we should note that the currents of ideas from which the Pharisaic rigorists and the Sadducean libertines sprang existed already in the time of Ecclesiastes, and that righteousness consisted in the observance of the Law. In 17 the writer warns against the excessive legalism of those early Pharisees, and in 18 he issues a warning against people who go to the other extreme and reject regulations of the Mosaic legislation. In 16^a above Ecclesiastes remarks that the wicked man lives on. Here he states that excess in wickedness will probably shorten life. 19. Do whatever your hand findeth to do without being over-scrupulous, for if you fear God you will succeed in everything. It is good that thou shouldst take hold of this (DV 'the just' is incorrect); yea, also from that withdraw not thy hand: for he that fears God shall come successfully out of everything. 20. Real strength and support in life is found in wisdom rather than in power and influence. This verse interrupts its context and originally may have followed 13. 21. Verily, there is not a righteous man upon earth, that does good and sins not. No man, however pious, is entirely righteous (cf. 3 Kg 8:46; Job 15:14 f.; 25:5 f.). 22 f. These verses give a new rule of conduct suggested by 21. Don't be too curious to know everything that is said, lest you hear your servant cursing you. Your conscience knows that you have spoken ill of others. Not being perfect yourself, you are not to expect perfection from others. 24-30a Intense Search after Wisdom in its Fullness brings Disappointment—24a. All this I have tried by wisdom; all his experiences above related he subjected to an examination, using whatever wisdom he had, for he sought to increase his natural wisdom by understanding the scheme of the universe and the divine government thereof. 25. The real nature of things escapes us: it is profound, exceedingly profound; who shall find it? 26. I applied myself earnestly to know and to search out, and to seek wisdom and the reason for things, and to know that wickedness is folly, and that foolishness is madness. 27. The problem which especially exercised the attention of Ecclesiastes was the existence of such wickedness in the universe which God created and governs. And I find a thing more bitter than death, the woman who is a snare, her heart nets and her hands fetters. Seeing that the writer is here using the terms (viz. snare, nets, fetters) of the descriptions of the harlot given in Prov 5 and 7, he must be referring to this one class of women only. He who is good before God shall escape from her, but the sinner shall be taken by her. The escape is attributed not to God's action, 'but to the legitimate and, so to say, natural result of the man's previous life. And so in the contrary case of the sinner' (Williams, 87). 28-30a. His diligent search after a reasonable explanation (DV 'the account') of things in general is a failure. As regards human beings, the appalling conditions of the period and place of his investigations led him to observe that perfect men are few, while perfect women are still fewer. But—this much he knows—the degeneracy is not to be attributed to God; the fault lies with man who uses his free-will to introduce into life corrupting complications (DV 379e 'he hath entangled himself with an infinity of questions'), and so mars the divine plan.

7:30b. Who is as the wise man? and who knows the solution of any question? This verse belongs more correctly, as in MT, to the first verse of ch 8. 8:1. A man's wisdom causes his face to shine, and the hardness of his face is changed. 2. O obey the king's command and that on account of the oath of God (i.e. the oath of fealty exacted by the king). 3 f. Do not rashly resign office; do not be disloyal by engaging in a conspiracy. The king will tolerate no opposition; his word is final. 5. He who keeps the command of the king (or, according to some commentators, the commandments of God) shall experience no ill. The wise man knows to bide his time and await judgement (DV 'answer'). 6 f. There is a time and judgement (DV 'opportunity') for every business. Truly, the misery of man is great upon him because he knows not that which shall be, because how it shall be, who can tell him? The nature and manner of the judgement in which justice will be done are unknown to him: that justice will be executed he knows. 8. In the meantime it is consoling to know that the tyrant cannot live always. He must die; no discharge from the obligation of fighting is possible (DV 'neither is he suffered to rest') in the war against death; the wickedness of the tyrant will not save him.

b VIII 9-15 Contrast of Doctrine and Fact—Ecclesiastes declares that the received Jewish doctrine that the righteous man prospers and the wicked man suffers is contradicted by the stern facts of life. He firmly believes that God will punish wickedness and reward righteousness, but beyond asserting that the received doctrine of retribution does not correspond with facts he does not proceed to the obvious conclusion. The doctrine of retribution hereafter had not yet been revealed. It often happens that a just man suffers and a wicked man prospers. Such being the case, all that is left for man is to take what pleasure is given by God, who has so arranged the world. This enjoyment should accompany him in his labour all the days of his life. 9. Ecclesiastes, when considering life, has seen a man using his power to hurt his fellow-man (DV 'to his own hurt' is incorrect). 10. And then I saw the wicked buried; they had frequented the holy place, and they were praised in the city who had acted thus. Ecclesiastes has seen the wicked receive decent burial (cf. 6:3), the wicked who during their lifetime did not hesitate to enter the Temple to worship God. Those ungodly people were even praised. 12. Inasmuch as a sinner does evil a hundred times, and prolongs his days, surely also I know that it shall be well with those who fear God, who fear before Him. 13. But it shall not be well with the wicked—neither shall he prolong his days which are as a shadow—because he does not fear before God. The clause 'neither . . . shadow' is to be treated as a parenthesis which refers back to the clause 'and prolongs his days' of the previous verse, to which it seems at first sight in direct contradiction. The parenthesis, however, means that the wicked man shall not in reality prolong his days, for they still flit away, as do the days of all men (cf. 7:1), like a shadow.

c 16-IX 10 God's Providence is Inscrutable—When Ecclesiastes sought to understand the travail of daily life—for man works incessantly—he saw that no one, however wise, can give a satisfactory explanation of what is happening 'under the sun'. The righteous and the wise and their works are in God's hands for him to deal with at his sole discretion. But no one knows whether God loves him or hates him, because happiness and adversity, coming as they do to the righteous and the wicked alike, are no indication of how a man stands with God. Everything (whether adversity or prosperity) in front of man (i.e. which man will experience) is vanity (DV 9:2a, 'are kept uncertain'). That things happen alike to both good and bad has the effect of favouring the development of evil and misconduct (DV 'contempt') in men while they live, and afterwards they go to Sheol, where they will no more participate in the activities that make up life on earth. Man is here and now to take enjoyment in and by his labour and to manifest exteriorly his interior contentment, for such is God's will. Moreover he is to engage in physical and mental activities while life lasts, for the activities of earth are absent from the abode of the dead. 9:2a. The reading given above involves a slight change in the Hebrew (cf. Barton, p 158). 7b. Thy works—with special reference to eating and drinking—have God's approval, for he has so arranged the world that this is the only thing you can do.

IX 11-17 Reward for Work is not guaranteed and the Value of Wisdom is not recognized—11 f. Given the apparent conditions for success, good results do not necessarily follow; there are still the elements of time (cf. 3:1-8) and chance (e.g. accident, misfortune, luck) to be considered; death may come unexpectedly and spoil a well-laid plan. 13 ff. Ecclesiastes gives a concrete example. A poor but wise man delivered a city by his wisdom but went unrewarded. All the apparent conditions for the gaining of a reward were present, yet his request for recognition (DV 9:16 'his words') went unheeded.

17-X:3 Proverbial Sayings about Wisdom—The insertion of these sayings was suggested by 9:15a. 17. The words of the wise (uttered) in quietness are heard more than the cry of a leader among fools. 18b. But one fault will ruin much good. 10:1. This verse illustrates 9:18b. Dying flies cause the ointment of the apothecary to putrify and ferment; so a little folly outweighs (Heb. yāqār, but here given the meaning it has in Aramaic) wisdom and honour. 2. The intelligence of a wise man is on the side of the most important of his endeavours, that of a fool on the side of the less important. 3. Yea even when a fool walks on the way his intelligence fails him, and he declares to every man his folly.

X 4-7 The Cultivation of Meekness—These verses counsel meekness in face of the capriciousness of rulers which leads them to promote the wrong people. 4b. Because meekness leaves great offences undone: both parties will be saved from serious faults.

8-15 The Advantage of Wisdom and some of the Results of Folly—8-11. Many activities involve risk and it is only wisdom to be prepared for contingencies. 10. If the axe becomes blunt and one does not whet the edge, then must one use more strength, but wisdom is advantageous for success. A wise man would sharpen the axe, thus saving himself much physical effort and accomplishing his task more successfully. 11. Mere proficiency brings no advantage to a man unless he uses it in good time. If the serpent bite before it is charmed, then there is no advantage for the charmer. 'Charmer': lit. 'the owner of the tongue', which the Syr. and LXX rightly render by 'the charmer'—the snake-charmer uses his voice to effect the charm. Vg understood the word to mean 'one who backbites'. 12a. Win favour (DV 'are grace'). 12b. Shall ruin him (DV 'shall throw him down headlong'). 13b. Madness (DV 'error'). 14. A fool talks fluently of the future as though it could be foreseen by man. 15. The labour of the fool wears him, for he had not the understanding to migrate to a city. The true interpretation of this verse seems to lie in the distinction between the country people and some of the city people. In Palestine all the former have to labour for their daily bread, while in the cities there are always some who do no work but still manage to live (cf. 4:5). The country fool has to work for a living, the city fool gets it without working.

16-20 Reflexions on Rulers—16. Woe to thee, O land, when thy king is a slave (DV 'a child') and thy princes eat in the morning. The morning is a most valuable time for the eastern, who rises early to get work done before the intense heat from noon till evening. The 381b state is in an evil plight when its princes feast so unseasonably. 17a. Happy art thou, O land, when thy king is a noble by birth (DV 'noble'). 18f. When the rafters supporting the roof are neglected they give way and cause leakage (DV 'drop through'). So shall the fabric of the state crumble because of the sloth and dissipation of its rulers who are wealthy enough to indulge in all sorts of pleasure. 20. The subject's safety lies, however, in silent submission to authority.

e XI 1-6 Encouragement of Prudent Enterprise—1-2. Ecclesiastes commends a spirit of commercial enterprise like that of exporting corn, for no loss will be incurred by the venture. Man is to be prudent, however, and divide the venture between several ships, for it is unwise to put all one's eggs in one basket; one does not know what evil may happen upon earth. 3. The thought of this verse is joined to that which precedes it by the mention of 'evil' in 2b. There will inevitably be some evils (i.e. calamities) upon the earth, for natural causes produce natural effects and man is powerless to control them. 4. Man, nevertheless, is not to stand hesitant waiting until success is absolutely assured. He who waits for ideal conditions will get nothing done. 5. God's works are known to man as little as the way of the wind (DV 'spirit'), or the formation of the bones in the womb of the pregnant (cf. Ps 138:15). 6. Man is, therefore, to use every opportunity, for he cannot know which effort will turn out well.

d 7-XII 1 Man is to enjoy Life while Youth lasts, being Mindful, however, of God and his Judgement—7f. 'The light is sweet and the sun is pleasant to behold. If man should live many years let him rejoice in them all', and the more so for remembering that many darksome days are to follow in the evening of life. All the days of life are vanity (i.e. a mere breath). 9. Let youth be cheerful, but let there be present that which shall check excess, viz. the knowledge that one's deeds will be weighed in the balance of divine justice. 10. Let man shun all trouble (DV 'anger') and bodily ill (DV 'evil') for the heyday of life is soon past (lit. 'is vanity'). 12:1. Finally let man reverence his Creator in the days of youthful vigour before advancing years bring bodily and mental inactivity.

e XII 2-7 A Figurative and somewhat Enigmatical Description of Old Age—The most widely held opinion among critics maintains that in 2-5a we have figurative descriptions of the failing bodily members of the old man. There is, however, wide divergence among these critics in the application of these figures to definite parts of the body. We shall give what we consider the most representative applications.

2. With advancing and clouding old age life loses its brightness (i.e. its charm). 3. Hands ('keepers of the house') tremble, legs ('strong men') become bent, teeth ('grinders') are few and feeble, eyes ('those that look through the latticed windows') lose their sight. 4. Ears ('doors in the street') fail to catch the sounds of others' voices (the sound of the grinding), the song of the bird ('the voice of the bird') or the sound of music ('the daughters of music'). 5. The old man suffers from giddiness ('he fears high things') and from timidity ('he is afraid in the way'); he has white hair ('the almond tree in blossom'), a halting gait (the grasshopper drags itself along), a languid palate (the caper berry is made ineffectual). This explanation of the passage requires the following readings: the clause 'one shall rise up at the voice of the bird' in 4 is to be emended to read 'the voice of the bird is silent', changing u'yāqūm lē, 'rises up at', to u'yiddōm, 'is silent'. In 5 the reading 'the almond tree blossoms' is that of the versions, while that of MT, with the verb pointed as impf., niph'al, is 'the almond tree is cast aside'. The reading 'the caper berry is made ineffectual' is got by reading the passive form of the verb. Read thus, the clause may also mean 'the caper shrub is broken'.

The whole passage 2-5a may also be interpreted as an allegory of a thunderstorm, a terrifying phenomenon in the east, to express the alarm, desolation and gloom that follow the death of a member of a household. The gathering, bursting and wake of destruction are described. As the storm gathers over an eastern city the light is darkened, the thick clouds pile up and cut off brightness. 3. The lightning flashes and the thunder peals, sending terror into the hearts of all, of the police who guard the mansions of the wealthy, of the strong men of the city, of the women whose hands have forgotten their task of grinding, and into the darkened faces of those who peep timidly through their latticed windows. 4. When the storm breaks, doors are shut against the wind and rain, the sound of the grinding is hardly heard, the birds are silent, and merry-makers are terrorized into silence. 5a. Men are afraid of the awful majesty of the storm (of that which is high) and there are terrors in the street. In the wake of the storm lies the battered, torn earth; the almond tree is cast aside, the caper shrub is broken, and even the least thing that moves, the tiny grasshopper, has felt the power of the storm. The sequence of thought in the whole passage, viz. 2-8, is: Remember thy Creator (understood from 12:1) before old age or death (2-5a); because man is going to his eternal home (5b); before the silver cord be snapped, etc.

6. The broken vessels refer to the dissolution of the body regarded as the container of the soul. 'Before the silver cord [from which the bowl was suspended] be snapped (emend Heb. root to ntq), and the golden bowl be broken, and the pitcher', etc. 7. The soul goes back to God (cf. note on 3:21).

8-14 Epilogue eulogizing Ecclesiastes and summarizing his Teaching—This passage is probably an addition made by the editor (cf. § 376n). 9. And further, because Ecclesiastes was wise, he still taught the people knowledge (i.e. he was not satisfied with having written this book), and he tested, investigated, and arranged many proverbs. 10. Ecclesiastes sought to give his work an attractive form, and to write with sincerity words of truth. 11. Pödechard, 477, translates: The words of the wise are as goads, and as nails firmly fixed holders of provisions; they (i.e. the words of the wise) are given from one shepherd. The nails are those fixed in a wall on which are hung baskets containing food. The words of the wise stimulate to action, and they sustain; all wisdom comes ultimately from one shepherd, God. 12. One is to be contented with the words of the wise—as for more than these, my son, be warned. One can save oneself the weariness of much reading. 13f. The editor sums up the teaching of the book: Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is every man (DV 'all man'), i.e. 'this is expected of, and can be accomplished in, every man' (so Williams, 163). 14. This verse gives the reason for fearing God: For God shall bring every work into judgement, concerning every hidden thing (DV 'every error'), whether it be good or whether it be evil.

c Title—The full Hebrew title is 'The Song of Songs, which is Solomon's'. The first half is a periphrastic Hebrew way of expressing the superlative, hence the meaning is 'the best of songs'; cf. 'holy of holies' = most holy. It is indeed a most beautiful poem both for its lyrical inspiration and rich imagery as well as for the loftiness of its meaning. The second half of the title is generally considered by modern scholars as a literary device whereby the poem is attributed to Solomon in the same manner as the book of Wisdom is attributed to him, though written at a much later date.

d Canonically and Place in the Canon—The canonicity of Cant has always been recognized by the Church. Theodore of Mopsuestia, who rejected its spiritual meaning and probably also its inspiration, had no followers (L. Dennefeld, Der alttestamentliche Kanon der Antiochenischen Schule (BS), xiv, 1909, 47). Among the Jews there were some doubts in the 1st cent. A.D., but these were dispelled in the Synod of Jabne (c. A.D. 100), chiefly by the authority of R. Aqiba who said: 'All the Hagiographa are holy, but the Canticle is most holy' (cf. Mishna, Yadayim 3, 5).

e In the Hebrew Canon it forms part of the Hagiographa, the third division of the canonical books. In our printed editions of MT it is the first of the 5 Megilloth or 'Scrolls', i.e. Canticle, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther. The Alexandrine translators, however, arranged the books according to their literary character and so included Cant among the poetical books. In Vg too it is reckoned with the poetical books.

Contents and Analysis—Canticle is a love-song in which two young shepherds praise each other's beauty and express their mutual love and desire for an indissoluble union. The analysis is difficult because the sense of certain passages and the nexus between the several parts are not always apparent. Those who hold that Cant is a drama divide the poem into acts and scenes according to their way of representing the development of the action. On the contrary, those who reject the unity of the poem make of it a collection of songs varying in number according to their subjective criteria.

Some sections are easily distinguishable by the recurrence of the refrain or by their opening words. On the grounds of these criteria we propose the following division:

2:8-3:5, the bride is invited to the fields; in the evening they return to their homes; the bride is restless until she again finds her beloved.

3:6-5:1, the pomp of a royal pageant; the bridegroom is enraptured by his bride's graceful charm and beauty and rejoices in her company.

5:2-6:2, while the bride is on her bed, the bridegroom comes unexpectedly; when she rises to open he has vanished; she goes out in search of him; description of the bridegroom; the joy of their union.

8:5-7, the two lovers are inseparably united.

8:8-14, appendix.

Literary Form—Although it is universally admitted that Cant is a love poem, there is no agreement as to the manner in which the subject is treated. This is a brief exposition of the different views:

(1) Cant is a collection of separate love-songs having no other link but the common subject, so *J. G. Herder, Lieder der Liebe, die ältesten und schönsten aus dem Morgenlande, Leipzig, 1778, 89-106; *M. Jastrow, The Song of Songs, being a collection of love lyrics of Ancient Palestine, London, 1922; *H. W. Robinson, The Old Testament: its making and meaning, London, 1937, 161 f.; *H. H. Rowley, The Interpretation of the Song of Songs, JTS 38 (1937) 358.

(2) Cant is a collection of popular nuptial songs that were sung during the nuptial week, so J. B. Bossuet, A. Calmet. *J. G. Wetzstein tried to find a support for this explanation in the marriage customs of Hauran in Syria. This theory was further developed by *K. Budde.

(3) Cant is a drama. The dramatic theory has been proposed in two forms: (i) A shepherd girl is taken away from her home by Solomon and made his wife, so *Frz Delitzsch (1875), F. Kaulen (1899). (ii) The shepherd girl is taken away by the king, but she remains faithful to her shepherd lover to whom she l (4) Cant is made up of lyrical dialogues alternating with monologues, with a slight dramatic movement, so the majority of Catholic interpreters.

m (5) Cant consists of seven short poems running parallel to each other. There is no development of action, but only a progressive movement within the several poems. The general plan of each poem is : the yearning of one part for the other, mutual praises and the joy of their union. They are like seven penitential Psalms which, with a variety of literary devices, develop the same ideas of sin, repentance and pardon, D. Buzy in RB, 49 (1940) 161-94 and in his commentary on Cant in Pirot-Clamer La Sainte Bible, 1946, 290.

n The first of these theories, in the form proposed by Herder, Jastrow and Robinson is certainly untenable. Throughout the whole poem there is unity of style and purpose, and this points to unity of authorship. But there is nothing against Rowley's explanation in so far as he admits unity of authorship and a certain development of the theme. (2) has no sufficient basis. Though love is considered in relation to marriage, there is nothing suggesting that we are assisting at a wedding. The dramatic theory is losing favour with critics. There is hardly any action in Cant, the dialogues and the change of scene are not enough to give it a dramatic movement. (4), though entirely acceptable, is rather vague and does not convey an adequate idea of the structure of the poem. The dialogue form is secondary. Even the development of the plot seems to be somewhat exaggerated. There is much to be said in favour of Buzy's theory, but the textual excisions and transpositions to which he has to resort have no justification except his own theory.

o Cant is a collection of love-songs composed by one writer with one definite purpose. Love is represented with a view to marriage. The several songs are as many tableaux or episodes in the story of two lovers. A certain development corresponding to the development of their love may be admitted, but whether the poem describes all the stages of love from its inception to its culmination in marriage remains undecided. The dialogue, monologues and the part played by the daughters of Jerusalem are poetical devices meant to give life to the descriptions and to the sentiments of the two lovers.

383a Systems of Interpretation—The most important problem in Cant is its meaning and interpretation. Apparently Cant is an erotic poem with or without a higher aim of describing love in its purest form or of extolling the excellence of monogamy and conjugal fidelity. This is the view prevailing among non-Catholic interpreters and we have no right to introduce any other sense unless we have solid reasons, and these reasons must be sought for not in the book itself but in other biblical books and in Tradition.

The Fathers of the Church were so strongly convinced of the spiritual meaning of Cant that they ignored the literal sense. The heterodox view of Theodore of Mopsuestia, who maintained that Cant celebrated Solomon's marriage with the Egyptian Princess, was condemned by the II Council of Constantinople (553); Mansi, Sacrorum Conc. Coll., ix, 225-7. The scriptural proof is provided by the writings of the prophets who very often represent the relation between Yahweh and Israel as that of husband and wife. Yahweh chose Israel for his Spouse, arrayed her with gold and silver and rich garments and made her renowned among the nations for her beauty and splendour (Ez 16:3-14; cf. also Is 54:6 ff.; 62:4 f.; Jer 2:2 'the love of thy betrothal'; Os 2:19 f.).

b There existed therefore a tradition representing Yahweh's relation to Israel as a marriage. This tradition is the strongest argument for admitting a higher and spiritual sense in Cant. In order to give a clear idea of the manner in which this higher sense is expressed and should be understood, a few preliminary remarks are necessary.

The literal proper sense, or the naturalistic interpretation, being excluded as contrary to the prophetic teaching and Tradition, there remain the allegorical, the typical and the parabolic interpretations. An allegory is a sustained metaphor or series of metaphors about the same subject, cf. Is. 5:1-6. All the details of the allegory have their own meaning. The parable is a fictitious but lifelike narrative composed to illustrate a fact or truth. The doctrine of the parable emerges from the narrative as a whole, not from its constituent parts, some of which may be mere embellishments without symbolical meaning. The essential difference between parable and allegory is that in the parable the two objects, the one illustrating and the other illustrated, are kept distinct and placed side by side, while in the allegory they are blended together and are represented as a single object. Sometimes parable and allegory run into each other and give rise to a mixed form, the parable mixed with allegoric elements. The typical sense differs widely from the allegorical. The latter is a sense understood and intended by the writer; the former is an additional sense intended by God and unknown to the writer except by revelation. The typical sense is always based upon the literal sense, proper or improper.

Of these, the typical interpretation does not seem to have a sound basis. A type may be a historical fact or person or an ideal one. The historical type of Cant is generally considered to be Solomon's marriage with Pharaoh's daughter (3 Kg 3:1); so Honorius of Autun (Expos. in Cant. PL 172, 347-494), Bossuet, Calmet. But there is no evidence in Scripture or Tradition that a marriage of a polygamous king is a type of the essentially monogamous union of Yahweh with Israel or of Christ with the Church. The ideal type is the conjugal union in its ideal form, as instituted by God (Gen 2:24), represented in a concrete form but without any reference to historical persons (Miller, 6 f.). It is a fictitious marriage, described as a real one and representing God's union with man. A similar view has been propounded by Pouget-Guitton (146 f.), Geslin (38-105), Chaine (in A. Robert-A. Tricot, Initiation biblique [1948] 175), who maintain that the sacred writer intended only to describe conjugal love and to inculcate the sanctity of marriage as instituted by God. Cant is, therefore, a moral lesson on the sanctity and indissolubility of marriage, and conjugal fidelity. Nothing more than that was meant by the writer. But in the mind of God, the primary author of Scripture, the conjugal union was to serve as a type of Christ's union with his Church and of his immense love for her. Cant represents in a parabolic form an ideal marriage foreshadowing Christ's union with the Church. The ideal-typical interpretation may be accepted, but it is doubtful whether the text provides solid ground for it. The writer indulges in his description of the two shepherds' love, their mutual yearning and admiration, but their union is passed over almost in silence. Although love is admittedly represented in view to marriage, and the two lovers are certainly married, the writer concentrates upon their love rather than on their marriage. If this is true, we can hardly understand how marriage can be the main object of Cant. But we can easily understand the writer's unwillingness to describe the happiness of married life if his object was really to symbolize God's love for man under the figure of human conjugal love.

In the parabolic interpretation Cant describes, in its literal sense, the love between two imaginary shepherds with a view to illustrating God's love for man (Tobac, 110). Its meaning must be sought in the book as a whole, not in the several details, some of which serve only to render the picture more lifelike.

In its strictest form generally adopted by the Fathers, the allegorical interpretation applies the whole description of the marriage to Christ and the Church, and tries to find a meaning for all such details as the hair, eyes, lips, etc., of the bride. This system has led 383f to the most varied, and sometimes fanciful, interpretations which are nothing else but pious accommodations. Some allegorical elements must, however, be recognized. The appellation of God as a shepherd is a familiar OT metaphor; cf. Ps 23:1; 80:1; Jer 31:10; Ez 34:11, 19; Zach 11:17. The designation of the shepherd-lover as dōdī 'my beloved', which occurs thirty times in Cant, recalls Is 5:1-6, an allegory in which the same word dōdī is used of Yahweh.

g As neither the parabolic nor the purely allegorical interpretation fully satisfies the exegetical requirements of the text, modern interpreters mostly prefer the mixed or parabolic-allegorical interpretation. Cant is essentially a parable placing side by side, as the Gospel parables, two facts, an imaginary and a real one, and illustrating the one by the other. It follows, according to the hermeneutical rules of parables, that many details must be considered as mere literary embellishments having no historical reality corresponding to them. It must be remarked also that although the parabolic-allegorical interpretation has been preferred to the typical-ideal, we do not deny that Cant teaches, at least implicitly, a moral lesson on the sanctity of marriage which was later raised to the dignity of a sacrament by Christ.

h We pass now to define the object and limits of this allegorical parable. Some interpreters as Nicholas de Lyra (†1340) and in recent times Joüon and Ricciotti, following in the steps of Jewish interpreters, explain Cant as an allegorical representation of Yahweh's dealings with Israel from the Exodus to the return from the Exile. Although a 'Judaic sense' must absolutely be admitted, the historico-allegorical interpretation has never been popular in Christian exegesis. In fact, it requires a great power of imagination to find a correspondence between the several literary features of Cant and Jewish history.

i Other interpreters, from Hippolytus to modern times, have applied the allegory to the union of Christ with the Church. The basis for such an interpretation is provided by the NT which describes the foundation of the Church as a nuptial feast (Mt 22:1-14) and Christ as the Bridegroom (Mt 9:15; cf. also Jn 3:29; 2 Cor 11:2; Eph 5:23-32; Apoc 21:9).

j This interpretation, which is called 'the Christian interpretation', must be taken as a development of the Judaic sense in order to be fully acceptable. In the plan of divine providence the election of Israel was a preparation for the establishment of the Church by Christ. The foundation of the Israelitic theocracy and that of the Church were not two independent events, but two successive stages in God's work of redemption. God's love for Israel foreshadowed Christ's love for his Church. If Cant, therefore, symbolizes Yahweh's love for Israel, it must necessarily symbolize also Christ's love for his Church. This is the fuller sense of Cant which, though not perceived by the Jewish reader, is certainly contained in it and intended by God. The two senses—Judaic and Christian—are two complementary senses forming together one sense and one interpretation which is that followed by the majority of Catholic exegetes.

k The Judaic aspect of this interpretation, however, requires to be defined more accurately. It is universally recognized that in the prophetic books Yahweh's relations to Israel are those of husband and wife. But in the earlier books Yahweh is represented as Israel's father and Israel as Yahweh's firstborn (Ex 4:22 f.). This image is further developed in Deut where Yahweh is described as a father carrying his son in his arms (1:31), educating him (8:5), and as the author of his existence (32:18); cf. also Os 11:1-14, etc. The marriage-figure originated with the prophets who, however, always represent Israel as a faithless wife divorced by her husband (Is 50:1; Jer 3:8; Ez 16:1-58; Os 2). There is not the slightest allusion to the first happy days of their marriage; Israel proved faithless from the very first day of her marriage (Ez 16:15; Os 9:10). There is no time from the Sinaitic alliance to the return from the Exile in which Israel could say of Yahweh 'He is mine and I am his'.

But Israel's infidelity and her repudiation by Yahweh were not to last for ever. After having atoned for her misbehaviour she would be taken up again by Yahweh and re-united with him by an eternal bond of love. This re-instatement of Israel is clearly foretold by the prophets (Is 49:14 f.; 54:6 ff.; Ez 16:59-63; Os 2:19 f.). It is this reconciliation or re-marriage of Yahweh to Israel, which is the object of Cant. (Buzy, Vivre et Penser, III, 1945, 77-90.)

An extension, or what may be called a consequential sense, of the allegorical interpretation is the ascetico-mystical interpretation which identifies the bridegroom as Christ and the bride as the faithful soul. This interpretation first proposed by Origen, became common in the Middle Ages with St Bernard as its chief representative. Closely related to it is the Mariological interpretation. Not only is the Virgin Mary the holiest of all the members of the Church, but she also concurred in the accomplishment of the mystical union of the Son of God with humanity. Special prominence to the Mariological interpretation is given by Cardinal Lépicier and Girotti in their respective commentaries. Of mediæval expositors Rupert of Deutz is one of the best.

Author and Date—Tradition has always attributed Cant to Solomon. The authority of the title, however, is not decisive as it is either a later addition or a literary artifice. The language bears marks of a later origin. But the strongest argument against Solomonic authorship is the marriage allegory which originated with Osee. Cant is therefore later than the 8th cent. B.C. If the subject of Cant is Israel's reconciliation with Yahweh, its date must be fixed at the end of the Exile or a little later. This is also confirmed by the anthological character of the poem (A. Robert, Vivre et Penser, III [1945] 192-213). There are no reasons for placing its composition as late as the Persian period.

I The Title—See § 382c. As the title forms part of ch 1 in MT, the numeration of verses is one verse in advance in respect to Vg and DV. For practical reasons we follow the latter.

I 1-II 7 First Song—The Bride longs for her Bridegroom, admires his beauty and rejoices at his presence.
1-3 The Bride yearning for her Beloved—1. The bride yearns for her beloved's caresses (DV breasts) which she values more than aught else. Wine here denotes all earthly pleasures, cf. Eccles 2:3. 2. Her lover is as attractive as the sweetest perfume; his name, i.e. all his person, is like a bottle of scented ointment which, when poured out, spreads its sweet fragrance abroad. His charms are irresistible. 3. Punctuate: Draw me after thee: let us run. The words: 'to the odour of thy ointments' are wanting in MT and have probably crept in from 2a. Enraptured by his loveliness she is resolved to follow him everywhere. The nexus between 3a and 3b is not apparent. Her lover was not a king. Was she abducted by the king? Is 'king' a nuptial title of the bridegroom? Some interpreters read an imperative: 'Take me, O king'. An excellent sense is obtained if MT is translated thus: 'If the king were to take me into his inner apartments, I should be glad and rejoice in thee and praise thy love more than the (royal) banquet'. In other words, she will never give her love to another, not even to the king himself; she is happy with her beloved; it is delightful to love him.

384c and to read instead of Solomon the name of a place or tribe such as Salma, near Cedar (Miller, Ricciotti), or Salom (Pouget-Guitton), or Salem for Jerusalem (Buzy). 5. She gives the cause of her dark complexion. She had to pass the long summer days guarding the vineyards, a hard task assigned to her by her malevolent brothers. Why she abandoned her work is not stated. Perhaps she sought a better opportunity of meeting her lover; see 6 f.

d 6-7 The Bride in search of her Lover—The bride desires to meet her lover. She is represented here as a shepherdess tending her flock in the vicinity of her beloved without knowing precisely the place where he grazes his flock or where he rests and waters it at noon. The dialogue expresses the intense passion of the shepherdess.

e 8-10 The Bridegroom's Praise of his Bride—The bride has found her lover who is fascinated by her beauty. 8. He compares her to a mare in Pharaoh's chariot. The point of comparison is the gorgeousness of the trappings of the royal mare, not the mare itself. 9. Her cheeks are beautiful with ear-rings, her neck with jewels. 10. He promises to make her more beautiful with gold ear-rings and silver necklaces. Some interpreters believe that these are the words of a seducer trying to divert the guileless heart of the shepherdess from the simplicity of pastoral life to the pomp and splendour of the court. But there is nothing in the text suggesting this sense. For the mention of the king see 11.

f 11-13 The Bride's Praise of her Bridegroom—The bride very courteously returns her bridegroom's compliments. 11. The scene is, apparently, in the king's palace. But the king has no part in the dialogue, nor is he addressed in the 2nd person or as 'my king'. We have here probably a tacit comparison. She will pour her odorous perfumes upon the head of her beloved, thus showing her immense love for him, just as the king's attendants and courtiers pay homage to him while he is sitting on his couch. The scene is reminiscent of Lk 7:37 f. and Jn 12:3. 12. The bridegroom is compared to a sachet full of myrrh which she always carries on her breast as her favourite scent. The subject of 'shall abide' is the sachet. Myrrh is a fragrant resinous gum which exudes from the Balsamodendron Myrrha; cf. Ps 44:9; Prov 7:17; Eccles 24:20. 13. He is also compared to a bunch of henna which grows in the plains of Engaddi, on the west shore of the Dead Sea. Henna was used by the Arabs for tinting the nails with a red hue and for its smell.

g 14-II 3 Expressions of Mutual Love—The dialogue reaches its climax. Unable to repress their emotions the two lovers express their affection and mutual admiration with tender words and exquisite images. 14. The bride's eyes are like doves. Her looks are full of candour reminiscent of a dove, the symbol of innocence and simplicity (Mt 10:16). 15. Her reply almost repeats her lover's words but adds: 'our tent is green'. The reference is to the shepherd's hut of green branches and leaves where the two lovers had met. 16. Mark the contrast between the bride's words and the more elevated tone of the bridegroom's expressions of praise. She had said: our dwelling is a poor shepherd's hut. He replies: our habitation, adorned with our love, is like a royal palace with cedar beams and cypress ceiling. II 1. The bride with her characteristic modesty describes herself as a narcissus which grows in the plains or more particularly in the plain of Sharon, and to a lily of the valley. In other words, she is as humble as a little meadow flower. 2. The bridegroom turns this declaration of modesty into a flattering compliment. Your beauty among other maidens is that of a lily among thorns. 3. Sensible of the compliment she replies in the same strain. You excel all other men in beauty and goodness as much as an apple-tree, or in a general sense a fruit-tree, excels all the trees of the forest. The image of the fruit-tree naturally evokes that of shade and fruit. She longs for, and sits down in, the shade of the tree enjoying its delicious fruit.

4-7 The Union of the two Lovers—From the leafy hut we are taken to a banquetting-hall to assist at the wedding of the two lovers. 4. The bridegroom takes his bride into the banquetting-hall or, as we should say, the reception hall. As the marriage ceremony consisted in the introduction of the bride into the bridegroom's home, we have here an allusion to the marriage feast. But the poet is more interested in their mutual love than in their wedding; he therefore omits all details to concentrate on the intensity of their love. In fact the bridegroom's affection for his bride is described as an attack by a powerful army; he arrayed against me his army of love, 4b. 5. Unable to resist the attack she falls like a wounded soldier. Vg-DV 'I languish' renders the idea well, and we need not suppose that she was ill as Heb. holaš seems to suggest. She asks for assistance: Stay me up with raisin-cakes, refresh me with apples. 6. The bridegroom runs to her side supporting her head with his left hand and embracing her with his right arm. 7. These words are spoken by the bridegroom. The bride, overwhelmed by the power of love, has fallen asleep in his arms, and he entreats her friends not to disturb her rest. The gazelles are either a symbol of feminine grace or a mere poetical figure.

Allegorical interpretation. Israel, reborn after the Exile, desires to be re-united with Yahweh whose love she knows so well. She will never let herself be led astray by the fascinating splendour of other religions. Yahweh will be her only God, her only happiness. Though few in number and unimpressive in their external appearance the Israelites were beautiful in the sight of God as they were faithful to him (Is 54:6-8). The Church too rejoices in Christ, her Founder and the source of all her prosperity. 'Thy name' is the name of Jesus (cf. St Bernard, Serm. 15 in Cant. PL 183, 846). Though humble in her origin, the Church stands high in God's favour who loves and adorns her with supernatural gifts. The life of the just is a continual aspiration for mystical union with God.

8-III 5 Second Song—It develops the same theme j on the same lines, but with different descriptions. The bridegroom comes to meet his bride; they spend a happy day in the fields; during the night she becomes restless until she finds him again.

8-9 An Unexpected Visit from the Bridegroom—8. k She is still in her house when she suddenly hears her lover's footsteps approaching. With a bold poetical figure he is described as a gazelle or a young hart running and leaping over hills and mountains to arrive more quickly near his bride. 9. He has arrived, and now he stands by the wall of her house looking through the latticed window to assure her of his coming.

10-17 The Bridegroom's Invitation—10-13. l The bridegroom calls his bride with the most affectionate terms 'my love', 'my beautiful one' (omit 'my dove'). He invites her to come out because winter has passed; flowers are in bloom; the time of singing has arrived; all nature has awakened to new life after the long death-like sleep of winter. 14. He repeats his invitation making a strong appeal to her sensitive feminine nature. You are like a dove in the crevices of rocks and old walls. Let me hear your sweet voice and see your fair face. We must not imagine the bride staying in her house and quietly listening to her friend's serenade before she rises to open. As remarked above, the dialogue form is a literary device to give life to the scene. 15 is considered to be a popular song sung by the bride m in response to her lover's invitation. Buzy rejects 15-17 as a later addition. Joüon makes 15 the beginning of another scene. But 15-17 may also be regarded as a dramatic description of the way the two lovers spent the day in the fields. Although it is not expressly stated that the bride accepted the invitation, this is at least implied in 17. We are then naturally led to imagine the two lovers running through the fields, enjoying the beautiful scenery and chasing the little foxes that ravage the flourishing vines. 16. Before 384m parting she once more professes her unchangeable love. He is mine and I am his. The words 'who feedeth (his flock) among the lilies' do not imply that the bridegroom was actually tending his flock (Buzy). They simply denote his ordinary work, hinting at the same time at a higher meaning, namely, his predilection for fragrant flowers, the symbol of virtue. 17. As night approaches they part. Before the day breathes (i.e. 'before the cool evening breeze begins to breathe') and the shadows stretch out, he goes back to the mountains of Bether with the same swiftness with which he had come. Thus 17 links up with 8 and cannot be regarded as a later addition. The name 'Bether' creates a difficulty. Many interpreters, on the ground of analogy (cf. 4:6), take it as the name of an aromatic plant which they identify with the malabathron which passed into Hebrew in a syncretized form [mala] bathr[on] = bether.

n III 1-5 Seeking the Bridegroom—1. It was late in the evening when the two lovers returned to their homes (2:17). Now with her heart and mind still full of the emotions of the day she imagines herself to be still with her beloved. There is nothing to suggest that she is relating a dream. 2 f. Unable to repress her emotions she hastens out in search of her beloved. Nothing is impossible to love, still less to a poet. 4. No sooner has she passed the night patrol than she finds her beloved, lays hold on him and takes him to her mother's home. Where and how she found him at that time of night, the words they exchanged, are matters that fall outside the poet's interest. 5. The refrain, which recurs in 2:7 and 8:3, describes the quiet joy of the union of the two lovers. Once she has found the object of her love she falls into an ecstatic sleep which her beloved does not wish to disturb.

o Allegorical interpretation. In 2:8-14 it is the bridegroom who seeks his bride; in 3:1-4 it is the bride who goes in search of her beloved. The two scenes represent their yearning for each other. Yahweh called Israel and Israel responded, and though for some time she turned her back on him, she returned once more to him, was received and made again the object of his love. The Fathers explain the bridegroom's leaping over the mountains as God's approach to man by way of the Virgin's womb, the manger, the Cross, the tomb and heaven (St Greg. the Great In expos. Evang. hom. 29, PL 79, 907). The description of spring means that God's appeal to man is made at a time when response is more likely to follow. Spring in fact is the time for love. But such details as the latticed window, winter, rain, figs, etc. are mere parabolic elements.

385a III 6-V 1 Third Song—A contrast between the pomp of a royal marriage and the simple unconventional manifestations of love between the two shepherds. Buzy thinks 3:6-11 to be interpolated. Probably the poet by describing Solomon's marriage intended to give a stronger relief to the simple way of living of the countryfolk.

b III 6-8 The Royal Procession—6. The people are astonished on seeing a cloud of dust in the desert approaching the city and ask: What is this? The point of comparison is the rising cloud of the smoke not its fragrance. This is mentioned only in view of what is to follow. 7 f. When the procession comes nearer, they can see Solomon's litter escorted by sixty of the most valiant men of Israel, all well-trained in the use of arms and carrying their swords against some possible night attack.

c 9-11 The Royal Pavillion—9. When the procession arrives in the city, the king sits down on his throne under a pavilion that had been erected for the occasion. Heb. 'appiryôn, translated by Vg-DV 'ferculum-litter', is now rendered 'pavilion' (Joüon, Buzy) or 'throne' (Miller). 10. The pavilion had silver pillars, a golden ceiling, and the seat upholstered with purple embroidery and inlaid with ebony (Siegfried, Miller, Ricciotti). 11. The maidens of Jerusalem are invited to admire the magnificence of the king crowned by his mother. The mention of the king's mother is embarrassing.

There is no evidence of a king being crowned by his mother. Moreover, if the king is Yahweh and his bride is Israel, who is the king's mother? But both the crown and the king's mother may be a mere literary development of the nuptial comparison.

IV 1-7 The Bride's Beauty—From Solomon's marriage-feast we are taken back to the fields to admire once more the bride's beauty. 1. The opening words are identical with 1:14. For DV 'besides what is hid within' read 'through the veil' or 'amidst your locks'. Her dove-like eyes can be seen through the thin, transparent veil which covers her face. Her long, wavy locks are like a flock of goats streaming down from Mount Galaad. 2. Her teeth are as white as a flock of sheep coming up from the washing before being shorn. They are also paired, and there is none missing. Whiteness and symmetry of teeth are meant. 3. Her lips are like a red thread and her mouth, or speech, is graceful. 'Besides that which lieth hid within', see 1. 4. Her neck is erect and stately as a tower built for the trophies, or as a fortress; the mention of David adds nothing to the image. If the neck is a tower, the bucklers and the armour of the warriors are the necklaces and pendants. 5. 'Which feed among the lilies', these words serve only to add gracefulness to the description; see 2:16. 6 is repeated with slight modifications from 2:17 and is the conclusion of the first part of the song, though perhaps loosely connected with the context.

7-9 The Bridegroom fascinated by his Bride's Beauty e—7 is similar to 4:1. The Heb. word for 'spot' means 'a physical defect', cf. 2 Kg 14:25. 7b is applied by the Church in an accommodated sense to the Immaculate Conception: 'et macula originalis non est in te'. Hence the appellation 'Immaculate'. 8. MT has 'with me' for the first two 'come' of DV. The reading of Vg, which is that of LXX and the Syriac version, is preferred by many modern interpreters (Miller, Buzy). By changing a vowel or two in MT this sense is obtained: 'Me from Lebanon, my Spouse, me from Lebanon thou dost bring back'. This sense is preferable because it is the bridegroom, not the bride, that is represented coming from the mountains, cf. 2:8, 17; 4:6. Vg-DV 'thou shalt be crowned' is a misinterpretation of MT which is usually rendered: 'advance, come forth'. But as the person coming from the mountains is the bridegroom, we translate: 'induce me to come' (A. Vaccari, Bi [1947] 395). Amanah, Sanir, Hermon are peaks in the Antilebanon range. The bridegroom is drawn by his bride's beauty from the most distant and inaccessible places. 9. The power of the bride's fascinating beauty is now explicitly asserted. One glance from her charming eyes, one bead of her necklaces is enough to make his heart burn with love. For 'wounded' read 'ravished'.

10-15 Other Praises of the Bride's Beauty—10 recalls f 1:2 f. The bride's caresses, the expression of her love, are sweeter than wine, the symbol of joy and pleasure. 11. Milk mixed with honey was, and still is, a favourite drink in the East (Power, VD [1922] 54 f.). Here it symbolizes sweetness of speech. Even the perfumes of the bride's garments contribute to make her more lovely. 12. MT reads: 'a garden enclosed . . . a spring shut up'; but probably we must read 'a spring' twice, the two Heb. words gan and gal being easily interchangeable (Joüon, Buzy). Springs of water were sometimes enclosed by a wall with a locked entrance in order to make them inaccessible to intruders. The metaphor is obvious. 13. The conduits conveying water from the enclosed spring irrigate an orchard of pomegranates and trees of exquisite fruits, henna and spikenard. The unusual plural n'radim 'spikenards' and the repetition of the same word in the singular in 14 have led some interpreters to read u'radim 'roses', a word which occurs in Mishnaic Hebrew. 14. A list of aromatic plants irrigated by the invisible spring. Instead of 'Libanus' read 'incense' and 'balm-trees' for 'perfumes'. 15. The poet reverts to the image of the spring. The bride is compared to a spring, which

g 16-V 1 The Union—16. The bridegroom requests the winds to blow and to saturate the air with the fragrance of the flowers that he may enjoy the aromatic perfume of the garden. The garden is another metaphor for the bride. The bridegroom wishes to enjoy the delightful presence of his bride. V 1a. The bride manifests the same desire. Let him come near and enjoy the pleasure of his bride's love. Both garden and fruit are his, the bridegroom's, because the bride has given her heart to him alone. 1b. The bridegroom is now with his bride. Read: 'I gather. . . I eat . . . I drink'. 1c. The lovers' meeting is represented as a marriage feast at which friends are necessarily present.

h Allegorical interpretation. The meaning of 3:6-11 must be considered in relation to the whole song. If this relation is one of contrast and if 4:1-5:1 describes the pure love of two shepherds unaffected by the conventionalism of a more refined society, then 6-11 represent all that can defile or frustrate that love. But if there is no opposition between 3:6-11 and 4:1-5:1, the king's marriage may be taken to represent Christ's union with the Church, or his assumption of human nature in the Incarnation, or Yahweh's installation in the temple of Jerusalem.

i The beautiful bride is Israel cleansed from her sins and arrayed with her finest garments (Is 52:1), or the Church purified by the blood of Christ, 'cleansed by the laver of water in the word of life: . . . a glorious church not having spot or wrinkle . . . but holy and without blemish' (Eph 5:26 f.). The several parts of the body—eyes, hair, teeth, etc.—are parabolic elements. God's love for man knows no obstacles. He so loved the world as to give his only-begotten Son (Jn 3:16); and this immense love is vividly described as drawing him near to mankind from distant and inaccessible places, i.e. from heaven. Man is beautiful in the sight of God because he is made in the divine image, but still more beautiful does he become when he is adorned with sanctifying grace. The figure of the sealed fountain represents the inalienable love of the Church whose heart is shut to all affections but that for her divine Bridegroom. The Fathers have applied the figure to the virginity of Mary. In this song, and throughout the whole poem, love is represented in its purest form. The bride is called 'sister-bride' and the union of the two lovers is a spiritual one.

j V 2-VI 3 Fourth Song—Here too we have the usual theme: the bridegroom's yearning for his bride, the bride's description of her bridegroom's beauty, and the joy of their union. A new feature is the painful proof to which the bridegroom subjects his bride.

k V 2-5 A Night Visit.—2. She is sleeping, but her mind is wakeful. Of a sudden she hears a knock. Her beloved has come and calls her insistently in the most endearing terms and asks her to open. 3. Apparently she refuses to open for a trifling pretext (Calmet, Joüon, Ricciotti). But this is hardly compatible with the statement that even during sleep her mind is absorbed by her beloved. It is preferable to regard her words as a poetic device meant to account for the sudden disappearance of the bridegroom (Miller, Buzy). 4. The bridegroom tries to open by passing his hand or finger through the keyhole and removing the bolt. On hearing the sound and perhaps on seeing his hand through the hole, she is seized by violent emotion. For 'at his touch' read 'on account of him' or 'of this'. 5. She rises up to open, and as soon as she touches the bolt her hands become moist with myrrh. Probably the bridegroom had bathed his hands in myrrh and so left its perfume upon the bolt.

l 6-8 In search of the Bridegroom—6. Unable to open the door the bridegroom departs. The words 'my soul melted when he spoke' are out of place, because as he had already gone, she could not hear him speaking. Some interpreters transpose these words after 4 (Miller, Buzy). If we read 'br' to pass away, to depart' for 385f MT db 'to speak', the consonants 'a' and 'd' being easily interchangeable in the old Heb. script, we obtain this sense: I fainted when he went away. No transposition is necessary. Immediately she hurries out looking for him and calling for him in vain. 7. This ill-treatment is another poetical fiction meant to heighten her distress. 8. As has been often remarked, the dialogue is sometimes intended to give a dramatic effect to the internal feelings of the actor. So we need not ask how the daughters of Jerusalem happened to be outdoors at that time of night.

9-16 Description of the Bridegroom—9. The question m of the maidens serves to introduce the following description. 10. My beloved is white and ruddy, distinguished out of thousands. 11. His head is finest gold; his locks are like palms and black as a raven. 12. His eyes are like doves beside the water-brooks. In 12b read: 'His teeth are bathed in milk, ensconced in their setting' (A. Vaccari, Bi [1947] 399 f.). 13. His cheeks are beds of balsam shrubs, rich in perfume; his lips are like lilies, dropping choice myrrh. 14. His arms are rods of gold, set with topaz; his breast is ivory set with sapphires. 15. His legs are like pillars of alabaster, set upon sockets of fine gold. His aspect is like that of (the trees of) Lebanon, stately as the cedars. 16. His mouth is full of sweetness; he is all lovely. 17. After this panegyric on the bridegroom's beauty, the maidens show themselves ready to help her.

VI 1f. The Meeting—1. The scene changes; n the maidens have disappeared; it is daylight; the bride and the bridegroom are together in the garden. We are not told how the bride found her bridegroom. The poet depicts the amorous scenes by a few strokes and leaves it to the imagination to fill up the gaps. The bridegroom is in his garden planted with balsam shrubs, feeding his flock and gathering lilies. The two details of feeding the flock in the garden and gathering lilies, unlikely though they are, are two delicate touches which render the picture more attractive. 2. The joy of their union is expressed with the same words as in 2:16.

Allegorical interpretation. The most salient traits of o this song are: The bridegroom's unexpected visit, the bride's apparent indifference, the bridegroom's disappearance, the bride's night search and description of the bridegroom, their union. Applied to the history of Israel these may refer to Israel's infidelity, punishment and conversion. The Church too sometimes seems to be deserted by her divine Spouse. She is persecuted by her enemies who try to strip her of her bridal raiment, which is her sanctity. But she remains faithful to Christ, the most beautiful of the sons of man. In the Liturgy the description of the bridegroom is applied to Christ. Everlasting happiness is the reward for her fidelity. The song is particularly rich in ascetic applications. God knocks at the door of our heart in the quiet of the night, far from the distractions of the world, in solitude (Os 2:14); he comes unexpectedly, and we must be ever ready to respond. Those who are neglectful will miss the benefits of God's grace, and it is through penance that they may regain them. Sometimes God seems to abandon the faithful soul but it is only to test her attachment. The soul that comes out victorious is rewarded with more abundant graces and with the spiritual joy of a closer union with God.

VI 8-VIII 4 Fifth Song—The analysis is difficult. 386a The beginning and the end are in the style of the other songs, but the connexion and internal development of the ideas are not always clear.

3-8 Praises of the Bride—3. She is as beautiful as b Tirsah, the old capital of the Northern Kingdom (3 Kg 15:33). Tirsah, not Samaria, has been chosen as a term of comparison both for its connexion with the verb rāsāh 'to be pleased with', as well as for Samaria's association with heathen cult. Her beauty could conquer all hearts as a powerful army ready for the attack. 4a. Her eyes are fascinating. The words 'turn 386b away thy eyes from me 'express the marvellous beauty of the bride's eyes. 4b-6. See on 4:1b-3. 7 f. A contrast between the polygamy of oriental rulers and the monogamous union of the two shepherd-lovers. The sense is : Let a king have as many as sixty wives having legal rights (queens), and as many as eighty other secondary wives (concubines) and a host of maidens attending upon his wives, or, more probably, awaiting their turn to be introduced to the king (Est 2:9-14), I have only one, who is the only, and therefore most beloved, daughter of her mother and the object of universal praise and admiration.

c 9-11 The Bride's Sudden Appearance—9. The bride, whose extraordinary beauty has just been described, now makes a sudden appearance, exciting admiration in the spectators. Her charming beauty and stately aspect are compared to the splendour of dawn, the moon and the sun, and to the imposing march of an army. The verse is a familiar antiphon in the Office of our Lady's Assumption. 10. The subject is probably the bridegroom who alone is represented as going to his garden (4:16; 5:1; 6:1). 11. While he is in the garden, something, that it is difficult to determine, happens to him. The source of the difficulty is the Heb. expression 'ammi nādīb' which is taken as a proper noun by LXX and Vg, while modern interpreters generally translate 'noble people' (Joüon), 'prince of my people' (Pouget-Guitton), 'princely cortège' (Miller). As the word nādīb recurs in 7:1 in an analogous phrase 'noble daughter', it seems that we should retain the same meaning here and translate 'noble people', the final i in 'ammi' being a paragogic i. But 'the chariots of a noble people' hardly makes sense and the context requires the name of some well-known personage whose chariots were renowned for their speed. Buzy's reference to the chariot carrying the ark from Abinadab's house (2 Kg 6:3) is far-fetched. The general sense of 11 seems to be : The bridegroom was so struck by the unexpected appearance of his beautiful bride that he ran out of his garden with all possible speed.

d 12-VII 5 Other Praises by the Chorus—12. The bride is requested to return that the maidens may admire her beauty once more. This is another poetic device meant to bring the bride into the scene as the object of the praises that are to follow. She is described here as 'the Shulamite', a native of Shulam, a village in the plain of Esdraelon; the word may be a variant of Shunamite (3 Kg 1:3). This appellation occurs here and in 7:1 only, and seems to be chosen for some literary motive rather than for historical reasons.

VII 1a. Why would you gaze at the Shulamite, as upon a chorus in two bands? This difficult verse has received many different interpretations. As m'hōlaṭ hammah'nayim is generally translated 'dance of two companies', the bride's words are taken as a refusal of the maidens' invitation to dance (Vaccari, I Libri Poetici della Bibbia, Rome, 1925), or as an acceptance (Miller, Ricciotti, Pouget-Guitton). Joüon, followed by Buzy, thinks that these words were spoken by the bridegroom, who modestly agrees that his bride should come before the maidens. The reference to dancing seems to be excluded by the shyness and modesty of the bride and by the general tone of Cant. M'hōlaṭ hammah'nayim may also be rendered 'a chorus in two bands'. The bride is supposed to be advancing between two rows of girls singing alternately and accompanying their singing with a rhythmical movement of their bodies e (Buzy). 1b. How graceful are thy steps in sandals, O prince's daughter! The praises of the bride are sung by the two halves of the chorus alternately. 1c. The roundings of thy thighs (or, the pillars of thy legs) are like the links of a chain, the work of an artist's hand. They are perfectly rounded. 2a. Thy navel is like a rounded goblet, wherein wine is not wanting. The literary taste of oriental poets differs from ours. The image of wine has been called forth by that of the goblet. 2b. Palestinian farmers heap up the corn on the threshing-floor and surround it with thorns to protect it from animals before carrying it to their barns. But the image represents the heap of wheat surrounded with lilies, the symbol of purity. 3 is repeated from 4:5-4a. Her neck is compared to a tower for its erectness, and to ivory for its whiteness. 4b. Thine eyes are like the pools of Heshbon, by the gate of Bath-Rabbim. Heshbon was the ancient capital of the Amorites in Transjordan (Num 21:25). Probably it had some water reservoirs. Bath-Rabbim is an unknown locality, perhaps in the land of the Ammonites, cf. Rabbath Ammon, the capital of the Ammonites (Jer 48:3). But the geography of the author is more poetical than scientific. 4c. Her nose is compared to an imaginary tower built on Lebanon guarding the way to Damascus. Here again we have no right to impose our aesthetic rules upon the oriental poet. 5. Her head is erect and majestic as Mount Carmel; the tresses of her head are like purple; in 4:1 they are black, but the poet has the right to vary the comparisons. A king is held captive in the locks thereof. The king is not Solomon, the supposed rival of the shepherd-lover, but the shepherd himself who is called king according to the nuptial language. The sense may be also : Thy tresses are so beautiful as to captivate even a king. The captivating power of the bride is also recorded in 4:9; 6:5.

6-9 Other Praises by the Bridegroom—6. The exclamation 'How beautiful art thou!' which recurs in 1:13; 4:1, 7; and 6:4 suggests that it is the bridegroom who is speaking. Instead of 'in delights' read with the Syriac and many modern interpreters 'daughter of delights', i.e. exceedingly delightful. 7. The palm-tree is a favourite figure in oriental poetry to describe the stateliness of a slender and graceful body. Tamar (= palm-tree) was also a frequent name for women, cf. Gen 38:6; 4 Kg 13:1. 8. The bridegroom is not content with admiring the bride's bodily perfections, he is also anxious to enjoy them. He is longing for the complete possession of his bride. 9. In MT and Vg these words are spoken by the bride. But, as the context shows, they are the continuation of the bridegroom's praise of his bride's beauty. A slight modification of MT would give this sense : Thy mouth, i.e. thy speech, is like the choicest wine dropping gently on my palate, gliding over my lips and teeth.

10-VIII 4 The Joy of their Union—10. The bride gives herself up entirely to her beloved who is irresistibly drawn towards her. 11. She invites him to go for a walk through the fields. 12. It is spring-time, and she now invites him to the vineyards, where she will give him her love, i.e. she will offer herself to him. 13. The images are all expressive of love. The mandrakes are a fruit of the size and colour of a small apple. They ripen in May. Their flowers have a pleasant smell, and the fruit was believed to possess aphrodisiac properties (Gen 30:14), hence called also 'love-apples'. VIII 1. In her ecstasy of love the bride expresses the desire to become the sister of her bridegroom without, however, renouncing her condition of bride. She had already expressed her self-surrender to her bridegroom in the solitary vineyard, far from the sight of men. She now desires to show her love for him anywhere without shame or fear. 2 emended reads thus : I would bring you into my mother's house, into the chamber of her who bore me ; I will give you to drink spiced wine, my wine of pomegranates. 3 f. See on 2:6 f.

Allegorical interpretation. In general it is identical with that of the other songs, particularly the third which describes the incomparable beauty of the bride and her irresistible attractiveness. Points of special interest are : the uniqueness of the bride. As God has selected only one people in the OT, so Christ founded only one Church, whom he loved so much as to shed his blood for her (Eph 2:16). The heap of corn surrounded by lilies suggests the virginal fecundity of the Church. The image of the corn and the goblet of wine is, according to the Fathers, an allusion to the Eucharist. The bridegroom gathering the fruits of his palm-like bride is Christ rejoicing in the children of the Church 386i and their virtues. The intimacy between Christ and his Church is as chaste as that existing between a brother and a sister. The Fathers agree in explaining 8:1 as the Synagogue's ardent desire for the Incarnation of the Son of God. Through his human nature Christ became like men (Phil 2:7; Heb 2:17) and their brother (Rom 8:29; Heb 2:11).

387a VIII 5-7 Sixth Song—The Triumph of Love. In this short song, which may be considered as the conclusion of that preceding, the two lovers are represented in the fullness of their joy, united for ever with an indissoluble bond of love. 5a. Omit 'flowing with delights'. The poet is describing the nuptial cortège proceeding to the bridegroom's house. 5b. Read: 'Under the apple-tree I raised thee up, where thy mother brought thee forth, where she that bare thee brought thee forth'. These words are spoken by the bridegroom probably in the first days of their love. The beginning of their mutual affection is poetically associated with the apple-tree and the maternal house, which are, in a different way, symbols of love. 6 f. A hymn to love. The bride begs to remain inseparably united with her bridegroom, as a signet ring which is usually bound round the neck with a cord or fastened to the arm (Gen 38:18; Jer 22:24). Her love for him is as strong as death which none can escape, and her passion is as inexorable as Sheol, which never gives back any who come under its sway. Its flashes are flashes of fire, which warms, burns and consumes; and its flames are flames of Yahweh; Yahweh is added to denote the intensity of the flames of love. Love is so strong and intense that it can neither be extinguished by flooding waters nor swept away by impetuous rivers; cf. Rom 8:35 ff. Love is more precious than riches, and whoever attempts to bargain for love deserves the utmost contempt. The sense of DV is slightly different: If love could be bought for money, man would give all his possessions to acquire it; cf. the parable of the pearl, Mt 13:45 f.

c Allegorical interpretation. Both Israel after the exile and the Church declare their inseparable attachment to God. More particularly, Israel is described, according to some interpreters, returning from the exile accompanied by Yahweh (Is 52:12) who recalls to her memory her humble origin (Ricciotti). The Fathers generally refer the whole scene to Christ's marriage with the triumphant Church, Apoc 19:7 f.

d VIII 8-15 Appendix—After this magnificent apotheosis of love one feels reluctant to assist at a marriage contract such as is described in 8-12. This section is therefore rejected as an interpolation by Meignan (545) and Buzy (360). Jotūn with greater probability believes that it was added by the poet himself sometime after he had finished the poem. Other interpreters, however, consider it to be the conclusion of the book. 8-10 The Marriage Bargain—8. We have a young sister who is not yet of marriageable age, what shall we do when she is asked in marriage? The elder brothers, the guardians of their younger sister ask themselves what sum will they ask from the prospective suitor of their sister. In those times the prospective bridegroom had to pay a sum of money; cf. Gen 24:25; 34:11. 9. If she is comparable to a wall, i.e. a walled city, let us make it impregnable by constructing silver bulwarks; if she is a gate, or the city gate, we will bar it with cedar planks. In other words, the brothers are unwilling to give her away unless for a very high price. 10. The sister proudly claims that she is fully mature and that she has found peace since she has found the man of her heart.

11-12 Solomon's Vineyard—11. Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-Hamon, which he gave in charge to keepers for the sum of one thousand shekels. Baal-Hamon is an unknown place. It is not clear by whom these words were spoken. 12. The bridegroom steps in. My vineyard, i.e. my bride, is here before me. I am ready to pay the sum you asked and an additional remuneration to you, the keepers of the vineyard. Solomon is the type of the wealthy man.

13-14 Conclusion—13. The price has been agreed upon and paid by the bridegroom who now addresses his bride: O thou that dwellest in the gardens, let me hear in the presence of friends thy consent to my demand. 14. She replies asking him to take her away with him wherever he pleases. She now belongs to him and will live with him for ever.

Allegorical interpretation. It depends on the literal sense which is not clear. Supposing the appendix to be written by the same author, we can easily trace the main lines of interpretation. Bride and bridegroom are, in a particular way, the Church and Christ. The price which Christ had to pay for his bride was far in excess of what any man could offer; in fact, it was Christ's own blood (1 Pet 1:19). The bride's brothers, trying to frustrate her marriage, are the heathen peoples and all the persecutors of the Church. The vineyard is a familiar metaphor for Israel (Is 5:1) and the Church (Mt 20:1 ff.; 21:33 ff.). The bride's last words to the bridegroom express a desire for the consummation of their union in heaven.

THE BOOK OF WISDOM

(THE WISDOM OF SOLOMON)

By C. LATTEY, S.J.

388a Bibliography—St Jerome, as is well known, followed his Jewish teachers in Hebrew in rejecting the deuterocanonical books, including Wisdom, the text of which in Vg (translated in DV) consequently does not go back to him, but to an earlier African translation. For the original Greek text Swete's edition (Cambridge, 1930) has been followed. Upon the whole the book has fared well at the hands of English commentators, the chief being *Deane (Oxford, 1881); *Goodrick (Rivingtons, 1913); *Holmes (in CAP, I); *Oesterley (mainly translation: S.P.C.K., 1917); *Gregg (Cambridge, 1922). The chief Catholic commentaries are those by Fr Cornely, S.J., in CSS, edited after his death by Fr Zorell, S.J. (1910) and Dr Feldmann's Das Buch der Weisheit in BB (1926). Two useful books of more general scope are *Swete's Introduction to the OT in Greek (ed. 2 by R. R. Ottley, Cambridge, 1914) and Introductionis in S. Scripturae Libros Compendium by Fr Cornely, S.J., in CSS (ed. 9 by Fr Merk, S.J., 1927).

b Title and Language—‘The Book of Wisdom’ is the title of the work in the Latin Bible, but the Greek and Syriac Bibles entitle it ‘the Wisdom of Solomon’. St Jerome in his preface to the Wisdom books expressly affirms that it was written in Greek, an opinion now generally admitted, which of course rules out Solomon as author. St Augustine (De Civ. Dei, XVII. 20, 1) remarks that the more learned have no doubt that the work is not Solomon's. Swete (268) writes that ‘no other book in the Greek Bible is so manifestly Alexandrian in tone and style’. The proof that it was written in Greek rests chiefly upon the fact that ‘throughout the book compound words abound—a mark of Alexandrian Greek’ (Holmes, 525: cf. Swete, 311), upon the use of alliteration and assonances and philosophical terms, all pointing to a Greek original, and to the impossibility of translating the book adequately into Hebrew. It is an example of ‘pseudepigraphy’, the text of the work indicating verbally Solomon as author (especially in 9:7–8, 12) though he did not really write it.

c Date of Composition—It appears to have been written in the first half of the 2nd cent. B.C. The hostile attitude adopted towards the ancient Egyptians indicates a period when they were still quite distinct from the Greek immigrants. A fair interval of time would probably be required for a work written in Greek to be recognized as Holy Scripture; yet there is no sign that there was any difficulty about receiving it into the Greek OT, nor does the employment of it in the NT suggest that there was any controversy or doubt about its authority. The Alexandrian Jews were not likely to recognize a book as canonical that would be repudiated in Jerusalem, nor were the NT writers likely to appeal to it. The true reason for the ultimate exclusion of the Book of Wisdom from the Jewish canon is doubtless that given by Dr Ginzberg in JE, I, 305–6, in the article Akiba ben Joseph: Rabbi Akiba was the one who definitely fixed the Jewish canon, and in rejecting Wisdom and some other books he was guided by the desire to disarm Christians—especially Jewish Christians—who drew their arguments from them. The exclusion was also doubtless part of a reaction towards the exclusive use of Hebrew.

d The use of Wisdom is most conspicuous in St Paul, who bases his exposition in Rom 1:18–32 on Wis 13:1–10. In Rom 9:19–23 we may trace the influence of Wis 11:22; 12:12; 15:7; and there are reminiscences in other passages of his epistles, and in other NT works. Very significant is Mt 27:43, where (for example) *Nestle in his small NT rightly marks a reference to Wis 2:13, 18–20, for his reference to Ps 22:9 does not exhaust the citation. When we consider St Matthew's constant insistence on the fulfilment of the OT, it is clear that he found it here also. In general, ‘of the deuterocanonical books of the OT there is none that the apostles and early Church used oftener’ (Cornely-Merk, 512).

Considerations such as the above put out of court any attempt to date the book to the reign of the Roman Emperor Gaius (Caligula). It is astonishing to find Goodrick (15 f.), for example, suggesting A.D. 41–4; though it is in part accounted for by his still more surprising statement (16) that the deification of the Ptolemies ‘seems certain in very few cases, possibly only in that of Ptolemy I’. Mahaffy, to whom he refers, has made the matter sufficiently clear in his Empire of the Ptolemies (MacMillan, 1895), and it is now certain that their worship was a permanent part of their royal style, as it was afterwards in that of the Roman emperors. The temporary disturbance under Gaius would not explain Pseudo-Solomon's explicit (yet cautious) attack on ruler-worship in 14:12–21, nearly so well as the steady pressure of the earlier cult centred at Alexandria itself, and in its essence inherited through Alexander the Great from the Pharaohs.

Literary Type—The element of historical fiction contained in Wisdom may go beyond pseudepigraphy, and make of it a ‘midrashic’ treatise. This is a convenient technical term, founded on the Hebrew word ‘midrash’, and implies a pious but imaginative meditation upon sacred history, of a kind still to some extent in use. Not only is the work ascribed verbally to Solomon, but he is represented as writing for the benefit of other kings (6:2, etc.); and the description of OT events appears to be heightened for the author's special purposes. The question arises mainly in regard to Part V (chh 16–19); cf. § 394a. The need of a careful investigation of literary form in biblical studies has been stressed by His Holiness Pope Pius XII in his encyclical, Divino afflante Spiritu (30 Sept., 1943).

Doctrine—The Book of Wisdom has a strong personifying tendency, which prepares the way for the doctrine of the Blessed Trinity, without explicitly affirming Wisdom to be more than a divine attribute. Thus in regard of Wisdom itself we may compare 9:4 with St Paul's declaring Christ ‘the Wisdom of God’ (1 Cor 1:24), and Wis 7:25 with all Col 1:15–19. In Wis 18:15 we even read of the ‘almighty word’ or Logos of God, which prepares us for St John's gospel. The term had a philosophical past, and was to become even more prominent between the dates of Wisdom and the fourth gospel in the writings of the Jewish Alexandrian Philo, but still without definitely signifying a distinct person. It is a question whether at the time of the composition of Wisdom the rabbis had already begun in the targums (the Aramaic paraphrases for public reading of the Hebrew OT) to write ‘the Word of the Lord’ in place of ‘Yahweh’. This use of the ‘Word’ (Mavra), like the Logos of Philo h Somewhat similarly we read that 'the spirit of the Lord filleth the inhabited earth' (Wis 1:7; cf. 9:17, etc.), with which we may compare 1 Cor 2:10-16, etc. At the beginning of the development we may put Gen 1:2, and at the end Ac 5:3-4.

i The Book of Wisdom is largely concerned with rewards and punishments after death, to which we get the first rather vague reference in Dan 12:2. The doctrines of the immortality and immateriality of the soul find here their first certain expression. The lot of the just hereafter (3:1-9) is contrasted with that of the wicked (5:1-15): the Lord shall reward the former (5:16-17), but overwhelm the latter (5:18-24). The problem of evil is thus settled by reference to the next world, in the sense that men are ultimately requited according to their deserts. Indeed, the merit of suffering well borne is so stressed in the first part (chh 1-5) as to present an other-worldly outlook. On the other hand the last part (chh 16-19) lays hardly less emphasis on God's especial favour to the Israelites in this world; nor does the writer envisage clearly the possibility of Israelites being lost or Egyptians saved. He is at pains to say that God was giving the Egyptians the chance of repentance, but with the evident implication that the grace was not taken (11:24-12:2; 12:8-10, etc.). In one place (19:4) he writes that 'a necessity well deserved' was drawing the Egyptians on to their destruction, much as in Ex 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, God is said to have hardened the heart of Pharaoh. Thus the author does not appear to have found a perfect synthesis of individual and collective salvation, or of this-world and other-worldly retribution, or of grace and free will; rather he opens up problems which had not yet presented themselves in all their force, and which it was to be the task of Christianity to solve, so far as it is given to man here below to solve them at all.

j There is no hint of a Messiah in the book; in spite of the questions of which the author shows himself aware, he does not contemplate any radical change in the Jewish theocratic ideal. Neither is there any apocalyptic feature, a fact which in a work of this particular kind makes for a date before the period of the Jewish apocalypses, to which he must have stood very close. On the other hand there is no trace of the narrow rabbinical reaction which prevented Judaism from blossoming gently and naturally into Christianity. The Jewish professor, Dr Joseph Klausner, has written in his work, From Jesus to Paul (Engl. transl., 1943: 136) 'Truly, therefore, the Wisdom of Solomon as a syncretistic book, a mixture of Judaism and Hellenism, had no equal for purposes of Christian propaganda'. But it is 'syncretistic' only to one who, like himself, looks upon rabbinical Judaism as the only legitimate development of the OT. In reality the book is genuinely and intensely Jewish, but it does not altogether ignore the universalism in the OT, which so clearly demanded fuller expression. The absence of Messianism prevented it from being at all equal to the prophets for the purposes of Christian propaganda.

k The Book of Wisdom certainly found an attentive reader in St Paul; but, like most, if not all, pious Jews of his time, he was steeped in the Messianic hope. The book would chiefly serve to reconcile him to a Messiah who must suffer, to give him a definitely other-worldly outlook, to strengthen the universalism which he would draw from the OT itself, and even to prepare his mind for the mystery of the Blessed Trinity.

l Plan of the Book—This appears to be as follows. Part I (chh 1-5) is in the nature of a general introduction. Part II (chh 6-9) contains the positive exposition of Wisdom, which Part III (chh 10-12) illustrates from history. Part IV (chh 13-15) contains an attack upon idolatry, the negative or polemical justification of Wisdom, which Part V (chh 16-19) once more illustrates from history.

PART I chh 1-5. The Righteous and the Wicked— 389a

This introductory part reminds us somewhat of Ps 1, the introduction to the whole Psalter, which sets forth the two opposed ways of virtue and vice.

I 1-16 Wisdom is only for the Righteous—The opening appeal is to 'ye that judge the earth', in the sense of ruling it, as in Jg; in 6:2 'judges' is parallel to 'kings'. In the main, however, the book is of universal application. 1. Man must have holy thoughts about God and make it his single purpose to do his will. Already in 4-6 Wisdom is personified and is identified in the parallelism with God himself (6a, c). He is witness of man's 'reins', i.e. kidneys, where we should say 'heart'. ('Heart' itself comes nearer to our 'mind'.) 6-11. God's knowledge is urged as an incentive to virtue, his 'spirit' being likewise personified in a way that prepares the definite revelation of the Third Person of the Blessed Trinity, to whom it is applied in the Whitsuntide liturgy, though the literal sense does not refer to the Pentecostal gift of tongues: God's spirit is everywhere, filling the whole world, 'and that which holdeth all things together hath knowledge' of all that the voice of man utters. 10. God is a jealous God (cf. Ex 20:5; 34:14, etc.) and will not suffer murmurings against his government of the world. 11. 'The mouth that lieth killeth the soul'; with that the argument passes to external works (12-16).

The transition to works introduces a new theme of life and death. In 15 'perpetual and' should probably be omitted, and the words, 'but wickedness is the attainment of death', be added: they furnish the necessary parallel line to what precedes, and also the mention of 'death' which is necessary to make sense of the next line, supplying the reference to the pronoun 'it'. They have some Latin support. In view of the emphasis on immortality here and elsewhere, 'death' is best understood to include spiritual death and the loss of a happy eternity. But the word for 'hell' (14) is the Greek 'Hades', which of itself signifies no more than the abode of the dead in general, as when we say that Christ 'descended into hell'. The writer denies that God delights in death: 'He created all things that they might have being', so we should perhaps translate the difficult words that follow, 'and all things that are produced upon the earth are helpful'. Only 'the wicked . . . call it [death] to them, and esteeming it a friend pine away' for love of it. They have covenanted with it and deserve it.

II 1-25 The Thoughts of the Wicked—(i) (1-5) They reject the idea of immortality: (ii) (6-9) abandon themselves to pleasure: (iii) (10-20) persecute the 'poor just man': (iv) (21-25) the author himself condemns these thoughts. In spite of the disedifying sentiments expressed, the vigorous and poetical style of this chapter makes it one of the finest in the book.

2. 'We were born by mere chance . . . and reason is but a spark kindled by the beating of our hearts'. 5. 'No one reverseth' our last end. 8. And so to the reckless pursuit of pleasure! 'Let no meadow escape our riot': this is not in the Greek, but 'is almost certainly genuine' (Goodrick: similarly Oesterley): it is required for parallelism and on other grounds. 10. 'The poor just man' is the 'anf of the OT, the 'poor in spirit' of Mt 5:3, who bears oppression in meek submission to the Divine Will. The type finds its supreme expression in Christ (cf. Mt 11:28-30) like the OT institution of prophecy (cf. Deut 18:15-19; Ac 3:22-23; 7:37). In 12 lax or apostate Jews must be speaking, since 'the poor just man' reproaches them with breaches both of the Mosaic Law and of the unwritten and traditional law ('sins against our discipline' or way of life); such mention of wicked Jews is unique in the book, and gives the more point to the reference to Wis 2:13, 18-20 in Mt 27:43, already mentioned as marked by Nestle (§ 388d). But the general tenor of the book forbids us to think that such alone are envisaged; there is question of the Gentiles (e.g.) in 4:14, and with these the bad Jews are presumably to be reckoned.

289f In 16 the poor just man's expectation of immortality is derided, and a shameful death is suggested for him in 20a. The following words seem to be ironical: 20. 'To judge from his words, there will be divine protection for him'. 21-25. The author himself condemns these thoughts of the wicked; (21-22) they are blinded by malice from perceiving the mysteries of God, of which several are at once set forth, concluding with the entry of death into the world through the devil's jealousy, and the fact that (25) 'they who are of his party experience it'. The word for 'experience' has this sense also in 12:26. Spiritual death is meant, as in 1:15, where see the commentary; for physical death is common to all. See also 5:16, etc. The Fall is referred to in 24-25; the doctrine is more fully developed in Rom 5:12-21, which (like so much else in that epistle) is partly based on Wisdom.

g III 1-9 The Righteous Hereafter—This section would more logically furnish a triumphant finale to Part I, where but little (5:16-17) is left to be said of the reward of the righteous, and the emphasis is on the punishment of the wicked.

The emphasis on immortality continues, though 'of death' in 1 should be omitted. 4-6. A value is laid upon suffering which to a large extent is a novelty in the OT, and prepares the way for the doctrine of the Cross, especially in St Paul. The glory of the reward is described without direct mention of the beatific vision: (7) 'as sparks among stubble they shall run to and fro', bright, swift, triumphant. 9. They shall judge the Gentiles, and the Lord shall be their King, in a kingdom of truth and love and grace and mercy. There is strong evidence for adding, 'and he will have regard to his holy ones'; on the other hand doubts are cast on these and the preceding words from the fact that they practically duplicate 4:15.

289a 10-IV 6 The Present Punishment of the Wicked—Their punishment in the next life is reserved for ch 5. 11. In spite of their brave words in ch 2, they are miserable and hopeless and ineffective, (12) their wives are foolish, their children wicked. 13. On the other hand the chaste but barren wife shall have fruit (i.e. in merit and reward) 'at the examination of souls' after death; (14) and to the virtuous eunuch also shall be given 'peculiar favour for his faithfulness': not of course 'the gift of faith' which he is supposed to have had already in life. 16-19. The children of adulterers will lead frustrated lives, unhonoured if they be long-lived, without hope against God's judgement if they die young. Such must be understood to be the natural, but not necessarily universal, effect of the parents' bad example.

IV:1—Better childlessness with virtue, he repeats, with an appeal now to the immortal memory of it with both God and man; (2) virtue wins the tribute of imitation when present, of regret after death, of everlasting and undefiled rewards. And then again, with a lack of orderly construction in the book that reminds us once again of St Paul's epistles, the author turns to pronounce the numerous progeny of the impious a failure: without deep root or firm foundation, trees torn up by the wind, with branches broken and fruit unripe, (6) they bear witness against their parents when the latter are put by God upon their trial.

b The stern judgement passed upon the children of unlawful unions may perhaps be explained in part by the peculiar circumstances of Egypt. The Ptolemies, who ruled there from Alexander the Great to Augustus, adopted the ancient practice of the Pharaohs of marrying their sisters, and each succeeding couple was deified even in life. This encouraged sister-marriage generally, which also obviated the necessity of dividing the inheritance, otherwise demanded by the equal rights enjoyed by brothers and sisters in matters of inheritance (cf. *Bouché-Leclercq, Histoire des Lagides, IV, 80: Paris, 1907). Such an incestuous practice called for strong reprobation.

c IV 7-14b The Blessedness of the Righteous even in Premature Death—7-9. The author turns back for a moment to the righteous, to say that even if their life be short, it is honourable, (7, 14) making also an implicit appeal to immortality. He takes the patriarch Henoch as a typical case (cf. Gen 5:24; Ecclus 44:16; Heb 11:5), though (after his wont) without mentioning his name. A considerable apocryphal literature was soon to gather about it, to some of which there is probably a reference in Jude 14-15; Henoch and Elias, too, are doubtless the 'two witnesses' of Apoc 11:1-13. 12. Henoch was taken away because 'the fascination of badness obscureth good things, and restless lust perverteth the guileless mind'. 13. He was perfected in a short space, the most short-lived of the antediluvian patriarchs.

14-20 The Wicked do not understand until they die— There still seems to be question of Henoch in 14-18, though even more than before as a typical case, so that 18-20 applies to the wicked in general, and 5:1 to the righteous in general. The two parallel condemnations in 16 (the second by 'youth soon perfected': cf. 4:13) are factual, by contrasting conduct, rather than verbal. In 17-18 the wicked have not yet realized the truth; (19) 'but after this they shall become dishonoured carcases, and be a mockery among the dead for ever. He shall dash them headlong, speechless'. Their ignorance is blameworthy: (20) 'They shall come to the reckoning up of their sins in cowardly fear, and their lawless deeds [personified after the author's manner] shall convict them to their face'.

V 1-15 Remorse of the Wicked at the Judgement— The judgement spoken of in this book is collective, at the end of time, but is not said to be impending. 1. The wicked are to understand something of the happiness of the just: cf. Lk 16:19-31. 'The righteous man shall stand with much boldness before the face of those who afflicted him, and reckoned his troubles [lit. labours] of no account . . . (2) they shall be amazed at the unexpectedness of his deliverance'. Their remorse is not true contrition. 'The post' in 9 (Greek, 'message'; Latin, 'messenger') may be understood of the official couriers. For the similes in 10-11, cf. Prov 30:19; in 11, 'but the light wind, lashed by the stroke of her pinions, and divided by the force of her flight, is traversed as her wings move, after which no sign of her passage is found therein'. 13. 'So we also . . . have been utterly squandered [have squandered our lives away] in our wickedness'. 14. (Vg) is not found in any other text, and was perhaps originally a marginal note.

16-24 God rewards the Righteous, and assails the Wicked—Once more we have a strong assertion of immortality (16), before the author goes on to depict with rich imagery the rewards and punishments of the next life. With 18-21 should be compared Eph 6:11-17, which (in view of the knowledge which St Paul shows elsewhere of this book) has doubtless been influenced by it, though both may well go back to Is 59:17. 18. 'He shall take his zeal for his panoply, and make the creation his weapon for vengeance upon his enemies', as is set forth in 21-24, and more at large in Part V: the picture here may be based partly on Ps 17:12-16 (= 2 Kg 22:12-16). 22. 'Well-aimed shafts of lightning . . . hailstones full of wrath as from a sling', sea, rivers, wind, shall all fight with God 'against the madmen' (21). Part I concludes with the general truth that 'lawlessness shall make a desert of the whole earth, and evil-doing shall overthrow the thrones of potentates' (24). These last words prepare the way for the address to kings which follows.

PART II chh 6-9. The Nature of Wisdom—This is the core of the work, in which the nature of Wisdom is set forth (chh 7-8), preceded by an exhortation (ch 6), and followed by a prayer to obtain it (ch 9).

VI 1-27 An Exhortation to Rulers—The first verse in the Latin text is not found elsewhere, and was probably inserted later as a heading, without being inspired. The address to rulers is, in the main, part of the literary form of the book, no less than the presenta-

391b tion of Solomon as speaking (e.g. in 9:7-8, 12). Although they appear to be charged with not having observed the Mosaic Law (5: omit 'of justice'), this is best interpreted, as in Rom 2:14-15, of the Mosaic Law as representing not merely the ideal code, but to a large extent what we should call the natural law. Terrible judgement awaits them (8) for God is no respecter of persons.

c 18. Wisdom 'is easily beheld by those who love her': the theme is developed with strong and characteristic personification, until in ch 8 Solomon desires to have her for bride. Rather, (17) Wisdom herself 'goeth about seeking such as are worthy of her, and in their paths she sheweth herself graciously to them, and meeteth them every purpose'. There follows a rather loose chain-argument or 'sorites', which may be summed up thus: (18-20) the beginning of Wisdom=love of instruction=keeping of her laws=assurance of immortality=nearness to God. 21. 'So then', runs the conclusion, 'the desire for wisdom leadeth to a kingdom', which means that Wisdom will make the reign of rulers (here nominally addressed) firm and enduring. 23 in Vg and DV is not found elsewhere, and once more is probably an uninspired heading like 6:1. Solomon accordingly undertakes to expound Wisdom to rulers: (26) 'a wise king is the stay of his people'. These peoples in turn should profit the whole world.

d VII 1-VIII 1 Solomon received Wisdom from God—1-3. Solomon, like other men, was descended from Adam, and was born after ten (perhaps lunar) months, wailing out his first cry as do all. 10. Realizing his helplessness, he prayed for Wisdom and obtained her, and esteemed and loved her before all. 11. All good things came to him along with her; this inexhaustible treasure of Wisdom he is ready to share with others. This Wisdom has a wide sweep, (17-20) embracing knowledge of the constitution of the world and of the elements, chronology and astronomy, 'the turns of the solstices' and the changes of the seasons, zoology, psychology, botany. The passage is doubtless founded on 3 Kings 4:29-34.

e There follows a highly poetical description of Wisdom, opening with twenty isolated epithets of the spirit which is in her, and concluding with a twenty-first to which other words are attached; the number 21 (3×7) may be intentional, 3 and 7 being sacred numbers, as for example in St Matthew's gospel. 22-23. She is 'only-begotten' (rather than 'one') as the unique offspring of God; yet 'manifold' as containing in her own infinite perfection the possibility of innumerable finite perfections: 'subtle, mobile, piercing, undefiled, sure, impassible, loving the good, keen to discern, irresistible, beneficent, loving man, steadfast, secure, free from care, all-powerful, all-surveying, and pervading all spirits that are understanding': pure and most subtle' or spiritual. Wisdom is a breath (lit. vapour) of God's power, an effluence of his glory, and therefore utterly undefiled: one herself, she can do all things: ever the same in herself, she reneweth all things. 27. 'From generation to generation' she passes into holy souls, making friends of God and prophets. 29. She is beautiful beyond compare, and evil is powerless against her: (VIII:1) she reaches everywhere and orders all things well.

f VIII 2-21 Solomon's Praise of Wisdom, his Bride—In spite of the preceding exaltation of Wisdom, Solomon goes on to speak of her as a lover of his bride; for it is no longer the divine attribute that is primarily in question, but created wisdom as a virtue of men, a finite reflection or communication of the infinite perfection of God. Not that the distinction between the two is very sharply drawn. 2. After remarking that from his youth he sought to win her, he launches out once again into her praises. It seems best to explain (3) of her glorifying man's nobility rather than her own; when a man shows himself noble by the practice of virtue, she will make this nobility of his far more glorious by giving her help in virtue and much else, as is explained in what follows. God himself loves her: (4) 'she is an initiate in the knowledge of God', and decides what God shall do. Thus we are back at increate Wisdom, but the writer quickly returns to the advantages of Wisdom to man, yet without forgetting her divine origin. 5. She is rich, because she can make all things, (6) and fashion them more skilfully than any merely human cunning; (7) if righteousness be desired, the very efforts prescribed by Wisdom are acts of virtue. Wisdom, it is said, teaches the four cardinal virtues, prudence, justice, fortitude and temperance. Plato first enumerated them as the chief virtues, but the name 'cardinal' may come from St Ambrose. 8. If experience be desired, Wisdom knows the past and can foretell the future; she understands arguments and riddles, and foresees signs and wonders, and the turn that events will take.

g 9. Solomon therefore determined to have her for bride, knowing that she would be a wise counsellor, and a comforter in care and grief: (10) that she would bring him praise and honour, (11) a keenness of judgement that would excite admiration among the powerful and make them listen to him, (18) an 'immortality' that seems best explained here by the parallel expression, an 'everlasting memory', undying fame. 14-15. He would govern peoples well and be feared by dreaded tyrants; he would prove his worth in peace and war. 16. At home he would find her company a joy. 18. Realizing that in union with her was immortality, and delight in her friendship, riches in her labours and prudence in assiduous conference with her, and renown in her conversation, he went about seeking how to win her. 19-20. Not only was he blessed with a good soul but it came into a flawless body; he guards the reader against inferring from his words the pre-existence of the body, but still less is there question of pre-existence of the soul. 21. Yet, knowing that even when so gifted he could not come to possess Wisdom except by the gift of God, and that to be aware of this was itself the fruit of understanding, he prayed for her with his whole heart.

h IX 1-19 Solomon's Prayer for Wisdom—This prayer, more than the rest of the book, follows the literary device of presenting the author as Solomon, chosen to be king of Israel (7), and to build the temple (8).

1-3. God is invoked by his mercy, as having set man over his creation to order the world and judge aright: this with evident reference to Solomon's own kingship as an especial example of it. 4. He prays for Wisdom, 'that sitteth by thee upon thy throne': (5-6) he is but a weak and short-lived man, lacking in understanding of judgement and laws: indeed, without Wisdom from God man is worth nothing. 7-8. God has chosen Solomon to be king of Israel and to build the temple, a copy upon a more magnificent scale of the Mosaic tabernacle with its covering tent (cf. Ex 26, etc.) which was intended to lead up to it. 9-11 May God communicate that Wisdom which is ever with him, and knows what is pleasing to him, to Solomon, that she may teach him likewise what is pleasing to God, and guide his actions, guarding him with her 'glorious light,' (an uncertain translation, lit. 'glory', but some means of 'guiding', and of 'guarding' against false steps, seems required).

i 12. Thus Solomon's works will be acceptable, his government just, himself worthy of David's throne. 13-17. Otherwise how can a man know God's plan? Man is only too well justified in fearing mistakes; the body weighs down the soul, and with difficulty we understand even the things of earth; how then are we to search out things heavenly, unless God give us wisdom, and send his holy Spirit from on high? Here again we have a strong personification of God's 'holy Spirit', which yet does not amount to declaring him a distinct Person within the Blessed Trinity, though it prepares the way for this.

j A textual question here arises. In the first place we must translate in 18 'were corrected' and 'were taught', not 'may be'; the writer is leading up to Part III, which is mainly historical. We must also 391] render, 'they were saved' rather than 'healed'. And what follows after 'saved' (or 'healed') can hardly have been part of the original text, not being found (apart from the Latin) in the MSS or versions. Still, this addition must be fairly old, as it can be traced in some of the early Christian liturgies.

392a PART III eh 10-12. Wisdom in History—Divine Wisdom is seen in the story of the great men of old (ch 10), and especially in its contrasted treatment of the Israelites and Egyptians (11:1-12:2), and of the Canaanites and Israelites (12:3-27); but in this last section the main emphasis is soon laid upon God's forbearance.

b X 1-21 Wisdom's Dealings with the Holy Men of Old—1-2. The list begins with Adam, who was preserved and forgiven and left as lord of creation; (3-4) but Cain, who deserted Wisdom in his anger, perished also in his fratricidal rage. The meaning appears to be that he perished no less than Abel; Cain's whole life became one long punishment, and perhaps punishment in the next world also is to be understood. The Flood is also ascribed to him, doubtless as having started a tradition of wickedness, but Wisdom preserved Noah by means of wood of little price (not needing more elaborate means), and the earth with him. Just as the enumeration jumps from Cain to the Flood, so it passes at once (5-8) from the Tower of Babel to Abraham, and to the deliverance of Lot from the fire which came upon the five cities of Gen 14:2, of which destruction the memorials are Dead Sea fruit and a pillar of salt. 9-12. Wisdom protected Jacob from Esau (cf. Gen 27:41-45), showed him the kingdom of God (by which is probably meant the vision of Gen 28:10-17), (11) made him rich at the expense of Laban, who was warned to leave him alone (Gen 31:24: for 'seducers' in 12 read rather 'liers in wait'), and gave him victory over the angel (Gen 32:24-30). 13-14. The story of Joseph is easily followed, and (15-21) brings us to Moses and the Exodus. In 19 read 'from the depth of the abyss', i.e. of the Red Sea. Cornely-Zorell understand 21 as a poetical hyperbole, claiming this as the commoner and correct view: we may compare the singing of the babies to the mountains skipping like rams in Ps 113:4. Such imagery is common in poetical and rhetorical styles.

c XI 1-XII 2 The Contrasted Treatment of Israelites and Egyptians—Although the theme is still Divine Wisdom, the writer addresses all this section directly to God without mention of it, showing more clearly than ever that he looks upon it simply as a divine attribute. Two features are pointed out in the working of the Divine Wisdom: (i) the Israelites were benefited by those very things whereby their foes were punished (5: cf. 13-14); and (ii) in general, 'by what things a man sinneth, by these he is punished' (17). God, however, did not exclude the Egyptians from his love: 'Thou hast mercy upon all' (24). This thought is further developed in the following section.

d Moses led the Israelites through the desert, and gave them water from the rock (Ex 17:1-7; Num 20:1-13). In 4, as in some other places, the conduct of the 'holy people' (10:15) is to some extent idealized, for they were rebellious. 5-6. But while they were benefited by water, their foes were punished by it: 'For through those things whereby their foes were punished, by these they in their need were benefited'. The Latin has some extra words which are not in the other versions or in the Greek text. 7-8. The waters of Egypt were turned to blood (Ex 7:19-25): 'instead of a river's ever-flowing fountain', which was now 'turbid with clotted blood', a punishment for the decree to kill the babes of the Hebrews, 'thou gavest to them', i.e. the Hebrews, 'abundant water, unlooked for'. 9-10. By the thirst wherewith they were tried in the desert, the Israelites understood how God had punished their enemies. 15. Moses the Egyptians had wickedly exposed to perish along with the other babes, but through him they were punished, and they learnt to respect him when suffering from a thirst more terrible than that of the righteous Israelites. In the same way as a punishment for the Egyptian worship of animals, God, whose almighty hand 'had created the world out of formless matter'—a compressed summary of its beginnings from lifeless mass—was well able to send upon them bears and lions or horrible and unheard of monsters; but in fact he ordered all things (21) 'by measure and number and weight', by which expression are indicated the careful workings of divine providence and mercy.

21-22. For instead of gloating over the workings of divine wrath and power, the author, at a moment when we least expect it, proclaims magnificently God's universal love: (27-XII:1) 'Thou hast mercy upon all men . . . and overlookest the sins of men, that they may repent: thou lovest all things . . . Thou sparest all things, because they are thine, O Lord, lover of souls; for thine imperishable spirit is in all things'. 2. The example of the Egyptians shows how God admonishes sinners little by little (as he did through the plagues), 'and dost admonish them by reminding them [in their very punishment, as explained above (cf. 17)] of the things wherein they sin, that [in this way] they may escape from their wickedness and believe in thee, O Lord'.

XII 2-27 The Canaanites: God's Forbearance—1 God was minded to destroy the previous inhabitants of Palestine in order to settle the Hebrews there; yet he did so only little by little, in order to bring them to repentance. His forbearance is expounded at some length. In regard of the crimes imputed to the Canaanites in 3-6, Oesterley remarks in his note on the cannibalism that 'recent excavations on the site of ancient Gezer by the Palestine Exploration Fund prove this to have been literally true', but I have not been able to find evidence for it in the official account of the excavations (The Excavation of Gezer, by *R.A.S. Macalister, London, 1912: 3 vols.). In general, cf. Deut 18:9-12; Ez 16:20-21, etc. Archaeology affords adequate proof of infant sacrifices at Gezer and elsewhere: cf. Modern Research as illustrating the Bible, by *S. R. Driver (London, 1909) 50, 67-73. The last words of 5 (DV 'from the midst of thy consecration') are not clear: perhaps the most likely rendering is 'and initiates from the midst of a frenzied troop', e.g. of Bacchantes: so Cornely-Zorell, supplying the 'and'.

6. But although God 'was minded' to destroy the previous inhabitants, and was 'not unable' to do so, he sent hornets in advance of the Hebrews, and in general executed his judgements by degrees, so as to give them an opportunity of repentance, having regard to the inborn wickedness (11) of a seed accursed from the beginning. Who can accuse him in regard of the nations destroyed? He orders all things rightly, and does not punish unjustly: 'Thy being Lord of all maketh thee to spare all'. He shows the fullness of his power upon those who believe him not, and convicts those who do know him (omit 'no' in DV) of their presumption: nevertheless (18) 'thou dost govern us with much forbearance', for God's power is always there if he choose to use it. 19. And this forbearance was intended as an example for his chosen people, teaching 'that the righteous man must be a lover of men', and filling them with hope by the way in which he offers repentance to those who have sinned; for if he took vengeance upon their enemies, who deserved death, with so much deliberation 'and indulgence' (the probable reading and meaning: the word is omitted in Vg), with what circumspection has he judged his own children! 22. While chastising these latter, he scourges their enemies ten thousandfold, that when judging others they may be mindful of his goodness and forbearance, and when judged themselves may be sure of his mercy.

In the last verses of the chapter the writer harks back to the Egyptians, and completes his discussion of them by the mention of their final destruction in the Red Sea. Still insisting that 'by what things a man sinneth, 392h by these he is punished' (11:17; see above), he points out (23) that they were tormented 'through their own abominations'. 24. 'They wandered very far in the ways of error, taking as gods beasts despised even among our enemies', i.e. crocodiles, etc., despised even among the Gentiles, 'being deceived like silly children'. And so the earlier plagues were sent to them as though in mockery, as fit only for children. But they that are not corrected by such lighter chastisements (26) 'shall experience a judgement worthy of God' in its severity, such as befell the Egyptians. They were vexed at their own sufferings, being punished where they had sinned, by means of the very creatures which they thought to be gods. 27. Thus they came to recognize him for the true God whom they had of old denied to be such: 'wherefore final condemnation came upon them'. God manifested himself ever more clearly unto them by his increasing punishments. When they crowned their iniquity by refusing to submit to him even after they had been brought to recognize him clearly, their punishment also culminated in their utter destruction.

393a PART IV ehh 13-15. Against Idolatry—Idolatry is the very opposite of Wisdom, and is attacked in its three chief manifestations, with emphasis upon its folly and its consequences.

b XIII 1-9 The Worship of Natural Objects—The Greek text asserts that 'all men are vain by nature', where the Latin omits 'by nature', perhaps owing to the difficulty of the sense. In 12:10 the Canaanites are said to have a nature evil by birth, and inborn wickedness, wherefore God in his mercy punished them little by little, to give them a chance of repentance. Those therefore who are 'vain by nature' have remained so through their own fault, and chiefly because they have blinded themselves voluntarily to the evident existence of 'him that is', a title taken from Ex 3:14, 'I am who am'. First of all those are considered who think the forces of nature or the like to be 'the gods that rule the world'; whereas they ought to have been able to reason from them 'analogously' to their Creator. 5. 'Is beheld analogously' means by an argument from the less to the greater; and the author appears to be coining two words in 3 and 5 in order to bring out the full sense of 'Creator'.

And now he brushes aside an excuse: 'perhaps but little blame' attaches to this category: such men were anxious to find God, and were dazzled by the beauty of what they saw. 8. But no, he answers, even men of this category are not to be excused; for if they were able to find out so much about the world (which seems to show that he has the ancient philosophers and other students of nature especially in view), how was it that they did not find out all the sooner the Lord of all these things?

c 10-XIV 11 The Worship of Men's Handiwork—Those in the next category are in a far worse way, and are in a condition as hopeless as that of corpses. These are they who make gods of gold or silver or stone or wood. And the author goes on to elaborate Is 44:9-20 with bitter irony. Out of the remains of a piece of wood, of which he can make nothing further of any use, he takes a bit, (13) 'crooked and full of knots', and proceeds in his leisure moments to carve it into the shape of a man, 'or likens it to some paltry beast', making a little shrine for it, which he fastens on the wall with a nail (16) for fear it should fall, 'knowing that it is unable to help itself'. And then he is not ashamed to pray for life to that which is dead—and so forth. Again (XIV:1), another, 'about to journey through the raging waves, calleth upon a piece of wood more rotten than the vessel which carrieth him'.

d No, it is Divine Providence that is really watching over the ship; for our author even in all his bitterness never quite lets go of his principle: (11:24, 27) 'Thou hast mercy upon all men . . . and overlookest the sins of men, that they may repent. . . Thou sparest all things, because they are thine, O Lord, lover of souls'. Human wisdom built the ship for gain, but God's providence guides it through the waves, so that (5) 393d men entrust their lives even to a very small piece of wood, and passing through the surge on a raft reach safety'. The reference is probably to some practice of the Egyptian sailors or fishermen. The word 'raft' seems to be used depreciatingly of the frailty of the boat compared to the force of the sea; it is used again at once (6) of Noe's ark, the supreme and blessed example of God's providence in this kind. 7-10. But the wood fashioned to be a god is accursed, as well as he who so fashioned it; both shall have their punishment. The idols appear to be identified with the devils who have, so to speak, identified themselves with the idols: cf. Jer 10:14-15, which may well have been in the author's mind, and Deut 32:17, this latter quoted in 1 Cor 10:20. 11. 'For this reason there shall be a visitation of the idols of the gentiles, because they have become an abomination in the guise of God's creatures', i.e. the devils have misused God's creatures and made abominations of them by taking possession of them and causing them to be worshipped. The 'no' in Vg should be omitted. XIV 12-21 The Worship of Rulers—Egypt was the chief source and centre of ruler-worship in the Mediterranean world. The Pharaohs had been gods to their subjects, and it was chiefly in order to step into their shoes that Alexander the Great came to claim divinity and worship. His successors followed his example, especially (as was to be expected) the Ptolemies in Egypt. From these Hellenistic kings it passed to the Roman Emperors. The author was familiar with the Egyptian worship, and attacks this species of idolatry also. 12. 'The devising of idols was the beginning of fornication'. This last word was itself understood in Holy Scripture to signify idolatry, partly because Israel was Yahweh's chosen bride, partly because of the impurity usually connected with idolatry. But here it probably has simply its frequent sense of impurity in general. It was the 'vanity of men' (i.e. of rulers) that brought this third kind of idolatry into the world; (14) 'and it was devised on account of their abrupt end'. This last clause presupposes an ancient and simple emendation of the text, fitting well into what follows, in place of a text otherwise hardly intelligible. 15. The abuse began with such cases as that of an afflicted father, mourning for a son prematurely lost to him; he would make an image of his son, and proceed to honour him as a god, and enjoin such rites upon his dependents. (Such, it may be remarked, was Cicero's purpose in regard of his daughter Tullia.) 16-17. And thus in course of time by order of the rulers their images came to be worshipped, so that when they were far off they were still flattered as present. In fact worship went further still: (19-20) for the artist, 'wishing perhaps to please the ruler, forced by his art the likeness to greater beauty' than the ruler really possessed, and the multitude were allured by the grace of the work to worship him. 21. And this became 'a snare' for men, who under the pressure 'either of misfortune or tyranny' invested stones or wood with 'the incommunicable name', by which is not meant the name 'Yahweh', which the Jews never pronounced, but probably the title 'God' itself, which can never be shared by creatures.

22-31 The Fruits of Idolatry—Having thus enumerated the three chief kinds of idolatry current in his time, the writer dwells upon its evil consequences: (27) it is 'the beginning and cause and extreme of every evil', and (30) 'a just doom shall pursue' idolaters. With this section may be compared Rom 1:24-32, a passage doubtless based in part upon this one; but it is peculiar to St Paul to assert that God delivered up to these vices those who refused to recognize him (Rom 1:24, 26, 28).

22. Living in a great war produced by their ignorance (by which appears to be meant the wild and disturbed manner of life described in what follows), they call such great evils peace: (23) the ritual murder of children (such as we read of in the OT), secret rites, 'the frantic revels of strange ordinances' in the Greek or Asiatic mysteries, murder, adultery, robbery and the 393f rest. 26. 'Forgetfulness of God' implies a wrong reading and should rather be 'forgetfulness of benefits received': 'disorder in marriage' may refer to marriage of sisters; cf. § 390b. 29. Trusting lifeless idols, men anticipate no punishment for perjury; but punishment will come, both for the idolatry and the perjury. 31. Not the power of their false gods, but due justice will follow them.

g XV 1-19 The Making of Idols—1-6. After touching briefly upon the freedom of Israel from idolatry (7-13) the writer dwells upon the wickedness of making idols (14-17) and the folly of those who believe in them.

1-8. God is 'our God . . . even if we sin, we are thine . . . but we shall not sin, knowing that we are reckoned thine. For to know thee is perfect righteousness'. Israel has not been led astray by idols; (6) they who make them and they who desire them and they who worship them are all 'lovers of evil things'. 7-8. Such a one is the potter, who among other things makes a god out of earth, even as he himself was made out of earth and shall return thither. What he is anxious about is not his toil or his short life, but the fact that he is competing with workers in gold and silver and bronze, and he thinks it to his credit to be making 'counterfeits'. 10-11. 'His hope is more worthless than earth', his material, because he knows not his Maker. 12. He reckons life a mere plaything, a fair at which to make profit, 'for, saith he, one must get rich as best one can, even by evil means'. 13. 'This man beyond all others knoweth that he sinneth'.

h 14-15. 'But the enemies [i.e. the Egyptians] of thy people, who oppress them are more foolish than all, and miserable beyond the soul of a babe, because they regard all the idols of the gentiles as gods'; and the writer inserts an obvious reference to Ps 113 (2nd part): 4-7; 134:15-17. 16. 'No man can make an image like to himself', (17) being in fact better than the objects of his worship; for he is alive, which they can never be. 18. Moreover the Egyptians worship the most hateful creatures, 'for compared in brutishness they are worse than the other' animals, (19) nor are they by any chance beautiful, so as (viewed as beasts) to be desired; but they have eluded [apparently an ironical word] both the praise of God [for any beauty they might have possessed] and his blessing, because they serve as idols.

394a PART V ehh 16-19. The Egyptians and Israelites—A contrast is worked out in various ways between God's treatment of the Egyptians and of the Israelites. It is not clear that what is related need always be taken as absolute historical fact. There is in any case admitted to be a considerable amount of fiction in the book, which in outward expression is written by Solomon for other kings. The narrative itself is so strange as naturally to provoke the suspicion that here too there is some fiction; and Catholic historians of the OT and commentators on the Pentateuch do not appear to feel bound to incorporate the details from this book. It may be conforming to a well-known type of Jewish literature known by the Hebrew name of 'midrash'. The substantial reasons required by the Biblical Commission for such an interpretation (23 June, 1905) may well seem fulfilled.

b XVI 1-29 The Contrast in Divine Punishments—1-3. It was right that worshippers of the contemptible animals indicated in 15:18-19 should be 'tormented' by a multitude of such beasts so disgusting as to turn them even from necessary food, while the Israelites were regaled with a pleasant diet of quails (cf. Ex 16:13; Num 11:31-35). 5-8. Even when the serpents came among them, 'they were troubled but a short time for their correction', for those who looked upon the brazen serpent were saved (Num 21:9), not through any virtue of its own, but by God, the Saviour of all, who thus showed the Egyptians that it is he who delivers from every evil. The Egyptians died from the bites of locusts and flies (cf. Ex 8:24; 10:4); (10-11) but even venomous serpents did not overcome the Israelites, 'for they were bitten to remind them of divine oracles', and were quickly healed. 12-13. 'For it was neither herb 394b nor ointment that healed them, but thy word, O Lord, which healeth all things; for thou hast power over life and death'. The bites were sufficient to kill the Israelites, but God saved them; (14) when man deals a mortal stroke (lit. 'kills') he cannot call back the soul. There does not seem to be a reference to God raising the dead; the context does not demand it, and the author would speak clearly if he meant to propound so great a truth.

Not only animals, but also fire and water punished the Egyptians, but had no power against the Israelites. 16. The former were 'pursued by strange rains and fire' (cf. Ex 9:24), (17-18) which latter even prevailed over the waters, only refraining from the animals sent against the Egyptians (probably based partly on Ex 9:26), (19) while burning up the products of their land in spite of all the water (cf. Ex 9:25). 20. The Israelites on the other hand were fed miraculously with the manna, which (though more or less of the nature of ice: cf. 19:20) did not melt. It is called 'the food of angels' either as being ministered by them (Cornely-Zorell), or as supporting human life without human effort in the same way that Almighty God maintains the angels in being without labour on their part. In this way it is a type of the Holy Eucharist, which is freely bestowed to maintain our supernatural life (cf. Jn 6:49 f.). 22-24. Thus snow and ice and fire showed in a like miraculous way how 'creation, serving thee its Maker, straineth itself to punish the unrighteous, and restrains itself for the benefit of those who trust in thee'. 28. The author returns to the topic of the manna, which was to teach the Israelites not to trust in crops, but in God's word, and to rise before the sun to thank and petition him.

d XVII 1-XVIII 4 Darkness and Light—The horrors of the Egyptian darkness are vividly depicted; it was the ninth plague (Ex 10:21-23). 3. The Egyptians, 'thinking to escape notice with their secret sins under the dark curtain of forgetfulness, were plunged in darkness'. This last verb seems a better reading than 'were scattered', because in the preceding verse they were 'shut in under their roofs'. 4-5. They were 'troubled by spectres' and strange noises and gloomy phantoms; no fire nor stars could give them light. 6 perhaps refers to flashes of lightning, so terrifying that they exaggerated in the darkness the things which they had for an instant beheld, 'being terrified by that sight when they saw it not'. Their magic was of no avail, and their vaunted wisdom was put to shame; (9) even when there was nothing to affright them, they perished with fear of the passing beasts and of the hissing reptiles. 11. 'For fear is nothing else but a yielding up of the succours of thought'. 12. The hope from within, founded upon reason, being all too slight, a man is more alarmed by his own ignorance than by the cause of his trouble, as when the Egyptians were alarmed at a powerless night which came from an equally powerless Hades. 13. That they should further be described as 'sleeping the same sleep' is puzzling, but seems to refer to their enforced rest during the three days of Ex 10:22. 14-15. They were molested by portentous apparitions, and 'were paralysed by the soul's surrender' to panic, (18) and collapsed (wherever they happened to be) into a very prison of darkness, swooning for fear at any and every noise. 19. For the whole world was lit up clearly, and engaged in unhindered labours; (20) the Egyptians alone were in heavy night, an image of the darkness awaiting them in the next world, and in their terror they were more grievous to themselves even than the darkness.

● XVIII 1-2. But the Israelites enjoyed bright light; and the Egyptians, who heard but did not see them, counted them happy, and were grateful that the Israelites did not take revenge upon them, 'and because they had been at variance with them, supplicated them' to depart (Ex 11:8; this translation 'been at variance' is not certain). 3. The Israelites on their side had a burning pillar of fire as a guide (Ex 13:21, etc.), and a 'harmless sun in their honourable exile' in the wilder-

394e ness. 4. The Egyptians deserved to be imprisoned in darkness for having kept the Israelites shut up, 'through whom the incorruptible light of the Law was to be given to the world'.

395a XVIII 5-25 Retributive Justice—The theme of this section is shortly announced in 5: the Egyptians planned to kill the Israelite babies, but God, having saved Moses, destroyed the firstborn of the Egyptians in the last plague, and all the host of the Egyptians in the Red Sea. This last destruction may also be intended to be taken as a fitting punishment, on the supposition that the Hebrew babies were being killed in the way intended in the case of Moses. 6-7. The Hebrews had 'received' the news beforehand of the impending salvation of the righteous and destruction of the wicked. 9. They gathered secretly to offer the passover, 'and with one accord set forth what the divine law required', sharing blessings and dangers together, 'while the fathers were already intoning praises'. 10-11. In contrast they heard the shouting of the Egyptians, and their lamentations for their firstborn. Master suffered with servant, and the king with the common people. 12. The corpses were without number, too many to be buried, and included the sons of the noblest families. 13. The magicians had made them disbelieve, but the destruction of the firstborn caused them to confess Israel for God's son, cf. Ex 4:22.

b 14-16. There follows a passage of great poetical beauty, telling how in the silence of midnight, 'thine almighty Word leapt down from thy royal throne in heaven, a stern warrior into the midst of the doomed land . . . and he filled all things with death'. This passage has often been applied to the Incarnation, for which so strong a personification of the Word of God certainly prepared the way; but Christ came to save, not to destroy. 17-19. Then the Egyptians with evil dreams and unlooked-for fears, thrown down half dead, manifested the cause of their death, which had been revealed to them in the dreams.

c 20-21. It is true that the Israelites also had some experience of the punishment of death from the plague (Num 16:44-50), and a multitude were killed; but God's anger did not last for long, for Aaron hastened to pray for the people, and to propitiate the Lord with the burning of incense, 'showing that he was thy servant'. 22. The Greek continues, 'He overcame the multitude', which hardly makes sense, but we should probably read, by a mere transposition of two letters, 'he overcame the wrath', much as in 23 ('beat back the wrath'), 'the wrath' being thus almost personified (after the manner of the author) and identified with 'the punisher' (22) and 'the destroyer' (25), evidently to be understood as an angel. Aaron 'stood between the dead and the living' (Num 16:48), and blocked the further progress of the plague by means of prayer and incensation (21); also, it is implied (24), by the majesty of his vestments and mitre (or turban), for which see Ex 28. The writer finds a typical meaning in robe and mitre different from that of Josephus (Ant. 3, 7, 7) and Philo (Life of Moses, 3, 11-14: and elsewhere), who interpret the high-priest's garments to represent the several parts of nature. 25. To all these 'the destroyer yielded', and the Israelites 'regarded them with awe'; a mere trial of God's wrath was enough for them, though not for the Egyptians.

d XIX 1-20 The Crossing of the Red Sea—Upon the Egyptians came pitiless wrath, until they were finally drowned in the Red Sea. 2. For God knew beforehand how, 'having changed their mind about the departure' of the Israelites (this translation is somewhat uncertain), they would pursue those whom they had sped on their way. 4. For a fate (lit. 'necessity') well deserved drew them on to this end, and made them forget what had already befallen them, in order that they might have their full punishment. 6. 'For the whole creation in its several kinds was fashioned again from above', displaying miraculous activities in obedience to the divine command: (7) a cloud overshadowed the Hebrew camp, a clear way appeared through the Red Sea, a grassy plain was seen in place of the raging waves. 8-10. The Israelites crossed with wonder and joy, remembering also how Egypt had brought forth lice in place of cattle (cf. Ex 8:17), and the Nile, frogs instead of fish; (11-12) for their own comfort a little later there came quails from the sea (cf. 16:1-3).

The guilt of the Egyptians is further brought out by comparison with that of the men of Sodom, whom however the author (after his wont) does not actually name; cf. Gen 19. 13. The Sodomites were inhospitable to strangers (i.e. to the two angels), but the Egyptians enslaved benefactors (the reference is especially to Joseph). 14-15. 'And not only so, but the visitation', i.e. punishment, of the Egyptians, 'shall be of another sort', i.e. much severer (such seems the best reading and sense), since the Sodomites received as enemies those who were strangers, whereas the Egyptians, 'having welcomed with feastings those who already shared the same rights as themselves' thereupon 'vexed them with grievous labours'. 16. Just as the Sodomites were stricken with blindness at Lot's door, so the Egyptians, unable to see in the immense darkness which encompassed them ('immense' is an uncertain rendering) sought a way through their own doors. The writer, as is his way, presents one side of the picture, even putting forward the Sodomites as in some way superior to the Egyptians, and saying nothing of their sin, any more than he tells the full story of the quails in 19:12; 16:1-3; cf. Ps 77:30-31, etc.

17. The author now appears to hark back to the thought of 6, but sense and grammar are alike difficult. A comparison is made to a psalter, probably a triangular stringed instrument with base and sounding-board above, struck downwards with a plectrum. Each string keeps its own sound, but the tune is determined by the various combinations of notes. Even so (it appears to be meant) the different elements changed their mutual relations. 18. 'For land-creatures became water-creatures', apparently referring to the Israelites and their cattle crossing the Red Sea, 'and swimming creatures passed on to the earth', meaning the frogs (Ex 8:3): (19) 'fire retained its own power in water, and water forgot its power to quench', as set forth in 16:17, 19. 20. 'Contrariwise, the flames did not waste the flesh of easily corruptible animals that walked in them'; this harks back to 16:18. 'Nor did they melt the easily melted ice-like grains of ambrosial food', the manna, already by implication compared to ice in 16:22; cf. Ex 16:14.

The author concludes with the thought which has dominated the book as a whole, and especially the third and fourth parts: 'For in all things, O Lord, thou didst magnify and glorify thy people, and didst not overlook them, standing by them at every time and place'.

b Title and Canonicity—The evidence of the Heb. subscription to ch 51, of the rabbinical citations, and of the Gk and Syr. versions suggests that Ecclus early bore the title The Wisdom-Book of Ben Sirach. In Latin the title Ecclesiasticus is found already in St Cyprian, Testim. II. 1, PL 4, 696, etc. Rufinus, who excluded it from the canon, explains this as meaning of ecclesiastical authority only, not canonical. It was a church book also in the sense that it was used with others as a handbook of moral training for catechumens (Athanas. Ep. fest. 39, PG 26, 1177; 1437; Orig. In Num., Hom. 27, PG 12, 780). In liturgical use it has, in common with Prov, Eccl, Cant, Wis, the generic title Liber Sapientiae. As regards Canonicity Ecclus has the same history as the other deuterocanonical books of OT. See §§ 14, 15.

c Text and Versions—The original Heb. text grew rare once Ecclus was excluded from the Jewish canon. It was still known in Jerome's time and not unknown even in the 11th cent. A.D. It then disappeared and was not again available until the discovery of about two-thirds of it in one form or another amongst the MSS of the Cairo Geniza in 1896 and following years; cf. *P. E. Kahle, Cairo Geniza (1947) 1-11. For nomenclature of these MSS—A, B, C, D—and details of the portions of the text they offer, see Oesterley, lxxxix f. For MS E, covering 32:16 (Vg 18)-34:1, see *Marcus, Newly discovered Original of Ben Sira, Philadelphia, 1931. Critical study of the MSS and of quotations in rabbinical literature shows that already before 132 B.C. the Heb. text existed in at least two recensions. The evidence of Gk, Syr. and Latin versions strongly confirms this conclusion. These recensions are here called Primary and Secondary Text. See § 396g.

d All MSS of the Greek Version, through a misplacement in their archetype, follow a wrong order in chh 30:26-36:18. The Latin, followed by DV, AV, RV, preserves the true order, as do Heb., Syr. and Armenian (Swete, OT in Gk, II, 1907², p vi f.). Following the cleavage in the Heb. MS tradition, there are two recensions of Gk. The Primary Gk, made by the author's grandson (see Prologue), represents Primary Heb. It is found in the main uncial MSS of LXX, such as A, B, Sin, and in nearly all printed editions of LXX, and underlies RV. The Secondary Gk, made as early as 80 B.C. (?) from Secondary Heb. is found in cursive MS 248 (ed. by Hart with apparatus from supporting MSS 55, 70, 106, 253, 254), and in the Complutensian Polyglot, and underlies AV and Latin with DV.

The Latin Version, here called Vg, is in fact the Old Latin, originating in N. Africa early in 3rd cent. A.D., and left untouched by St Jerome. See § 27a-d. It was made from a MS of Primary Gk which had been emended to agree with a MS of Secondary Heb. In many passages Vg offers evidence, not now available in any Gk MS, for characteristic readings of Secondary Gk.

There are two Syriac Versions. The Peshitta Syriac (see § 24h-i) was made c. A.D. 200, probably by a Christian. It was made from a Heb. text of a purer form than any now known, but was subsequently altered to agree with a Gk MS of Secondary type. It contains large portions insufficiently represented in Gk and Latin, and missing from Heb. The Syro-Hexaplar (see § 25b) probably represents Origen's critical work on the Gk text. (Collation by Hart, 73 ff.)

Secondary Text: Character and Inspiration—A rough idea of the differences between the Primary and Secondary Texts can be had by comparing RV (substantially Primary) with AV or DV (substantially Secondary). A number of the differences are purely scribal: marginal glosses, explanatory expansions, alternative readings or renderings (technically called 'doublets') of one original text. But there are also many editorial additions incorporated in the Secondary Text. A small number of these are Christian glosses, adapting Ecclus to its function as a church handbook. But the greater number are pre-Christian supplements, intended to emphasize a certain theological outlook which the editor or editors thought insufficiently represented in the Primary Text. They stress in particular the spiritual nature of creatures; the value of the individual soul and the human person; the part repentance can play in undoing sin, God's appreciation of such repentance, and his part in bringing it about. Above all they supplement the rudimentary eschatology of the Primary Text by stressing the ideas of judgement at or after death, of conscious survival in the next world, of the moral aspects of human immortality, of lasting punishment and reward beyond the grave. (E.g. 6:23; 15:8; 16:22; 17:25; 18:22; 20:4; 24:46.)

That these secondary additions, whilst not the work of the original writer, are nevertheless inspired is the view taken in the present commentary. (Compare the view taken by many of Jn 7:53-8:11.) Ecclus is thus equated with the Pentateuch, concerning which it may (theologically speaking) be freely held that in the form in which it has come down to us it contains not only glosses and explanatory notes inserted in the text, but also additions by an inspired author made after the time of Moses, § 48d. The Western Church has received Ecclus in a form which exhibits most of the characteristic Secondary features, viz. the Vg (or Old Latin, as it really is), so there is good ground for maintaining their canonicity. The Council of Trent has declared canonical all the 'parts' of the Vg (EB 45). And it would be hard to deny to many of the additions the right to be called parts—integral parts—of Ecclus as we have it in the Vg, since it would be doctrinally the poorer if these passages were shorn away.

Authorship and Date—The data of the Prologue, of 50:29 and 51:1 in Vg, of 50:27 in LXX, and of 50:27

396h and colophon after ch 51 in Heb. (in the last two of which the name 'Simeon' is critically suspect), show that the author's name was Yēšua' (Gk 'Jesus'), his father's name Eleazer, and his grandfather's Sirach. In Heb. idiom he is often called Yēšua' ben Sirach 'Jesus son of Sirach'; or simply Ben Sirach. The Prologue, and various passages of his book (34:9-13; 38:25; 39:1-5; 50:29; 51:3-5, 18, 31, 37), show him as an inhabitant of Jerusalem, a member of the scribal class, with the necessary wealth and leisure to devote himself in his youth entirely to the study of the Scriptures which he loved; as one who in his maturity travelled abroad, mixed with high society, found employment with some foreign potentate (in the course of which he escaped providentially from a mortal danger which a slanderous conspiracy had raised against him); as one, finally, who in later years settled in Jerusalem and opened a school for the scriptural and moral instruction of his younger fellow-countrymen, and composed the present work. For his doctrinal purpose and outlook see §§ 396i, 397. As to the date at which he wrote, the Prologue shows his grandson to have been of mature age 'in the 38th year when (Ptolemy) Euergetes was king'. This is best taken as meaning the 38th year of Euergetes II, 132 B.C. The grandfather, Ben Sirach, would have flourished 60 or 50 years previously, i.e. 190-180 B.C. This fits in with his ref. in 50:1 ff. to 'Simon the son of Onias (al. Ionias)' in such a way as to show he had known him and that he was dead when this was written. The high-priest referred to was Simeon II, son of Jochanan II. He held office c. 219-196 B.C. This confirms 190-180 B.C. as the date of writing. For the historical background this date implies see § 68b-c, and cf. on 35:22 ff.
